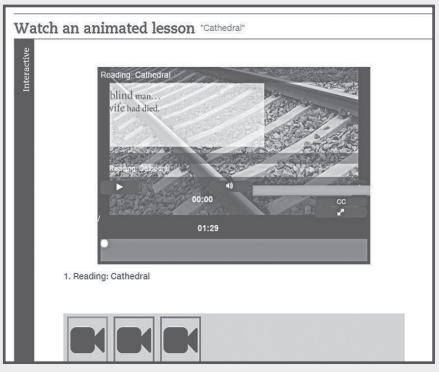
ELEVENTH EDITION

LITERATURE FOR COMPOSITION



An Introduction to Literature

SYLVAN BARNET WILLIAM BURTO WILLIAM E. CAIN CHERYL NIXON

REVEL™ for Literature for Composition

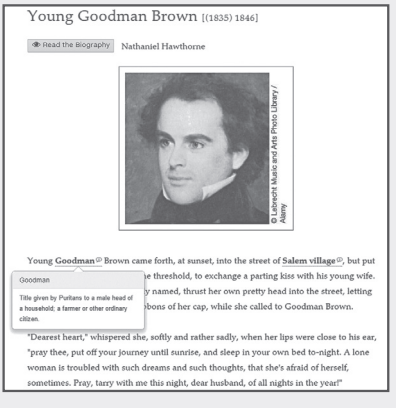
REVEL™ is Pearson's newest way of delivering our respected content. Fully digital and highly engaging, REVEL™ offers an immersive learning experience designed for the way today's students read, think, and learn. Enlivening course content with media interactives and assessments, REVEL™ empowers educators to increase engagement with the course and to connect better with students.

Video and Rich Multimedia Content

Videos, audio recordings, animations, and multimedia instruction provide context that enables students to engage with the text in a more meaningful way.

Interactive Readings and Exercises



Students explore readings through interactive texts. Robust annotation tools allow students to take notes, and post-reading assignments let instructors monitor their students' completion of readings before class begins.

Just-in-Time Context

Just-in-time context—encompassing biographical, historical, and social insights—is incorporated throughout, giving students a deeper understanding of what they read.

Integrated Writing Assignments

Minimal-stakes, low-stakes, and high-stakes writing tasks allow students multiple opportunities to interact with the ideas presented in the reading assignments, ensuring that they come to class better prepared.

Visit www.pearsonhighered.com/revel for more information.

This page intentionally left blank

ELEVENTH EDITION

Literature for Composition

An Introduction to Literature

Sylvan Barnet
Tufts University

William Burto
University of Massachusetts at Lowell

William E. Cain
Wellesley College

Cheryl L. Nixon
University of Massachusetts at Boston

PEARSON

Boston Columbus Indianapolis New York San Francisco
Amsterdam Cape Town Dubai London Madrid Milan Munich Paris Montréal Toronto
Dehli Mexico City São Paulo Sydney Hong Kong Seoul Singapore Taipei Toyko

This work is solely for the use of instructors and administrators for the purpose of teaching courses and assessing student learning. Unauthorized dissemination, publication or sale of the work, in whole or in part (including posting on the internet) will destroy the integrity of the work and is strictly prohibited.

Senior Editor: Brad Potthoff
Senior Development Editor: Anne Brunell Ehrenworth
Program Manager: Eric Jorgensen
Product Marketing Manager: Nicholas T. Bolt
Field Marketing Manager: Joyce Nilsen
Media Producer: Elizabeth Bravo
Content Producer: Julia Pomann
Media Editor: Christine Stavrou
Project Manager: Donna Campion
Text Design, Project Coordination, and Electronic Page Makeup: Cenveo® Publisher Services Program Design Lead: Barbara Atkinson
Cover Designer: Cenveo Publisher® Services
Cover Illustration: marcusaires/Fotolia
Senior Manufacturing Buyer: Roy L. Pickering, Jr.
Printer/Binder: RR Donnelley/Crawfordsville
Cover Printer: Phoenix Color/Hagerstown

Acknowledgments of third-party content appear on pages 1417–1426, which constitute an extension of this copyright page.

PEARSON, ALWAYS LEARNING, and MYWRITINGLAB are exclusive trademarks owned by Pearson Education, Inc. or its affiliates in the United States and/or other countries.

Unless otherwise indicated herein, any third-party trademarks that may appear in this work are the property of their respective owners and any references to third-party trademarks, logos, or other trade dress are for demonstrative or descriptive purposes only. Such references are not intended to imply any sponsorship, endorsement, authorization, or promotion of Pearson's products by the owners of such marks, or any relationship between the owner and Pearson Education, Inc., or its affiliates, authors, licensees, or distributors.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Names: Barnet, Sylvan, editor. | Burto, William, editor. | Cain, William E., date-editor. | Pearson, Cheryl L. Nixon, editor.
Title: Literature for composition : an introduction to literature / [edited by] Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, Cheryl L. Nixon Pearson.
Description: Eleventh edition. | Boston : Pearson, 2016. | Previous editions had other title information: essays, stories, poems, and plays. | Includes bibliographical references and index.
Identifiers: LCCN 2015048640 | ISBN 9780134099149 (student edition) | ISBN 0134099141 (student edition) | ISBN 9780134101774 (exam copy) | ISBN 0134101774 (exam copy)
Subjects: LCSH: College readers. | English language—Rhetoric—Problems, exercises, etc. | Criticism—Authorship—Problems, exercises, etc. | Academic writing—Problems, exercises, etc.
Classification: LCC PE1417 .L633 2016 | DDC 808/.0427—dc23
LC record available at http://lccn.loc.gov/2015048640

Copyright © 2017, 2014, 2011 by Pearson Education, Inc.

All Rights Reserved. Printed in the United States of America. This publication is protected by copyright, and permission should be obtained from the publisher prior to any prohibited reproduction, storage in a retrieval system, or transmission in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise. For information regarding permissions, request forms and the appropriate contacts within the Pearson Education Global Rights & Permissions Department, please visit www.pearsoned.com/permissions/.

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1—V055—19 18 17 16

Instructor's Review Copy ISBN 10: 0-13-410177-4
Instructor's Review Copy ISBN 13: 978-0-13-410177-4
Student Edition ISBN 10: 0-13-409914-1
Student Edition ISBN 13: 978-0-13-409914-9
A la Carte Edition ISBN 10: 0-13-431089-6
A la Carte Edition ISBN 13: 978-0-13-431089-3

PEARSON

www.pearsonhighered.com

Contents

Contents by Genre xxiii
Preface xxvii

PART I
Thinking Critically about Literature

CHAPTER 1 How to Write an Effective Essay about Literature: A Crash Course 1

The Basic Strategy 1
Reading Closely: Approaching a First Draft 2
✔ Checklist: Generating Ideas for a Draft 5
Writing and Revising: Achieving a Readable Draft 6
✔ Checklist: Writing and Revising a Draft 9
Revising: Working with Peer Review 9
Preparing the Final Draft 10

CHAPTER 2 How to Engage in Critical Thinking about Literature: A Crash Course 11

The Basic Strategy 11
What Is Critical Thinking? 12
How Do We Engage in Critical Thinking? 13
Close Reading 14
✔ Checklist: Close Reading 15
Analysis: Inquiry, Interpretation, Argument 15
Inquiry 16
✔ Checklist: Inquiry and Question-Asking 17
Interpretation 18
✔ Checklist: Interpretation 19
Argument 19
✔ Checklist: Argument 20
Comparison and Synthesis 21
✔ Checklist: Comparison and Synthesis 22
Revision and Self-Awareness 22
Standing Back: Kinds of Writing 23
Nonanalytical versus Analytical Writing 23

CHAPTER 3 The Writer as Reader 25

Reading and Responding 25
KATE CHOPIN • Ripe Figs 25
Reading as Re-creation 26
Reading for Understanding: Collecting Evidence and Making Reasonable Inferences 27
Reading with Pen in Hand: Close Reading and Annotation 28
Reading for Response: Recording First Reactions 29
Reading for Inquiry: Ask Questions and Brainstorm Ideas 30
Reading in Context: Identifying Your Audience and Purpose 31
From Reading to Writing: Developing an Analytical Essay with an Argumentative Thesis 32
Student Analytical Essay: "Images of Ripening in Kate Chopin's 'Ripe Figs'" 32
The Analytical Essay: Argument and Structure Analyzed 34
The Writing Process: From First Responses to Final Essay 35
Other Possibilities for Writing 37
From Reading to Writing: Moving from Brainstorming to Analytical Essay 37
BRUCE HOLLAND ROGERS • Three Soldiers 37
The Writing Process: From Response Writing to Final Essay 38
Student Analytical Essay: "Thinking about Three Soldiers Thinking" 39
The Analytical Essay: The Development of Ideas Analyzed 42
From Reading to Writing: Moving from Preliminary Outline to Analytical Essay 43
RAY BRADBURY • August 2026: There Will Come Soft Rains 43
The Writing Process: From Outlining to Final Essay 47
Student Analytical Essay: "The Lesson of 'August 2026'" 48
Your Turn: Additional Stories for Analysis 51
MICHELE SERROS • Senior Picture Day 51
HARUKI MURAKAMI • On Seeing the 100% Perfect Girl One Beautiful April Morning 56
JOHN UPDIKE • A & P 59

CHAPTER 4 The Reader as Writer 64

Developing Ideas through Close Reading and Inquiry 64
Getting Ideas 64
Annotating a Text 64
KATE CHOPIN • The Story of an Hour 65
Brainstorming Ideas 66
Focused Freewriting 67
Listing Ideas, Details, and Quotations 67
Asking Questions 68
Keeping a Journal 69
Developing a Thesis through Critical Thinking 70
Arguing with Yourself 70
Arguing a Thesis 71
✔ Checklist: The Thesis Sentence 72

From Reading to Writing to Revising: Drafting an Argument in an Analytical Essay 72
Student Analytical Essay: "Ironies in an Hour" (Preliminary Draft) 73
Revising an Argument 75
Outlining an Argument 75
Soliciting Peer Review, Thinking about Counterarguments 76
From Reading to Writing to Revising: Finalizing an Analytical Essay 77
Student Analytical Essay: "Ironies of Life in Kate Chopin's 'The Story of an Hour'" (Final Draft) 77
The Analytical Essay: The Final Draft Analyzed 80
From Reading to Writing to Revising: Drafting an Analytical Essay 80
KATE CHOPIN • Désirée's Baby 80
Student Analytical Essay: "Race and Identity in 'Désirée's Baby'" 84
From Reading to Writing to Revising: Drafting a Comparison Essay 87
KATE CHOPIN • The Storm 87
Student Comparison Essay: "Two New Women" 91
The Comparison Essay: Organization Analyzed 94
Your Turn: Additional Stories for Analysis 95
DAGOBERTO GILB • Love in L.A. 95
ELIZABETH TALLENT • No One's a Mystery 97
JUNOT DÍAZ • How to Date a Brown Girl (Black Girl, White Girl, or Halfie) 100
T. CORAGHESSAN BOYLE • Greasy Lake 103
MARY HOOD • How Far She Went 110

CHAPTER 5 The Pleasures of Reading, Writing, and Thinking about Literature 116

The Pleasures of Literature 116
ALLEN WOODMAN • Wallet 117
The Pleasures of Analyzing the Texts That Surround Us 118
The Pleasures of Authoring Texts 119
The Pleasures of Interacting with Texts 120
Interacting with Fiction: Literature as Connection 121
JAMAICA KINCAID • Girl 122
Personal Response Essay 123
Student Personal Response Essay: "The Narrator in Jamaica Kincaid's 'Girl': Questioning the Power of Voice" 123
Interacting with Graphic Fiction: Literature as (Making and Breaking) Rules 127
LYNDA BARRY • Before You Write 128
Interacting with Poetry: Literature as Language 129
JULIA BIRD • 14: a txt msg poM 130
BILLY COLLINS • Twitter Poem 131
Interacting with Drama: Literature as Performance 131
OSCAR WILDE • Excerpt from The Importance of Being Earnest 132
Interacting with Essays: Literature as Discovery 134
ANNA LISA RAYA • It's Hard Enough Being Me 135
Your Turn: Additional Poems, Stories, and Essay for Pleasurable Analysis 138

Poems
JIMMY SANTIAGO BACA • Green Chile 138
ALBERTO RIOS • Nani 140
WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS • This Is Just to Say 141
HELEN CHASIN • The Word Plum 142
GARY SOTO • Oranges 143
SARAH N. CLEGHORN • The Golf Links 145
STEVIE SMITH • Not Waving but Drowning 145
Stories
AMBROSE BIERCE • An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge 146
MARGARET ATWOOD • Happy Endings 153
Essay
GEORGE SAUNDERS • Commencement Speech on Kindness 156

PART II
Writing Arguments about Literature

CHAPTER 6 Close Reading: Paraphrase, Summary, and Explication 165

What Is Literature? 165
Literature and Form 165
Form and Meaning 167
ROBERT FROST • The Span of Life 167
Close Reading: Reading in Slow Motion 169
Exploring a Poem and Its Meaning 170
LANGSTON HUGHES • Harlem 170
Paraphrase 171
Summary 173
Explication 175
Working toward an Explication 176
Student Explication Essay: "Langston Hughes's 'Harlem'" 178
Explication as Argument 180
✔ Checklist: Drafting an Explication 182
Student Argumentative Explication Essay: "Giving Stamps Personality in 'Stamp Collecting'" 182
CATHY SONG • Stamp Collecting 183
Your Turn: Additional Poems for Explication 187
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE • Sonnet 73 188
JOHN DONNE • Holy Sonnet XIV 189
EMILY BRONTË • Spellbound 189
LI-YOUNG LEE • I Ask My Mother to Sing 190
RANDALL JARRELL • The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner 191

CHAPTER 7 Analysis: Inquiry, Interpretation, and Argument 192

Analysis 192
Understanding Analysis as a Process of Inquiry, Interpretation, and Argument 193
Analyzing a Story from the Hebrew Bible: The Judgment of Solomon 194
The Judgment of Solomon 194
Developing an Analysis of the Story 195
Opening Up Additional Ways to Analyze the Story 196
Analyzing a Story from the New Testament: The Parable of the Prodigal Son 197
The Parable of the Prodigal Son 198
Asking Questions that Trigger an Analysis of the Story 198
From Inquiry to Interpretation to Argument: Developing an Analytical Paper 199
ERNEST HEMINGWAY • Cat in the Rain 200
Close Reading 202
Inquiry Questions 203
Interpretation Brainstorming 204
The Argument-Centered Paper 205
Student Argument Essay: "Hemingway's American Wife" 206
From Inquiry to an Analytical Paper: A Second Example 208
Student Analytical Essay: "Hemingway's Unhappy Lovers" 210
Breaking Down the Analytical Essay 213
Choosing a Topic and Developing a Thesis 213
Developing an Argument 215
Introductory Paragraphs 215
Middle Paragraphs 217
Concluding Paragraphs 218
Coherence in Paragraphs: Using Transitions 219
✔ Checklist: Revising Paragraphs 219
From Inquiry to Interpretation to Argument: Organizing Ideas in an Analytical Paper 220
JAMES JOYCE • Araby 220
Finding and Organizing an Interpretation 224
Student Analytical Essay: "Everyday and Imagined Settings in 'Araby'" 226
From Inquiry to Interpretation to Argument: Maintaining an Interpretation in an Analytical Paper 231
APHRA BEHN • Song: Love Armed 231
Maintaining Interpretive Interest Notes 231
Student Analytical Essay: "The Double Nature of Love" 233
✔ Checklist: Editing a Draft 235
Your Turn: Additional Short Stories and Poems for Analysis 236
Stories
EDGAR ALLAN POE • The Cask of Amontillado 236
LESLIE MARMON SILKO • The Man to Send Rain Clouds 242
Poems
BILLY COLLINS • Introduction to Poetry 245
ROBERT FROST • The Road Not Taken 246

JOHN KEATS • Ode on a Grecian Urn 247
MARTÍN ESPADA • Bully 249

CHAPTER 8 Pushing Analysis Further: Reinterpreting and Revising 251

Interpretation and Meaning 251
Is the Author's Intention a Guide to Meaning? 252
What Characterizes a Sound Interpretation? 252
Interpreting Pat Mora's "Immigrants" 253
PAT MORA • Immigrants 254
✔ Checklist: Developing an Interpretation 255
Strategy #1: Pushing Analysis by Rethinking First Responses 255
JEFFREY WHITMORE • Bedtime Story 257
DOUGLAS L. HASKINS • Hide and Seek 258
MARK PLANTS • Equal Rites 258
Strategy #2: Pushing Analysis by Exploring Literary Form 259
✔ Checklist: Using Formal Evidence in an Analytical Essay 260
LANGSTON HUGHES • Mother to Son 261
Student Analytical Essay: "Accepting the Challenge of a Difficult Climb in Langston Hughes's 'Mother to Son'" 264
Strategy # 3: Pushing Analysis by Emphasizing Concepts and Insights 268
ROBERT FROST • Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening 269
Student Analytical Essay: "Stopping by Woods—and Going On" 270
Analyzing the Analytical Essay's Development of a Conceptual Interpretation 273
Student Analytical Essay: "'Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening' as a Short Story" 274
Strategy #4: Pushing Analysis through Revision 278
Revising for Ideas versus Mechanics 278
Revising Using Instructor Feedback, Peer Feedback, and Self-Critique 278
Examining a Preliminary Draft with Revision in Mind 279
HA JIN • Saboteur 280
Student Analytical Essay: "Morals in Ha Jin's 'Saboteur'" (Preliminary Draft) 287
Developing a Revision Strategy: Thesis, Ideas, Evidence, Organization, and Correctness 288
✔ Revision Checklist 289
Student Analytical Essay: "Individual and Social Morals in Ha Jin's 'Saboteur'" (Final Draft) 291
Your Turn: Additional Poems and Story for Interpretation 297
Poems
T. S. ELIOT • The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock 297
THOMAS HARDY • The Man He Killed 301
ANNE BRADSTREET • Before the Birth of One of Her Children 302
CHRISTINA ROSSETTI • After Death 303
FRED CHAPPELL • Narcissus and Echo 304

Story
JOYCE CAROL OATES • Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been? 305

CHAPTER 9 Comparison and Synthesis 317

Comparison and Critical Thinking 317
Organizing a Comparison Essay 318
Comparison and Close Reading 320
Comparison and Asking Questions 322
Comparison and Analyzing Evidence 323
Comparison and Arguing with Yourself 323
E. E. CUMMINGS • Buffalo Bill 's 324
✔ Checklist: Developing a Comparison 328
Synthesis through Close Reading: Analyzing a Revised Short Story 328
RAYMOND CARVER • Mine 329
RAYMOND CARVER • Little Things 330
Synthesis through Building a Concept Bridge: Connecting Two Poems 332
THYLIAS MOSS • Tornados 333
KWAME DAWES • Tornado Child 333
Synthesis Using Theme 336
SANDRA CISNEROS • Barbie-Q 337
MARYANNE O'HARA • Diverging Paths and All That 338
JAYNE ANNE PHILLIPS • Sweethearts 339
Synthesis Using Form 341
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE • Sonnet 18: Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day? 342
HOWARD MOSS • Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day? 342
Student Comparison Essay: "Condensing Shakespeare: A Comic Re-writing of a Shakespeare Sonnet" 342
✔ Checklist: Revising a Comparison 348
Your Turn: Additional Poems and Stories for Comparison and Synthesis 348
Carpe Diem ("Seize The Day") Poems
ROBERT HERRICK • To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time 348
CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE • The Passionate Shepherd to His Love 349
SIR WALTER RALEIGH • The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd 350
ANDREW MARVELL • To His Coy Mistress 351
JOHN DONNE • The Bait 353
Poems about Blackberries
GALWAY KINNELL • Blackberry Eating 354
SYLVIA PLATH • Blackberrying 355
SEAMUS HEANEY • Blackberry-Picking 356
YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA • Blackberries 357
Poems about America
WALT WHITMAN • I Hear America Singing 359
LANGSTON HUGHES • I, Too [Sing America] 359
Stories about Reading and Writing

JULIO CORTÁZAR • The Continuity of Parks 361
A. M. HOMES • Things You Should Know 362
Stories about Grandmothers
LAN SAMANTHA CHANG • Water Names 364
KATHERINE ANNE PORTER • The Jilting of Granny Weatherall 368

CHAPTER 10 Research: Writing with Sources 374

Creating a Successful Research Plan 374
Enter Research with a Plan of Action 374
What Resources Does Your Institution Offer? 375
What Type of Research Do You Want to Do? 376
Selecting a Research Topic and Generating Research Questions 376
Use Close Reading as Your Starting Point 376
Select Your Topic 377
Skim Resources through Preliminary Research 377
Narrow Your Topic, and Form a Working Thesis 377
Generate Key Concepts as Keywords 380
Create Inquiry Questions 380
Locating Materials through Productive Searches 381
Generate Meaningful Keywords 382
✔ Checklist: Creating Meaningful Keywords for a Successful Search 382
Using Academic Databases to Locate Materials 382
Search the MLA Database 382
Search Full-Text Academic Databases 383
Perform Advanced Keyword Searches 383
Evaluate the Results List, and Revise Your Search 384
Evaluate the Individual Titles 384
Using the Library Catalog to Locate Materials 385
Locate Books and Additional Resources 386
Use a Catalog Entry to Locate More Sources 386
Using the Internet to Perform Meaningful Research 387
Locate Academic Sites on the Internet 388
Locate Information-Rich Sites on the Internet 389
Avoid Commercial Sites on the Internet 389
Locate Well-known Literary Sites on the Internet 389
Locate Primary Sources on the Internet 389
Evaluating Sources for Academic Quality 390
✔ Checklist: Evaluating Web Sites for Quality 390
Evaluating Sources for Topic "Fit" 392
✔ Checklist: Evaluating Sources for Topic "Fit" 393
Taking Notes on Secondary Sources 395
A Guide to Note Taking 395
Drafting the Research Paper 399
Focus on Primary Sources 400

Integrate Secondary Sources 400
Create a Relationship between Your Writing and the Source 400
Surround the Source with Your Writing 401
Agree with a Source in Order to Develop Your Ideas 401
Apply a Source in Order to Develop Your Ideas 401
Disagree with a Source in Order to Develop Your Ideas 402
Synthesize Critics' Ideas to Show Scholarly Debate 403
Avoiding Plagiarism 403
Student Research Essay: "Dickinson's Representation of Changing Seasons and Changing Emotions" 404

PART III
Analyzing Literary Forms and Elements

CHAPTER 11 Reading and Writing about Essays 415

Types of Essays 415
Elements of Essays 416
The Essayist's Persona 416
Voice 417
Tone 417
Topic and Thesis 418
BRENT STAPLES • Black Men and Public Space 419
✔ Checklist: Getting Ideas for Writing about Essays 421
Student Writing Portfolio Summary Paper 422
Writing a Summary Paper 422
Annotation: Reading for Information 424
Note Taking: Using Inquiry Notes to Summarize Information 425
Inquiry: Paragraph-by-Paragraph Notes 425
Crafting a Thesis and Creating a Concise Summary 426
Drafting: Crafting a Strong Thesis 426
Drafting: Creating a Concise Summary 428
Student Summary Paragraph: Summary Paragraph on Staples (Preliminary Draft) 429
Revision: Using a Revision Strategy 430
✔ Revision Checklist 430
Revision: Revising to Integrate Evidence 430
Student Summary Paragraph: "Exploring Racial Fear: A Summary of Brent Staples' 'Black Men and Public Spaces'" (Final Draft) 431
Your Turn: Additional Essays for Analysis 431
LANGSTON HUGHES • Salvation 432
LAURA VANDERKAM • Hookups Starve the Soul 433
STEVEN DOLOFF • The Opposite Sex 435
GRETEL EHRLICH • About Men 437

CHAPTER 12 Reading and Writing about Stories 440

Stories True and False 440
GRACE PALEY • Samuel 441
Elements of Fiction 443
Character 443
Plot 444
Foreshadowing 445
Setting and Atmosphere 446
Symbolism 446
Narrative Point of View 448
Style and Point of View 449
Theme 450
WILLIAM FAULKNER • A Rose for Emily 451
✔ Checklist: Getting Ideas for Writing about Stories 457
Student Writing Portfolio Analytical Paper 460
Writing an Analytical Paper 460
Annotation: Reading for Form and Content 461
Note Taking: Using Inquiry Notes to Generate Ideas 462
Inquiry: Double- (or Triple-) Entry Notes 462
Inquiry: Listing Notes 463
Inquiry: Journal Writing 464
Drafting: Creating an Argument and Explaining Your Interpretation 465
Student Analytical Essay: "Homer's Murder in 'A Rose for Emily'" (Preliminary Draft) 466
Revision: Using a Revision Strategy 469
✔ Revision Checklist 470
Revision: Revising to Strengthen the Thesis 470
Revision: Revising to Develop Ideas 471
Revision: Revising to Improve Organization 472
Student Analytical Essay: "The Townspeople's Responsibility for Homer's Murder in 'A Rose for Emily'" (Final Draft) 474
Your Turn: Additional Stories for Analysis 480
KATHERINE MANSFIELD • Miss Brill 481
TIM O'BRIEN • The Things They Carried 484
GABRIEL GARCÍA MÁRQUEZ • A Very Old Man with Enormous Wings: A Tale for Children 495
An Author in Depth: Flannery O'Connor 500
FLANNERY O'CONNOR • A Good Man Is Hard to Find 500
Remarks from Essays and Letters 511
From "The Fiction Writer and His Country" 511
From "Some Aspects of the Grotesque in Southern Fiction" 512
From "The Nature and Aim of Fiction" 512
From "Writing Short Stories" 513
On Interpreting "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" 513
"A Reasonable Use of the Unreasonable" 514

CHAPTER 13 Reading and Writing about Graphic Fiction 517

Letters and Pictures, Words and Images 517
Reading an Image: A Short Story Told in One Panel 520
TONY CARRILLO • F Minus 520
Elements of Graphic Fiction 522
Visual Elements 522
Narrative and Graphic Jumps 523
Graphic Style 523
Reading a Series of Images: A Story Told in Sequential Panels 524
ART SPIEGELMAN • Nature vs. Nurture 525
✔ Checklist: Getting Ideas for Writing Arguments about Graphic Fiction 527
Your Turn: Additional Graphic Fiction for Analysis 529
WILL EISNER • Hamlet on a Rooftop 529
R. CRUMB and DAVID ZANE MAIROWITZ • A Hunger Artist 541

CHAPTER 14 Reading and Writing about Plays 547

Types of Plays 547
Tragedy 547
Comedy 549
Elements of Drama 550
Theme 550
Plot 550
Gestures 552
Setting 552
Characterization and Motivation 553
✔ Checklist: Getting Ideas for Writing Arguments about Plays 554
Thinking about a Film Version of a Play 555
Getting Ready to Write about a Filmed Play 556
✔ Checklist: Writing about a Filmed Play 556
Student Writing Portfolio Comparison Paper 557
Writing a Comparison Paper 557
SUSAN GLASPELL • Trifles 558
SUSAN GLASPELL • A Jury of Her Peers 567
Annotation: Marginal Notes 582
Comparison as a Form of Critical Thinking 584
Inquiry Notes: Comparison Grid 584
Inquiry Notes: Journal Writing 585
Drafting and Revision: Using Comparison to Create Interpretation and Argument 587
Student Analytical Essay: "Trifles, the Play, versus 'A Jury of Her Peers,' the Short Story" (Preliminary Draft) 587
Revision: Using a Revision Strategy 593
✔ Revision Checklist 593
Revision: Revising to Develop Ideas 594

Revision: Revising to Clarify Style 595
✔ Writing Style Checklist 595
Student Analytical Essay: "The Dramatic Action of Trifles: Making the Audience into Detectives" (Final Draft) 597
Your Turn: Additional Plays for Analysis 605
A Modern Comedy 605
DAVID IVES • Sure Thing 606
A Note on Greek Tragedy 614
A Greek Tragedy 616
SOPHOCLES • Antigone 616
An Author in Depth: William Shakespeare 640
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE 640
A Note on the Elizabethan Theater 641
A Note on Hamlet on the Stage 642
A Note on the Text of Hamlet 646
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE • The Tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark 652
ANNE BARTON • The Promulgation of Confusion 756
STANLEY WELLS • On the First Soliloquy 759
ELAINE SHOWALTER • Representing Ophelia 761
BERNICE W. KLIMAN • The BBC Hamlet: A Television Production 762
WILL SARETTA • Branagh's Film of Hamlet 764

CHAPTER 15 Reading and Writing about Poems 766

Elements of Poetry 766
The Speaker and the Poet 766
EMILY DICKINSON • I'm Nobody! Who are you? 766
EMILY DICKINSON • Wild Nights—Wild Nights 768
The Language of Poetry: Diction and Tone 769
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE • Sonnet 146 769
Figurative Language 770
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE • Sonnet 130 772
Imagery and Symbolism 773
EDMUND WALLER • Song 773
WILLIAM BLAKE • The Sick Rose 774
Verbal Irony and Paradox 775
Structure 775
Rhythm and Versification: A Glossary for Reference 776
Meter 777
Patterns of Sound 780
Stanzaic Patterns 781
BILLY COLLINS • Sonnet 782
Blank Verse and Free Verse 783
✔ Checklist: Getting Ideas for Writing Arguments about Poems 783
Student Writing Portfolio Explication Paper 785
Writing an Explication Paper 785
✔ Checklist: Explication 786
GWENDOLYN BROOKS • kitchenette building 787

Annotation: Highlighting First Reactions 788
Explication as a Form of Critical Thinking 789
Annotation: Rereading and Adding Inquiry Questions 790
Inquiry: Mapping, Clustering, and Creating Graphic Notes 791
Inquiry: Journal Writing 793
Drafting and Revision: Explaining a Close Reading 794
Student Explication Essay: "Life in a 'kitchenette building'" (Preliminary Draft) 795
Revision: Using a Revision Strategy 798
✔ Revision Checklist 798
Revision: Revising to Strengthen the Thesis 799
Revision: Revising to Integrate and Explain Evidence 800
Student Analytical Essay: "The Contest between Dreams and Everyday Life in Brooks's 'kitchenette building'" (Final Draft) 802
Your Turn: Additional Poems for Analysis 807
ROBERT BROWNING • My Last Duchess 807
E. E. CUMMINGS • Anyone Lived in a Pretty How Town 809
SYLVIA PLATH • Daddy 811
GWENDOLYN BROOKS • We Real Cool 813
ETHERIDGE KNIGHT • For Malcolm, a Year After 814
ANNE SEXTON • Her Kind 815
JAMES WRIGHT • Lying in a Hammock at William Duffy's Farm in Pine Island, Minnesota 816
An Author in Depth: Robert Frost 817
Robert Frost on Poetry 818
ROBERT FROST • The Figure a Poem Makes 818
ROBERT FROST • The Pasture 819
ROBERT FROST • Mowing 820
ROBERT FROST • The Wood-Pile 820
ROBERT FROST • The Oven Bird 821
ROBERT FROST • The Need of Being Versed in Country Things 822
ROBERT FROST • The Most of It 823
ROBERT FROST • Design 824

