Introduction

Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) is a Canadian federal organization that was tasked with administering foreign aid programs in developing countries. We chose this organization because its core objective has been to reduce poverty, promote human rights, and most importantly support sustainable development. At the same time, we are also international students studying and living in Canada. CIDA has made a significant impact and strides in delivering services to the children at the international levels. It is an organization to be applauded for the remarkable progress it has made in the field. CIDA made efforts to get more children to school especially in developing countries. Additionally, it was primarily involved in the provision of effective lifesaving interventions that led to a significant decline in child mortality globally. Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) is an organization that has shown dedication and goodwill to help the children in the developing world. The organization has also single-handedly been able to address various health gaps in the African health system by offering finance as well as supporting various national strategies to address these gaps. CIDA has, without doubt, made tremendous contributions to supporting the wellbeing of families and children in the world.

History

The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) is an organization that was founded in 1968 under the leadership of Lester B. Pearson, who was by then the Prime Minister of Canada. This federal government agency was tasked with the administration of most of Canada's official co-operation programs majorly in the countries that were undergoing transition and the developing countries. During its formation, CIDA was under the Department of Foreign Affairs, Trade, and Development. CIDA's mission is "Lead Canada's international efforts to help people living in poverty. The organization has the objective of making sure that Canada's aid was the most focused and accountable to enhance the effectiveness of the provided assistance. The priorities set were also to increase food security, stimulating economic growth that was sustainable and securing the future of youth and children.

CIDA's mission statement is:

CIDA supports sustainable development activities in order to reduce poverty and to contribute to a more secure, equitable and prosperous world. Development is a complex, long-term process that involves all of the world's people, governments and organizations at all levels. Working with partners in the private and public sectors in Canada and in developing countries, and with international organizations and agencies, we support foreign aid projects in more than 100 of the poorest countries of the world. The objective: to work with developing countries and countries in transition to develop the tools to eventually meet their own needs (Canadian International Development Agency).

In 2013, CIDA was later merged with the Department of Foreign Affairs under the leadership of Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Governance

Framework:

As of 2006, the agency had 2336 classified positions and approximately 1700 full-time employees. Minister of International cooperation includes president's office, executive vice-president's office. Under these are senior vice-president's office and Canada Corps. It has Africa branch, America branch, Asia branch, Canadian Partnership branch, Human Resources and Corporate services branch, Policy branch, Multilateral programs branch, Europe, Middle East and Maghreb branch, Information Management and Technology branch, communications branch, and Performance and Knowledge Management branch.

The Canadian government ran the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) under the Department of Foreign Affairs, Trade, and Development. CIDA also had a variety of partners who assisted in the delivery of similar programs. Some of the projects handled by CIDA were through government-to-government agreements while others were managed and supported by Canadian Partners. CIDA also partnered with the World Bank, UNICEF, World Bank, and African Development Bank, among other international organizations to push the humanitarian agendas successfully.
