I do think that Bartleby's actions were expressed in a way of his over exhausting life style. With perfecting his work as a scrivener adding more to his work load was a lot easier said than done. With his magic words he said it can be seen as an act of non violent protesting. With Bartleby saying his words in a very mannerism way made his boss sit back and think for a moment on his next play. Throughout the story Bartleby's form of protesting was successful to a point of where it did get him out of situations with his boss but in the end he did lose the battle with death. Even though Bartleby did have other issues I think it would have been easier if he had just complied with his boss.