PART IV

Enjoying Literary Themes: A Thematic Anthology

CHAPTER 16 The World around Us 825

Essays
HENRY DAVID THOREAU • Where I Lived, and What I Lived For 825
HENRY DAVID THOREAU • The Ponds 825
BILL MCKIBBEN • Now or Never 828
Stories
AESOP • The Ant and the Grasshopper 832
AESOP • The North Wind and the Sun 833

JACK LONDON • To Build a Fire 833
SARAH ORNE JEWETT • A White Heron 844
PATRICIA GRACE • Butterflies 850
Poems
MATTHEW ARNOLD • In Harmony with Nature 852
THOMAS HARDY • Transformations 853
GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS • God's Grandeur 854
WALT WHITMAN • A Noiseless Patient Spider 855
EMILY DICKINSON • A Narrow Fellow in the Grass 856
EMILY DICKINSON • There's a certain Slant of light 857
EMILY DICKINSON • The name—of it—is 'Autumn' 857
JOY HARJO • Vision 858
MARY OLIVER • The Black Walnut Tree 859
KAY RYAN • Turtle 860
Chapter Overview: Looking Backward/Looking Forward 861

CHAPTER 17 Technology and Human Identity 862

Essay
NICHOLAS CARR • Is Google Making Us Stupid? 862
Stories
KURT VONNEGUT, JR. • Harrison Bergeron 870
AMY STERLING CASIL • Perfect Stranger 874
MARK TWAIN • A Telephonic Conversation 884
MARIA SEMPLE • Dear Mountain Room Parents 887
ROBIN HEMLEY • Reply All 890
JOHN CHEEVER • The Enormous Radio 895
RAY BRADBURY • The Veldt 902
STEPHEN KING • Word Processor of the Gods 912
KIT REED • The New You 924
Poems
WALT WHITMAN • To a Locomotive in Winter 931
EMILY DICKINSON • I Like to See it Lap the Miles 932
DANIEL NYIKOS • Potato Soup 933
A. E. STALLINGS • Sestina: Like 934
MARCUS WICKER • Ode to Browsing the Web 935
Play
LUIS VALDEZ • Los Vendidos 937
Chapter Overview: Looking Backward/Looking Forward 946

CHAPTER 18 Love and Hate, Men and Women 948

Essay
JUDITH ORTIZ COFER • I Fell in Love, or My Hormones Awakened 948
Stories
ZORA NEALE HURSTON • Sweat 953
JHUMPA LAHIRI • This Blessed House 961

Poems
ANONYMOUS • Western Wind 972
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE • Sonnet 116 972
JOHN DONNE • A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning 973
EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY • Love Is Not All: It Is Not Meat nor Drink 975
ROBERT BROWNING • Porphyria's Lover 976
NIKKI GIOVANNI • Love in Place 978
ANONYMOUS • Higamus, Hogamus 979
DOROTHY PARKER • General Review of the Sex Situation 979
FRANK O'HARA • Homosexuality 980
MARGE PIERCY • Barbie Doll 981
Play
TERRENCE MCNALLY • Andre's Mother 982
Chapter Overview: Looking Backward/Looking Forward 985

CHAPTER 19 Innocence and Experience 986

Essay
GEORGE ORWELL • Shooting an Elephant 986
Stories
CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN • The Yellow Wallpaper 991
JOHN STEINBECK • The Chrysanthemums 1002
ALICE WALKER • Everyday Use 1010
Poems
WILLIAM BLAKE • Infant Joy 1016
WILLIAM BLAKE • Infant Sorrow 1017
WILLIAM BLAKE • The Lamb 1018
WILLIAM BLAKE • The Tyger 1018
THOMAS HARDY • The Ruined Maid 1019
E. E. CUMMINGS • in Just- 1020
LOUISE GLÜCK • The School Children 1021
LINDA PASTAN • Ethics 1022
THEODORE ROETHKE • My Papa's Waltz 1023
SHARON OLDS • Rites of Passage 1024
NATASHA TRETHEWEY • White Lies 1025
Chapter Overview: Looking Backward/Looking Forward 1026

CHAPTER 20 All in a Day's Work 1028

Essay
BARBARA EHRENREICH • Wal-Mart Orientation Program 1028
Stories
JACOB GRIMM AND WILHELM GRIMM • Mother Holle 1031
WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS • The Use of Force 1034
WILL EISNER • The Day I Became a Professional 1037
DANIEL OROZCO • Orientation 1041

Poems
WILLIAM WORDSWORTH • The Solitary Reaper 1045
CARL SANDBURG • Chicago 1046
GARY SNYDER • Hay for the Horses 1048
ROBERT HAYDEN • Those Winter Sundays 1049
SEAMUS HEANEY • Digging 1049
JULIA ALVAREZ • Woman's Work 1050
MARGE PIERCY • To be of use 1051
JIMMY SANTIAGO BACA • So Mexicans Are Taking Jobs from Americans 1052 Plays
JANE MARTIN • Rodeo 1054
ARTHUR MILLER • Death of a Salesman 1057
Chapter Overview: Looking Backward/Looking Forward 1123

CHAPTER 21 American Dreams and Nightmares 1125

Essays
CHIEF SEATTLE • My People 1125
ELIZABETH CADY STANTON • Declaration of Sentiments and Resolutions 1128
ABRAHAM LINCOLN • Address at the Dedication of the Gettysburg National Cemetery 1132
STUDS TERKEL • Arnold Schwarzenegger's Dream 1133
ANDREW LAM • Who Will Light Incense When Mother's Gone? 1135
Stories
SHERMAN ALEXIE • The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven 1137
RALPH ELLISON • Battle Royal 1142
TONI CADE BAMBARA • The Lesson 1152
AMY TAN • Two Kinds 1158
Poems
ROBERT HAYDEN • Frederick Douglass 1166
LORNA DEE CERVANTES • Refugee Ship 1167
EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON • Richard Cory 1168
W. H. AUDEN • The Unknown Citizen 1169
EMMA LAZARUS • The New Colossus 1170
THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH • The Unguarded Gates 1171
JOSEPH BRUCHAC III • Ellis Island 1172
AURORA LEVINS MORALES • Child of the Americas 1174
GLORIA ANZALDÚA • To Live in the Borderlands Means You 1175
MITSUYE YAMADA • To the Lady 1177
nila northSUN • Moving Camp Too Far 1179
YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA • Facing It 1180
BILLY COLLINS • The Names 1182
Play
LORRAINE HANSBERRY • A Raisin in the Sun 1185
Chapter Overview: Looking Backward/Looking Forward 1240

CHAPTER 22 Law and Disorder 1241

Essay

MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. • Letter from Birmingham Jail 1242

Stories

ELIZABETH BISHOP • The Hanging of the Mouse 1254
URSULA K. LE GUIN • The Ones Who Walk Away from Omelas 1257
SHIRLEY JACKSON • The Lottery 1261
WILLIAM FAULKNER • Barn Burning 1267
TOBIAS WOLFF • Powder 1279

Poems

ANONYMOUS • Birmingham Jail 1282
A. E. HOUSMAN • The Carpenter's Son 1284
A. E. HOUSMAN • Oh who is that young sinner 1285
DOROTHY PARKER • Résumé 1286
CLAUDE MCKAY • If We Must Die 1287
JIMMY SANTIAGO BACA • Cloudy Day 1287
CAROLYN FORCHÉ • The Colonel 1289
HAKI MADHUBUTI • The B Network 1290
JILL MCDONOUGH • Three a.m. 1291

Play

BILLY GODA • No Crime 1292

Chapter Overview: Looking Backward/Looking Forward 1296

CHAPTER 23 Journeys 1297

Essay

JOAN DIDION • On Going Home 1297

Stories

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE • Young Goodman Brown 1299
EUDORA WELTY • A Worn Path 1308
JAMES JOYCE • Eveline 1313
RAYMOND CARVER • Cathedral 1317

Poems

JOHN KEATS • On First Looking into Chapman's Homer 1326
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY • Ozymandias 1327
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON • Ulysses 1328
COUNTEE CULLEN • Incident 1330
WILLIAM STAFFORD • Traveling through the Dark 1331
ADRIENNE RICH • Diving into the Wreck 1332
DEREK WALCOTT • A Far Cry from Africa 1335
SHERMAN ALEXIE • On the Amtrak from Boston to New York City 1336
WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS • Sailing to Byzantium 1338
CHRISTINA ROSSETTI • Uphill 1339

Play

HENRIK IBSEN • A Doll's House 1340

Chapter Overview: Looking Backward/Looking Forward 1390

APPENDIX A Writing about Literature: an Overview of Critical Strategies 1391

The Nature of Critical Writing 1391
Criticism as Argument: Assumptions and Evidence 1391
Some Critical Strategies 1392
Formalist Criticism (New Criticism) 1393
Deconstruction 1394
Reader-Response Criticism 1394
Archetypal Criticism (Myth Criticism) 1395
Historical Criticism 1396
Biographical Criticism 1397
Marxist Criticism 1397
New Historicist Criticism 1398
Psychological or Psychoanalytic Criticism 1398
Gender Criticism (Feminist, and Lesbian and Gay Criticism) 1399
Your Turn: Putting Critical Strategies to Work 1401

APPENDIX B The Basics of Manuscript Form 1403

Basic Manuscript Form 1403
Quotations and Quotation Marks 1404
Quotation Marks or Italics? 1406
A Note on the Possessive 1406
Documentation: Internal Parenthetical Citations and a List of Works Cited (MLA Format) 1406
Internal Parenthetical Citations 1407
Parenthetical Citations and List of Works Cited 1407
Forms of Citation in Works Cited 1409
Citing Internet Sources 1415
✔ Checklist: Citing Sources on the Web 1415

Credits 1417
Index of Authors, Titles, First Lines 1427
Index of Terms 1435

Contents by Genre

Essays

Anne Barton The Promulgation of Confusion 756
Nicholas Carr Is Google Making Us Stupid? 862
Judith Ortiz Cofer I Fell in Love, or My Hormones Awakened 948
Joan Didion On Going Home 1297
Steven Doloff The Opposite Sex 435
Barbara Ehrenreich Wal-Mart Orientation Program 1028
Gretel Ehrlich About Men 437
Langston Hughes Salvation 431
Martin Luther King Jr. Letter from Birmingham Jail 1241
Bernice W. Kliman The BBC Hamlet: A Television Production 762
Andrew Lam Who Will Light Incense When Mother's Gone? 1135
Abraham Lincoln Address at the Dedication of the Gettysburg National Cemetery 1132
Bill McKibben Now or Never 828
George Orwell Shooting an Elephant 986
Anna Lisa Raya It's Hard Enough Being Me 135
George Saunders Commencement Speech on Kindness 156
Will Saretta Branagh's Film of Hamlet 764
Chief Seattle My People 1125
Elizabeth Cady Stanton Declaration of Sentiments and Resolutions 1128
Brent Staples Black Men and Public Space 419
Elaine Showalter Representing Ophelia 761
Studs Terkel Arnold Schwarzenegger's Dream 1133
Henry David Thoreau From Walden 825
Laura Vanderkam Hookups Starve the Soul 433
Stanley Wells On the First Soliloquy 759

Short Stories

Aesop The Ant and the Grasshopper 832
The North Wind and the Sun 833
Sherman Alexie The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven 1137
Anonymous The Judgment of Solomon 194
The Parable of the Prodigal Son 198
Margaret Atwood Happy Endings 152
Toni Cade Bambara The Lesson 1152
Ambrose Bierce An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge 146
Elizabeth Bishop The Hanging of the Mouse 1254
T. Coraghessan Boyle Greasy Lake 103
Ray Bradbury August 2026: There Will Come Soft Rains 43
The Veldt 902
Raymond Carver Cathedral 1317
Mine 329
Little Things 330
Lan Samantha Chang Water Names 364
John Cheever The Enormous Radio 894
Kate Chopin Ripe Figs 25
The Story of an Hour 65
Désirée's Baby 80
The Storm 87
Sandra Cisneros Barbie-Q 336
Julio Cortázar The Continuity of Parks 360
Junot Diaz How to Date a Brown Girl, Black Girl, White Girl, or Halfie 100
Will Eisner The Day I Became a Professional 1037
Ralph Ellison Battle Royal 1142

William Faulkner A Rose for Emily 451
Barn Burning 1267
Amy Sterling Casil Perfect Stranger 874
Dagoberto Gilb Love in L.A. 95
Charlotte Perkins Gilman The Yellow Wallpaper 991
Susan Glaspell A Jury of Her Peers 567
Patricia Grace Butterflies 850
Jacob Grimm and Wilhelm Grimm Mother Holle 1031
Ursula K. Le Guin The Ones Who Walk Away from Omelas 1256
Douglas L. Haskins Hide and Seek 258
Nathaniel Hawthorne Young Goodman Brown 1299
Ernest Hemingway Cat in the Rain 199
Robin Hemley Reply All 890
A.M. Homes Things You Should Know 362
Mary Hood How Far She Went 110
Zora Neale Hurston Sweat 952
Shirley Jackson The Lottery 1261
Sarah Orne Jewett A White Heron 843
Ha Jin Saboteur 280
James Joyce Araby 220
Eveline 1313
Jamaica Kincaid Girl 121
Stephen King Word Processor of the Gods 911
Jhumpa Lahiri This Blessed House 960
Jack London To Build a Fire 833
Katherine Mansfield Miss Brill 480
Gabriel García Márquez A Very Old Man with Enormous Wings: A Tale for Children 495
Haruki Murakami On Seeing the 100% Perfect Girl One Beautiful April Morning 55
Joyce Carol Oates Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been? 305
Tim O'Brien The Things They Carried 484
Flannery O'Connor A Good Man Is Hard to Find 500
Maryanne O'Hara Diverging Paths and All That 338
Daniel Orozco Orientation 1041
Grace Paley Samuel 440
Dorothy Parker A Telephone Call
Edgar Allan Poe The Cask of Amontillado 236
Mark Plants Equal Rites 258
Jayne Anne Phillips Sweethearts 338
Katherine Anne Porter The Jilting of Granny Weatherall 367
Kit Reed The New You 924
Bruce Holland Rogers Three Soldiers 37
Maria Semple Dear Mountain Room Parents 887
Michele Serros Senior Picture Day 51
Leslie Marmon Silko The Man to Send Rain Clouds 241
John Steinbeck The Chrysanthemums 1002
Elizabeth Tallent No One's a Mystery 97
Amy Tan Two Kinds 1158
Mark Twain A Telephonic Conversation 884
John Updike A & P 58
Kurt Vonnegut, Jr. Harrison Bergeron 869
Alice Walker Everyday Use 1009
Eudora Welty A Worn Path 1308
Jeffrey Whitmore Bedtime Story 257
William Carlos Williams The Use of Force 1033
Tobias Wolff Powder 1279
Allen Woodman Wallet 117

Drama

Susan Glaspell Trifles 558
Billy Goda No Crime 1292
Lorraine Hansberry A Raisin in the Sun 1184
Henrik Ibsen A Doll's House 1340
David Ives Sure Thing 605
Jane Martin Rodeo 1054
Terrence McNally Andre's Mother 982
Arthur Miller Death of a Salesman 1056
William Shakespeare The Tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark 652
Sophocles Antigone 616
Luis Valdez Los Vendidos 937
Oscar Wilde Excerpt from The Importance of Being Ernest 132

Poetry

Thomas Bailey Aldrich The Unguarded Gates 1171
Sherman Alexie On the Amtrak from Boston to New York City 1336
Julia Alvarez Woman's Work 1050
Anonymous Higamus, Hogamus 979
Western Wind 972
Birmingham Jail 1282
Gloria Anzaldúa To Live in the Borderlands Means You 1175
W. H. Auden The Unknown Citizen 1169
Matthew Arnold In Harmony with Nature 851
Aphra Behn Song: Love Armed 231
Julia Bird 14: a txt msg pom 130
William Blake The Sick Rose 774
Infant Joy 1016
Infant Sorrow 1017
The Lamb 1018
The Tyger 1018
Jimmy Santiago Baca Green Chili 138
So Mexicans Are Taking Jobs from Americans 1052
Cloudy Day 1287
Anne Bradstreet Before the Birth of One of Her Children 302
Emily Brontë Spellbound 189
Gwendolyn Brooks kitchenette building 787
We Real Cool 813
Robert Browning My Last Duchess 807
Porphyria's Lover 976
Joseph Bruchac III Ellis Island 1172
Lorna Dee Cervantes Refugee Ship 1167
Fred Chapelle Narcissus and Echo 304
Helen Chasin The Word Plum 142
Sarah N. Cleghorn The Golf Links 144
Billy Collins Introduction to Poetry 245
Twitter Poem 131
Sonnet 782
The Names 1181
Countee Cullen Incident 1330
E. E. Cummings Buffalo Bill 's 324 anyone lived in a pretty how town 809
in Just- 1020
Kwame Dawes Tornado Child 333
Emily Dickinson I'm Nobody! Who are you? 766
Wild Nights—Wild Nights 768
A Narrow Fellow in the Grass 856
I Like to see it lap the Miles 932
There's a certain Slant of light 857
The name—of it—is "Autumn" 857
John Donne Holy Sonnet XIV 188
The Bait 352
A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning 973
T. S. Eliot The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock 297
Martin Espada Bully 249
Carolyn Forché The Colonel 1289
Robert Frost The Span of Life 167
The Road Not Taken 246
Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening 269
The Pasture 819
Mowing 820
The Wood-Pile 820
The Oven Bird 821
The Need of Being Versed in Country Things 822
The Most of It 823
Design 824
Nikki Giovanni Love in Place 978
Louise Glück The School Children 1021
Thomas Hardy The Man He Killed 301
Transformations 853
The Ruined Maid 1019
Joy Harjo Vision 858
Robert Hayden Those Winter Sundays 1048
Frederick Douglass 1166
Seamus Heaney Blackeberry-Picking 356
Digging 1049
Robert Herrick To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time 348
Gerard Manley Hopkins God's Grandeur 853
A. E. Housman The Carpenter's Son 1283
Oh who is that young sinner 1285
Langston Hughes Harlem 170
Mother to Son 261
I, Too [Sing America] 359
Randall Jarrell The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner 191

John Keats Ode on a Grecian Urn 247
On First Looking into Chapman's Homer 1326
Galway Kinell Blackberry Eating 354
Etheridge Knight For Malcolm, a Year After 814
Yusef Komunyakaa Blackberries 357
Facing It 1180
Emma Lazarus The New Colossus 1170
Li-Young Lee I Ask My Mother to Sing 190
Christopher Marlowe The Passionate Shepherd to His Love 349
Andrew Marvell To His Coy Mistress 351
Haki Madhubuti The B Network 1290
Jill McDonough Three a.m. 1291
Claude McKay If We Must Die 1286
Edna St. Vincent Millay Love Is Not All: It Is Not Meat nor Drink 975
Pat Mora Immigrants 253
Aurora Levins Morales Child of the Americas 1174
Thylias Moss Tornados 332
Howard Moss Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day 342
nila northSun Moving Camp Too Far 1179
Daniel Nyikos Potato Soup 933
Frank O'hara Homosexuality 980
Sharon Olds Rites of Passage 1024
Mary Oliver The Black Walnut Tree 859
Dorothy Parker General Review of the Sex Situation 979
Résumé 1286
Linda Pastan Ethics 1022
Marge Piercy Barbie Doll 981
To be of use 1051
Sylvia Plath Blackberrying 355
Daddy 810
Sir Walter Raleigh The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd 350
Alberto Rios Nani 139
Edwin Arlington Robinson Richard Cory 1168
Theodore Roethke My Papa's Waltz 1023
Christina Rossetti After Death 303
Uphill 1339
Kay Ryan Turtle 860
Carl Sandburg Chicago 1046
Anne Sexton Her Kind 815
William Shakespeare Sonnet 73 187
Sonnet 18: Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day? 342
Sonnet 146 769
Sonnet 130 772
Sonnet 116 (Let me not to the marriage of true minds) 972
Percy Bysshe Shelley Ozymandias 1327
Stevie Smith Not Waving but Drowning 145
Gary Snyder Hay for the Horses 1047
Cathy Song Stamp Collecting 183
Gary Soto Oranges 143
William Stafford Traveling through the Dark 1331
A. E. Stallings Sestina: Like 934
Alfred, Lord Tennyson Ulysses 1328
Natasha Trethewey White Lies 1025
Derek Walcott A Far Cry from Africa 1335
Edmund Waller Song (Go, lovely rose) 773
Walt Whitman I Hear America Singing 358
A Noiseless Patient Spider 855
To a Locomotive in Winter (from Leaves of Grass) 931
Marcus Wicker Ode to Browsing the Web 935
James Wright Lying in a Hammock at William Duffy's Farm in Pine Island, Minnesota 816
William Carlos Williams This Is Just to Say 141
Mitsuye Yamada To the Lady 1177
William Butler Yeats Sailing to Byzantium 1337

Graphic Fiction

Lynda Barry Before You Write 128
Tony Carrillo F Minus 520
R. Crumb and David Zane Mairowitz A Hunger Artist 540
Will Eisner Hamlet on a Rooftop 529
Art Spiegelman Nature vs. Nurture 524
Grant Wood Death on the Ridge Road 518

Preface to Instructors

Literature for Composition is based on the assumption that students in composition or literature courses should encounter first-rate writing—not simply competent prose, but the powerful reports of experience that have been recorded by highly skilled writers of the past and present, reports of experiences that must be shared.

We assume that you share our belief that the study of such writing offers pleasure and insight into life and also leads to increased skill in communicating. Here, at the beginning, we want to point out that the skills we emphasize in our discussions of communication are relevant not only to literature courses but to all courses in which students analyze texts or write arguments.

What Is New in the Eleventh Edition?

Instructors who are familiar with earlier editions will notice that we retain our emphasis on critical thinking and argument. For the convenience of instructors who have used an earlier edition, we briefly summarize here the major changes:

New Essays, Short Stories, Poems

- Essays by Nicholas Carr ("Is Google Making Us Stupid?) and George Saunders ("Commencement Speech on Kindness").
- Short stories by Haruki Murakami ("On Seeing the 100% Perfect Girl…"), Junot Diaz ("How to Date a Brown Girl, Black Girl, White Girl, or Halfie"), Jhumpa Lahiri ("This Blessed House"), Dagoberto Gilb ("Love in L.A."), and Lan Samantha Chang ("Water Names"), among others.
- Poems by Billy Collins ("Twitter Poem"), Walt Whitman ("To a Locomotive in Winter"), Thylias Moss ("Tornados"), Sylvia Plath ("Blackberrying"), Seamus Heaney ("Blackberry-Picking"), Alberto Rios ("Nani"), and Helen Chasin ("The Word Plum"), among others.

New Thematic Chapter on Technology and Human Identity

- A new Chapter 17 in Part 4, comprised of selections from a mix of classic and contemporary authors, provides a lens through which students can see how technology both informs and impedes our lives. Several stories use science fiction elements to imagine utopian and dystopian futures. Authors in this chapter include Mark Twain, Stephen King, Maria Semple, Ray Bradbury, John Cheever, and Amy Sterling Casil.

Reimagined Thematic Chapters

- Thematic chapters have been collapsed and combined to promote ease of use and to avoid repetition. Each theme has been carefully cultivated to feature the most representative selections for that theme.

New Chapter on Research

- An extensive new Chapter 10 on research walks students step-by-step through the process, from creating a research plan and selecting a topic to locating and evaluating sources and avoiding plagiarism. Woven throughout the chapter is one student's writing process, culminating with a paper on Emily Dickinson's use of nature imagery.

New Chapter on Critical Thinking about Literature

- A streamlined Chapter 2 provides an overview of critical thinking early in the text, defining the term and discussing the importance of close reading, analysis, and synthesis.

New Chapter on Close Reading

- A revised Chapter 6 on close reading now includes discussions of both paraphrasing and summarizing, complete with new student samples.

New Chapter on the Pleasures of Reading, Writing, and Thinking about Literature

- A revised Chapter 5 designed to help students think productively about their writing, this material has been updated to reflect contemporary writing (such as blogging and texting) and now contains examples from each of the genres represented in the text, complete with a new personal response essay and new selections.

New Chapter on Comparison and Synthesis

- A new Chapter 9 on comparison walks students through drafting and revising to final production of this type of paper, with student samples throughout.

New Student Writing Portfolios

- Part 3 contains four unique, genre-specific student writing portfolios. These self-contained portfolios (located in Chapters 11, 12, 14, and 15) each present one student's writing process step-by-step, from assignment to finished product. Every portfolio is framed with a brief description of the paper "type," a short assignment that defines the writing, and helpful marginal annotations next to each step of the student's writing process, which highlight notable structures and provide guidance for readers to emulate in their own writing.

New Checklists

- Designed to help students produce successful writing, even more checklists are now included in the text at key points in the writing process, including ideas for generating a draft, revising a comparison essay, and evaluating sources for topic "fit."

More Student Samples of Works-in-Progress

- Throughout the text, every part of the writing process is demonstrated through student models. In addition, Part 3 contains four self-contained, genre-specific student writing portfolios that each showcase one student's writing process for a particular assignment.

Key Features

Here are the key features of the eleventh edition of Literature for Composition.

Extensive instruction in composition: Students are guided through the entire process of writing (especially writing arguments), beginning with generating ideas (for instance, by listing or by annotating a text), developing a thesis, supporting the thesis with evidence, and on through the final stages of documenting and editing. Twenty-four sample student essays are included; most are prefaced with the students' preliminary notes, some include first and revised drafts, and some are annotated or otherwise analyzed. Each literary genre chapter includes a new "Student Writing Portfolio" that collects sample materials generated by each step of the writing process, demonstrating how a paper evolves from initial note taking to a final draft.

Strategies for writing effective arguments: The eleventh edition focuses on argument and evaluation, not only in the case studies, but also in the discussion topics that follow every reading (headed "Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing"). We emphasize the importance of questioning one's own assumptions—a key principle in critical thinking—and we also emphasize the importance of providing evidence in the course of setting forth coherent, readable arguments.

Wide range of literary selections: The book includes some three hundred selections, ranging from ancient classics such as Sophocles's Antigone to works written in the twenty-first century by authors such as Junot Diaz and Jhumpa Lahiri.

Abundant visual material, with suggestions about visual analysis: The book is rich in photographs. The images are chosen to enhance the student's understanding of particular works of literature. For example, we include photos of Buffalo Bill and a facsimile of a draft of E. E. Cummings's poem about Buffalo Bill. This edition also remains strong in its representation of graphic fiction.

Introductory genre anthology: After preliminary chapters on generating ideas and thinking critically, students encounter chapters devoted to essays, fiction, drama, and poetry.

Thematic anthology: The chapters in Part 4 are arranged under eight themes: The World around Us; Technology and Human Identity; Love and Hate, Men and Women; Innocence and Experience; All in a Day's Work; American Dreams and Nightmares; Law and Disorder; and Journeys.

Case studies: The three case studies presented in this book ("An Author in Depth") give a variety of perspectives for writing arguments and organizing research: Flannery O'Connor (page 500), William Shakespeare (page 640), and Robert Frost (page 817).

Extensive material on research and the Internet: Because instructors are increasingly assigning research papers, the eleventh edition includes material on implementing a productive research plan that incorporates electronic resources, provides up-to-date instruction on evaluating, using, and citing electronic sources, and features a new student research paper that uses electronic resources.

Checklists: Twenty-two checklists focus on topics such as revising paragraphs, editing a draft, and using the Internet. Students can use these checklists to become peer readers of their writing.

Resources for Instructors

Instructor's Manual with detailed comments and suggestions for teaching each selection. This important resource also contains references to critical articles and books that we have found to be the most useful. ISBN 0134101642

REVEL™ is Pearson's newest way of delivering our respected content. Fully digital and highly engaging, REVEL™ offers an immersive learning experience designed for the way today's students read, think, and learn. Enlivening course content with media interactives and assessments, REVEL™ empowers educators to increase engagement with the course, and to better connect with students.

With an emphasis on critical thinking and argument, REVEL™ for Literature for Composition offers superior coverage of reading, writing, and arguing about literature enhanced by an array of multimedia interactives that prompt student engagement. Throughout REVEL's™ flexible online environment, the authors demonstrate that the skills emphasized in their discussions of communication are relevant not only to literature courses, but to all courses in which students analyze texts or write arguments.

Acknowledgments

We would like to thank the following reviewers, who provided their feedback during the revision of the eleventh edition: Karen Guerin, Bossier Parish Community College; Mary Hubbard, Northwest Arkansas Community College; Jennifer Laufenberg, Bossier Parish Community College; Megan Looney, Northwest Arkansas Community College; Joanna Mann, Northwest Arkansas Community College; Timothy McGinn, Northwest Arkansas Community College; Tabitha Miller, Pitt Community College; Stephanie Noll, Texas State University—San Marcos; John Padgett, Brevard College; and Jennifer Wiley, Pima Community College.

In preparing the first eleven editions of Literature for Composition, we were indebted to Cieltia Adams, Elizabeth Addison, Jonathan Alexander, James Allen, Alexander Ames, Kathleen Anderson-Wyman, Larry Armstrong, William D. Atwill, Patricia Baldwin, Mary J. Balkun, Daniel Barwick, David Beach, Daniel Bender, Billie Bennet, Mary Anne Bernal, Phyllis Betz, Kenneth R. Bishop, Margaret Blayney, Bertha Norman Booker, John P. Boots, Paul Keith Boran, Pam Bourgeois, Noelle Brada-Williams, Carol Ann Britt, Jennifer Bruer, Robin W. Bryant, Sharon Buzzard, Kathleen Shine Cain, Diana Cardenas, William Carpenter, Evelyn Cartright, Allan Chavkin, Mike Chu, Alan P. Church, Melinda Cianos, Dennis Ciesielski, Arlene Clift-Pellow, Walter B. Connolly, Stanley Corkin, Linda Cravens, Morgan Cutterini, Donald A. Daiker, Bruce Danner, Phebe Davidson, Thomas Deans, Beth DeMeo, John Desjarlais, Emily Dial-Driver, John Dobelbower, Ren Draya, James Dubinsky, Gail Duffy, Bill Elliott, Leonard W. Engel, William Epperson, Gareth Euridge, Martin J. Fertig, Shelley Fischer, Elinor C. Flewellen, Kay Fortson, Marie Foster, Donna Friedman, Larry Frost, Loris Galford, Charlene Gill, Esther Godfrey, Dwonna Goldstone, Jessica Beth Gordon, Kim Greenfield, Chris Grieco, Susan Grimland, Debbie Hanson, Dorothy Hardman, Sandra H. Harris, Syndey Harrison, Sally Harrold, Tom Hayes, Keith Haynes, Michael Hennessey, Mary Herbert, Ana B. Hernandez, Maureen Hoag, Allen Hoey, Diane Houston, Elizabeth Howells, Clayton Hudnall, Joyce A. Ingram, Craig Johnson, Michael Johnson, Angela Jones, Kristianne Kalata, Rodney Keller, Beth Kemper, Glenn Klopfenstein, Alison Kuehner, Donya Lancaster, Theresa René LeBlanc, Regina Lebowitz, Margaret Lindgren, John Loftis, Robert Lynch, Maria Makowiecka, Twister Marquiss, Phil Martin, Kate Massengale, Dennis McDonald, Sara McKnight Boone, Delma McLeod-Porter, Linda McPherson, Bill McWilliams, Martin Meszaros, Zack Miller, JoAnna S. Mink, Dorothy Minor, Owen Monroe, Wayne Moore, Charles Moran, Patricia G. Morgan, Nancy Morris, Jonathan Morrow, Christina Murphy, Richard Nielson, Sean Nighbert, David Norlin, Torria Norman, Marsha Nourse, Shanna O'Berry, John O'Connor, Chris Orchard, Phyllis Orlicek, Eric Otto, Suzanne Owens, Janet Palmer, James R. Payne, Stephanie Pelkowski, Elizabeth Gassel Perkins, Don K. Pierstorff, Gerald Pike, Kenneth Poff, Louis H. Pratt, John Prince, Sharon Prince, Michael Punches, David Raymond, Samantha Regan, Bruce A. Reid, Thomas Reynolds, Linda Robertson, Lois Sampson, Terry Santos, Daniel Schierenbeck, Jim Schwartz, Sigmar J. Schwarz, Robert Schwegler, Linda Scott, Herbert Shapiro, William Shelley, David Slater, Janice Slaughter, Martha Ann Smith, Tiga Spitsberg, Judith Stanford, Pam Stinson, Darlene Strawser, Geri Strecker, Jim Streeter, Timothy Stuart, Anthony Stubbs, David Sudol, Beverly Swan, Leesther Thomas, Raymond L. Thomas, Susan D. Tilka, Mary Trachsel, Dorothy Trusock, Billie Varnum, John H. Venne, Mickey Wadia, Nancy Walker, Betty Weldon, Patrick White, Jonathon Wild, Bertha Wise, Arthur Wohlgemuth, Cary Wolfe, Linda Woodson, Sallie Woolf, Kathy J. Wright, Rebecca Wright, Carlson Yost, Dennis Young, and Gary Zacharias.

