I did not know that each member came from other parts of the U.S. to work in factories in Detroit. Not too long till each had met each other to form a band in a record company. I liked the idea of if you play it and don't feel it then don't play it. I feel that is true everywhere as why would anyone want to do anything they don't like to do. What I got from this is that the funk brothers had a more full or lively sound to them when they played a song. I think I can hear this as they play very meaningful and know each other's part well. I think it probably sucked for them. They had to be only the part that played the music part but also had one or two chances for them to have a perfect recording. But also for the funk brothers not to be known it was them that helped the singer to become big resulting them not really being recognized for the music part. I would not have thought their name came from their drummer and it had stuck with them.
