

Example Introduction

The transition from high school to college or university attendance represents a major life stressor for most students. Leaving home and moving to a dormitory or shared student residency during late adolescence is a major disruption to existing family and friendship relations. First-year students also have to deal with changing familial and societal roles involving greater independence. Furthermore, first year students often encounter more difficult courses that demand not only attendance at lectures, tutorials, and laboratory experiences, but also a great deal of independent coursework requiring diligent and adept time management skills.

Example (continuation)