No book of this kind gets done without a great deal of assistance from the publisher. We received insightful editorial guidance from Joe Terry and Anne Brunell Ehrenworth. Donna Campion (project manager at Pearson) kept things moving smoothly, and Donna Conte expertly copyedited the manuscript. Lois Lombardo (project manager at Cenveo) efficiently solved innumerable last-minute problems, and Gina Cheselka handled the difficult job of securing text permissions.

SYLVAN BARNET
WILLIAM BURTO
WILLIAM E. CAIN
CHERYL L. NIXON

This page intentionally left blank

CHAPTER 1

How to Write an Effective Essay about Literature: A Crash Course

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Approach the first draft of an essay purposefully
- Revise a draft effectively
- Participate in the peer review process
- Prepare a final draft of an essay

The Basic Strategy

Students have assured us that the following suggestions for writing analytical essays are helpful.

- Choose a topic and a tentative thesis, generating an argument. Aim to explore concepts that can be interpreted and developed rather than to summarize information.
- Generate ideas through analysis, engaging in a process of inquiry, interpretation, and argument. For instance, ask yourself inquiring questions such as "Why did the author—a woman—tell the story from the point of view of this male character rather than that female character?" and "Does this story give me some insight into family relationships?" Formulate interpretations based on your best questions and answers.
- Select and evaluate evidence, using specific details from the text to develop and support your ideas.
- Make a tentative outline of points that you plan to make.
- Rough out a first draft, working from your outline (don't worry about spelling, punctuation, etc.), but don't hesitate to depart from the outline when new ideas come to you in the process of writing.
- Make large-scale revisions in your draft by reorganizing, adding details to clarify and support assertions, or deleting or combining paragraphs.
- Make small-scale revisions by revising and editing sentences, and checking spelling and grammar.

- Revise your opening and concluding paragraphs. Be certain that they are interesting, not mere throat-clearing and not a mere summary.
- Have someone read your revised draft and comment on it.
- Revise again, taking into account the reader's suggestions. Read this latest version and make further revisions as needed so that your thesis—your argument—is evident.
- Proofread your final version.

All writers must work out their own procedures and rituals, but the following basic suggestions will help you write effective essays. They assume that you have made annotations in the margins of the literary text and have jotted notes in a journal, on index cards, or in a file of documents on your computer. If your paper involves using sources, consult also Chapter 10, "Research: Writing with Sources."

Reading Closely: Approaching a First Draft

1. Carefully read and reread the work or works you will write about, annotating as you read. Read with a pen in hand, and take notes in the margins of the text. Do not hesitate to reread the sections of the work that are most relevant to your subject, jotting down new notes and brainstorming new interpretations.
2. Keep your purpose in mind. Although your instructor may ask you, perhaps as a preliminary writing assignment, to jot down your early responses—your initial experience of the work—it is more likely that he or she will ask you to write an analysis in which you will connect details, draw inferences, and argue that such and such is the case. That is, almost surely you will be asked to do more than write a summary or to report your responses; you will be asked to engage with the conceptual ideas raised by the work. You probably will be expected to support a thesis, to make a claim, and offer an argument, for example: "The metaphors are chiefly drawn from nature and, broadly speaking, they move from sky and sea to the earth and to human beings, which is to say that they become closer at hand, more immediate, more personal."
3. Choose a worthwhile and interesting subject, and work to generate a thesis argument about that subject. As you determine what you will write about, choose something that interests you and is not so big that your handling of it must be superficial. As you work, shape your topic, narrowing it, for example, from "Characterization in Updike's 'A & P'" to "Updike's Use of Contrasting Characters in 'A & P.'"

Don't expect to have a sound thesis at the very beginning of your working on an essay. The thesis will probably come to you only after you have done some close reading and have stimulated ideas by asking yourself questions. Almost surely you will see that the initial thesis needs to be modified in the light of evidence that you encounter. It might be helpful to think of this writing as creating a working thesis, knowing that you will modify, expand, contract, and change the focus of your thesis as your ideas develop. In short, your thesis will evolve in the course of thinking about what you are reading.

An essay that analyzes a work will not only offer an argument but will also support the argument with evidence. Even an explication—a sort of line-by-line paraphrase (see Chapter 6)—presents an argument, holding that the work conveys a certain meaning. Your analysis will break down the whole of the work into parts and investigate the relationships among those parts. Your argument will show off your critical thinking about the literary work, demonstrating how you engage in original interpretation by highlighting meaningful aspects of the text, drawing inferences, connecting details, and extrapolating larger concepts.

In thinking about your purpose, remember, too, that your audience will, in effect, determine the amount of detail that you must give. Although your instructor may, in reality, be your only reader, probably you should imagine that your audience consists of people like your classmates—intelligent but not especially familiar with the topic on which you have recently become a specialist. In putting yourself into the shoes of your imagined readers, think of reasonable objections the readers might raise, and respond appropriately to these objections.

4. Keep looking at the literary work you are writing about, jotting down brainstorming notes on all relevant matters.
   - You can generate ideas for writing about the issues raised by essays, stories, plays, and poems by asking yourself questions such as those given in the Checklists on pages 419–20, 455–57, 525–27, 554–55, and 783–85.
   - As you look and think, reflect on your observations, and record them.
   - As you look and think, move beyond plot summary and information-based reading. Move toward engagement with the concepts—the most compelling ideas, issues, and concerns—raised by the literary work.
   - When you have an idea, jot it down as a marginal annotation on the book or on a Post-it note attached to the margin of the book page. Don't assume that you will remember your ideas when you begin writing. Develop a strategy for collecting ideas that move beyond marginal annotations, allowing your notes to becoming more detailed and interpretive. Many people will keep a journal to jot down brainstorming ideas, develop a system of using 4-by-6-inch index cards, or take notes in electronic files on a laptop or iPad or similar tablet device.
   - As you develop your note-taking and brainstorming record, embed organizational techniques within it. For example, if you use index cards, put only one point on each card, and write a brief caption on the card (e.g., "Significance of title," or "Night = death???" Later you can arrange the cards so that relevant notes are grouped together. Similarly, if you take brainstorming notes in a journal, leave room to label each page or document; if you take notes on a computer, create a system of clearly labeled files and folders.
   - Become comfortable rereading your own notes and marking them up. Circle or highlight your best ideas. Jot down more notes next to your original notes, continuing to develop your thinking.
5. When you are taking notes from secondary sources, do not simply highlight or photocopy.
   - Take brief notes, summarizing important points and jotting down your own critiques of the material.
   - Read the material analytically, thoughtfully, and with an open mind and a questioning spirit.
   - When you read in this attentive and tentatively skeptical way, you will find that the material is valuable not only for what it tells you but also for the ideas that you yourself produce in responding to it.

6. Sort out your notes, putting together what belongs together. The process of rereading and rethinking your own ideas allows you to hone and strengthen your ideas as you organize them. As a first step, create groupings of like ideas. Three notes about the texture of the materials of a building, for instance, probably belong together. Note cards can easily be rearranged to bring connected ideas together. If you are working on a computer, cut and paste similar ideas into one document or one subsection of a document. If you are taking notes in a journal, skim through your earlier notes, and rewrite connected ideas on a fresh page. As you select your best ideas, set aside your weakest ideas. Don't hesitate to delete ideas, moving them into a different file, knowing that you can always return to them later. Reject notes that are irrelevant to your topic.
7. Organize your notes into a reasonable sequence. Your notes contain ideas (or at least facts that you can think about); now the notes have to be put into a coherent sequence. Think of the relationships among your ideas: Is one idea the overarching idea and must come first? Does one idea lead to the next, creating a sequence? Does one idea offer a minor observation and might best become a subpoint presented "under" a more important argument? Does one idea rely on information that is presented in another section and thus could come later in the argument? When you have made a tentative arrangement, review it; you may discover a better way to group your notes, and you may even want to add to them. If so, start reorganizing.

A tripartite organization for your analytical essay usually works. For this structure, tentatively plan to devote your opening paragraph(s) to a statement of the topic or problem and a proposal of your hypothesis or thesis. The essay can then be shaped into three parts:

- a beginning, in which you identify the work(s) that you will discuss, giving the necessary background and, in a sentence or two, setting forth your underlying argument, your thesis;
- a middle, in which you develop your thesis in a series of well-organized paragraphs, chiefly by explaining the ideas central to your argument, by offering evidence, and by taking account of possible objections to your argument; and
- a conclusion, in which you wrap things up, perhaps by giving a more general interpretation or by setting your findings in a larger context.

In general, organize the material from the simple to the complex in order to ensure intelligibility. For instance, if you are discussing the structure of a poem, it will probably be best to begin with the most obvious points and then to turn to the subtler but perhaps equally important ones. Similarly, if you are comparing two characters, it may be best to move from the most obvious contrasts to the least obvious. When you have arranged your notes into a meaningful sequence, you have begun a key step: dividing your material into paragraphs.

8. Get it down on paper. Most essayists find it useful to jot down some sort of outline, a map indicating the main idea of each paragraph and, under each main idea, supporting details that give it substance. An outline will help you to overcome the paralysis called "writer's block" that commonly afflicts professional as well as student writers. It does not necessarily have to be anything formal, with capital and lowercase letters and Roman and Arabic numerals, but merely key phrases jotted down in some sort of order. We provide numerous examples of jotted notes and outlines that lead to a rough draft and then a polished essay.

A page of paper with ideas listed in some sort of sequence, however rough, ought to encourage you. You will discover that you do have something to say. And so, despite the temptation to sharpen another pencil, surf the Internet, or have another cup of coffee, follow the advice of Isaac Asimov, author of 225 books: "Sit down and start writing."

If you do not feel that you can work from notes and a rough outline, try another method: Get something down on paper, writing (in a journal or on a computer) freely, sloppily, automatically, or whatever, but allowing your ideas about what the work means to you and how it conveys its meaning—rough as your ideas may be—to begin to take visible form. If you are like most people, you cannot do much precise thinking until you have committed to paper at least a rough sketch of your initial ideas. At this stage, you are trying to find out what your ideas are, and in the course of getting them down on paper, you will find yourself generating new ideas. We think with words. Capture your ideas in words, and then turn them into phrases and sentences. Later you can push and polish your ideas into shape, perhaps even deleting all of them and starting over, but it is a lot easier to improve your ideas once you see them in front of you than it is to do the job in your head. On paper, one word leads to another; in your head, one word often blocks another.

You may realize, as you near the end of a sentence, that you no longer believe it. Okay; be glad that your first idea led you to a better one, and pick up your better one and keep going with it. What you are doing, by trial and error, is moving not only toward clear expression but also toward sharper ideas and richer responses.

✔ CHECKLIST: Generating Ideas for a Draft

Have I asked myself the following questions?

- ☐ Have I double-checked my assignment, knowing what the purpose of my reading and writing is?
- ☐ Am I engaged in an active reading process? Have I read and reread the literary work that I am writing about?
- ☐ Have I annotated the literary work and written down brainstorming notes?
- ☐ Have I selected an interesting subject for my paper? Can I start to generate a working thesis for my paper, knowing that I will continue to revise it?
- ☐ Do my notes move beyond recording information and start to engage with conceptual ideas?
- ☐ Am I capturing my best ideas in my notes? Have I generated notes that explore the most compelling issues and concerns raised by the literary work?
- ☐ Are my note-taking techniques efficient? Do my notes allow me to sort and organize my ideas?
- ☐ Can my notes be organized into a sequence that has a beginning, a middle, and an end?
- ☐ Can I develop an outline from my notes, mapping the main idea of each paragraph and the supporting evidence that will be presented in each paragraph?
- ☐ Have I gotten ideas down on paper, no matter how rough they are? Can I move my ideas from words to phrases to sentences?
- ☐ Can I collect and reflect on my annotations, brainstorming notes, thesis, and outline, and start drafting my paper?

Writing and Revising: Achieving a Readable Draft

Good writing is *re*writing. The evidence? Heavily annotated drafts by Chekhov, Keats, Hemingway, Tolstoy, Woolf—almost any writer you can name. Of course, it is easy enough to spill out words, but, as the dramatist Richard Sheridan said 200 years ago, "Easy writing's curst hard reading." Good writers find writing is difficult because they care; they care about making sense, so they will take time to answer reasonable objections to their arguments and to find the exact words that will enable them to say precisely what they mean so that their readers will understand their key ideas in the right way. And they care about holding a reader's attention; they recognize that part of their job is to be interesting.

1. Keep looking and thinking, asking yourself questions and providing tentative answers, searching for additional material that strengthens or weakens your main point, and taking account of it in your outline or draft. As you return to the literary work and your outline, continue to add more ideas to it. Your draft will grow organically out of these notes.
2. Continue to hone your thesis and develop your argument. Generate a thesis that captures your main argument, making sure that your thesis engages with the most important conceptual ideas that you want to explore and makes a claim about those ideas. Your thesis paragraph should preview your development of your argument. Continue to revise your thesis as your paper evolves.

Now is probably the time to think about a title for your essay. It is usually a good idea to let your reader know what your topic is—which works of literature you will discuss—and what your approach will be. For instance, your topic might be Kate Chopin's "Désirée's Baby"—a story about the response to a white woman who gives birth to a mixed-race infant—and your approach might be that the story's theme of racial prejudice is still meaningful today. At this stage, your title is still tentative, but thinking about the title will help you to organize your thoughts and to determine which of your notes are relevant and which are not. Rather than the title "Chopin's Story about Race," a title "Chopin's 'Désirée's Baby' and Lessons about Racial Prejudice and Ignorance" starts to capture your unique ideas about the work. Remember, the title is the first part of the paper that your reader encounters. You will gain the reader's goodwill by providing a helpful, interesting title.

3. With your outline or draft in front of you, write a more lucid version of your paper, checking your notes for fuller details. If you wrote your draft on a computer, do not revise it on screen. Print a hard copy, and revise it with a pen or pencil. You need to read the essay more or less as your instructor will read it. True, the process of revising by hand takes more time than revising on a computer, but time is exactly what you need to devote to the process of revision. Time spent developing and clarifying your ideas is time well spent; it will save you time in the later stages of finalizing and editing the draft. When you wrote your first draft, you were eager to find out what you thought, what you knew, and what you did not know. Now, in the revising stage, you need to write slowly, thoughtfully. Later, you will type the handwritten revisions into the computer.

When you are revising an early draft, it is probably best to start by concentrating on large-scale revisions—reorganization and additions (for instance, you may now see that you need to define a term, or to give an example, or to quote further from the work that you are discussing). You will probably also make substantial deletions because you will now see that some sentences or paragraphs, although interesting, are redundant or irrelevant.

Although it is best to start with large-scale revisions (what teachers of composition somewhat grandly call "global revision"), the truth is that when most writers revise, whether they are experienced or inexperienced, they do not proceed methodically. Rather, they jump around, paying attention to whatever attracts their attention at the moment, like a dog hunting for fleas—and that is not a bad way to proceed. Still, you might at least plan to work in the following sequence:

- Introductory and concluding sections: Make sure that your title and opening paragraph(s) give your readers an idea of where you will be taking them. Is your thesis evident? Your concluding paragraph should tell them where they've been. Is your concluding paragraph conclusive without being merely repetitive?
- Organization: If some of your material now seems to be in the wrong place, move it by cutting and pasting. The Golden Rule is "Put together what belongs together." Make sure your ideas have a logical sequence or follow a natural flow in which one idea leads to the next.
- Development: Your ideas should not be repetitive and should not remain surface level. Rather, you should be presenting new but related ideas that add layers of depth and insight to your thesis.
- Evidence: Make sure that your assertions are supported by evidence and that the evidence is of varying sorts, ranging from details in the works to quotations from appropriate secondary sources.
- Counterevidence: Consider the objections that a reasonable reader might raise to some or all of your points, and explain why these objections are not substantial.
- Coherence in sentences, in paragraphs, and between paragraphs: Usually, this is a matter of adding transitional words and phrases (furthermore, therefore, for instance, on the other hand).
- Tone: Your sentences inevitably convey information not only about your topic but also about yourself. Do the sentences suggest stuffiness? Or are they too informal, too inappropriately casual?
- Editorial matters: Check the spelling of any words that you are in doubt about, check the punctuation, check sentence structure, and check the form of footnotes and bibliography (list of works cited).

If you find that some of your earlier notes are no longer relevant, eliminate them, but make sure that your argument flows from one point to the next. It is not enough to keep your thesis in mind; you must keep it in the reader's mind. As you write, your ideas will doubtless become clearer, and some may prove to be poor ideas. (We rarely know exactly what our ideas are until we write them down on paper or on the computer. As the little girl said, replying to the suggestion that she should think before she speaks, "How do I know what I think until I see what I say?") Not until you have written a draft do you really have a strong sense of what you feel and know and of how good your essay may be.

At this point, you can engage in a practice termed "reverse outlining." You read your draft and pull an outline out of it, in order to make sure that the draft is reasonably organized. A reverse outline works to capture what is actually written on the page. Jot down, in sequence, each major point and each subpoint as it is written in the draft. You may find that some points need amplification, that you have forgotten a key point, or that a point made on one page really ought to go on another page.

Later you will concern yourself with small-scale revisions (polishing sentences, clarifying transitions, varying sentence structure if necessary, checking spelling and documentation).

4. After a suitable interval, preferably a few days, again revise the draft. To write a good essay, you must be a good reader of the essay that you are writing. (We are not talking at this stage about proofreading or correcting spelling errors). Van Gogh said, "One becomes a painter by painting." Similarly, one becomes a writer by writing—and by rewriting and revising. In revising their work, writers ask themselves many questions:
   - Do I mean what I say?
   - Do I say what I mean? (Answering this question will generate other questions: Do I need to define my terms? Do I need to add examples to clarify? Do I need to reorganize the material so that a reader can grasp it?)

A Rule for Writers: Put yourself in the reader's shoes to make sure not only that the paper has an organization but also that the organization will be clear to your reader. If you imagine a classmate as the reader of the draft, you may find that you need to add transition words (for instance, on the other hand), clarify definitions, and provide additional supporting evidence.

During this part of the process of writing, read the draft in a skeptical frame of mind. You engaged in critical thinking when you made use of the literary work and any secondary sources; now apply the same questioning spirit to your own writing. In taking account of your doubts, you will probably unify, organize, clarify, and polish the draft.

Reminder: If you have written your draft on a computer or a tablet, do not try to revise it on screen. Print the entire draft, and then read it—as your reader will be reading it—page by page, not screen by screen. Almost surely you will detect errors in a hard copy that you miss on screen. Only by reading the printed copy will you be able to see if, for instance, the ideas on page two are repeated on page four.

5. With your draft in near-final form, turn to editing for correctness. After producing a draft that seems good enough to show to someone, writers engage in yet another activity: They edit. Editing includes such work as checking the accuracy of quotations by comparing them with the original, checking a dictionary for the spelling of doubtful words, and checking a handbook for doubtful punctuation—for instance, whether a comma or a semicolon is needed in a particular sentence.

✔ CHECKLIST: Writing and Revising a Draft

Have I asked myself the following questions?

- ☐ Does the draft fulfill the specifications (e.g., length, scope) of the assignment?
- ☐ Does the draft have a thesis—a central focusing argument that gives my paper a purpose?
- ☐ Is the title interesting and informative? Does my title create a favorable first impression?
- ☐ Are the early paragraphs engaging, and do they give the reader a good idea of what will follow, naming the works of literature, the approach, and the argument?
- ☐ Are key concepts explained clearly and then developed with supporting observations, insights, and analysis?
- ☐ Is the organization clear, reasonable, and effective? Can I check the organization by making a quick reverse outline?
- ☐ Are arguable assertions supported with evidence? Is the evidence explained?
- ☐ Are my readers kept in mind, for instance, by defining terms that they may be unfamiliar with? Are possible objections faced and adequately answered?
- ☐ If quotations are included, are they introduced rather than just dumped into the essay? Are quotations as brief as possible? Might summaries (properly credited to the sources) be more effective than long quotations?
- ☐ Are all sources cited, including Internet material?
- ☐ Does the final paragraph nicely round off the paper, or does it merely restate—unnecessarily—the obvious?
- ☐ Does the paper include whatever visual materials the reader may need to see?

Revising: Working with Peer Review

Almost all professional writers get help—from friends, from colleagues, and especially from editors who are paid to go over their manuscripts and call attention to matters that need clarification. If possible, get a fellow student to read your manuscript and give you his or her responses. Do not confuse this sort of help—recommended by all instructors—with plagiarism, which is the unacknowledged use of someone else's words or ideas. Your reader is not rewriting the paper for you but merely suggesting that (for instance) your title is misleading, that here you need a clear example, that there you are excessively repetitive, and so forth. If you are unfamiliar with the process of peer review and uncertain about the nature of plagiarism, we urge you to read the discussions on pages 403-04.

If peer review is a part of the writing process in your course, the instructor may arrange for writing workshops to be held in or out of class. The instructor may also distribute a guide for peer review that offers suggestions and questions. The preceding checklist is an example of such a guide.

Preparing the Final Draft

1. If you have received comments from a reader, consider them carefully. Even when you disagree with them, they may alert you to places in your essay that need revision or clarification.

When a friend, a classmate, or another peer reviewer has given you help, acknowledge that person in a footnote or an endnote. (If you look at almost any book, you will notice that the author acknowledges the help of friends and colleagues. In your own writing, follow this practice.) Here are sample acknowledgments from papers by students:

> I wish to thank Anna Aaron for numerous valuable suggestions.

> I thank Paul Gottsegen for calling my attention to passages that needed clarification, and Jane Leslie for suggesting the comparison between Sammy in Updike's "A & P" and the unnamed narrator in Joyce's "Araby."

2. If you have borrowed ideas, be sure to give credit, usually in footnotes, to your sources. Remember that plagiarism is not limited to the unacknowledged borrowing of words; a borrowed idea, even when put into your own words, requires acknowledgment. (On giving credit to sources, see Appendix B.)
3. Print a clean copy of your final draft, following the principles concerning margins, pagination, footnotes, and so on, set forth in Appendix B.
4. Proofread the hard copy, make corrections as necessary, and print it out again.

All of this adds up to a recipe found in a famous Victorian cookbook: "First catch your hare, then cook it."

CHAPTER 2

How to Engage in Critical Thinking about Literature: A Crash Course

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to:

- Define critical thinking
- Use close reading to investigate a literary work
- Engage in analysis, using inquiry, interpretation, and argumentation to come to a deeper understanding of a literary work
- Use comparison and synthesis to connect your ideas to other sources
- Reflect on your ideas and continually revise them to improve your writing
- Identify the differences between nonanalytical and analytical writing

The Basic Strategy

In order to develop your critical thinking skills, we suggest that you try the following strategies:

- Annotate the literary work as you read, engaging in active reading. Take notes in the margins of the text as you read; this will help you to remember key details but will also help to trigger insightful thinking as you read.
- Make sure that you can summarize the literary work, demonstrating that you understand its key ideas. If there is a passage that confuses you or a detail that you have forgotten, go back and reread the passage and clarify your thinking before you start to develop an interpretation of the text.
- Ask questions about the literary work, using an analytical approach to the text by asking conceptual "why" and "how" questions, rather than by asking informational "what" questions.
- Argue with yourself as you generate ideas. Continue to revise your understanding of the text by scrutinizing your assumptions, testing your evidence, thinking of counterarguments, and asking yourself follow-up questions.

- Create an interpretation that captures your sense of the meaning of the work. As you write your paper, develop a focused analysis of the work by selecting a key idea for exploration. Define, explain, and add depth to that idea.
- Develop your interpretation by exploring both literary content and form. Literary analysis examines both literary content (the thematic ideas presented by the work) and literary form (the structuring of those ideas through literary elements, such as voice, imagery, and symbolism, among many others). How does the form of the text shape its ideas?
- Collect evidence that supports your interpretation. Look "inward" to literary form and content, and look "outward" to literary contexts and criticism. As you develop your ideas, support them with details from the literary work and, if your assignment allows, information about the cultural context of the work or literary criticism written by scholars about the work.
- Create an argument that captures your most important analytical ideas about the text. Develop a thesis that takes a stand. Present your point of view on the key idea that you have selected for analysis.
- Use comparison and contrast to develop relationships among texts and to connect two or more texts by analyzing their similarities and differences. A comparison paper should lead to new insights about each text, clarifying the key ideas that you see in each.
- When performing research, synthesize your sources. Create relationships among your ideas and those of critics, working to interweave your sources in your paper.
- Revise your ideas as you revise your writing. An essential component of critical thinking is the ability to revisit and "re-see" your own ideas. Become your own best critic, and revise your ideas as you develop them.

What Is Critical Thinking?

When we engage in critical thinking, we are keenly aware of what we are doing. We are, for instance, studying an effect and searching for its causes. "This story bores me, but exactly why does it bore me?" "Is the plot too familiar?" "Are the characters unrealistic?" "Is the language trite?" "Is the language so technical that I can't follow it?" "Does the author use too many words to say too few?" Or: "I loved the book but hated the movie. Why?" Again, we start to consider the problem closely, probably (again) by examining the parts that make up the whole. And here we are at the heart of critical thinking. Critical thinking is a matter of separating the whole into parts in order to see relationships.

Having said that critical thinking does not necessarily involve faultfinding, we want to modify that statement. There is one writer whose work you should indeed judge severely. That writer is you. When you read a draft of your work, adopt a skeptical spirit. As you read, ask yourself if your assertions are supported with sufficient evidence, and ask if other interpretations of the evidence might reasonably be offered. When you engage in this process, you are engaged in critical thinking.

When we engage in critical thinking in an academic setting, we critique in order to come to a deeper understanding of complex ideas. Let's apply this to literary study: When we engage in critical thinking about literature, we critique in order to come to a deeper understanding of a literary text's possible meanings, determine what meaning we find most interesting and important, explore how and why a text creates that meaning, and explore how and why that meaning might connect to a larger understanding of the world. Writing takes this critical thinking process one step further: It forces us to slow down and register how we understand and evaluate the text, how we develop an interpretation of the text, how we select evidence to support our ideas, how we construct an argument about the text, and how we compare texts and synthesize our ideas with those of others writers. Writing puts our critical thinking skills on display.

How Do We Engage in Critical Thinking?

We are constantly engaging with texts, ranging from stories to movies to blogs to YouTube clips, working to understand them and then express our opinions about them. When you go to a movie, you might come out from the screening telling a friend, "I really liked that character, except it was so unrealistic when he was able to overcome that warrior.…" In moments like this, you are engaging in critical thinking without realizing it. You are showing that you understood what happened in the movie, and you are taking the next step of determining what the movie means by questioning its key elements and connecting it to your knowledge about how you think it should work. By explaining your opinions about the movie, you are showing that you've created your own interpretation of it. In other words, you've generated your own ideas—you've used someone else's work to trigger new ideas of your own.

In academic critical thinking, you take this general process of thinking and make it more directed and purposeful. You aim to understand and organize your thought processes and then apply those processes to challenging texts. You judge and critique those texts in order to hone your ability to develop ideas—and become an idea-creator and text-creator yourself. The process of critical thinking can be broken down into the following simplified stages of thinking:

- Summary, in which you restate the information conveyed by a literary text, demonstrating that you've carefully read the text and have fully understood its key ideas
- Analysis, in which you develop your opinion about the meaning of the text by questioning the text, interpreting the text, defining concepts central to the text, locating evidence that supports your ideas, and creating arguments that explain your unique understanding of the text
- Synthesis, in which you connect your reading of the text to other sources, developing relationships among your ideas and the ideas of others (such as critics)

Literature is widely understood to be one of the best ways to develop critical thinking because it is purposefully open-ended and encourages multiple interpretations. Literature does not tell you what it means in a straightforward way. It often raises more questions than it answers. It is often purposely complex or unclear. Why? Literature attempts to capture the complexity of the human experience, and human emotions, thoughts, dreams, and memories are far from straightforward. Crucially, literature does not tell you exactly what to think. Literature is not a lecture, or a sermon, or a political speech, with a clear message or argument. Yet, that is exactly why we read literature—it gives us the freedom to think on our own.

Literature encourages you to come up with your own understanding of it—and this is where critical thinking comes in. When you are reading literature, you are able to develop your interpretation of the text and then create arguments that capture that interpretation.

Literature encourages the development of a particularly rich and multifaceted set of critical thinking skills. Let's explore these skills in more detail.

Close Reading

A strong literary analysis starts with a strong close reading. A close reading takes on a deceptively simple task: It attempts to accurately understand a literary work and then figure out what ideas the work explores. A close reading develops an understanding of the text and investigates how the text makes meaning.

In some ways, the close reading task is straightforward. For example, you know that the sentence, "Go to the store and buy a loaf of bread," means exactly that, and you do not have to attend to that sentence very closely to understand what it means. When you turn to literature, however, the close reading task gets more complex. For example, take the opening sentence of James Joyce's short story, "Araby": "North Richmond Street, being blind, was a quiet street except at the hour when the Christian Brothers' School set the boys free." We can provide a summary of the information in the sentence: A street named North Richmond Street is the site of a boy's school, and the street is typically quiet except when the boys are leaving school. However, a literary work encourages you to start a process of analysis. Instantly, questions pop up: What does "being blind" mean—how can a street be blind? What are the boys being set free from? Where are we—in what country and in what time period? Asking questions like this starts a process of thinking, interpreting, arguing—the process of critical thinking.

