Response 1 (Jamie Clifford)

I concur that school to work transition is a good example of an educational setting while community-based counseling is an instance of a community setting in career development interventions. In comparison, both school-to-work changeover and community-based counseling tend to embrace career development interventions based on the school counseling specialty. In this regard, indeed, career development in both education settings, as well as community setting, are mutually influenced by parental inspiration also known as learning from the setting. Here, parents influence young people through either negative or positive inspiration. For instance, a negative influence could entail; If the parents struggled to get through the education system otherwise finances, they might influence a young person to resolve never to follow their trail. Besides, I accede that both career development interventions in the community setting, as well as educational settings, could be influenced by role models. Here, youths may acquire useful information on career goals pursuit from role models through social support.

Subsequently, it is clear that by contrast, the two settings differ in several ways too. Based on influence, career development in an education setting could be influenced by individual career curiosity. Also, I concur that in the education setting, there is a need for young people to make decisions on their majors before completing high school. Similarly, based on the latter setting, young people tend to commence post-high school education two to five years after. Alternatively, I agree that for counselors working in the community setting such as community counseling depicted above, they need to be equipped with competent skills in cases of administration, organization, advocacy as well as consultation. On the flip side, a counselor in the education setting should consider developing proactive personality, career adaptability, entrepreneurship, boundaryless mentality as well as calling and making meaning which is true according to me.

I assent that based on education setting as well as young populace, diverse multicultural considerations pertain to them. For instance, in China, Hong Kong, Korea, Iran and Singapore, their career development interventions revolve around career adaptability. Contrarily, in Philippines and China, career development interventions are profoundly influenced through social support emanating from parents to a large extent.