Close reading asks you to become a detective, picking up clues that can help you figure out what you think the text's meaning is. Annotating the text, marking it up as you read, is the best way to collect those ideas. As you read, "notice what you notice," and note any interesting, strange, beautiful, or confusing moments.

In literature, the clues are the interesting words and the interesting ways those words are positioned in a text, such as repetition or sentence placement. Literary structure, literary genre, and literary elements call attention to certain ideas. In a poem, for example, the form that words take on a page (such as a sonnet form) is crucial to discovering the poem's meaning. A close reading examines not just what is being said but how the text is saying it.

If you reread that first sentence from "Araby," it starts to make sense. The street must be "blind" like a "blind alley" or a dead end; the boys are being set free from their school, which is holding them in like a prison; the school is in a town with clearly named streets and buildings. Slowing down and rereading the text for clues to its meaning is essential to the close reading process.

As you read "Araby," continue to notice key words and ask questions about them, connecting details to larger concepts. The second sentence reads, "An uninhabited house of two storeys stood at the blind end, detached from its neighbors in a square ground." "Araby" is not describing a street filled with happiness; the words "uninhabited" and "detached" are creating a feeling of loneliness or uneasiness. The word "blind" seems important: It is repeated in the first two sentences. Is a pattern being set up? What does "blind" mean? In the story, maybe someone won't be seeing things clearly? Creating interpretations based on textual clues is the key outcome of close reading. With only two sentences to go on, we've already started to create an interpretation: We can hypothesize that "Araby" is going to explore loneliness or unhappiness, might feature a boy, and might be set in a city.

What literary forms are helping to create the text's meaning?

✔CHECKLIST: Close Reading

How can I perform a close reading? As you think about your reading and writing process, ask yourself:

- ☐ Have I read with an open mind, asking questions as I read?
- ☐ Did I annotate the text, capturing my thinking in marginal notes?
- ☐ Have I slowed down my reading process, making sure that I am reading both to gather information and to generate new ideas?
- ☐ Did I read to understand the text? Make sure that you can accurately summarize the text. Reread passages that might be confusing or unclear on a first reading. Use annotations to keep track of important information about the literary work.
- ☐ Have I formulated ideas about the text's larger meaning? Collect clues to the text's meaning. Make sure to "notice what you notice," marking down any aspects of the text that you find interesting.
- ☐ Did I highlight specific evidence—words, phrases, images, structures—that seems to be signaling deeper meaning?
- ☐ Have I looked for patterns among details?
- ☐ Have I connected details to concepts? Make sure to jot down concept words in the margins of the text.
- ☐ Did I reread and rethink passages that seem particularly rich and passages that seem to be most connected to the concepts that I found interesting?

Analysis: Inquiry, Interpretation, Argument

Analysis is the process of thinking about (and rethinking and rethinking about!) a literary text in order to explore how it works, to examine the ideas that it raises, and to develop a unique interpretation of its meaning. Analysis asks you to investigate an issue raised by the literary work by breaking down the text into its component parts; you examine the text's parts in order to see how the text works as a whole to create its larger conceptual ideas. Analysis includes three critical thinking steps, which lead to and often overlap each other:

- Inquiry: the process of asking questions about a text in order to understand its meaning
- Interpretation: the development of a unique understanding of the text
- Argument: the presentation of a claim or a thesis about the text, which is then explained, developed, and supported with evidence

An analysis assignment might ask you to explore the ideal of beauty as presented in Michelle Serros's "Senior Picture Day," a short story that appears in Chapter 3. As soon as you start to explore "beauty" as presented in the story, it raises multiple questions and becomes a complex concept: In the story, how is beauty defined—is it defined only as appearance? Why does the narrator think her Mexican or Indian nose is not beautiful? How does American culture define beauty? How does her friend, Terri, reinforce that definition of beauty? Why would Native American beauty not be part of American beauty? How and why does her friend use her looks against her? Is beauty primarily about winning a boyfriend? This is just a start—the questions can keep coming!

As you think through your inquiry questions, you start to hypothesize answers to them. You might determine that you like the questions that connect ideas about friendship to ideas about beauty. Friends using beauty against each other is an unexpected concept. With some more thought, that idea could develop into an interpretation that explores how the story presents a character who uses beauty as a form of competition, showing that ideals of beauty can undermine friendship.

With a clear focusing idea and interpretation in place, you are ready to start writing your paper. When you are writing an analytical paper, you present your interpretation of the text in the form of an argument. You will need to create a central claim—an argument that captures your interpretation and conveys a position that can be debated. Your paper will work to develop and deepen that one idea. The central claim will become your thesis, serving as your paper's overarching and organizing principle. As you shape your thesis (such as with the argument that "Senior Picture Day" presents a character who uses beauty as a form of competition, showing that ideals of beauty can undermine friendship), you will need to examine any assumptions that you are making (such as the assumption that friendship should not be competitive) and define any terms that are essential to it (such as "beauty" and "American"). You will develop the thesis by explaining the different parts of the text that support your central idea, using details from the text as evidence and using sources that trigger further thinking. Analysis, then, is a process of using your observations about a text to develop a deeper understanding of the text and then presenting your new ideas and insights in a well-organized argument about the text's form and meaning.

As you read this description of analysis, you can see why it is at the core of critical thinking: It requires determining and exploring ideas, creating concepts, taking ideas apart and putting them back together again, making arguments, finding evidence, and developing ideas further. Let's look at each of these steps in turn.

Inquiry

Inquiry is the process of asking productive questions that lead to further thought and investigation, triggering new ideas and interpretations. The term "inquiry" captures the sense of a curious, inquiring mind asking open-ended questions that will lead to more questions and, ultimately, to the attempt to answer those questions. Inquiry is often positioned as the starting point of a discovery process that generates new ideas—inquiry encompasses a type of activity that we loosely call "brainstorming."

If you are trying to create new knowledge, you must be able to ask good questions about issues that you are observing, reading about, and researching. So, what is a "good" question? Inquiry-based questions cannot be answered with a quick "yes" or "no." They cannot be answered with a quick checking of factual information.

They cannot be answered with a plot summary or a restatement of the author's argument or findings. Instead, inquiry-based questions are often conceptual questions that seek to "open up" a topic to new thinking. Rather than asking for information, an inquiry-based question asks "why?" or "how?"

You can start to trigger interpretive thinking by asking general questions such as, "What is the main idea of this work?" or "What is the most important issue that this work explores?" and then moving toward more specific questions such as, "How does this story's character change to create a changing definition of this idea?" or "How does this poem's imagery show both positive and negative aspect of this idea?"

If we return to the story "Senior Picture Day," you might question how it presents "beauty," asking some of the questions that we've already noted. Those questions will become more specific as you reexamine the literary work and question it further. For example, as you reread your annotations on "Senior Picture Day," you might start to focus on the role the narrator's friend, Terri, plays in defining beauty. Why does Terri say to the narrator, "you look like you're more from Mexico than California"? How does the narrator counter that statement—does it show that she understands stereotypical ideals of beauty? When Terri is talking to Lightning Bolt, what are the ideals of female beauty that she references and why? Why does the narrator say about Terri, "She was saying things about a friend, things a real friend shouldn't be saying?" Why is Terri's reference to the narrator's nose the most painful comment? Why does the narrator leave Terri's house without telling her?

Inquiry-based questions wrestle with the ideas that are at the heart of the issue under consideration. Something meaningful is at stake in an inquiry-based question: An idea is being discovered and explained, an argument is being proven or disproven, a topic is being redefined, or a finding is being expanded.

✔CHECKLIST: Inquiry and Question-Asking

How can I start my analysis by engaging in inquiry? As you think about your reading and writing process, ask yourself:

- ☐ Have I approached the text with a curious, inquiring mind? Remember that literary analysis is a process of discovery in which the reader uncovers meanings that he or she won't see at first.
- ☐ Have I asked as many questions as possible, big and small?
- ☐ Have I asked conceptual questions? Do not ask just fact-based "what" questions or "yes" and "no" questions. Instead, ask concept-oriented questions or "why" and "how" questions. Ask unexpected questions.
- ☐ Did I use brainstorming writing—jotting notes, making lists, writing response entries—to formulate answers to my questions?
- ☐ Have I argued with myself to continue the brainstorming process? Use questions to test your inferences, assumptions, and preexisting knowledge.
- ☐ Have I defined key terms?
- ☐ Did I use questions and answers to determine what a text might mean? At the same time, continue to be comfortable with ambiguity and indeterminacy, explore open-ended possibilities, entertain half-formed ideas, investigate opposing ideas, and notice what ideas seem too obvious and what ideas seem richly complex.

Interpretation

Analysis encourages you to maintain openness, asking questions while also predicting or hypothesizing the answers that you might discover as you continue your investigation. When you are working with literature, the most obvious outcome of the "questioning and answering" brainstorming process is that you interpret a piece of literature in an analysis paper. You use the annotating process of close reading and the note-taking process of inquiry to figure out what you think that literary text means, and you are then ready to turn to outlining and drafting a paper that solidifies your specific interpretation. Once focused and consolidated, your answers to your inquiry questions become your interpretation; your answers can serve as the arguments that structure your analysis paper.

Central to the interpretative process is evidence. Interpretation works with specific details in the text, asking, "What does this detail mean?" Literature trains you to look carefully at specific words and phrases, and at literary elements such as symbolism, setting, character, plot, and imagery. We discuss the literary elements central to each genre in detail in Chapters 11–15. All of these details become evidence for your interpretation, and you will evaluate and select the best evidence to support your ideas, quoting that evidence and citing it in your paper.

Literature also trains you to move back and forth between small details and big conceptual ideas, or to connect literary form (the literary elements) with literary content (the conceptual ideas, such as theme). Your interpretation will determine what ideas are represented by what details and what literary elements of the text are the most important. As you generate ideas, you will employ critical thinking skills, including drawing inferences, uncovering assumptions, connecting details, and entertaining and weighing competing interpretations.

If you look at the questions that we have been asking about "Senior Picture Day," you can see this movement from small details to larger concepts. An analysis will connect specific words, images, and elements from the story, such as Terri's comment about the narrator looking "Mexican" and not "blond," to larger ideas, such as the story's exploration of American ideals of female beauty and whether Native American women can fit those ideals. As you explore the story, you might analyze Terri's critique of her friend's body—how she mentions her being "skinny," then calls her "flat-chested," and then labels her nose "Indian." As you look at those phrases, you might form the opinion that Terri is purposely creating worse and worse insults about her friend. Your interpretation might show that, because the insults are presented in a series (skinny, flat-chested, nose), Terri knows that she is making insulting comments about her friend—they aren't unintentional. Your interpretation might determine that this is a strategic use of beauty by one friend to hurt another friend: Terri seems to move strategically toward the worst insult that she can make—and American ideals of beauty help her to do that.

Interpretation is the process of generating and testing your ideas. As you develop your interpretation, you should work to hone your ideas, making your interpretation more precise. We often think of "going deeper" into a text or "deepening" an interpretation, in that we do not want to remain at the surface level of the text and create an obvious or superficial interpretation of it; instead, we want to get to a deeper knowledge of what the text presents and understand its most important ideas. As you finalize your analysis, you will start to sort and organize your questions and answers, finding connections among your ideas. You will discover key ideas that repeat themselves, revealing that they are central to the literary work. You will also start to discard ideas that seem weak or off-topic. As your interpretation takes shape, it will become an argument, taking the form of a clear statement that will organize your paper.

✔CHECKLIST: Interpretation

How can I continue my analysis, moving from inquiry to interpretation? As you think about your reading and writing process, ask yourself:

- ☐ Have I developed my understanding of the literary work, aiming for a focused explanation of the work's larger meaning? It can be helpful to ask, "What is one of the text's most important main ideas, and how does the text present and develop that idea?"
- ☐ Did I analyze both literary content and literary form as I created my interpretation? Literature not only presents complex ideas but also presents them in an artistic way, using specific literary forms. Make sure that your interpretation explores how the work makes meaning by attending to both form and content.
- ☐ Have I broken down the literary work? Separate the whole into parts in order to see relationships among the parts.
- ☐ Have I worked with concepts? Define, explain, and develop the work's key ideas.
- ☐ Have I worked with evidence? Explore the work's details, noting the ideas that they trigger. As you work with the evidence, you might:
  - draw inferences
  - uncover assumptions
  - connect details
  - organize evidence by categorizing it, locating similarities and differences
  - trace patterns and repetitions
  - entertain and weigh competing interpretations
  - note what seems to be missing, locating interesting gaps
- ☐ Did I create predictions or hypotheses concerning possible meanings?
- ☐ Did I create an interpretation? (Take a leap: What do you think the text means?)

Argument

An argument is a claim that offers a focused presentation of your interpretation of a literary work. A strong paper will take a specific position on, or make a specific proposition about, a carefully selected and narrowed topic, rather than present an obvious idea about a general topic. Your presentation of your claim and the evidence for your claim—and your attempt to win your reader over to your side through logical and well-organized writing—is argumentation.

When a main argument or claim is presented in an academic paper, we often label it a "thesis statement." A thesis statement allows you to show off your analysis by presenting it in a concise manner that highlights the strength of your ideas. This argument is then developed, typically through a series of supporting ideas or subpoints that present evidence and explain the reasoning behind the argument. A successful paper will answer the "so what" question and explain the significance of the argument.

Imagine yourself having to explain your ideas about a literary work to a friend, and then imagine your friend being somewhat resistant to your ideas so that you have to explain them in a more argumentative way, support them with clear evidence, and develop them with a series of related ideas. If you were exploring T. Coraghessan Boyle's "Greasy Lake," you might say something along the lines of, "The narrator seems really immature." If your friend questions you on this, you might decide to make your ideas more argumentative, explaining, "The narrator represents immaturity because he doesn't think of the consequences of his actions—especially his violence toward the 'greasy character' and the 'fox.'" You might have to explain your ideas further, saying, "Although he can't handle responsibility, the narrator thinks that he is superior to everyone; he shows off how smart he is by making reference to art and literature. He thinks he is smart, but he is not smart about his actions and their consequences. Boyle wants to show that immaturity can't be rewarded, and that's why the narrator is punished with his car getting wrecked." With a bit of revision and development, this type of argument is already on its way to becoming a claim—a thesis—that can be further developed in an analytical paper.

Your thesis presents the main idea of your paper; it is the specific argument that you make about your selected topic. The best thesis arguments come from the ideas and evidence that you return to again and again in your brainstorming—the ideas that you are most interested in and passionate about. A thesis can result from your interest in a(n)

- Pattern: such as repeated images, ideas, or literary techniques
- Problem: such as a scene that raises but doesn't quite resolve a difficult issue
- Insight: such as a realization that an image might symbolize a specific idea
- Question: such as a questioning of a character's motivation
- Formal element: such as a careful charting of voice throughout a story
- Conceptual idea: such as a new insight into a universal concept, like love

Although we are concentrating on writing about literature, you can see how this type of writing develops larger critical thinking skills, such as learning to identify and analyze a problem, which are helpful in all fields and careers.

Once you have a thesis, you will want to develop it. The process of inquiry, of asking and answering questions about a text, can generate many insights. Those insights can be shaped—sorted, selected, and consolidated—into a pattern of ideas that can be developed into your argument. As you develop your interpretation of a text, your ideas can follow a logical order; for example, you might organize your ideas by subtopics, by facets of a topic, by "problems and solutions," from "most important to least important ideas," or from "big picture to smaller details."

✔CHECKLIST: Argument

How can I use my analysis to generate an argument? As you think about your reading and writing process, ask yourself:

- ☐ Have I turned my interpretation into an argument by focusing on a specific aspect of the literary work and developing a position on that aspect?
- ☐ Did I create a strong thesis that presents a focused claim?
- ☐ Did I create a strong thesis that moves beyond an obvious statement or general idea?
- ☐ Have I developed my argument by selecting my best ideas and deepening them through further analysis?
- ☐ Have I organized my argument, most typically by breaking down my interpretation into a series of subideas or subconcepts, which I then have organized in a logical fashion? Remember to keep similar ideas together and work to create a flow from one set of ideas to the next. You might create an organization in which you

- move from the most important idea to the least important idea
- move from the most obvious or understandable idea to the most complex idea
- trace a "cause/effect" or "causal" relationship, in which one idea leads to another because it causes it to occur
- explain the facets of one idea, showing how they connect (for example, "love" can encompass romantic love, platonic love, and familial love)
- perform an analysis of one literary element, such as a character analysis
- move from specific details to larger generalizations ("bottom up" or inductive reasoning)
- move from a general statement to smaller details ("top down" or deductive reasoning)
- follow a chronological order
- use a "pros/cons," "problem/solution," or "similarities/differences" structure

☐ Have I supported ideas with meaningful evidence that is analyzed and explained?

☐ Did I consider counterarguments?

Comparison and Synthesis

Comparison and synthesis connect together two or more sources, creating a relationship between them. In both comparison and synthesis, you are looking to find common concerns—areas of connection—that will allow different texts, authors, ideas, interpretations, or insights to be brought together.

Comparison is a well-known means of creating connections among sources, as most of us have written "comparison/contrast" papers at some point. Comparison focuses on finding similarities, while contrast focuses on finding differences among two or more sources. The development of relationships among texts encourages critical thinking; you cannot rely on a summary of the two texts but must evaluate each text in light of the other. Through comparison, you locate ideas and issues that might not be readily apparent in each text but that are revealed and then explored through the relationships you create.

Synthesis typically indicates a research paper in which multiple sources that comment on a topic are brought together in order to develop a new understanding of that topic. Rather than being compared and contrasted, the sources are often interwoven, taking the best ideas from each in order to help build an understanding of what has been discovered or debated about the topic at hand. When engaged in synthesis, you are connecting sources to your own thinking, showing how your ideas fit into larger critical debates. A synthesis will often serve as a strong foundation for further analysis, allowing you to show that your ideas are strong because they build on the ideas of critics. When working with critics' ideas, maintain a clear sense of your own ideas and arguments, explaining how you agree, disagree, or both agree and disagree ("Okay, but…") with the critics; further their ideas through your use of them; or apply their ideas to a new source. Use correct attribution and citation style, as detailed in Appendix B.

Synthesis requires several forms of critical thinking: You understand each source and can accurately convey its key ideas; you select only the most relevant ideas from each source; you bring together sources in a way that clarifies how they agree, disagree, expand, develop, support, or contradict each other; you explain how each source connects to your thesis and arguments; and you create an organization for your synthesis that allows you to bring together sources without overwhelming your own ideas.

✔ CHECKLIST: Comparison and Synthesis

How can I engage in comparison and synthesis? As you think about your reading and writing process, ask yourself:

- ☐ Have I collected and selected sources that "speak to each other"—that address shared ideas and information, and thus can create meaningful connections?
- ☐ Did I create a relationship among my sources, explaining how they connect? Remember that comparison emphasizes similarities among sources, contrast emphasizes differences, and synthesis emphasizes an interweaving of sources.
- ☐ Have I maintained a strong sense of my own voice when performing research, clarifying how I agree with, disagree with, or further apply the critics' arguments?
- ☐ Did I create a strong thesis that emphasizes the relationship that I've created?
- ☐ Have I used the relationship that I've created to generate new insights into each text?
- ☐ Did I create a clear argumentative structure in which my paper works to integrate the sources to highlight ideas?
- ☐ Have I selected specific evidence from each source for quotation and analysis?
- ☐ Did I cite each source correctly?

Revision and Self-Awareness

An essential part of critical thinking is reflecting on your ideas and continually revising them in order to improve them. Each part of the critical thinking process should be repeated as needed: Reading should include rereading, inquiry should include asking follow-up questions, interpretation should include revisiting insights and reinterpreting evidence, argumentation should include a honing and reorganizing of key ideas, and synthesis should include reexamining the relationships created among sources.

The writing process ensures this rethinking by requiring revision. A paper is typically drafted and redrafted, moving from a rough initial draft through several intermediary drafts and then to a final draft that is polished before being submitted. Throughout this book, we provide multiple examples of papers being revised and improved as part of the writing process.

It might be helpful to think of paper "re-vision" as an opportunity to "re-envision" your ideas. Writing captures your thinking on the page. Writing also triggers new thinking: We have all had a lightbulb go off during the process of drafting—our mind is stimulated by the writing process to invent new ideas. When we are revising, we create new opportunities to improve our ideas. Make sure to see revision as an essential critical thinking skill and not a mere afterthought.

Revision forces you to step into the position of critic, asking you to analyze and criticize your own writing. The ability to create your own ideas and then to step outside of yourself, reflect on, and critique those ideas requires advanced critical thinking skills that will serve you well in all of your academic courses and will later transfer into your career and beyond. Critical thinking encourages you to develop a sense of reflective self-awareness of yourself as a reader, writer, and thinker. As you engage in the writing process, use it to think carefully about your audience, the academic context of writing, your strengths and weaknesses as a writer, and how to push yourself to continually improve your thinking processes.

Standing Back: Kinds of Writing

Most writing about literature seeks to do one or both of two things:

- to inform ("This play was written only five years ago"; "The images of night suggest death.")
- to persuade ("This early story is one of her best"; "Despite the widespread view that the images of night suggest death, I will argue that here they do nothing more than indicate a time of day.")

Whether you are primarily concerned with informing or with persuading (and the two purposes can be nearly indistinguishable, because writers usually want to persuade readers that their information is significant), you ought to be prompted by a strong interest in a work or a body of work. This interest is usually a highly favorable response to the material (essentially, "That's terrific"), but an unfavorable response ("Awful!") or a sense of bafflement ("Why would anyone care for that?") may also motivate writing. In any case, because you have been stimulated by a work, you put words onto paper, perhaps first by jotting down observations in no particular sequence. Later, you will organize them for the benefit of an imagined reader, offering what D. H. Lawrence calls "a reasoned account of the feelings" produced by a work. Don't be embarrassed if a work produces strong feelings in you, pleasant or unpleasant.

Nonanalytical versus Analytical Writing

Writing about literature includes a range of types of writing. Some types of writing are nonanalytical-they try to avoid argument and attempt instead to inform, to describe, or to define. Some types of writing narrate personal responses. Although personal responses can hardly be argued about in rational terms, they can and must be set forth clearly and interestingly so that the reader understands—because the writer points to things in the literary work that evoke the responses—why the writer experiences these responses and why the writer evaluates the work as he or she does. Types of nonanalytical writing include the following:

- Description and summary ("The story is unusually brief, only a page long"; "The narrator explained his morning ritual of making coffee and then described riding the subway to work.")
- Definition ("The poem is a Shakespearian sonnet, since it is comprised of three quatrains and a couplet, following the rhyme scheme of abab, cdcd, efef, gg.")

- Personal report or response or what might be called "confession," a report of one's immediate response and perhaps of later responses ("The story reminds me of an experience that I had when I was about the age of the central character").
- Review, evaluation, or judgment ("The story is shocking" or "There is nothing here that holds my interest.") In Appendix A, we discuss critical strategies that underlie evaluation. Here, it is enough to say that the two most common sources for judging are: (1) a spontaneous personal response ("The death of a child is deeply disturbing") and (2) a principle that is alleged to be widely held ("A story ought to be unified").

Most academic writing about literature is chiefly explanatory and argumentative or, we can say, analytical: It is concerned with examining relationships (for instance, of the parts to the whole within a work, or of historical causes and effects) and creating arguments about how those relationships work and what they mean. Your instructors will probably ask you to write papers that are chiefly analytical, although some description, personal response, and review will almost surely be implicit (if not explicit) in your analyses. Analytical writing attempts to win over its audience through an interesting thesis, strong argumentation, compelling evidence, original insight, and clear organization.

- Analysis or explanation of the work, typically focusing on the conceptual ideas developed by the work and the internal relationships—the form and structure—of the work ("The second scene in this play has at least three functions"). As we have seen, an analytical paper results from close reading, inquiry, interpretation, and argumentation.
- Comparison ("While both poems present motherhood as challenging, the first emphasizes the negative feelings of overwork and the second emphasizes the positive emotions of support.")
- Synthesis ("These critics agree that the story presents a utopian vision of nineteenth-century farm life.") Synthesis can also include the application of critical concepts or theories to a literary work ("Freud's concept of the superego offers a way of understanding this character's motivations").

These analytical forms of writing aim to convince the reader of your interpretation of the work. Argumentation is central to these analytical forms of writing:

- Argument or writing that makes a strong claim and offers reasons advancing that specific understanding of the literary work. The reasons will be supported by evidence, notably references to passages from the literary works that you are discussing.

As you review the critical thinking process outlined in this chapter, the most obvious outcome of these steps is that you interpret a piece of literature—you figure out what you think that literary work means. In a literature-based class, the act of analysis is what it is all about! The ability to come to your own conclusions about a text's meaning is the foundation for all sorts of activities—class discussions, class debates, class papers—all of which typically present an argument that a text emphasizes as a key idea. More generally, note the skills that this process develops. A critical thinker learns not only to become a better reader and writer but also to notice details and patterns, to feel comfortable asking questions, to develop interpretations, to remain open to alternate interpretations, to test his or her own ideas, and to make arguments. Literature invites you to develop critical thinking skills at the most sophisticated level.

CHAPTER 3

The Writer as Reader

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Explain the process of reading and responding to literature
- Use first responses, inquiry notes, and outlining to generate ideas for an essay
- Develop an analytical essay with an argumentative thesis
- Analyze an essay's argument, structure, and idea development
- Evaluate a student essay

Reading and Responding

Learning to write is in large measure learning to read. The text you should read most carefully is the one you yourself write—for example, an essay that makes an argument defending an interpretation. Your writing may start as jotting notes in the margin of a book that you are reading or in a journal, and it will go through several drafts before it becomes a finished essay. To produce something that another person will find worth reading, you must read each draft with care, trying to imagine the effect your words are likely to have on your reader. In writing about literature, you will apply some of the same critical thinking skills to your reading; that is, you will examine your responses to what you are reading, and you will try to account for them.

Let's begin by looking at a very short story by Kate Chopin.

KATE CHOPIN

Kate O'Flaherty (1851–1904), born into a prosperous family in St. Louis in 1870, married Oscar Chopin, a French-Creole businessman from Louisiana. They lived in New Orleans, where they had six children. Oscar died of malaria in 1882, and in 1884, Kate returned to St. Louis, where, living with her mother and children, she began to write fiction.

Ripe Figs

Maman-Nainaine said that when the figs were ripe Babette might go to visit her cousins down on the Bayou-Lafourche where the sugar cane grows. Not that the ripening of figs had the least thing to do with it, but that is the way Maman-Nainaine was.

It seemed to Babette a very long time to wait; for the leaves upon the trees were tender yet, and the figs were like little hard, green marbles.

But warm rains came along and plenty of strong sunshine, and though Maman-Nainaine was as patient as the statue of la Madone, and Babette as restless as a humming-bird, the first thing they both knew it was hot summertime. Every day Babette danced out to where the fig-trees were in a long line against the fence. She walked slowly beneath them, carefully peering between the gnarled, spreading branches. But each time she came disconsolate away again. What she saw there finally was something that made her sing and dance the whole long day.

When Maman-Nainaine sat down in her stately way to breakfast, the following morning, her muslin cap standing like an aureole about her white, placid face, Babette approached. She bore a dainty porcelain platter, which she set down before her godmother. It contained a dozen purple figs, fringed around with their rich, green leaves.

"Ah," said Maman-Nainaine arching her eyebrows, "how early the figs have ripened this year!"

"Oh," said Babette. "I think they have ripened very late."

"Babette," continued Maman-Nainaine, as she peeled the very plumpest figs with her pointed silver fruit-knife, "you will carry my love to them all down on Bayou-Lafourche. And tell your Tante Frosine I shall look for her at Toussaint—when the chrysanthemums are in bloom."

[1893]

Reading as Re-creation

If we had been Chopin's contemporaries, we might have read this sketch in Vogue in 1893 or in an early collection of her works, A Night in Acadie (1897). However, since we live more than a century later, we inevitably read "Ripe Figs" in a somewhat different way. This gets us to an important truth about writing and reading. A writer writes, sets forth his or her meaning, and attempts to guide the reader's responses, as we all do when we send a text or an e-mail home saying that we're thinking of dropping a course or asking for news or money. To this extent, the writer creates the written work and puts meaning in it.

But the reader, whether reading that written work as a requirement or for recreation, re-creates it in terms of his or her own experience and understanding. For instance, if your appeal for money is too indirect, the reader may miss it entirely or may sense it but feel that the need is not urgent. If, on the other hand, the appeal is direct or demanding, the reader may feel imposed upon, even assaulted. "Oh, but I didn't mean it that way," the writer later protests. Nevertheless, that's the way the reader took it. The text or e-mail is "out there," a physical reality standing between the writer and the reader, but its meaning is something that both the reader and the writer make.

Since all readers bring themselves to a written work, they each bring something individual. Although many of Chopin's original readers knew that she wrote chiefly about the people of Louisiana, especially Creoles (descendants of the early French and Spanish settlers), Cajuns (descendants of the French whom the British had expelled from Canada in the eighteenth century), African Americans, and mulattoes, those readers must have varied in their attitudes about such people. And many of today's readers do not (before they read a work by Chopin) know anything about her subject. Some readers may know where Bayou-Lafourche is, and they may have notions about what it looks like, but most readers will not. Indeed, many readers will not know that a bayou is a sluggish, marshy inlet or outlet of a river or lake.

Moreover, even if a present-day reader in Chicago, Seattle, or Juneau knows what a bayou is, he or she may assume that "Ripe Figs" depicts a way of life that is still current, whereas a reader from Louisiana may see in the work a lost way of life, a depiction of the good old days (or perhaps the bad old days, depending on the reader's point of view). Much depends, we can say, on the reader's storehouse of experience.

Reading for Understanding: Collecting Evidence and Making Reasonable Inferences

As readers, we can and should make an effort to understand what an author is getting at. To begin, we should make an effort to understand unfamiliar words. Perhaps we need not look up every word that we don't know, at least on the first reading, but if certain unfamiliar words are repeated and thus seem especially important, we will want to look them up.

It happens that, in "Ripe Figs" a French word appears: "Tante Frosine," which means "Aunt Frosine." Fortunately, the meaning of the word is not crucial, and the context probably makes it clear that Frosine is an adult, which is all that we really need to know about her. However, a reader who does not know that chrysanthemums bloom in late summer or early autumn will miss part of Chopin's meaning. The point is this: The writer is pitching, and she expects the reader to catch on.

On the other hand, although writers tell us a good deal, they cannot tell us everything. We know that Maman-Nainaine is Babette's godmother, but we don't know exactly how old Maman-Nainaine and Babette are. Further, Chopin tells us nothing of Babette's parents. It sounds as though Babette and her godmother live alone, but readers' opinions may differ. One reader may argue that Babette's parents must be dead or ill; another may argue that the status of her parents is irrelevant and that what counts is that Babette is supervised by only one person, a mature woman.

In short, a text includes indeterminacies (passages that careful readers agree are open to various interpretations) and gaps (things left unsaid in the story, such as why a godmother rather than a mother takes care of Babette). As we work our way through a text, we keep reevaluating what we have read, pulling the details together to make sense of them, in a process called consistency building.

Whatever the gaps are, careful readers will collect evidence and draw many reasonable inferences about Maman-Nainaine. We can list them:

- She is older than Babette.
- She has a "stately way," and she is "as patient as the statue of la Madone."
- She has an odd way (is it exasperating, engaging, or a little of each?) of connecting actions with the seasons.
- Given this last point, she seems to act slowly, to be very patient.
- She is apparently used to being obeyed.

At this point, you may want to go back and reread "Ripe Figs" to see what else you can say about Maman-Nainaine.

What inferences can we list about Babette?

- She is young.
- She is active and impatient ("as restless as a humming-bird").
- She is obedient.

At this point, you may want to add to the list.

If you compare your additions with those of a classmate, you may find that the two of you disagree about what may reasonably be inferred from Chopin's words. Suppose, for instance, that your classmate says that, although Babette is outwardly obedient, inwardly she probably hates Maman-Nainaine. Would you agree that this is an acceptable inference? If you don't agree, how might you convince your classmate that such a response is not justified? What arguments (supported by what evidence) would you offer? We are speaking here of an activity of mind we call critical thinking, a topic outlined in Chapter 2 and that will be discussed throughout this book.

Reading with Pen in Hand: Close Reading and Annotation

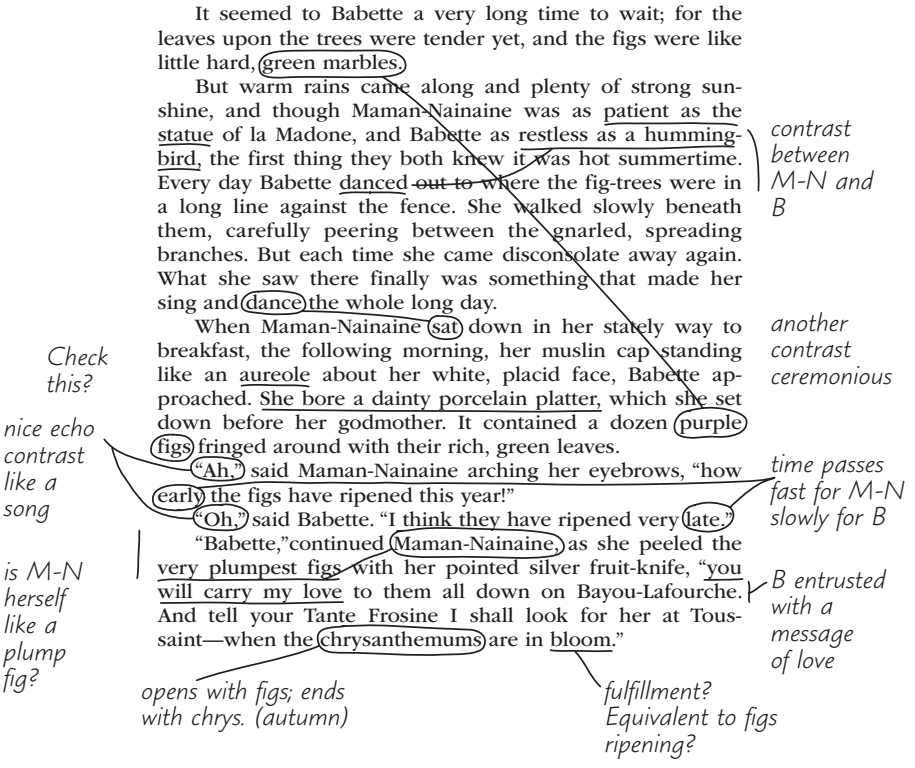
It's probably best to read a work of literature straight through, enjoying it and letting yourself be carried along to the end. Then, when you have an overall view, you'll want to read it again, noticing (for example) how certain innocent-seeming details early in the work prove to be important later.

Perhaps the best way to read attentively is, after a first reading, to mark the text, underlining or highlighting passages that seem especially interesting, and to jot down notes or queries in the margins. (Caution: Annotate and highlight, but don't get so carried away that you highlight entire pages.)

The critical thinking skills developed by close reading are explored in Chapters 2, 4, and 6. Close reading encourages you to "notice what you notice," using annotation to remark on aspects of the text that seem to convey meaningful ideas, raise interesting questions, or offer rich opportunities for interpretation. Close reading also encourages you to notice how literary content (the ideas conveyed by the text) is created by literary form (the structuring of the text through literary elements, such as voice, imagery, setting, and word choice). By annotating the text, you'll start the process of asking questions, gathering evidence, and formulating opinions about the text.

Let's look at some sample annotations written by a student, Antonia Tenori, on "Ripe Figs."

Student Work: Annotation



KATE CHOPIN

Ripe Figs

Maman-Nainaine said that when the figs were ripe Babette might go to visit her cousins down on the Bayou-Lafourche where the sugar cane grows. Not that the ripening of figs had the least thing to do with it, but that is the way Maman-Nainaine was.

?

strange

Reading for Response: Recording First Reactions

Another useful way of getting at the meaning of a work of literature is to jot down your initial responses to it, recording your impressions as they come to you, in any order—almost as though you're talking to yourself. Since no one else is going to read your notes, you can be entirely at ease. You can write in sentences or not; it's up to you.

You can jot down your responses either before or after you annotate the text. Some readers find that annotating a text helps to produce ideas for further jottings; others prefer to jot down a few thoughts immediately after a first reading, and then, stimulated by these thoughts, they reread and annotate the text.

Write whatever comes into your mind, whatever the literary work triggers in your own imagination, and whatever you think are the important ideas or values, based on your own experience.

Here is Tenori's first response to "Ripe Figs":

Student Work: Response Writing

> This is a very short story. I didn't know stories were this short, but I like it because you can get it all quickly and it's no trouble to reread it carefully. The shortness, though, leaves a lot of gaps for the reader to fill in. So much is not said. Your imagination is put to work.

But I can see Maman-N sitting at her table—pleasantly powerful—no one you would want to argue with. She's formal and distant—and definitely has quirks. She wants to postpone Babette's trip, but we don't know why. And you can sense B's frustration.

But maybe she's teaching her that something really good is worth waiting for and that anticipation is as much fun as the trip. Maybe I can develop this idea.

Another thing. I can tell they are not poor—from two things. The pointed silver fruit knife and the porcelain platter, and the fact that Maman sits down to breakfast in a "stately" way. They are the leisure class. But I don't know enough about life on the bayous to go into this. Their life is different from mine; no one I know has that kind of peaceful rural life.

Reading for Inquiry: Ask Questions and Brainstorm Ideas

After getting your initial responses down on paper, you are ready to start moving toward turning those reactions into an analytical paper by engaging in inquiry, or the process of active question asking. Inquiry-based questions aim to generate insights into a text and uncover new ideas. They are typically open-ended conceptual questions rather than information-based questions, asking "how" and "why" and trying to determine a text's meaning and how that meaning is created.

After reading the story, annotating it, and jotting down her first responses, Antonia reread her notes and highlighted any ideas that she thought were especially noteworthy. She then jotted down more analytical ideas on her laptop.

She generated a series of questions, placing each question on a new page so that she could further develop her thinking. Is "Ripe Figs" a story, or is it just a character sketch? (She put her responses on a page for that topic.) What contrasts are notable? (She recorded the material on another notebook page.) How should we define the relationship between Maman and Babette? (She recorded her ideas on another notebook page.) What words, phrases, or images are unusual? (She recorded this material on another notebook page.) A day later, when she returned to work on her paper, stimulated by another reading of "Ripe Figs" and a review of her notes, Antonia made additional notes that took this shape:

Student Work: Inquiry Notes

Is Ripe Figs a story, or is it just a character sketch?

Story = has a plot, events
—there is some conflict and resolution—there is the sense of moving forward
—there is a thematic emphasis on time

Character sketch = focuses on characters' key qualities
—this focuses mostly on describing the two characters and their interactions—these interactions and their emphasis on time seem to make this more of a story

What contrasts are notable?

The contrast between age and youth: time
Between patience and impatience
Between Babette "restless as a humming-bird" and Maman with a "white, placid face"

Between seasons: spring and summer, unripe and ripe, warm and hot
Story emphasizes the cycle of seasons?
Between observing (the figs) and longing (for visit)

How should we define the relationship between Maman and Babette?

Godmother and goddaughter: wealthy, leisured
Mother figure and daughter figure
Old age and youth: the cycle of aging?
Solid and "stately" vs. energetic and "restless"
Sitting vs. dancing
Perceived passage of time as "early" vs. perceived changes as "late": time issue
—This raises another question: Why does Babette want to visit her cousins so much?
What is the relationship of Mamam and Babette to her cousins? Are they more fun, youthful, energetic like Babette?

What words or phrases or images are unusual?

"ripening"
leaves: "tender"; figs: "hard"
"patient as a statue" vs. "restless as a humming-bird"
"Babette danced out," "sing and dance the whole long day"
"sat down in her stately way," "like an aureole about her white, placid face"
"bore a dainty porcelain platter"
"how early the figs have ripened this year" vs. "I think they have ripened very late"
"peeled the plumpest fig with her pointed silver fruit-knife"
"when the chrysanthemums are in bloom"

Reading in Context: Identifying Your Audience and Purpose

Now, suppose that you are beginning the process of writing about "Ripe Figs" for someone else. The first question to ask yourself is, "For whom am I writing?" That is, who is your audience? (You are probably writing because an instructor has asked you to do so, but you must still imagine an audience. Your instructor may tell you, for instance, to write for your classmates or to write for the best teacher you had in high school.)

- If you are writing for people who are familiar with some of Chopin's work, you won't have to say much about the author.
- If you are writing for an audience that perhaps has never heard of Chopin, you may want to include a brief biographical note of the sort that we gave earlier.
- If you are writing for an audience that you believe has read several works by Chopin, you may want to make comparisons, explaining—arguing, really—how "Ripe Figs" resembles or differs from Chopin's other work.

In a sense, your audience is your collaborator and helps you to decide what you will say. You are also helped by your sense of purpose. If your aim is to introduce readers to Chopin, you will make points that reflect this purpose. If your aim is to tell people what you think "Ripe Figs" means to say about human relationships or about time, you will address that subject. If your aim is to have a little fun and to entertain an audience that is already familiar with "Ripe Figs," you may decide to write a parody (a humorous imitation) of the story.

From Reading to Writing: Developing an Analytical Essay with an Argumentative Thesis

Let's assume that you want to describe "Ripe Figs" to someone who has not read it. You will briefly summarize the action, such as it is, and will mention where it takes place; tell who the characters are, including what their relationship is; and note what, if anything, happens to them. Beyond that, you'll try to explain as honestly as you can what makes "Ripe Figs" appealing or interesting—or trifling, or boring, or whatever. You will want to explain what the story means and how it has created that meaning. You will most likely focus on the conceptual ideas raised by the story that you find most important. That is, you will argue a thesis, even though you won't want to make so formal a statement as "In this essay, I will argue that . . ." or "This essay will attempt to prove that. . . ." Your essay will essentially be an argument because (perhaps after a brief summary of the work) you will point to the evidence that has caused you to respond as you did.

Student Analytical Essay: "Images of Ripening in Kate Chopin's 'Ripe Figs'"

Here is an essay that Antonia Tenori wrote for an assignment that asked for an analysis of "Ripe Figs" in a paper of "about 500 words (two double-spaced typed pages)."

Tenori 1

Antonia Tenori

Professor Lee

English 102

11 February 2016

Images of Ripening in Kate Chopin's "Ripe Figs"

Very little happens in Kate Chopin's one-page story, "Ripe Figs." Maman-Nainaine tells her goddaughter Babette that she may "visit her cousins down on the Bayou-Lafourche" "when the figs were ripe"; the figs ripen, and Babette is given permission to go (25). So little happens in "Ripe Figs" that the story at first appears merely to be a character sketch that illustrates, through Babette and her godmother, the contrast between youth and age. But by means of the natural imagery of the tale, Chopin suggests more than this: She asks her readers to see the relationship of human time to nature's seasons, and she suggests that, try as we may to push the process of maturity, growth or "ripening" happens in its own time.

The story clearly contrasts the impatience of youth with the patience and dignity that come with age. Babette, whose name suggests she is still a "little baby," is "restless as a humming-bird" (26). Each day when she eagerly goes to see if the figs have ripened, she doesn't simply walk but she dances. By contrast, Maman-Nainaine has a "stately way," she is "patient as the statue of la Madone," and there is an "aureole"—a radiance—"about her white, placid face" (26). The brief dialog near the end of the story also emphasizes the difference between the two characters. When the figs finally ripen, Maman-Nainaine is surprised (she arches her eyebrows), and she exclaims, "how early the figs have ripened this year!" Babette replies, "I think they have ripened very late" (26).

Chopin is not simply remarking here that time passes slowly for young people, and quickly for old people. She suggests that nature moves at its own pace, regardless of human wishes. Babette, young and "tender" as the fig leaves, can't wait to "ripen" (25). Her visit to Bayou-Lafourche is not a mere pleasure trip, but represents her coming into her own season of maturity. Babette's desire to rush this process is tempered by a condition that her godmother sets: Babette must wait until the figs ripen, since everything comes in its own season. Maman-Nainaine recognizes the patterns of the natural world, the rhythms of life. By asking Babette to await the ripening, the young girl is asked to pay attention to the patterns as well.

Tenori 3

Chopin further suggests that if we pay attention and wait with patience, the fruits of our own growth will be sweet, plump, and beautiful, like the "dozen purple figs, fringed around with their rich, green leaves," that Babette finally offers her godmother (26). Chopin uses natural imagery effectively, interweaving the young girl's growth with the rhythms of the seasons. In this way, the reader is connected with both processes in an intimate and inviting way.

[New page]

Tenori 4

Work Cited

Chopin, Kate. "Ripe Figs." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 25-26. Print.

The Analytical Essay: Argument and Structure Analyzed

- The title of the essay is informative; it clearly indicates the focus of the analysis. Notice, too, that it is much more interesting than "An Analysis of a Story" or "An Analysis of Kate Chopin's 'Ripe Figs'" or "'Ripe Figs': A Study" or "An Analysis of Imagery." For your own essays, construct titles that inform and interest your reader.
- The first sentence names the author and title being written about. Strictly speaking, this information is redundant, since it appears in the essay's title, but it is customary to give the author's full name and the title of the work early in the essay, and it is essential to give such information when it is not in the title.
- The second sentence offers enough plot summary to enable the reader to follow the discussion. Notice, however, that the essay as a whole is much more than a summary of the plot. The summary is offered early in order to make the analysis intelligible. Chiefly, the opening paragraph presents one view (e.g., the view that Antonia Tenori believes is inadequate); then, after a transitional "but," it offers a second view and presents a thesis—the point that you will argue in the essay.

Perhaps the most common error that students make in writing about literature is to confuse a summary of the plot with analysis of the work. A little plot telling is acceptable, to remind your reader of what happens, but normally your essay will be devoted to setting forth a thesis about a work and supporting that thesis with evidence. Your readers do not want to know what happens in the work; they want to know what you make of the work—how you interpret it or why you like or dislike it.

- The last sentence of the first paragraph provides the thesis statement: Chopin "asks her readers to see the relationship of human time to nature's seasons, and she suggests that, try as we may to push the process of maturity, growth or 'ripening' happens in its own time." Note that this thesis is conceptual, exploring ideas of human time, the seasons, and maturity. Note also that the thesis is argumentative, maintaining that Chopin presents a specific understanding of time—that the process of maturity cannot be rushed.
- In the second paragraph, Tenori supports her thesis by providing brief quotations. These quotations are not padding; rather, they are evidence supporting her assertion that Chopin "contrasts the impatience of youth with the patience and dignity that come with age."
- In the third paragraph, Tenori develops her thesis ("Chopin is not simply. . . . She suggests. . . .").
- The final paragraph begins with a helpful transition ("Chopin further suggests"), offers additional evidence, and ends with a new idea (about the reader's response to the story) that takes the analysis a step further. The essay avoids the deadliest kind of conclusion, a mere summary of the essay ("Thus we have seen," or some such words). Tenori's effective final sentence nicely draws the reader into the essay. (Effective final sentences can be difficult to write; we give advice about writing them on pages 218 and 274.)

Tenori wrote this paper for an assignment that asked for five hundred words. If the first question to ask is "To whom am I writing?" the second question to ask is "What is the length of the assignment?" The answer to this second question will provide two sorts of guidance: It will give you some sense of how much time you should devote to preparing the paper—an instructor expects you to spend more time on a ten-page paper than on a one-page paper—and it will give you a sense of how much detail you can include. For a short paper—say, one or two pages—you will need to make your main point with directness; you will not have space for lots of details, just those that support the main point. This is what Tenori aims to achieve in her second and third paragraphs, where she highlights the term "ripens" and briefly, but effectively, develops its implications. For a longer paper of three to five pages or more, you can examine the characters, setting, and central themes in depth, and you can focus on more details in the text to strengthen your analysis.

The Writing Process: From First Responses to Final Essay

Antonia Tenori's essay is good because it is clear and interesting, and especially because it helps to develop a reader's understanding and enjoyment of Chopin's story. Now let's go backstage, so to speak, to see how this student turned her notes into an effective final draft.

Capturing Earliest Responses. After reading the story, Tenori annotated it, marking whatever she thought was especially noteworthy. She then captured her inquiry process by jotting down notes on her laptop, using note-taking software.

As seen, she asked interesting questions that pushed her thinking further: Is "Ripe Figs" a story, or is it just a character sketch? What contrasts are notable? How should we define the relationship between Maman and Babette? What words or phrases or images are unusual? Tenori started to answer those questions and then, a day later, returned to her reading and brainstorming and added additional notes.

Organizing Notes. When the time came to turn her notes into a draft essay, Tenori reviewed the notes and added further thoughts. Next, she organized the note pages, putting together into one section the pages about characterization and into another section the pages about the seasons. Reviewing the notes in each section, on the basis of her review (after making a backup copy), she deleted a few pages that no longer seemed useful and moved an occasional page into a different section (via the Contents view). She then started to think about how she might organize her essay.

As a first step in settling on an organization, she arranged the notebook sections into a sequence that seemed reasonable. It made sense, she thought, to begin with a brief biographical sketch of Chopin, but she soon decided not to include this material because the reader would probably already know it, it would take up too much of the paper's length, and, in any case, it was not relevant to the argument that she planned to set forth. She decided to go on to her major points about the story, then to refine some of these points, and finally to offer a conclusion. This organization, she felt, was reasonable and would enable the reader to follow her argument easily.

Preparing a Preliminary Outline. In order to get a clear idea of where she might be going, Tenori then typed an outline, following the sequence of her note packets—the organization of her chief points became an outline. In short, she prepared a map to confirm that each part of her paper would lead coherently to the next part.

Surveying her outline, Tenori became aware of points that she should have included but had overlooked. Her first outline and the revised version of it follow.

A tentative outline is a preliminary map that helps the writer to see not only pointless detours that need to be eliminated but also undeveloped areas that need to be worked up. As the two versions of Tenori's outline indicate, drafting her map enabled her to make important changes before she wrote a first draft.

Student Work: Outlining

First Outline

Bio of Chopin
Plot summary
Characterization
- Babette
- Maman-N

Contrasts
- Youth: activity, impatient
- Age: stately, "statue"

Differences in perception of nature
Point? Meaning?

Revised Outline

Little plot, emph. on contrasting characters
Characters related to seasons
Contrasts
- spring vs autumn
- youth vs maturity
- impatience vs patience (?)

Significance, meaning
- Maman-N as teacher
- some things can't be hurried
- implication that B is maturing, can carry message, will become aware of the changing seasons, and that there is a right time for each action

Writing a Draft. Working from her thoughtfully revised outline, Tenori wrote a first draft, which she then revised. The second draft, when further revised, became the final essay. Microsoft Word, for example, allows you to track the revisions made to a document and look at different versions of a document. However, many writers find comfort in having a printed copy of each draft to go over with a pen; the desired changes can then be made (and kept track of) on the computer.

Other Possibilities for Writing

You might write a paper of a very different sort, based on the same story by Chopin but emphasizing creative thinking in addition to analytical thinking. Consider the following possibilities:

1. Write a sequel, moving from fall to spring.
2. Write a letter from Babette, at Bayou-Lafourche, to Maman-Nainaine.
3. Imagine that Babette is now an old woman, writing her memoirs. What does she say about Maman-Nainaine?
4. Write a narrative based on your own experience of learning a lesson in patience.

From Reading to Writing: Moving from Brainstorming to Analytical Essay

Bruce Holland Rogers

Bruce Holland Rogers, an American writer who has won numerous prizes for his short fiction, teaches in the MFA program of the Northwest Institute of Literary Arts. In 2001, a film, The Other Side, was based on his short novel, Lifeboat on a Burning Sea.

The following story consists of three stories, each of which contains sixty-nine words. The form originated with a short-lived, Toronto-based magazine, NFC, which set the limit of sixty-nine words, exclusive of the title. From this limit, there somehow evolved the story that consists of three thematically related stories, each of sixty-nine words, a form now known as the three-six-nine.

Three Soldiers

1. The Hardest Question

My marines bring me questions. "When do we get to shower?" "Sergeant, how do you say 'Good afternoon' again?" "Sarge, where can I get more gun oil?"

I have answers. "Tomorrow, maybe." "Maysuh alheer." "Use mine."

Answering their questions is my job. But when Anaya was shot and bleeding out, he grabbed my arm and said, "Sergeant? Sergeant?" I understood the question, but damn. I didn't have an answer.

2. Foreign War

No U.S. soldier who could see that kid would have shot him. But that's long-range ordnance for you. Calder stood next to me in the street, looking at the pieces. "We've come so far from home," he said, "that we'll never get back."

"You dumbass," I said. But a year later I stood on the tarmac hugging my child, thinking of that kid in pieces, and I wasn't home.

3. Decisions, Decisions

In morning twilight, far away, my men are making up their minds:

What's that guy carrying?
Friend or foe?

I should be there, helping them decide. My wife and my parents do their best to make Christmas dinner conversation around my silence. An hour ago, I was yelling at Angie for turning on the damn news. My father, carving, won't meet my eyes. He says, "White meat, or dark?"

[2004]

The Writing Process: From Response Writing to Final Essay

Now, for the responses to "Three Soldiers" by a student who had been given only the biographical note that appears above the text and the suggestion that students begin by jotting down their first reactions to each story, such as:

- What puzzles you?
- What interests you?
- Are there significant connections among the three stories?

Here is the response of one student, Will Holly. Notice how he focuses on asking questions about the text and investigating the questions asked within the text. This is productive inquiry.

Student Work: Response Writing

This business of 69 words seems silly—crazy—to me. I wouldn't want to learn that Shakespeare wrote Hamlet because he was challenged to write a play of exactly such-and-such a number of words. Nutty—but I am glad that Rogers did write the stories, for whatever reason.

What sort of puzzles me is that I like them—even though I ought to be depressed by them—stuff about a soldier dying, a kid blown to pieces, soldiers who can't get over their terrible experiences. Why do we read this stuff, and—maybe a bigger puzzle—why do I like it?

In the first story, exactly what is "the hardest question"? I think the hardest question—not the first three questions but the question hidden in the word "Sergeant?"—the question asked but not asked in words, by the soldier who "was shot and bleeding out" (which I think means he is bleeding to death)—must be, "Why am I dying?" or something close to this. Maybe the question is "Why ME?" but in any case, it is a question about "bleeding out," and this question is a lot harder than "when do we shower" or "how do you say such-and-such in a foreign language?" or "where can I get oil?" Notice that the sergeant does not have an answer for this question. Sure, we can give answers, but we realize that our answers cannot be adequate to the terrifying occasion.

In the second story, there is no question, but we are still concerned with death in war. A soldier is looking at the "pieces" of a kid who was killed by long-range gunfire. This soldier says, "We've come so far from home that we'll never get back." What does he mean? After all, most of the soldiers will actually get back to home. I think he means that we have had an experience—an experience we could not possibly have imagined when we were safe at home, maybe at college or maybe at some job, and now we can never be the same, we can never regain our naivete. We can literally go home, but we will be so changed by the experience that everything will look different. And in fact, in the last line of this very short story this soldier does get home, and he is hugging his own child, but his thoughts are in the warzone. So although he is physically home, he is not mentally home.

In the third story, the characters are also back home—the soldier is with his parents and his wife—but it is clear that his mind is still in the war zone. He is thinking—as any soldier in a combat area would think when he sees a stranger—"What's that guy carrying?" and "Friend or foe?" These questions are different, VERY different—from the trivial question that his father is asking, carving the chicken or turkey at the Christmas dinner, "White meat, or dark?" Again, he is home, but he is so changed from when he was last home that he is not home, he is in another world.

The order of the stories: The first story is set in—well, I don't know where, but I guess maybe Iraq. Certainly in a war zone. The second story, too, is set there, but they talk about home. The third story is set at home—but the soldier is still mentally at war. Further, there is a nice connection between the first and the last stories: The first story pretty much begins with a question, and the last story ends with a question, so, in a way, the wheel has come full circle. There is a sense of unity, of completion. It's sort of frightening, but, well, one would have to be crazy to think that the experience of war—which can include killing innocent children—is not horrible!

Student Analytical Essay: "Thinking about Three Soldiers Thinking"

The student ultimately wrote the following short essay.

Holly 1

Will Holly

Professor Cargill

English 101A

28 January 2016

Thinking about Three Soldiers Thinking

On the printed page Bruce Holland Rogers's "Three Soldiers" is three very short stories, and each of the three can stand alone and can be read with interest, but the three really go together and they form a whole that is greater than any of the parts.

All of the stories deal with soldiers who are engaged in killing people—maybe in Vietnam or Iraq, I think but I am not certain, and the exact locale does not really matter. The first story, "The Hardest Question," begins with some trivial questions that soldiers ask a sergeant ("When do we get to shower") but it ends, a few sentences later, with a soldier who is "bleeding out," and whose question—repeated—is only one word long, "Sergeant?" (37). The reader probably is supposed to understand that the soldier is bleeding to death, and the question in his mind is something like, "Sergeant, will I die?" or maybe it is, "Sergeant, why me?" The sergeant can easily answer the earlier questions, about showering, and so forth, but he gives no answer to what the title of the story calls "The Hardest Question."

When readers start to read a story called "The Hardest Question," they probably expect to hear the question stated fully, and they probably also expect some sort of answer to the question. Here, the question is never stated fully—we just get "Sergeant?"—and it certainly isn't answered (37). Does that mean we are disappointed with the story? No, the story, though painful, is complete. We know there is no satisfactory answer to the question of the soldier who is "bleeding out" (37).

The second story, "Foreign War," is also only a few sentences long. It begins by saying that a soldier is looking at "the pieces" of a "kid" who has been killed by "long-range ordnance" (38). A few sentences later the soldier is home, hugging his own kid, but his mind is back at the scene of the disaster, and he realizes that although he can return home physically, in another sense he can never be back home again, can never return to the place where he had been unaware of such horrors.

The third story, "Decisions, Decisions" continues this theme of being back home but not being at home. The soldier is with his family (wife and parents), and is having Christmas dinner. But when we begin reading the story we do not know that this is the situation. The story begins, "In morning twilight, far away, my men are making up their minds" (38). And then we get two questions, "What's that guy carrying?" and "Friend or foe?" (38). Probably when readers first read these questions they think that even though the speaker says he is "far away" from his men he is still abroad with other soldiers—soldiers who quite naturally are suspicious of some "guy" carrying something—it could be a weapon—and who, seeing a stranger, wonder if it is "Friend or foe?" (38). We then learn where he is physically—although his mind is still on the battlefield, where his men are in danger, but he really is safe at home with his family. Here at home the decisions are not the life-and-death decisions of a soldier in combat ("What's that guy carrying?" "Friend or foe?") but are the utterly trivial decisions concerning whether one prefers the white meat or the dark meat of the Christmas bird (38). Bruce Holland Rogers is probably not saying that we should not express our preferences when it comes to food, but he is saying—or, rather, he is memorably showing us—that for someone who has gone through such experiences as seeing a man bleed to death, or seeing the blown-up pieces of a child—to be asked to make "decisions, decisions" about food preferences is almost intolerable (38).

The three stories are separate and they can be read as separate things, but they are really three parts of one story. The title is "Three Soldiers," so we must assume that the characters in each of the three stories are different, but they really add up to one character, a soldier who has seen the unbearable, and who will carry the memories for the rest of his life, whether he is hugging his child or sitting at a family Christmas dinner. Put this way, the story sounds deeply depressing, and a reader might wonder why Rogers thinks we should read this, but in fact, the story is told so effectively, so vividly, so concisely, so memorably, that it comes across as something that one wants to tell one's friends they must read. It's not that it has an encouraging moral (it doesn't) or a happy ending (it doesn't), but it is told so skillfully—for instance, the first story begins with a question and the last story ends with a question—and it is told with such apparent simplicity and honesty that a reader feels he or she must share it with others.

Holly 4

[New page]

Holly 5

Work Cited

Rogers, Bruce Holland. "Three Soldiers." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 37-38. Print

The Analytical Essay: The Development of Ideas Analyzed

Let's look at this short essay.

- The title, though not exceptionally good, is adequate. Will Holly tells us that, when he was working on his draft, he was very much taken with his perception that the stories are closely related—for instance, that questions begin the first story and a question ends the last story—and he thought he would title his essay "What Goes Around Comes Around." But, when he drafted the essay, he realized that this title sounded as though it referred to some aspect of a plot in which a character ends up where he or she started, or gets what he or she deserves, and Holly decided that it wasn't suitable. He then considered "Thinking About 'Three Soldiers'" but soon decided that this title was too vague. Holly says he was getting desperate until at the last minute he realized that he was thinking about soldiers who are thinking, and so he came up with his title, "Thinking About Three Soldiers Thinking." This title is accurate, and it involves a bit of wordplay, so in our view it is appropriate.
- The opening paragraph lets the reader know what author and what work(s) will be discussed—always a good idea!—and it makes the interesting thesis argument that the three works are independent yet also form a unified whole. The reader now expects that the rest of the essay will offer support for this claim.
- The second and third paragraphs discuss the first story. They briefly summarize the plot, but they do much more: They explain aspects of the story.

- The fourth paragraph, devoted to the second story, both summarizes and offers an interpretation of the significance of the plot. It tells the reader what the happenings add up to. The student is thinking, not just retelling what the story clearly says.
- The fifth paragraph, devoted to the third story, connects that story with the preceding story ("The third story . . . continues this theme of being back home") and then reports that here readers probably have to revise their sense of what is going on in the story. It's not that the author of the story is clumsy or careless; rather, Rogers wants to bring us back to the battlefield, so rather than offer an objective view of the setting, he puts us in the soldier's mind. Again, the essayist is thinking, analyzing, and offering evidence to support a thesis.
- The final paragraph begins by reasserting the thesis (the three stories are so connected by theme that they cohere as one story), and then it comments on why we are not depressed by reading a story (or three stories) on this theme. You may disagree with the author's conclusions, but we think you will agree that the essay goes beyond plot telling and offers interesting reasons to support its thesis.

From Reading to Writing: Moving from Preliminary Outline to Analytical Essay

Ray Bradbury

Ray Bradbury (1920–2012) was born in Waukegan, Illinois, and was educated there and in Los Angeles. While a high school student, he published his first science fiction in the school's magazine, and by 1941, he was publishing professionally. The story printed here is from The Martian Chronicles (1950), a collection of linked short stories. Among his other works are Fahrenheit 451 (1953), Something Wicked This Way Comes (1962), and Death Is a Lonely Business (1985).

August 2026: There Will Come Soft Rains

In the living room the voice-clock sang, Tick-Tock, seven o'clock, time to get up, time to get up, seven o'clock! as if it were afraid that nobody would. The morning house lay empty. The clock ticked on, repeating and repeating its sounds into the emptiness. Seven-nine, breakfast time, seven-nine!

In the kitchen the breakfast stove gave a hissing sigh and ejected from its warm interior eight pieces of perfectly browned toast, eight eggs sunny-side up, sixteen slices of bacon, two coffees, and two cool glasses of milk.

"Today is August 4, 2026," said a second voice from the kitchen ceiling, "in the city of Allendale, California." It repeated the date three times for memory's sake. "Today is Mr. Featherstone's birthday. Today is the anniversary of Tilita's marriage. Insurance is payable, as are the water, gas, and light bills."

Somewhere in the walls, relays clicked, memory tapes glided under electric eyes.

5 Eight-one, tick-tock, eight-one o'clock, off to school, off to work, run, run, eight-one! But no doors slammed, no carpets took the soft tread of rubber heels. It was raining outside. The weather box on the front door sang quietly: "Rain, rain, go away; rubbers, raincoats for today. . . ." And the rain tapped on the empty house, echoing.

Outside, the garage chimed and lifted its door to reveal the waiting car. After a long wait the door swung down again.

At eight-thirty the eggs were shriveled and toast was like stone. An aluminum wedge scraped them into the sink, where hot water whirled them down a metal throat which digested and flushed them away to the distant sea. The dirty dishes were dropped into a hot washer and emerged twinkling dry.

Nine-fifteen, sang the clock, time to clean.

Out of warrens in the wall, tiny robot mice darted. The rooms were acrawl with the small cleaning animals, all rubber and metal. They thudded against chairs, whirling their mustached runners, kneading the rug nap, sucking gently at hidden dust. Then, like mysterious invaders, they popped into their burrows. Their pink electric eyes faded. The house was clean.

Ten o'clock. The sun came out from behind the rain. The house stood alone in a city of rubble and ashes. This was the one house left standing. At night the ruined city gave off a radioactive glow which could be seen for miles.

Ten-fifteen. The garden sprinklers whirled up in golden founts, filling the soft morning air with scatterings of brightness. The water pelted windowpanes, running down the charred west side where the house had been burned evenly free of its white paint. The entire west face of the house was black, save for five places. Here the silhouette in paint of a man mowing a lawn. Here, as in a photograph, a woman bent to pick flowers. Still farther over, their images burned on wood in one titanic instant, a small boy, hands flung into the air; higher up, the image of a thrown ball, and opposite him a girl, hands raised to catch a ball which never came down.

The five spots of paint—the man, the woman, the children, the ball—remained. The rest was a thin charcoaled layer.

The gentle sprinkler rain filled the garden with falling light.

Until this day, how well the house had kept its peace. How carefully it had inquired, "Who goes there? What's the password?" and, getting no answer from lonely foxes and whining cats, it had shut up its windows and drawn shades in an old-maidenly preoccupation with self-protection which bordered on a mechanical paranoia.

It quivered at each sound, the house did. If a sparrow brushed a window, the shade snapped up. The bird, startled, flew off! No, not even a bird must touch the house!

The house was an altar with ten thousand attendants, big, small, servicing, attending, in choirs. But the gods had gone away, and the ritual of the religion continued senselessly, uselessly.

Twelve noon.

A dog whined, shivering, on the front porch.

The front door recognized the dog voice and opened. The dog, once huge and fleshy, but now gone to bone and covered with sores, moved in and through the house, tracking mud. Behind it whirred angry mice, angry at having to pick up mud, angry at inconvenience.

For not a leaf fragment blew under the door but what the wall panels flipped open and the copper scrap rats flashed swiftly out. The offending dust, hair, or paper, seized in miniature steel jaws, was raced back to the burrows. There, down tubes which fed into the cellar, it was dropped into the sighing vent of an incinerator which sat like evil Baal in a dark corner.

The dog ran upstairs, hysterically yelping to each door, at last realizing, as the house realized, that only silence was here.

It sniffed the air and scratched the kitchen door. Behind the door, the stove was making pancakes which filled the house with a rich baked odor and the scent of maple syrup.

The dog frothed at the mouth, lying at the door, sniffing, its eyes turned to fire. It ran wildly in circles, biting at its tail, spun in a frenzy, and died. It lay in the parlor for an hour.

Two o'clock, sang a voice.

Delicately sensing decay at last, the regiments of mice hummed out as softly as blown gray leaves in an electrical wind.

Two-fifteen.

The dog was gone.

In the cellar, the incinerator glowed suddenly and a whirl of sparks leaped up the chimney.

Two thirty-five.

Bridge tables sprouted from patio walls. Playing cards fluttered onto pads in a shower of pips. Martinis manifested on an oaken bench with egg-salad sandwiches. Music played.

But the tables were silent and the cards untouched.

At four o'clock the tables folded like great butterflies back through the paneled walls.

Four-thirty.

The nursery walls glowed.

Animals took shape: yellow giraffes, blue lions, pink antelopes, lilac panthers cavorting in crystal substance. The walls were glass. They looked out upon color and fantasy. Hidden films clocked through well-oiled sprockets, and the walls lived. The nursery floor was woven to resemble a crisp, cereal meadow. Over this ran aluminum roaches and iron crickets, and in the hot still air butterflies of delicate red tissue wavered among the sharp aroma of animal spoors! There was the sound like a great matted yellow hive of bees within a dark bellows, the lazy bumble of a purring lion. And there was the patter of okapi feet and the murmur of a fresh jungle rain, like other hoofs, falling upon the summer-starched grass. Now the walls dissolved into distances of parched weed, mile on mile, and warm endless sky. The animals drew away into thorn brakes and water holes.

It was the children's hour.

Five o'clock. The bath filled with clear hot water.

Six, seven, eight o'clock. The dinner dishes manipulated like magic tricks, and in the study a click. In the metal stand opposite the hearth where a fire now blazed up warmly, a cigar popped out, half an inch of soft gray ash on it, smoking, waiting.

Nine o'clock. The beds warmed their hidden circuits, for nights were cool here.

Nine-five. A voice spoke from the study ceiling:

"Mrs. McClellan, which poem would you like this evening?"

The house was silent.

The voice said at last, "Since you express no preference, I shall select a poem at random." Quiet music rose to back the voice. "Sara Teasdale. As I recall, your favorite. . . .

There will come soft rains and the smell of the ground,
And swallows circling with their shimmering sound;

And frogs in the pools singing at night,
And wild plum trees in tremulous white;

Robins will wear their feathery fire,
Whistling their whims on a low fence-wire;

And not one will know of the war, not one
Will care at last when it is done.

Not one would mind, neither bird nor tree,
If mankind perished utterly;

And Spring herself, when she woke at dawn
Would scarcely know that we were gone."

The fire burned on the stone hearth and the cigar fell away into a mound of quiet ash on its tray. The empty chairs faced each other between the silent walls, and the music played.

At ten o'clock the house began to die.

The wind blew. A falling tree bough crashed through the kitchen window. Cleaning solvent, bottled, shattered over the stove. The room was ablaze in an instant!

"Fire!" screamed a voice. The house lights flashed, water pumps shot water from the ceilings. But the solvent spread on the linoleum, licking, eating, under the kitchen door, while the voices took it up in chorus: "Fire, fire, fire!"

The house tried to save itself. Doors sprang tightly shut, but the windows were broken by the heat and the wind blew and sucked upon the fire.

The house gave ground as the fire in ten billion angry sparks moved with flaming ease from room to room and then up the stairs. While scurrying water rats squeaked from the walls, pistoled their water, and ran for more. And the wall sprays let down showers of mechanical rain.

But too late. Somewhere, sighing, a pump shrugged to a stop. The quenching rain ceased. The reserve water supply which had filled baths and washed dishes for many quiet days was gone.

The fire crackled up the stairs. It fed upon Picassos and Matisses in the upper halls, like delicacies, baking off the oily flesh, tenderly crisping the canvases into black shavings.

Now the fire lay in beds, stood in windows, changed the colors of drapes!

And then, reinforcements.

From attic trapdoors, blind robot faces peered down with faucet mouths gushing green chemical.

The fire backed off, as even an elephant must at the sight of a dead snake. Now there were twenty snakes whipping over the floor, killing the fire with a clear cold venom of green froth.

But the fire was clever. It had sent flames outside the house, up through the attic to the pumps there. An explosion! The attic brain which directed the pumps was shattered into bronze shrapnel on the beams.

The fire rushed back into every closet and felt of the clothes hung there.

The house shuddered, oak bone on bone, its bared skeleton cringing from the heat, its wire, its nerves revealed as if a surgeon had torn the skin off to let the red veins and capillaries quiver in the scalded air. Help, help! Fire! Run, run! Heat snapped mirrors like the brittle winter ice. And the voices wailed, Fire, fire, run, run, like a tragic nursery rhyme, a dozen voices, high, low, like children dying in a forest, alone, alone. And the voices fading as the wires popped their sheathings like hot chestnuts. One, two, three, four, five voices died.

60 In the nursery the jungle burned. Blue lions roared, purple giraffes bounded off. The panthers ran in circles changing color, and ten million animals, running before the fire, vanished off toward a distant steaming river. . . .

Ten more voices died. In the last instant under the fire avalanche, other choruses, oblivious, could be heard announcing the time, playing music, cutting the lawn by remote-control mower, or setting an umbrella frantically out and in the slamming and opening front door, a thousand things happening, like a clock shop when each clock strikes the hour insanely before or after the other, a scene of maniac confusion, yet unity; singing, screaming, a few last cleaning mice darting bravely out to carry the horrid ashes away! And one voice, with sublime disregard for the situation, read poetry aloud in the fiery study, until all the film spools burned, until all the wires withered and the circuits cracked.

The fire burst the house and let it slam flat down, puffing out skirts of spark and smoke.

In the kitchen, an instant before the rain of fire and timber, the stove could be seen making breakfasts at a psychopathic rate, ten dozen eggs, six loaves of toast, twenty dozen bacon strips, which, eaten by fire, started the stove working again, hysterically hissing!

The crash. The attic smashing into kitchen and parlor. The parlor into cellar, cellar into sub-cellar. Deep freeze, armchair, film tapes, circuits, beds, and all like skeletons thrown in a cluttered mound deep under.

65 Smoke and silence. A great quantity of smoke.

Dawn showed faintly in the east. Among the ruins, one wall stood alone. Within the wall, a last voice said, over and over again and again, even as the sun rose to shine upon the heaped rubble and steam:

"Today is August 5, 2026, today is August 5, 2026, today is. . . ."

[1950]

The Writing Process: From Outlining to Final Essay

Here is one student's response to Bradbury's story, preceded by the notes that the student used in preparing a draft. Notice that the final essay does not slavishly follow the notes. For instance, although the student jotted down four possible titles for her essay, none of them is the title that she settled on.

Student Work: Outlining

Possible title:
- Bradbury's Meaning for Us
- Bradbury and Today
- Learning from Literature/Bradbury's Lesson
- Bradbury's Lesson for Us

~~Begin by quoting first sentence~~
Begin with joke about airline??
~~Define science fiction?~~
Technology today—can do almost everything—but is this really LIVING?
Maybe such a life is a living death. Evidence??

End essay:
Does Bradbury show us our future?
A wake-up call. 2026 is not really very far away
~~end with an example of unnecessary technology~~

Student Analytical Essay: "The Lesson of 'August 2026'"

Working with this sort outline, the student produced the following essay. As the questions that follow the essay indicate, this essay makes an interesting argument, but it could have developed its ideas further. A more detailed outline might have led to a more fully developed paper. As you read the paper, consider how the writer might have expanded the paper by engaging more fully with the story and providing more evidence from the story.

Esther Daniels

Professor Izzard

English 101a

14 January 2016

The Lesson of "August 2026"

Before discussing some of the implications of Ray Bradbury's short story "August 2026: There Will Come Soft Rains," I want to tell a little joke. The joke goes like this. Passengers are seated on the latest kind of airplane, a plane that flies without a pilot because all of the controls are operated mechanically, and the entire flight has been preprogrammed. After all the passengers have boarded the plane, and the door has closed, and the passengers, in accordance with the pre-recorded announcement, have fastened their seat-belts, the plane begins to taxi for a take-off. As the plane moves down the runway, the sound system says, in its flat mechanical voice, "You are now beginning your flight on the most technologically advanced airplane ever designed. There is no pilot or copilot, and there are no flight attendants. Everything has been preprogrammed. The plane will taxi for 60 seconds and then will take off. Nothing can go wrong . . . nothing can go wrong . . . nothing can . . . nothing can . . . nothing can. . . ."

None of us has been on such a plane, but we probably all have had, in a mild way, the sort of experience that the joke implies. We have bought some wonderful gadget—let's say an alarm clock, and we have programmed it according to the complicated instructions, and it has failed to go off the next morning. Apparently we had set it for P.M. instead of A.M., but we still don't see what we did wrong. Or, try as we may we cannot change the margins on the computer. Or the airline has put our luggage on the wrong airplane. Or . . .

None of us wants to give up the wonderful devices we rely on—let's say the automobile, the computer, the iPod. We can even attend an English composition class, and, if we think it is boring, we can silently be exchanging messages with a friend a thousand miles away. Despite these pleasures and these great conveniences, there are times, I think, when most of us must wonder, "Are we really living, or are our machines doing the living for us?" In "August 2026: There Will Come Soft Rains," Ray Bradbury gives us a glimpse—with great exaggeration, of course—of what our lives may be like in the future when machines have become all-powerful.

In Bradbury's story, a preprogrammed house runs everything: sounds wake people up, mechanisms prepare food and clean the house, and other provide entertainment. If the people don't make a choice, a machine chooses something on their behalf. At the opening of the story, the house makes the people's breakfast, reminds the people of the weather and their work day, cleans itself with robot mice, and automatic sprinklers water the lawn.

Are the people who are served by these devices happy? We don't know, because there are no people in Bradbury's story. They have all been incinerated, and only their silhouettes survive on the wall of the house. We learn that some major disaster has happened in the future, as the ruined city near the house is giving off a radioactive glow. Although the preprogrammed house seems to fill the people's every need and want, we, as readers of the story, probably feel that these people could not really have been happy. Things are too programmed; the people who lived in this society must have become almost like machines themselves. With everything provided for them, how did these people think and feel for themselves? Probably none of us wants to say that in our own lives we actually want difficulties, but, still, when we read Bradbury's story we probably say that we would not want to live in a society that was as highly programmed with labor-saving devices as Bradbury shows.

And yet, that is the way we seem to be going, with faster computers, smarter houses. You can now, from your place of work, phone your home and turn the oven on and set the temperature and the duration, so that when you get home the beef has been roasted to medium-rare.

Bradbury first published the story in 1950, so the story was set seventy-six years in the future. It was set, we can say, at a time when most of his readers would probably not still be alive. But today, 2026 is not all that far from us. Most of us who today are reading this story will still be alive in 2026, unless, as the story warns us, we allow our technology—gadgets that can do just about anything—to blow ourselves up. Bradbury's "August 2026: There Will Come Soft Rains" is a wake-up call, a call that we ought to heed. We have somehow let our technical knowledge outrun not only our wisdom but our sense of how to live decent meaningful lives, lives of fun, truly human lives, not just lives in which everything is easy, everything is done for us. We are allowing our gadgets to do our living for us—and they may kill us. We are barely living, we are sleep-walking. This cannot go on without some sort of catastrophic ending. To quote the first line of Ray Bradbury's story, it is "time to get up, time to get up" (43).

[New page]

Work Cited

Bradbury, Ray. "August 2026: There Will Come Soft Rains." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 43-47. Print.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Has Esther Daniels done a good job in writing her title and opening paragraph? Please explain.
2. What is Daniels's thesis? Where does she state it?
3. Do you think Daniels has provided sufficient evidence for her thesis?
4. How could Daniels engage more fully with Bradbury's story to develop her ideas? What details from the story could she cite? Daniels does not explore several important events in the story, such as the poem that the house recites or the final fire that collapses the house. How could Daniels analyze and interpret these plot elements in her paper?
5. If Daniels added more analysis to each paragraph, what ideas could she emphasize and develop?
6. Daniels does not include direct quotations from the story, except in the last line of her paper. What passages from the story could she use to support and develop her ideas? Select one quotation from the story for each of her body paragraphs.
7. Evaluate the final paragraph. Is it effective? Why or why not?

Your Turn: Additional Stories for Analysis

Michele Serros

Michele Serros (1966–2015), published her first book of poems and stories, Chicana Falsa and Other Stories of Death, Identity and Oxnard, while she was still a student at Santa Monica City College. We reprint a story from her second book, How to Be a Chicana Role Model (2000), which achieved national attention.

Senior Picture Day

Sometimes I put two different earrings in the same ear. And that's on a day I'm feeling preppy, not really new wave or anything. One time, during a track meet over at Camarillo High, I discovered way too late that I'd forgot to put on deodorant and that was the worst 'cause everyone knows how snooty those girls at Camarillo can be. Hmmm. Actually the worst thing I've ever forgotten to do was take my pill. That happened three mornings in a row and you can bet I was praying for weeks after that.

So many things to remember when you're seventeen years old and your days start at six A.M. and sometimes don't end until five in the afternoon. But today of all days there's one thing I have to remember to do and that's to squeeze my nose. I've been doing it since the seventh grade. Every morning with my thumb and forefinger I squeeze the sides of it, firmly pressing my nostrils as close as they possibly can get near the base. Sometimes while I'm waiting for the tortilla to heat up, or just when I'm brushing my teeth, I squeeze. Nobody ever notices. Nobody ever asks. With all the other shit seniors in high school go through, squeezing my nose is nothing. It's just like some regular early-morning routine, like yawning or wiping the egg from my eyes. Okay, so you might think it's just a total waste of time, but to tell you the truth, I do see the difference. Just last week I lined up all my class pictures and could definitely see the progress. My nose has actually become smaller, narrower. It looks less Indian. I look less Indian and you can bet that's the main goal here. Today, when I take my graduation pictures, my nose will look just like Terri's and then I'll have the best picture in the year-book. I think about this as Mrs. Milne's Duster comes honking in the driveway to take me to school.

Terri was my best friend in seventh grade. She came from Washington to Rio Del Valle junior high halfway through October. She was the first girl I knew who had contact lenses and four pairs of Chemin de Fers. Can you believe that? She told everyone that her daddy was gonna build 'em a swimming pool for the summer. She told me that I could go over to swim anytime I wanted. But until then, she told me, I could go over and we could play on her dad's CB.[1]

"You dad's really got a CB?" I asked her.

"Oh, yeah," she answered, jiggling her locker door. "You can come over and we can make up handles for ourselves and meet lots of guys. Cute ones."

"Whaddaya mean, handles?" I asked.

"Like names, little nicknames. I never use my real name. I'm 'G.G.' when I get on. That stands for Golden Girl. Oh, and you gotta make sure you end every sentence with 'over.' You're like a total nerd if you don't finish with 'over.' I never talk to anyone who doesn't say 'over.' They're the worst."

Nobody's really into citizen band radios anymore. I now see 'em all lined up in pawnshops over on Oxnard Boulevard. But back in the seventh grade, everyone was getting them. They were way better than using a phone 'cause, first of all, there was no phone bill to bust you for talking to boys who lived past the Grade and second, you didn't have your stupid sister yelling at you for tying up the phone line. Most people had CBs in their cars, but Terri's dad had his in the den.

When I showed up at Terri's to check out the CB, her mama was in the front yard planting some purple flowers.

"Go on in already." She waved me in. "She's in her father's den."

I found Terri just like her mama said. She was already on the CB, looking flustered and sorta excited.

"Hey," I called out to her, and plopped my tote bag on her dad's desk.

She didn't answer but rather motioned to me with her hands to hurry up. Her mouth formed an exaggerated, "Oh, my God!" She held out a glass bowl of Pringles and pointed to a glass of Dr Pepper on the desk.

It turned out Terri had found a boy on the CB. An older interested one. He was fifteen, a skateboarder, and his handle was Lightning Bolt.

"Lightning Bolt," he bragged to Terri. "Like, you know, powerful and fast. That's the way I skate. So," he continued, "where you guys live? Over."

"We live near Malibu." Terri answered. "Between Malibu and Santa Barbara. Over."

"Oh, excuse me, fan-ceee. Over."

"That's right." Terri giggled. "Over."

We actually lived in Oxnard. Really, in El Rio, a flat patch of houses, churches, and schools surrounded by lots of strawberry fields and some new snooty stucco homes surrounded by chainlink. But man, did Terri have this way of making things sound better. I mean, it was the truth, geographically, and besides it sounded way more glamorous.

[1]CB Citizens Band (a radio frequency used by the general public to talk to one another over a short distance).

I took some Pringles from the bowl and thought we were gonna have this wonderful afternoon of talking and flirting with Lightning Bolt until Terri's dad happened to come home early and found us gabbing in his den.

"What the . . . !" he yelled as soon as he walked in and saw us hunched over his CB. "What do you think this is? Party Central? Get off that thing!" He grabbed the receiver from Terri's hand. "This isn't a toy! It's a tool. A tool for communication, you don't use it just to meet boys!"

"Damn, Dad," Terri complained as she slid off her father's desk. "Don't have a cow." She took my hand and led me to her room. "Come on, let's pick you out a handle."

When we were in her room, I told her I had decided on Cali Girl as my handle.

"You mean, like California?" she asked.

"Yeah, sorta."

"But you're Mexican."

"So?"

"So, you look like you're more from Mexico than California."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, California is like, blond girls, you know."

"Yeah, but I am Californian. I mean, real Californian. Even my great-grandma was born here."

"It's just that you don't look like you're from California."

"And you're not exactly golden," I snapped.

We decided to talk to Lightning Bolt the next day, Friday, right after school. Terri's dad always came home real late on Fridays, sometimes even early the next Saturday morning. It would be perfect. When I got to her house the garage door was wide open and I went in through the side door. I almost bumped into Terri's mama. She was spraying the house with Pine Scent and offered me some Hi-C.

"Help yourself to a Pudding Pop, too," she said before heading into the living room through a mist of aerosol. "They're in the freezer."

Man, Terri's mama made their whole life like an afternoon commercial. Hi-C, Pringles in a bowl, the whole house smelling like a pine forest. Was Terri lucky or what? I grabbed a Pudding Pop out of the freezer and was about to join her when I picked up on her laugh. She was already talking to Lightning Bolt. Dang, she didn't waste time!

"Well, maybe we don't ever want to meet you," I heard Terri flirt with Lightning Bolt. "How do you know we don't already have boyfriends? Over."

"Well, you both sound like foxes. So, uh, what do you look like? Over."

"I'm about five-four and have green eyes and ginger-colored hair. Over."

Green? Ginger? I always took Terri for having brown eyes and brown hair.

"What about your friend? Over."

"What about her? Over."

Oh, this was about me! I had to hear this. Terri knew how to pump up things good.

"I mean, what does she look like?" Lightning Bolt asked. "She sounds cute. Over."

"Well . . ." I overheard Terri hesitate. "Well, she's real skinny and, uh . . ."

"I like skinny girls!"

"You didn't let me finish!" Terri interrupted. "And you didn't say 'over.' Over."

"Sorry," Lightning Bolt said. "Go ahead and finish. Over."

I tore the wrapper off the Pudding Pop and continued to listen.

50 "Well," Terri continued. "She's also sorta flat-chested, I guess. Over."

What? How could Terri say that?

"Flat-chested? Oh yeah? Over." Lightning Bolt answered.

"Yeah. Over."

Terri paused uncomfortably. It was as if she knew what she was saying was wrong and bad and she should've stopped but couldn't. She was saying things about a friend, things a real friend shouldn't be saying about another friend, but now there was a boy involved and he was interested in that other friend, in me, and her side was losing momentum. She would have to continue to stay ahead.

55 "Yeah, and she also has this, this nose, a nose like . . . like an Indian. Over."

"An, Indian?" Lightning Bolt asked. "What do ya mean an Indian? Over."

"You know, Indian. Like powwow Indian."

"Really?" Lightning Bolt laughed on the other end. "Like Woo-Woo-Woo Indian?" He clapped his palm over his mouth and wailed. A sound I knew all too well.

"Yeah, just like that!" Terri laughed. "In fact, I think she's gonna pick 'Li'l Squaw' as her handle!"

60 I shut the refrigerator door quietly. I touched the ridge of my nose. I felt the bump my mother had promised me would be less noticeable once my face "filled out." The base of my nose was far from feminine and was broad, like, well, like Uncle Rudy's nose, Grandpa Rudy's nose, and yeah, a little bit of Uncle Vincente's nose, too. Men in my family who looked like Indians and here their Indian noses were lumped together on me, on my face. My nose made me look like I didn't belong, made me look less Californian than my blond counterparts. After hearing Terri and Lightning Bolt laugh, more than anything I hated the men in my family who had given me such a hideous nose.

I grabbed my tote bag and started to leave out through the garage door when Terri's mama called out from the living room. "You're leaving already?" she asked. "I know Terri would love to have you for dinner. Her daddy's working late again."

I didn't answer and I didn't turn around. I just walked out and went home.

And so that's how the squeezing began. I eventually stopped hanging out with Terri and never got a chance to use my handle on her dad's CB. I know it's been almost four years since she said all that stuff about me, about my nose, but man, it still stings.

65 During freshman year I heard that Terri's dad met some lady on the CB and left her mama for this other woman. Can you believe that? Who'd wanna leave a house that smelled like a pine forest and always had Pudding Pops in the freezer?

As Mrs. Milne honks from the driveway impatiently, I grab my books and run down the driveway, squeezing my nose just a little bit more. I do it because today is Senior Picture Day and because I do notice the difference. I might be too skinny. My chest might be too flat. But God forbid I look too Indian.

[2000]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. How would you characterize the narrator of "Senior Picture Day"? Do you regard her with amusement, pity, contempt, sympathy—or all of the above, or none? Please explain.
2. Briefly recounted within this story about the narrator is another story about Terri's parents. Why do you suppose Serros included this story?

One of the most important Mayan portrait sculptures shows Pakal the Great, with an ample nose. Mayan portrait sculpture (mid-seventh century).

3. If someone asked you to write an essay about your body, would you find the assignment easy or difficult? Please explain.
4. a. Describe the impression that the portrait sculpture (shown above) of the most famous Mayan king, Pakal the Great, makes on you.
   b. When we say that someone is handsome or beautiful or striking looking, what do we mean? Is this just a strong feeling that we have, or is it a strong feeling that we could explain and support through an argument? Support your answer in an argument of 250–500 words (probably two or three paragraphs).
5. Which statement has the greater effect on you: "That person is very attractive" or "That person is highly intelligent"? Do you think that most people would agree with you? Could you present an argument that would convince others to agree with you? What would your argument consist of? What would your evidence be? Set forth your argument in 250–500 words.

Haruki Murakami

Born in Kyoto, Japan, in 1949, Haruki Murakami attended Waseda University in Tokyo, where he studied drama. In a well-known story told by Murakami, he was inspired to write his first novel when he attended a baseball game and saw an American player hit a double; he said he instantly knew he could write a novel and went home and started that night. A best-selling novelist, Murakami's work often uses surrealistic and experimental elements to capture the sense of alienation, uncertainty, and disconnection created by contemporary culture.

On Seeing the 100% Perfect Girl One Beautiful April Morning

One beautiful April morning, on a narrow side street in Tokyo's fashionable Harujuku neighborhood, I walked past the 100% perfect girl.

Tell you the truth, she's not that good-looking. She doesn't stand out in any way. Her clothes are nothing special. The back of her hair is still bent out of shape from sleep. She isn't young, either—must be near thirty, not even close to a "girl," properly speaking. But still, I know from fifty yards away: She's the 100% perfect girl for me. The moment I see her, there's a rumbling in my chest, and my mouth is as dry as a desert.

Maybe you have your own particular favorite type of girl—one with slim ankles, say, or big eyes, or graceful fingers, or you're drawn for no good reason to girls who take their time with every meal. I have my own preferences, of course. Sometimes in a restaurant I'll catch myself staring at the girl at the next table to mine because I like the shape of her nose.

But no one can insist that his 100% perfect girl corresponds to some preconceived type. Much as I like noses, I can't recall the shape of hers—or even if she had one. All I can remember for sure is that she was no great beauty. It's weird.

"Yesterday on the street I passed the 100% girl," I tell someone.

"Yeah?" he says. "Good-looking?"

"Not really."

"Your favorite type, then?"

"I don't know. I can't seem to remember anything about her—the shape of her eyes or the size of her breasts."

"Strange."

"Yeah. Strange."

"So anyhow," he says, already bored, "what did you do? Talk to her? Follow her?"

"Nah. Just passed her on the street."

She's walking east to west, and I west to east. It's a really nice April morning.

Wish I could talk to her. Half an hour would be plenty: just ask her about herself, tell her about myself, and—what I'd really like to do—explain to her the complexities of fate that have led to our passing each other on a side street in Harajuku on a beautiful April morning in 1981. This was something sure to be crammed full of warm secrets, like an antique clock built when peace filled the world.

After talking, we'd have lunch somewhere, maybe see a Woody Allen movie, stop by a hotel bar for cocktails. With any kind of luck, we might end up in bed.

Potentiality knocks on the door of my heart.

Now the distance between us has narrowed to fifteen yards.

How can I approach her? What should I say?

"Good morning, miss. Do you think you could spare half an hour for a little conversation?"

Ridiculous. I'd sound like an insurance salesman.

"Pardon me, but would you happen to know if there is an all-night cleaners in the neighborhood?"

No, this is just as ridiculous. I'm not carrying any laundry, for one thing. Who's going to buy a line like that?

Maybe the simple truth would do. "Good morning. You are the 100% perfect girl for me."

No, she wouldn't believe it. Or even if she did, she might not want to talk to me. Sorry, she could say, I might be the 100% perfect girl for you, but you're not the 100% boy for me. It could happen. And if I found myself in that situation,

I'd probably go to pieces. I'd never recover from the shock. I'm thirty-two, and that's what growing older is all about.

We pass in front of a flower shop. A small, warm air mass touches my skin. The asphalt is damp, and I catch the scent of roses. I can't bring myself to speak to her. She wears a white sweater, and in her right hand she holds a crisp white envelope lacking only a stamp. So: She's written somebody a letter, maybe spent the whole night writing, to judge from the sleepy look in her eyes. The envelope could contain every secret she's ever had.

I take a few more strides and turn: She's lost in the crowd.

Now, of course, I know exactly what I should have said to her. It would have been a long speech, though, far too long for me to have delivered it properly. The ideas I come up with are never very practical.

Oh, well. It would have started "Once upon a time" and ended "A sad story, don't you think?"

30 Once upon a time, there lived a boy and a girl. The boy was eighteen and the girl sixteen. He was not unusually handsome, and she was not especially beautiful. They were just an ordinary lonely boy and an ordinary lonely girl, like all the others. But they believed with their whole hearts that somewhere in the world there lived the 100% perfect boy and the 100% perfect girl for them. Yes, they believed in a miracle. And that miracle actually happened.

One day the two came upon each other on the corner of a street.

"This is amazing," he said. "I've been looking for you all my life. You may not believe this, but you're the 100% perfect girl for me."

"And you," she said to him, "are the 100% perfect boy for me, exactly as I'd pictured you in every detail. It's like a dream."

They sat on a park bench, held hands, and told each other their stories hour after hour. They were not lonely anymore. They had found and been found by their 100% perfect other. What a wonderful thing it is to find and be found by your 100% perfect other. It's a miracle, a cosmic miracle.

35 As they sat and talked, however, a tiny, tiny sliver of doubt took root in their hearts: Was it really all right for one's dreams to come true so easily?

And so, when there came a momentary lull in their conversation, the boy said to the girl, "Let's test ourselves—just once. If we really are each other's 100% perfect lovers, then sometime, somewhere, we will meet again without fail. And when that happens, and we know that we are the 100% perfect ones, we'll marry then and there. What do you think?"

"Yes," she said, "that is exactly what we should do."

And so they parted, she to the east, and he to the west.

The test they had agreed upon, however, was utterly unnecessary. They should never have undertaken it, because they really and truly were each other's 100% perfect lovers, and it was a miracle that they had ever met. But it was impossible for them to know this, young as they were. The cold, indifferent waves of fate proceeded to toss them unmercifully.

40 One winter, both the boy and the girl came down with the season's terrible influenza, and after drifting for weeks between life and death they lost all memory of their earlier years. When they awoke, their heads were as empty as the young D. H. Lawrence's piggy bank.

They were two bright, determined young people, however, and through their unremitting efforts they were able to acquire once again the knowledge and feeling that qualified them to return as full-fledged members of society. Heaven be praised, they became truly upstanding citizens who knew how to transfer from one subway line to another, who were fully capable of sending a special-delivery letter at the post office. Indeed, they even experienced love again, sometimes as much as 75% or even 85% love.

Time passed with shocking swiftness, and soon the boy was thirty-two, the girl thirty.

One beautiful April morning, in search of a cup of coffee to start the day, the boy was walking from west to east, while the girl, intending to send a special-delivery letter, was walking from east to west, but along the same narrow street in the Harajuku neighborhood of Tokyo. They passed each other in the very center of the street. The faintest gleam of their lost memories glimmered for the briefest moment in their hearts. Each felt a rumbling in their chest. And they knew:

She is the 100% perfect girl for me.

45 He is the 100% perfect boy for me.

But the glow of their memories was far too weak, and their thoughts no longer had the clarity of fourteen years earlier. Without a word, they passed each other, disappearing into the crowd. Forever.

A sad story, don't you think?

Yes, that's it, that is what I should have said to her.

[2010]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In Murakami's short story, the narrator explains that he has passed his ideal match—the "100% perfect girl"—on the streets of Tokyo. How does he recognize her as the 100% perfect girl?
2. Why does the narrator not stop and talk to the 100% perfect girl?
3. The narrator imagines what he would have said to the girl and starts to tell a "once upon a time" story. Why would he tell a story to the girl? What would this story accomplish? Imagine being the girl listening to this story. Would this story intrigue and attract you, or would it confuse and repel you?
4. How does the "once upon a time" story connect to the first half of the short story? For example, are the characters in the "once upon a time" story the same people as in the original short story? How does the "once upon a time" story comment on the first half of the short story?
5. What do you make of the ending of the story and its statement, "A sad story, don't you think?"? Do you think this is a "sad story" and sad ending? Write a short response paper that analyzes and interprets the story's ending.

JOHN UPDIKE

John Updike (1932–2009) grew up in Shillington, Pennsylvania, where his father was a teacher and his mother was a writer. After receiving a BA degree in 1954 from Harvard, where he edited the Harvard Lampoon (for which he both wrote and drew), he studied drawing at Oxford for a year until an offer from the New Yorker brought him back to the United States. He was hired as a reporter for the magazine but soon began contributing poetry, essays, and fiction. In 1957, he left the New Yorker in order to write independently full-time, though his stories and book reviews appeared regularly in it.

In 1959, Updike published his first book of stories (The Same Door) and also his first novel (The Poorhouse Fair); the next year, he published Rabbit, Run, a highly successful novel whose protagonist, "Rabbit" Angstrom, reappears in three later novels: Rabbit Redux (1971), Rabbit Is Rich (1981), and Rabbit at Rest (1990). The first and the last Rabbit books each won a Pulitzer Prize.

A & P

In walks these three girls in nothing but bathing suits. I'm in the third checkout slot, with my back to the door, so I don't see them until they're over by the bread. The one that caught my eye first was the one in the plaid green two-piece. She was a chunky kid, with a good tan and a sweet broad soft-looking can with those two crescents of white just under it, where the sun never seems to hit, at the top of the backs of her legs. I stood there with my hand on a box of HiHo crackers trying to remember if I rang it up or not. I ring it up again and the customer starts giving me hell. She's one of these cash-register-watchers, a witch about fifty with rouge on her cheekbones and no eyebrows, and I know it made her day to trip me up. She'd been watching cash registers for fifty years and probably never seen a mistake before.

By the time I got her feathers smoothed and her goodies into a bag—she gives me a little snort in passing, if she'd been born at the right time they would have burned her over in Salem—by the time I get her on her way the girls had circled around the bread and were coming back, without a pushcart, back my way along the counters, in the aisle between the checkouts and the Special bins. They didn't even have shoes on. There was this chunky one, with the two-piece—it was bright green and the seams of the bra were still sharp and her belly was still pretty pale so I guessed she just got it (the suit)—there was this one, with one of those chubby berry-faces, the lips all bunched together under her nose, this one, and a tall one, with black hair that hadn't quite frizzed right, and one of these sunburns right across under the eyes, and a chin that was way too long—you know, the kind of girl other girls think is very "striking" and "attractive" but never quite makes it, as they very well know, which is why they like her so much—and then the third one, that wasn't quite so tall. She was the queen. She kind of led them, the other two peeking around and making their shoulders round. She didn't look around, not this queen, she just walked straight on slowly, on these long white prima-donna legs. She came down a little hard on her heels, as if she didn't walk in her bare feet that much, putting down her heels and then letting the weight move along to her toes as if she was testing the floor with every step, putting a little deliberate extra action into it. You never know for sure how girls' minds work (do they really think it's a mind in there or just a little buzz like a bee in a glass jar?) but you got the idea she had talked the other two into coming in here with her, and now she was showing them how to do it, walk slow and hold yourself straight.

She had on a kind of dirty pink—beige maybe, I don't know—bathing suit with a little nubble all over it and, what got me, the straps were down. They were off her shoulders looped loose around the cool tops of her arms, and I guess as a result the suit had slipped on her, so all around the top of the cloth there was this shining rim. If it hadn't been there you wouldn't have known there could have been anything whiter than those shoulders. With the straps pushed off, there was nothing between the top of the suit and the top of her head except just her, this clean bare plane of the top of her chest down from the shoulder bones like a dented sheet of metal tilted in the light. I mean, it was more than pretty.

She had sort of oaky hair that the sun and salt had bleached, done up in a bun that was unravelling, and a kind of prim face. Walking into the A & P with your straps down, I suppose it's the only kind of face you can have. She held her head so high her neck, coming up out of those white shoulders, looked kind of stretched, but I didn't mind. The longer her neck was, the more of her there was.

5 She must have felt in the corner of her eye me and over my shoulder Stokesie in the second slot watching, but she didn't tip. Not this queen. She kept her eyes moving across the racks, and stopped, and turned so slow it made my stomach rub the inside of my apron, and buzzed to the other two, who kind of huddled against her for relief, and then they all three of them went up the cat and dog food-breakfast cereal-macaroni-rice-raisins-seasonings-spreads-spaghetti-soft drinks-crackers-and-cookies aisle. From the third slot I look straight up this aisle to the meat counter, and I watched them all the way. The fat one with the tan sort of fumbled with the cookies, but on second thought she put the package back. The sheep pushing their carts down the aisle—the girls were walking against the usual traffic (not that we have one-way signs or anything)—were pretty hilarious. You could see them, when Queenie's white shoulders dawned on them, kind of jerk, or hop, or hiccup, but their eyes snapped back to their own baskets and on they pushed. I bet you could set off dynamite in the A & P and the people would by and large keep reaching and checking oatmeal off their lists and muttering "Let me see, there was a third thing, began with A, asparagus, no, ah, yes, applesauce!" or whatever it is they do mutter. But there was no doubt, this jiggled them. A few house slaves in pin curlers even look around after pushing their carts past to make sure what they had seen was correct.

You know, it's one thing to have a girl in a bathing suit down on the beach, where what with the glare nobody can look at each other much anyway, and another thing in the cool of the A & P, under the fluorescent lights, against all those stacked packages, with her feet paddling along naked over our checker-board green-and-cream, rubber-tile floor.

"Oh, Daddy," Stokesie said beside me. "I feel so faint."

"Darling," I said. "Hold me tight." Stokesie's married, with two babies chalked up on his fuselage already, but as far as I can tell that's the only difference. He's twenty-two, and I was nineteen this April.

"Is it done?" he asks, the responsible married man finding his voice. I forgot to say he thinks he's going to be a manager some sunny day, maybe in 1990 when it's called the Great Alexandrov and Petrooshki Tea Company or something.

10 What he meant was, our town is five miles from a beach, with a big summer colony out on the Point, but we're right in the middle of town, and the women generally put on a shirt or shorts or something before they get out of the car into the street. And anyway these are usually women with six children and varicose veins mapping their legs and nobody, including them, could care less. As I say, we're right in the middle of town, and if you stand at our front doors you can see two banks and the Congregational church and the newspaper store and three real estate offices and about twenty-seven old freeloaders tearing up Central Street because the sewer broke again. It's not as if we're on the Cape; we're north of Boston and there's people in this town haven't seen the ocean for twenty years.

The girls had reached the meat counter and were asking McMahon something. He pointed, they pointed, and they shuffled out of sight behind a pyramid of Diet Delight peaches. All that was left for us to see was old McMahon patting his mouth and looking after them sizing up their joints. Poor kids, I began to feel sorry for them, they couldn't help it.

Now here comes the sad part of the story, at least my family says it's sad, but I don't think it's so sad myself. The store's pretty empty, it being Thursday afternoon, so there was nothing much to do except lean on the register and wait for the girls to show up again. The whole store was like a pinball machine and I didn't know which tunnel they'd come out of. After a while they come around out of the far aisle, around the light bulbs, records at discount of the Caribbean Six or Tony Martin Sings or some such gunk you wonder they waste the wax on, six-packs of candy bars, and plastic toys done up in cellophane that fall apart when a kid looks at them anyway. Around they come, Queenie still leading the way, and holding a little gray jar in her hand. Slots Three through Seven are unmanned and I could see her wondering between Stokes and me, but Stokesie with his usual luck draws an old party in baggy gray pants who stumbles up with four giant cans of pineapple juice (what do these bums do with all that pineapple juice? I've often asked myself) so the girls come to me. Queenie puts down the jar and I take it into my fingers icy cold. Kingfish Fancy Herring Snacks in Pure Sour Cream: 49¢. Now her hands are empty, not a ring or a bracelet, bare as God made them, and I wonder where the money's coming from. Still with the prim look she lifts a folded dollar bill out of the hollow at the center of her nubbled pink top. The jar went heavy in my hand. Really, I thought that was so cute.

Then everybody's luck begins to run out. Lengel comes in from haggling with a truck full of cabbages on the lot and is about to scuttle into the door marked MANAGER behind which he hides all day when the girls touch his eye. Lengel's pretty dreary, teaches Sunday school and the rest, but he doesn't miss that much. He comes over and says, "Girls, this isn't the beach."

Queenie blushes, though maybe it's just a brush of sunburn I was noticing for the first time, now that she was so close. "My mother asked me to pick up a jar of herring snacks." Her voice kind of startled me, the way voices do when you see the people first, coming out so flat and dumb yet kind of tony, too, the way it ticked over "pick up" and "snacks." All of a sudden I slid right down her voice into her living room. Her father and the other men were standing around in ice-cream coats and bow ties and the women were in sandals picking up herring snacks on toothpicks off a big glass plate and they were all holding drinks the color of water with olives and sprigs of mint in them. When my parents have somebody over they get lemonade and if it's a real racy affair Schlitz in tall glasses with "They'll Do It Every Time" cartoons stencilled on.

15 That's all right," Lengel said. "But this isn't the beach." His repeating this struck me as funny, as if it had just occurred to him, and he had been thinking all these years the A & P was a great big dune and he was the head lifeguard. He didn't like my smiling—as I say he doesn't miss much—but he concentrates on giving the girls that sad Sunday-school-superintendent stare.

Queenie's blush was no sunburn now, and the plump one in plaid, that I liked better from the back—a really sweet can—pipes up, "We weren't doing any shopping. We just came in for the one thing."

"That makes no difference," Lengel tells her, and I could see from the way his eyes went that he hadn't noticed she was wearing at two-piece before. "We want you decently dressed when you come in here."

"We are decent," Queenie says suddenly, her lower lip pushing, getting sore now that she remembers her place, a place from which the crowd that runs the

A & P must look pretty crummy. Fancy Herring Snacks flashed in her very blue eyes.

"Girls, I don't want to argue with you. After this come in here with your shoulders covered. It's our policy." He turns his back. That's policy for you. Policy is what the kingpins want. What the others want is juvenile delinquency.

All this while, the customers had been showing up with their carts but, you know, sheep, seeing a scene, they had all bunched up on Stokesie, who shook open a paper bag as gently as peeling a peach, not wanting to miss a word. I could feel in the silence everybody getting nervous, most of all Lengel, who asks me, "Sammy, have you rung up this purchase?"

I thought and said "No" but it wasn't about that I was thinking. I go through the punches, 4, 9, GROC, TOT—it's more complicated than you think and after you do it often enough, it begins to make a little song, that you hear words to, in my case "Hello (bing) there, you (gung) hap-py *pee*pul (splat)!"—the splat being the drawer flying out. I uncrease the bill, tenderly as you may imagine, it just having come from between the two smoothest scoops of vanilla I had ever known were there, and pass a half and a penny into her narrow pink palm and nestle the herrings in a bag and twist its neck and hand it over, all the time thinking.

The girls, and who'd blame them, are in a hurry to get out, so I say "I quit" to Lengel quick enough for them to hear, hoping they'll stop and watch me, their unsuspected hero. They keep right on going, into the electric eye; the door flies open and they flicker across the lot to their car, Queenie and Plaid and Big Tall Goony-Goony (not that as raw material she was so bad), leaving me with Lengel and a kink in his eyebrow.

"Did you say something, Sammy?"

"I said I quit."

"I thought you did."

"You didn't have to embarrass them."

"It was they who were embarrassing us."

I started to say something that came out "Fiddle-de-doo." It's a saying of my grandmother's, and I know she would have been pleased.

"I don't think you know what you're saying," Lengel said.

"I know you don't," I said. "But I do." I pull the bow at the back of my apron and start shrugging it off my shoulders. A couple customers that had been heading for my slot begin to knock against each other, like scared pigs in a chute.

Lengel sighs and begins to look very patient and old and gray. He's been a friend of my parents for years. "Sammy, you don't want to do this to your Mom and Dad," he tells me. It's true, I don't. But it seems to me that once you begin a gesture it's fatal not to go through with it. I fold the apron, "Sammy" stitched in red on the pocket, and put it on the counter, and drop the bow tie on top of it. The bow tie is theirs, if you've ever wondered. "You'll feel this for the rest of your life," Lengel says, and I know that's true, too, but remembering how he made that pretty girl blush makes me so scrunchy inside I punch the No Sale tab and the machine whirs "pee-pul" and the drawer splats out. One advantage to this scene taking place in summer, I can follow this up with a clean exit, there's no fumbling around getting your coat and galoshes, I just saunter into the electric eye in my white shirt that my mother ironed the night before, and the door heaves itself open, and outside the sunshine is skating round on the asphalt.

I look around for my girls, but they're gone, of course. There wasn't anybody but some young married screaming with her children about some candy they didn't get by the door of a powder-blue Falcon station wagon. Looking back in the big windows, over the bags of peat moss and aluminum lawn furniture stacked on the pavement, I could see Lengel in my place in the slot, checking the sheep through. His face was dark gray and his back stiff, as if he'd just had an injection of iron, and my stomach kind of fell as I felt how hard the world was going to be to me hereafter.

[1962]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In what sort of community is this A & P located? To what extent does this community resemble yours?
2. Do you think Sammy is a misogynist? Why, or why not? And, if you think he is, do you find the story offensive? Again, why or why not? Present your response in the form of a detailed argument.
3. In the last line of the story, Sammy says, "I felt how hard the world was going to be to me hereafter." Do you think the world is going to be hard to Sammy? Why, or why not? And, if it is going to be hard to Sammy, will this be because of a virtue or a weakness in Sammy?
4. Write Lengel's version of the story (500–1,000 words) as he might narrate it to his wife during dinner. Or write the story from Queenie's point of view.
5. In speaking of contemporary fiction, Updike said:

   > I want stories to startle and engage me within the first few sentences, and in their middle to widen or deepen or sharpen my knowledge of human activity, and to end by giving me a sensation of completed statement.

   Let's assume that you share Updike's view of what a story should do. To what extent do you think "A & P" fulfills these demands? (You may want to put your response in the form of a letter to Updike.)

CHAPTER 4

The Reader as Writer

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Use a wide range of close reading and inquiry strategies to develop ideas for an essay
- Employ critical thinking to develop a thesis
- Engage effectively in the process of drafting and revising an argument
- Evaluate a student's analysis essay

Developing Ideas through Close Reading and Inquiry

Getting Ideas

How do writers "learn to have ideas"? Among the methods are these: reading with a pen or pencil in hand so that you can annotate the text; using brainstorming and freewriting notes to ask questions and develop answers; keeping a journal in which you jot down reflections about your reading; generating notes in the form of lists and outlines that organize your ideas; and arguing with yourself and talking with others (including your instructor) about the reading.

Let's take another look at the first of these methods, annotating.

Annotating a Text

When you're reading, if you own the book that you're reading, don't hesitate to mark it up, indicating (by highlighting or underlining or making marginal notes) what puzzles you, what pleases or interests you, and what displeases or bores you. If you plan to return the book, use sticky notes to add annotations to the text or take reading notes in a journal or on your laptop. Later, you'll want to think further about these responses, asking yourself, on rereading, whether you still feel that way, and if not, why not. These first responses, however, will get you started.

Annotations of the sort shown on pages 28–29, which chiefly call attention to contrasts, indicate that the student is thinking about writing an analysis of the story. That is, she is thinking of writing an essay in which she will examine the parts of a literary work either in an effort to see how they relate to each other or in an effort to see how one part relates to the whole.

Let's look at a story by Kate Chopin that is a little longer than "Ripe Figs," featured in Chapter 3, and then we'll discuss how, in addition to annotating it, you might get ideas for writing about it.

Kate Chopin

For a biographical note, see page 25.

The Story of an Hour

Knowing that Mrs. Mallard was afflicted with a heart trouble, great care was taken to break to her as gently as possible the news of her husband's death.

It was her sister Josephine who told her, in broken sentences, veiled hints that revealed in half concealing. Her husband's friend Richards was there, too, near her. It was he who had been in the newspaper office when intelligence of the railroad disaster was received, with Brently Mallard's name leading the list of "killed." He had only taken the time to assure himself of its truth by a second telegram, and had hastened to forestall any less careful, less tender friend in bearing the sad message.

She did not hear the story as many women have heard the same, with a paralyzed inability to accept its significance. She wept at once, with sudden, wild abandonment, in her sister's arms. When the storm of grief had spent itself she went away to her room alone. She would have no one follow her.

There stood, facing the open window, a comfortable, roomy armchair. Into this she sank, pressed down by a physical exhaustion that haunted her body and seemed to reach into her soul.

She could see in the open square before her house the tops of trees that were all aquiver with the new spring life. The delicious breath of rain was in the air. In the street below a peddler was crying his wares. The notes of a distant song which some one was singing reached her faintly, and countless sparrows were twittering in the eaves.

There were patches of blue sky showing here and there through the clouds that had met and piled above the other in the west facing her window. She sat with her head thrown back upon the cushion of the chair quite motionless, except when a sob came up into her throat and shook her, as a child who has cried itself to sleep continues to sob in its dreams.

She was young, with a fair, calm face, whose lines bespoke repression and even a certain strength. But now there was a dull stare in her eyes, whose gaze was fixed away off yonder on one of those patches of blue sky. It was not a glance of reflection, but rather indicated a suspension of intelligent thought.

There was something coming to her and she was waiting for it, fearfully. What was it? She did not know; it was too subtle and elusive to name. But she felt it, creeping out of the sky, reaching toward her through the sounds, the scents, the color that filled the air.

Now her bosom rose and fell tumultuously. She was beginning to recognize this thing that was approaching to possess her, and she was striving to beat it back with her will—as powerless as her two white slender hands would have been.

When she abandoned herself a little whispered word escaped her slightly parted lips. She said it over and over under her breath: "Free, free, free!" The vacant stare and the look of terror that had followed it went from her eyes. They stayed keen and bright. Her pulses beat fast, and the coursing blood warmed and relaxed every inch of her body.

She did not stop to ask if it were not a monstrous joy that held her. A clear and exalted perception enabled her to dismiss the suggestion as trivial.

She knew that she would weep again when she saw the kind, tender hands folded in death; the face that had never looked save with love upon her, fixed and gray and dead. But she saw beyond that bitter moment a long procession of years to come that would belong to her absolutely. And she opened and spread her arms out to them in welcome.

There would be no one to live for her during those coming years; she would live for herself. There would be no powerful will bending her in that blind persistence with which men and women believe they have a right to impose a private will upon a fellow creature. A kind intention or a cruel intention made the act seem no less a crime as she looked upon it in that brief moment of illumination.

And yet she had loved him—sometimes. Often she had not. What did it matter! What could love, the unsolved mystery, count for in face of this possession of self-assertion which she suddenly recognized as the strongest impulse of her being.

15 "Free! Body and soul free!" she kept whispering.

Josephine was kneeling before the closed door with her lips to the keyhole, imploring for admission. "Louise, open the door! I beg; open the door—you will make yourself ill. What are you doing, Louise? For heaven's sake open the door."

"Go away. I am not making myself ill." No; she was drinking in a very elixir of life through that open window.

Her fancy was running riot along those days ahead of her. Spring days, and summer days, and all sorts of days that would be her own. She breathed a quick prayer that life might be long. It was only yesterday she had thought with a shudder that life might be long.

She arose at length and opened the door to her sister's importunities. There was a feverish triumph in her eyes, and she carried herself unwittingly like a goddess of Victory. She clasped her sister's waist, and together they descended the stairs. Richards stood waiting for them at the bottom.

20 Some one was opening the front door with a latchkey. It was Brently Mallard who entered, a little travel-stained, composedly carrying his gripsack and umbrella. He had been far from the scene of accident, and did not even know there had been one. He stood amazed at Josephine's piercing cry; at Richards' quick motion to screen him from the view of his wife.

But Richards was too late.

When the doctors came they said she had died of heart disease—of joy that kills.

[1894]

Brainstorming Ideas

Unlike annotating, which consists of making brief notes and small marks on the printed page, "brainstorming"—the free jotting down of ideas—asks that you write down whatever comes to mind, without inhibition. Don't worry about spelling, writing complete sentences, or unifying your thoughts; just let one thought lead to another. Later, you can review your jottings, deleting some, connecting those that are related, and expanding others, but for now you just want to get going. As we explored in Chapter 2, brainstorming starts the process of inquiry, working to move from your annotations about the text to open-ended writing that captures your questions and answers about the text. These writing strategies allow you to capture your thought process on paper, helping you to develop new insights that are worthy of further investigation.

Thus, you might jot down something about the title:

Title speaks of an hour, and story covers an hour, but maybe takes five minutes to read.

Then, perhaps prompted by "an hour," you might add something to this effect:

> Doubt that a woman who got news of the death of her husband could move from grief to joy within an hour.

Your next jotting might have little or nothing to do with this issue; it might simply say,

> Enjoyed "Hour" more than "Ripe Figs" partly because "Hour" is so shocking.

And then you might ask yourself,

> By shocking, do I mean "improbable," or what? Come to think of it, maybe it's not so improbable. A lot depends on what the marriage was like.

Focused Freewriting

Focused, or directed, freewriting is a form of brainstorming that some writers use to uncover ideas. Concentrating on one issue—for instance, a question that strikes them as worth puzzling over ("What kind of person is Mrs. Mallard?")—they write at length, nonstop, for perhaps five or ten minutes. They do not stop to evaluate the results or to worry about niceties of sentence structure or spelling. They just pour out their ideas in a steady stream of writing, drawing on whatever associations come to mind.

After the freewriting session, these writers reread what they have written, highlighting or underlining whatever seems to be of value. At this point, the writers are often able to make a rough outline and begin a draft.

Here is an example of one student's focused freewriting:

Student Work: Freewriting

> What do I know about Mrs. Mallard? Let me put everything down here I know about her or can figure out from what Kate Chopin tells me. When she finds herself alone after the death of her husband, she says, "Free! Body and soul free!" and before that she said, "Free, free, free!" So she has suddenly perceived that she has not been free; she has been under the influence of a "powerful will." In this case it has been her husband, but she says no one, man or woman, should impose their will on anyone else. So it's not a feminist issue—it's a power issue. No one should push anyone else around is what I guess Chopin means, force someone to do what the other person wants. I used to have a friend that did that to me all the time; he had to run everything. They say that fathers—before the women's movement—used to run things, with the father in charge of all the decisions, so maybe this is an honest reaction to having been pushed around by a husband. I think Mrs. Mallard is a believable character, even if the plot is not all that believable—all those things happening in such quick succession.

Listing Ideas, Details, and Quotations

In your preliminary thinking, you may find it useful to make lists. In the previous chapter, we saw that listing the traits of the two characters was helpful in thinking about Chopin's "Ripe Figs":

Student Work: Listing

Maman-Nainaine
- older than Babette
- "stately way"
- "patient as the statue of la Madone"
- connects actions with seasons
- expects to be obeyed

Babette
- young
- active and impatient
- obedient

For "The Story of an Hour," you might list Mrs. Mallard's traits, or you might list the stages in her development. Such a list is not the same as a summary of the plot. The list helps you to see the sequence of psychological changes.

Mrs. Mallard
- weeps (when she gets the news)
- goes to room, alone
- "pressed down by a physical exhaustion"
- "dull stare"
- "something coming to her"
- strives to beat back "this thing"
- "Free, free, free!" The "vacant stare went . . . from her eyes"
- "A clear and exalted perception"
- rejects Josephine
- "she was drinking in a very elixir of life"
- gets up, opens door, "a feverish triumph in her eyes"
- sees B., and dies

Unlike brainstorming and annotating, which let you go in all directions, listing requires that you first make a decision about what you will be listing: traits of character, images, puns, or whatever. Once you make the decision, you can construct a list, and with that list in front of you, you will see patterns that you were not fully conscious of earlier.

Asking Questions

When you feel stuck, ask yourself questions. Questioning can help you to reenergize the process of inquiry. You'll recall that the assignment on "Ripe Figs" in effect, asked that students form questions about the work-for instance, questions about the relationship between the characters—and about their responses to it: "You'll try to explain as honestly as you can what makes 'Ripe Figs' appealing or interesting—or trifling, or boring."

If you are thinking about a work of fiction, ask yourself questions about the plot and the characters: Are they believable, are they interesting, and what does it all add up to? What does the story mean to you?

One student found it helpful to record the following inquiry notes:

Student Work: Inquiry Notes

Plot
Ending false? Unconvincing? Or prepared for?
Character?
Mrs. M. unfeeling? Immoral?
Mrs. M. unbelievable character?
What might her marriage have been like? Many gaps.
Can we tell what her husband was like?
And yet she loved him—sometimes" Fickle? Realistic?
What is "this thing that was approaching to possess her"?
Symbolism
Set on spring day = symbolic of new life?

You don't have to be as organized as this student. You may begin by recording notes and queries about what you like or dislike and about what puzzles or amuses you. What follows are the inquiry notes of a second student. They are in no particular order; the student is brainstorming, putting down whatever occurs to her, although it is obvious that one question sometimes leads to the next:

Title nothing special. What might be a better title?
Could a woman who loved her husband be so heartless?
Is she heartless? Did she love him?
What are (were) Louise's feelings about her husband?
Did she want too much? What did she want?
Could this story happen today? Feminist interpretation?
Sister (Josephine)—a busybody?
Tricky ending—but maybe it could be true.
"And yet she had loved him—sometimes. Often she had not."
Why does one love someone "sometimes"?
Irony: plot has reversal. Are characters ironic too?

These inquiry notes helped this reader think about the story, find a special point of interest, and develop a thoughtful argument about it.

Keeping a Journal

A critical thinking journal is not a diary. Rather, it is a place to store some of the thoughts that you may have inscribed in the margin of the text, such as your initial response to the title of a work or to the ending. It is also a place to capture further reflections, such as thoughts about what the work means to you and what was said in the classroom about writing in general or about specific works.

You may, for instance, want to reflect on why your opinion is so different from that of another student, or you may want to apply a concept such as character or irony or plausibility to a story that later you may write about in an essay. Comparisons are especially helpful: How does this story (or this character, or this rhyme scheme) differ from last week's reading?

A student who wrote about "The Story of an Hour" began with the following entry in his journal. When you are reading this entry, notice that one idea stimulates another. The student was, quite rightly, concerned with getting and exploring ideas, not with writing a unified paragraph.

Student Work: Journal Writing

Apparently a "well-made" story, but seems clever rather than moving or real. Doesn't seem plausible. Mrs. M's change comes out of the blue—maybe some women might respond like this, but probably not most.

Does literature deal with unusual people, or with usual (typical?) people? Shouldn't it deal with typical? Maybe not. (Anyway, how can I know?) Is "typical" same as "plausible"? Come to think of it, prob. not.

Anyway, whether Mrs. M is typical or not, is her change plausible, believable? Think more about this.

Why did she change? Her husband dominated her life and controlled her actions; he did "impose a private will upon a fellow creature." She calls this a crime, even if well-intentioned. Is it a crime?

Developing a Thesis through Critical Thinking

Arguing with Yourself

In our discussion of annotating, brainstorming, freewriting, listing, asking questions, and keeping a journal, the emphasis has been on responding freely rather than on responding in any systematic or disciplined way.

The almost random play of mind in brainstorming and the other activities is a kind of thinking, but the term critical thinking (which we addressed in Chapter 2) is reserved for the process of moving these ideas toward analytical writing. When we think critically, we scrutinize our own ideas—for example, by searching out our underlying assumptions or evaluating what we have recorded as evidence. We have seen examples of this sort of analysis of one's own thinking in the journal entries in which a student wrote that literature should probably deal with "typical" people and then wondered if "typical" and "plausible" were the same, and then added "probably not."

Speaking broadly, critical thinking is rational, logical thinking. In thinking critically, writers

- scrutinize their assumptions;
- define their terms;
- test the evidence that they have collected and even look for counterevidence; and
- revise their thesis when necessary, in order to make the argument as complete and convincing as possible.

Let's start with assumptions. If I say that a story is weak because it is improbable, I ought to think about my assumption that improbability is a flaw I can begin by asking myself if all good stories—or all the stories that I value highly—are probable. I may recall that among my favorites is Alice's Adventures in Wonderland (or Gulliver's Travels or Animal Farm)—so I probably have to withdraw my assumption that improbability in itself makes a story less than good. I may go on to refine the idea and decide that improbability is not a fault in satiric stories but is a fault in other kinds of stories, which is not the same as saying bluntly that improbability is a fault.

The second aspect of critical thinking, definition, does not refer chiefly to defining technical terms, such as "meter," for readers who may be unfamiliar with the language of literary criticism; rather, here we are speaking about the need to define controversial terms. For instance, if you are arguing that a particular story is sentimental, you will have to define what you mean by "sentimental" because the word has several meanings.

The third aspect of critical thinking that we have isolated—testing the evidence and searching for counterevidence within the work—involves rereading the work to see whether we have overlooked material or taken a detail out of context. If, for instance, we say that in "The Story of an Hour" Josephine is a busybody, we should reexamine the work to make sure that she is, indeed, meddling needlessly and not offering welcome or necessary assistance. Perhaps the original observation will stand up, but perhaps on rereading the story we may feel, as we examine each of Josephine's actions, that she cannot reasonably be characterized as a busybody.

Different readers may come to different conclusions; the important thing is that all readers subject their initial responses to critical thinking, testing their responses against all of the evidence. Remember, your instructor expects you to hand in an essay that is essentially an argument, a paper that advances a thesis of your own, and therefore you will want to revise your thinking if you find counterevidence. Your thesis might be that

- the story is improbable, or
- the story is typical of Chopin, or
- the story is antiwoman, or
- the story is a remarkable anticipation of contemporary feminist thinking.

Whatever your thesis will be, it should be able to withstand scrutiny: That is what a good argument does. You may not convince every reader that you are unquestionably right, but you should make every reader feel that your argument is thoughtful. If you read your notes and then your drafts critically, you will probably write a paper that meets this standard.

Your first reading of the literary work probably won't be a critical reading. It is entirely appropriate to begin by reading simply for enjoyment. After all, we read literature (or listen to music, or go to an art museum, or watch dancers) to derive pleasure. However, in this course, you are trying to deepen your understanding of literature, so you are studying literature. On subsequent readings, therefore, you will read the work critically, carefully noting the writer's view of human nature and the writer's ways of achieving certain effects.

Arguing a Thesis

If you think critically about your early jottings and about the literary work itself, you will probably find that some of your jottings lead to dead ends but that others will lead to further ideas that hold up under scrutiny. What the thesis of your essay will be—the idea that you will assert and argue (support with evidence)—is still unclear, but you know that a good essay will need a thesis, or a claim that makes an argument. You ought to be able to state your point in a thesis sentence.

Consider the following candidates for a thesis sentence:

1. Mrs. Mallard dies soon after hearing that her husband has died.

True, but this is not a point that can be argued or even developed. About the most an essayist can do with this sentence is to amplify it by summarizing the plot of the story, a task not worth doing unless the plot is unusually obscure. An essay may include a sentence or two of summary to give readers their bearings, but a summary is not an essay.

2. The story is a libel on women.

Unlike the first statement, this one can be developed into an argument. Probably the writer will try to demonstrate that Mrs. Mallard's behavior is despicable. Whether this point can be argued convincingly is another matter; the thesis may be untenable, but it is a thesis. A second problem, however, is this: Even if the writer demonstrates that Mrs. Mallard's behavior is despicable, he or she will have to go on to demonstrate that the presentation of one despicable woman constitutes a libel on women in general. That's a pretty big order.

3. The story is clever but superficial because it is based on an unreal character.

Here, too, is a thesis—a point of view that can be argued. Whether this thesis is true is another matter. The writer's job will be to support it by presenting evidence. Probably the writer will have no difficulty in finding evidence that the story is "clever"; the difficulty will be in establishing a case that the characterization of Mrs. Mallard is "unreal." The writer will have to set forth some ideas about what makes a character real and then show that Mrs. Mallard is an unreal (unbelievable) figure.

4. The irony of the ending is believable partly because it is consistent with earlier ironies in the story.

The student who wrote the essay that appears on pages 73–75 began by drafting an essay based on the third of these thesis topics, but as she worked on a draft, she found that she could not support her assertion that the character was unconvincing. In fact, she came to believe that, although Mrs. Mallard's joy was the reverse of what a reader might expect, several early reversals in the story helped to make Mrs. Mallard's shift from grief to joy understandable.

✔ CHECKLIST: The Thesis Sentence

- ☐ Does the thesis sentence make a claim rather than merely offer a description?
- ☐ Is the claim arguable rather than self-evident, universally accepted, or of little interest?
- ☐ Does the thesis emphasize conceptual thinking? Does it focus on an important concept that can be developed? Does the thesis avoid an information-based statement, such as plot summary?
- ☐ Can evidence be produced to support the claim?
- ☐ Is the claim narrow enough to be supported convincingly in a paper written within the allotted time and at the assigned length?

From Reading to Writing to Revising: Drafting an Argument in an Analytical Essay

After making notes about your reading and then adding more notes stimulated by your rereading and further thinking, you should be able to formulate a tentative thesis. At this point, most writers review their preliminary notes and jot down brief statements of what they think their key points may be. These notes may include quotations of key phrases that the writer thinks will support the thesis.

Having reached this stage in considering irony in "The Story of an Hour," one student made the following notes:

title? Ironies in an Hour (?) An Hour of Irony (?) Kate Chopin's Irony (?) thesis: irony at end is prepared for by earlier ironies chief irony: Mrs. M. dies just as she is beginning to enjoy life smaller ironies:? 1. "sad message" brings her joy
2. Richards is "too late" at end
3. Richards is too early at start

These notes are, in effect, a very brief outline. Some writers at this point like to develop a fuller outline, but most writers begin with only a brief outline, knowing that, in the process of developing a draft from their notes, additional ideas will arise. For these writers, the time to make a detailed outline is after they have written a first or second draft. The outline of the written draft will then help them to make sure that their draft has an adequate organization and that main points are developed.

Student Analytical Essay: "Ironies in an Hour" (Preliminary Draft)

Now for the student's draft—not the first version, but a revised draft with some irrelevancies of the first draft omitted and some evidence added.

The numbers in parentheses refer to the page numbers from which the quotations are drawn, though with so short a work as "The Story of an Hour," page numbers are limited. (Detailed information about how to document a paper appears in Appendix B.)

Bridas 1

Jennifer Bridas

Professor Lester

English 1102

22 February 2016

Ironies in an Hour

After we know how the story turns out, if we reread it we find irony at the very start, as is true of many other stories. Mrs. Mallard's friends assume, mistakenly, that Mrs. Mallard was deeply in love with her husband, Brently

Mallard. They take great care to tell her gently of his death. The friends mean well, and in fact they do well. They bring her an hour of life, an hour of freedom. They think their news is sad. Mrs. Mallard at first expresses grief when she hears the news, but soon she finds joy in it. So Richards's "sad message" (57), though sad in Richards's eyes, is in fact a happy message.

Among the ironic details is the statement that when Mallard entered the house, Richards tried to conceal him from Mrs. Mallard, but "Richards was too late" (58). This is ironic because earlier Richards "hastened" (57) to bring his sad message; if he had at the start been "too late" (58), Brently Mallard would have arrived at home first, and Mrs. Mallard's life would not have ended an hour later but would simply have gone on as it had before. Yet another irony at the end of the story is the diagnosis of the doctors. The doctors say she died of "heart disease—of joy that kills" (58). In one sense the doctors are right: Mrs. Mallard has experienced a great joy. But of course the doctors totally misunderstand the joy that kills her.

The central irony resides not in the well-intentioned but ironic actions of Richards, or in the unconsciously ironic words of the doctors, but in her own life. In a way she has been dead. She "sometimes" (58) loved her husband, but in a way she has been dead. Now, his apparent death brings her new life. This new life comes to her at the season of the year when "the tops of trees . . . were all aquiver with the new spring life" (57). But, ironically, her new life will last only an hour. She looks forward to "summer days" (58) but she will not see even the end of this spring day. Her years of marriage were ironic. They brought her a sort of living death instead of joy. Her new life is ironic too. It grows out of her moment of grief for her supposedly dead husband, and her vision of a new life is cut short.

[New page]

Bridas 3

Work Cited

Chopin, Kate. "The Story of an Hour." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 65-66. Print.

Revising an Argument

Jennifer Bridas's draft, although thoughtful and clear, is not yet a finished essay. First, the draft needs a good introductory paragraph that will let the audience—the readers—know where the writer will be taking them. Doubtless you know from your own experience that readers can follow an argument more easily—and with more pleasure—if early in the discussion the writer tells them what the argument is. (The title, too, can strongly suggest the thesis.) Second, some of the paragraphs could be more effective.

In revising paragraphs—or an entire draft—writers unify, organize, clarify, and polish.

1. Unity is achieved partly by eliminating irrelevancies. Notice that, in the final version of the essay, which begins on page 78, the writer has deleted "as is true of many other stories."
2. Organization is largely a matter of arranging material in a sequence that will assist the reader to grasp the point.
3. Clarity is achieved largely by providing concrete details and quotations—evidence—to support generalizations and by providing helpful transitions ("for instance," "furthermore," "on the other hand," "however").
4. Polishing involves making small-scale revisions, such as deleting unnecessary repetitions. In the second paragraph of the draft, the phrase "the doctors" appears four times, but it appears only three times in the final version of the paragraph. Similarly, in polishing, a writer may combine choppy sentences into longer ones and break overly long sentences into shorter ones.

Later, after producing a draft that seems close to a finished essay, writers engage in yet another activity:

5. Editing includes checking the accuracy of quotations by comparing them with the original, consulting a dictionary for the spelling of doubtful words, and checking a handbook for appropriate punctuation.

Outlining an Argument

Whether or not you draw up an outline before writing a draft, you will be better able to improve your draft if you prepare an outline of what you have written. This revision strategy of pulling an outline out of an essay that has already been written in order to check its ideas, organization, and argument, is often termed "reverse outlining." For each paragraph in your draft, write down the main point of the topic sentence or topic idea. Under each of these sentences, indented, add key words for the idea(s) developed in the paragraph. Thus, in an outline for the first two paragraphs of the draft that we have just looked at, you might make the following jottings:

story ironic from start friends think news is sad
Ms. M. finds joy
some ironic details
Richards hastened, but "too late" doctors right and also wrong

An outline of what you have written will help you to see whether your draft is adequate in three important ways. The outline will show you

1. the sequence of major topics,
2. the degree of development of these topics, and
3. the argument, the thesis.

When you are studying your outline, you may realize that your first major point (probably after an introductory paragraph) would be more effective as your third point and that your second point needs to be further developed.

An outline of this sort is a short version of your draft, perhaps even containing phrases from the draft. Another sort of outline indicates not what each paragraph says but what each paragraph does. Such an outline of the three-paragraph draft of the essay on "The Story of an Hour" might look like this:

1. The actions of the friends are ironic.
2. Gives some specific (minor) details about ironies.
3. Explains "central irony."

We ought to see a red flag here. The aim of this sort of outline is to indicate what each paragraph does, but the jotting for the first paragraph only summarizes its content. Why? Because the paragraph doesn't do anything. It doesn't clearly introduce a thesis, or define a crucial term, or set the story in the context of Chopin's other work.

An outline indicating the function of each paragraph will force you to see whether your essay has an effective structure. We will see that this student later wrote a new opening paragraph for her essay on "The Story of an Hour."

Soliciting Peer Review, Thinking about Counterarguments

You may be asked to get a review from your peers. Such a procedure is helpful in several ways. First, it gives you a real audience-readers who can point to what pleases or puzzles them, who make suggestions, who may often disagree with you or with each other, and who frequently misread. Though writers don't always like what they hear about their work, reading and discussing their work with others almost always gives them a fresh perspective on their work, and a fresh perspective can stimulate thoughtful revision.

Your reviewers may suggest that you have overlooked evidence that works against your interpretation. Obviously, you will have to either revise your interpretation or show that, in fact, the supposed counterevidence really does not weaken your interpretation.

The writer whose work is being reviewed is not the sole beneficiary of a review. When students serve as readers for each other, they become better readers of their own work and consequently better revisers. As we said in Chapter 2, learning to write is, in large measure, learning to read.

If peer review is a part of the writing process in your course, the instructor may distribute a sheet of questions and suggestions. Here is an example of such a sheet.

QUESTIONS FOR PEER REVIEW ENGLISH 125A

Read each draft once, quickly. Then read it again, with the following questions in mind.

1. What is the essay's topic? Is it one of the assigned topics or a variation from it? Does the draft show promise of fulfilling the assignment?
2. Looking at the essay as a whole, what thesis (main idea) is stated or implied? If the thesis is implied, state it in your own words.
3. Is the thesis plausible? How might the argument be strengthened?
4. Looking at each paragraph separately, answer the following questions:
   a. What is the basic point? (If it isn't clear to you, ask for clarification.)
   b. How does the paragraph relate to the essay's main idea or to the previous paragraph?
   c. Should some paragraphs be deleted? Should they be divided into two or more paragraphs? Should they be combined? Should they be put elsewhere? (If you outline the essay by jotting down the main point of each paragraph, it will help you to answer these questions.)
   d. Is each sentence clearly related to the sentence that precedes it and to the sentence that follows it?
   e. Is each paragraph adequately developed?
   f. Are there sufficient details—perhaps brief, supporting quotations from the text?
5. What are the paper's chief strengths?
6. Make at least two specific suggestions that you think will assist the author to improve the paper.

From Reading to Writing to Revising: Finalizing an Analytical Essay

Student Analytical Essay: "Ironies of Life in Kate Chopin's 'The Story of an Hour'" (Final Draft)

Here is the final version of Jennifer Bridas's essay. The essay submitted to the instructor was entirely retyped; but here, so that you can easily see how the draft was revised, we show the draft version with the final changes written in by hand.

Jennifer Bridas
Professor Lester
English 1102
4 February 2016

Ironies of Life in Kate Chopin's "The Story of an Hour"
~~Ironies in an Hour~~

Despite its title, Kate Chopin's "The Story of an Hour" ironically takes only a few minutes to read. In addition, the story turns out to have an ironic ending, but on rereading it one sees that the irony is not concentrated only in the outcome of the plot—Mrs. Mallard dies just when she is beginning to live—but is also present in many details.

After we know how the story turns out, if we reread it we find irony at the very start. ~~as is true of many other stories.~~ Because Mrs. Mallard's friends and her sister assume, mistakenly, that ~~Mrs. Mallard~~ she was deeply in love with her husband, Brently Mallard. They take great care to tell her gently of his death. ~~The friends~~ They mean well, and in fact they do well. ~~They~~ bring her an hour of joyous ing freedom. They think their news is sad. Mrs. Mallard at first expresses grief when she hears the news, but soon she finds joy in it. So Richards's "sad message" (57), though sad in Richards's eyes, is in fact a happy message. but it is ironic that ≠ True, (unknown to her friends)

Among the ironic details is the statement small but significant that when Mallard entered the house, Richards tried to conceal him from Mrs. Mallard, but "Richards was too late" (58). This is ironic because near the end of the story ~~earlier~~ Richards "hastened" (57) to bring his sad message; if he had at the start been "too late" (58), Brently Mallard would have arrived at home first, and Mrs. Mallard's life would not have ended an hour later but would simply have gone on as it had before. Yet another irony at the end of the story is the diagnosis of the doctors. The doctors say she died of "heart disease—of joy that kills" (58). In one sense ~~the doctors~~ almost at the start of the story, in the second paragraph, they are right: Mrs. Mallard for the last hour experienced a great joy. But of course the doctors totally misunderstand the joy that kills her. It is not joy at seeing her husband alive, but her realization that the great joy she experienced during the last hour is over.

Bridas 2

All of these ironic details add richness to the story, but The central irony resides not in the well-intentioned but ironic actions of Richards, or in the unconsciously ironic words of the doctors, but in ~~her~~ Mrs. Mallard's own life. ~~In a way she has been dead.~~ She "sometimes" (58) loved her husband, but in a way she has been ~~dead.~~ a body subjected to her husband's will Now, his apparent death brings her new life. Appropriately This new life comes to her at the season of the year when "the tops of trees . . . were all aquiver with the new spring life" (57). But, ironically, her new life will last only an hour. She is "free, free, free"—but only until her husband walks through the doorway. She looks forward to "summer days" (58) but she will not see even the end of this spring day. ~~Her~~ If years of marriage were ironic*,* bringing ~~They brought~~ her a sort of living death instead of joy*,* ~~.~~ Her new life is ironic too*,* ~~.~~ not only because It grows out of her moment of grief for her supposedly dead husband, but also because her vision of "a long progression of years" ~~and her vision of a new life~~ is cut short within an hour on a spring day.

[New page]

Bridas 3

Work Cited

Chopin, Kate. "The Story of an Hour." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 65-66. Print.

The Analytical Essay: The Final Draft Analyzed

As a review, let's look at several principles illustrated by Jennifer Bridas's essay.

- The title of the essay is not merely the title of the work discussed; it should give the reader a clue about the essayist's topic. Because the title will create that crucial first impression, make sure that it is interesting.
- The opening or introductory paragraph does not begin with the obvious, "In this story…" Rather, by naming the author and the title, it lets the reader know what story is being discussed. It also indicates the writer's thesis so that readers will know where they are going.
- The organization is effective. The smaller ironies are discussed in the second and third paragraphs, and the central irony is discussed in the last paragraph. The essay does not dwindle or become anticlimactic; the argument builds from the least important to the most important point. Again, if you outline your draft, you will see whether it has an effective organization.
- Brief quotations are used, both to provide evidence and to let the reader hear—if only fleetingly—Kate Chopin's writing voice.
- The essay is chiefly devoted to analysis (how the parts relate to each other), not to a summary (a restatement of what happened). The writer, properly assuming that the reader has read the work, does not tell the plot in detail. But, aware that the reader has not memorized the story, the writer gives helpful reminders.
- The present tense is used in narrating the action: "Mrs. Mallard dies"; "Mrs. Mallard's friends and relatives all assume."
- Although a concluding paragraph is often useful, when it does more than merely summarize, it is not essential in a short analysis. In this essay, the last sentence explains the chief irony and therefore makes an acceptable ending.
- Documentation follows the form set forth in Appendix B.
- If the author has proofread the final version of the paper carefully, it will contain no typographical errors.

From Reading to Writing to Revising: Drafting an Analytical Essay

Kate Chopin

Désirée's Baby

As the day was pleasant, Madame Valmondé drove over to L'Abri to see Désirée and the baby.

It made her laugh to think of Désirée with a baby. Why, it seemed but yesterday that Désirée was little more than a baby herself; when Monsieur in riding through the gateway of Valmondé had found her lying asleep in the shadow of the big stone pillar.

The little one awoke in his arms and began to cry for "Dada." That was as much as she could do or say. Some people thought she might have strayed there of her own accord, for she was of the toddling age. The prevailing belief was that she had been purposely left by a party of Texans, whose canvas-covered wagon, late in the day, had crossed the ferry that Coton Maïs kept, just below the plantation. In time Madame Valmondé abandoned every speculation but the one that Désirée had been sent to her by a beneficent Providence to be the child of her affection, seeing that she was without child of the flesh. For the girl grew to be beautiful and gentle, affectionate and sincere,—the idol of Valmondé.

It was no wonder, when she stood one day against the stone pillar in whose shadow she had lain asleep, eighteen years before, that Armand Aubigny riding by and seeing her there, had fallen in love with her. That was the way all the Aubignys fell in love, as if struck by a pistol shot. The wonder was that he had not loved her before; for he had known her since his father brought him home from Paris, a boy of eight, after his mother died there. The passion that awoke in him that day, when he saw her at the gate, swept along like an avalanche, or like a prairie fire, or like anything that drives headlong over all obstacles.

Monsieur Valmondé grew practical and wanted things well considered: that is, the girl's obscure origin. Armand looked into her eyes and did not care. He was reminded that she was nameless. What did it matter about a name when he could give her one of the oldest and proudest in Louisiana? He ordered the corbeille[1] from Paris, and contained himself with what patience he could until it arrived, then they were married.

Madame Valmondé had not seen Désirée and the baby for four weeks. When she reached L'Abri she shuddered at the first sight of it, as she always did. It was a sad looking place, which for many years had not known the gentle presence of a mistress, old Monsieur Aubigny having married and buried his wife in France, and she having loved her own land too well ever to leave it. The roof came down steep and black like a cowl, reaching out beyond the wide galleries that encircled the yellow stuccoed house. Big, solemn oaks grew close to it, and their thick-leaved, far-reaching branches shadowed it like a pall. Young Aubigny's rule was a strict one, too, and under it his negroes had forgotten how to be gay, as they had been during the old master's easy-going and indulgent lifetime.

The young mother was recovering slowly, and lay full length, in her soft white muslins and laces, upon a couch. The baby was beside her, upon her arm, where he had fallen asleep, at her breast. The yellow nurse woman sat beside a window fanning herself.

Madame Valmondé bent her portly figure over Désirée and kissed her, holding her an instant tenderly in her arms. Then she turned to the child.

"This is not the baby!" she exclaimed, in startled tones. French was the language spoken at Valmondé in those days.

"I knew you would be astonished," laughed Désirée, "at the way he has grown. The little cochon de lait![2] Look at his legs, mamma, and his hands and fingernails,—real fingernails. Zandrine had to cut them this morning. Isn't it true, Zandrine?"

The woman bowed her turbaned head majestically, "Mais si,[3] Madame."

"And the way he cries," went on Désirée, "is deafening. Armand heard him the other day as far away as La Blanche's cabin."

Madame Valmondé had never removed her eyes from the child. She lifted it and walked with it over to the window that was lightest. She scanned the baby narrowly, then looked as searchingly at Zandrine, whose face was turned to gaze across the fields.

[1]corbeille wedding gifts from the groom to the bride.
[2]cochon de lait suckling pig (French).
[3]Mais si certainly (French).

"Yes, the child has grown, has changed," said Madame Valmondé, slowly, as she replaced it beside its mother. "What does Armand say?"

15 Désirée's face became suffused with a glow that was happiness itself.

"Oh, Armand is the proudest father in the parish, I believe, chiefly because it is a boy, to bear his name; though he says not—that he would have loved a girl as well. But I know it isn't true. I know he says that to please me. And mamma," she added, drawing Madame Valmondé's head down to her, and speaking in a whisper, "he hasn't punished one of them—not one of them—since baby is born. Even Négrillon, who pretended to have burnt his leg that he might rest from work—he only laughed, and said Négrillon was a great scamp. Oh, mamma, I'm so happy; it frightens me."

What Désirée said was true. Marriage, and later the birth of his son had softened Armand Aubigny's imperious and exacting nature greatly. This was what made the gentle Désirée so happy, for she loved him desperately. When he frowned she trembled, but loved him. When he smiled, she asked no greater blessing of God. But Armand's dark, handsome face had not often been disfigured by frowns since the day he fell in love with her.

When the baby was about three months old, Désirée awoke one day to the conviction that there was something in the air menacing her peace. It was at first too subtle to grasp. It had only been a disquieting suggestion; an air of mystery among the blacks; unexpected visits from far-off neighbors who could hardly account for their coming. Then a strange, an awful change in her husband's manner, which she dared not ask him to explain. When he spoke to her, it was with averted eyes, from which the old love-light seemed to have gone out. He absented himself from home; and when there, avoided her presence and that of her child, without excuse. And the very spirit of Satan seemed suddenly to take hold of him in his dealings with the slaves. Désirée was miserable enough to die.

She sat in her room, one hot afternoon, in her peignoir, listlessly drawing through her fingers the strands of her long, silky brown hair that hung about her shoulders. The baby, half naked, lay asleep upon her own great mahogany bed, that was like a sumptuous throne, with its satin-lined half-canopy. One of La Blanche's little quadroon boys—half naked too—stood fanning the child slowly with a fan of peacock feathers. Désirée's eyes had been fixed absently and sadly upon the baby, while she was striving to penetrate the threatening mist that she felt closing about her. She looked from her child to the boy who stood beside him, and back again; over and over. "Ah!" It was a cry that she could not help; which she was not conscious of having uttered. The blood turned like ice in her veins, and a clammy moisture gathered upon her face.

20 She tried to speak to the little quadroon boy; but no sound would come, at first. When he heard his name uttered, he looked up, and his mistress was pointing to the door. He laid aside the great, soft fan, and obediently stole away, over the polished floor, on his bare tiptoes.

She stayed motionless, with gaze riveted upon her child, and her face the picture of fright.

Presently her husband entered the room, and without noticing her, went to a table and began to search among some papers which covered it.

"Armand," she called to him, in a voice which must have stabbed him, if he was human. But he did not notice. "Armand," she said again. Then she rose and tottered towards him. "Armand," she panted once more, clutching his arm, "look at our child. What does it mean? tell me."

He coldly but gently loosened her fingers from about his arm and thrust the hand away from him. "Tell me what it means!" she cried despairingly.

"It means," he answered lightly, "that the child is not white; it means that you are not white."

A quick conception of all that this accusation meant for her nerved her with unwonted courage to deny it. "It is a lie; it is not true, I am white! Look at my hair, it is brown; and my eyes are gray, Armand, you know they are gray. And my skin is fair," seizing his wrist. "Look at my hand; whiter than yours, Armand," she laughed hysterically.

"As white as La Blanche's," he returned cruelly; and went away leaving her alone with their child.

When she could hold a pen in her hand, she sent a despairing letter to Madame Valmondé.

"My mother, they tell me I am not white. Armand has told me I am not white. For God's sake tell them it is not true. You must know it is not true. I shall die. I must die. I cannot be so unhappy, and live."

The answer that came was as brief:

"My own Désirée: Come home to Valmondé; back to your mother who loves you. Come with your child."

When the letter reached Désirée she went with it to her husband's study, and laid it open upon the desk before which he sat. She was like a stone image: silent, white, motionless after she placed it there.

In silence he ran his cold eyes over the written words. He said nothing. "Shall I go, Armand?" she asked in tones sharp with agonized suspense.

"Yes, go."

"Do you want me to go?"

"Yes, I want you to go."

He thought Almighty God had dealt cruelly and unjustly with him; and felt, somehow, that he was paying Him back in kind when he stabbed thus into his wife's soul. Moreover he no longer loved her, because of the unconscious injury she had brought upon his home and his name.

She turned away like one stunned by a blow, and walked slowly towards the door, hoping he would call her back.

"Good-by, Armand," she moaned.

He did not answer her. That was his last blow at fate.

Désirée went in search of her child. Zandrine was pacing the sombre gallery with it. She took the little one from the nurse's arms with no word of explanation, and descending the steps, walked away, under the live-oak branches.

It was an October afternoon; the sun was just sinking. Out in the still fields the negroes were picking cotton.

Désirée had not changed the thin white garment nor the slippers which she wore. Her hair was uncovered and the sun's rays brought a golden gleam from its brown meshes. She did not take the broad, beaten road which led to the far-off plantation of Valmondé. She walked across a deserted field, where the stubble bruised her tender feet, so delicately shod, and tore her thin gown to shreds.

She disappeared among the reeds and willows that grew thick along the banks of the deep, sluggish bayou; and she did not come back again.

Some weeks later there was a curious scene enacted at L'Abri. In the centre of the smoothly swept back yard was a great bonfire. Armand Aubigny sat in the wide hallway that commanded a view of the spectacle; and it was he who dealt out to a half dozen negroes the material which kept this fire ablaze.

A graceful cradle of willow, with all its dainty furbishings, was laid upon the pyre, which had already been fed with the richness of a priceless layette. Then there were silk gowns, and velvet and satin ones added to these; laces, too, and embroideries; bonnets and gloves; for the corbeille had been of rare quality.

The last thing to go was a tiny bundle of letters; innocent little scribblings that Désirée had sent to him during the days of their espousal. There was the remnant of one back in the drawer from which he took them. But it was not Désirée's; it was part of an old letter from his mother to his father. He read it. She was thanking God for the blessing of her husband's love:—

"But, above all," she wrote, "night and day, I thank the good God for having so arranged our lives that our dear Armand will never know that his mother, who adores him, belongs to the race that is cursed with the brand of slavery."

[1892]

Student Analytical Essay: "Race and Identity in 'Désirée's Baby'"

Let's examine a student essay that analyzes "Désirée's Baby." The essay features a strong argument and an interesting uses of quotations. After the essay, we ask several questions that encourage you to evaluate the writing strategies used.

Gus Hodges

Professor Durocher

English 125, section B

16 January 2016

Race and Identity in "Désirée's Baby"

"Désirée's Baby," says the literary scholar Emily Toth, is "a shocking story" that deals with the death of "a beautiful young woman"—the subject that, she notes, Edgar Allan Poe identified as "the perfect subject for poetry" (145). But in my view this story is shocking because it connects sexuality and race. It is not just that Désirée suffers a cruel fate, but that she does so because of her race, or, rather, the race that her husband Armand believes she belongs to. The tragic revelation is that Armand, not Désirée, is the person of mixed blood and thus is the cause or source of the mixed blood of their child.

In a key passage midway through the story, Chopin brings the Désirée/Armand relationship into focus:

> When the baby was about three months old, Désirée awoke one day to the conviction that there was something in the air menacing her peace.

Hodges 2

> It was at first too subtle to grasp. It had only been a disquieting suggestion; an air of mystery among the blacks; unexpected visits from far-off neighbors who could hardly account for their coming. Then a strange, an awful change in her husband's manner, which she dared not ask him to explain. When he spoke to her, it was with averted eyes, from which the old love-light seemed to have gone out. He absented himself from home; and when there, avoided her presence and that of her child, without excuse. And the very spirit of Satan seemed suddenly to take hold of him in his dealings with the slaves. Désirée was miserable enough to die. (82)

Chopin relates the action from Désirée's point of view—what she is seeing, thinking, feeling, fearing, as she and her husband grow estranged. But, at the same time, Chopin makes the reader aware of Armand. She prompts us to imagine, for ourselves, what might be leading him to shun his wife and child and, furthermore, what might account for his Satan-like treatment of his slaves.

This is a powerful insight on Chopin's part. As the story unfolds, it becomes clear that Armand has turned against Désirée because, to his horror and disgust, he has discovered that she possesses black—that is, "not white"—blood (83). To him, his family has been made impure, contaminated. He feels betrayed, and he takes out his wrath on his wife and child: he cannot bear to be in their presence. In addition, he unleashes his wrath on his slaves; they become the objects of his fury about his family, which is not what he thought it was.

Chopin is showing the tyranny of male authority and power, but, again, she is relating it to race. Armand becomes abusive—psychologically, emotionally, and physically violent—as a result of his reaction to the presence of blackness in his domestic life. This is intolerable to him, and he drives Désirée and the baby away, as if their disappearance could cancel out all memories of them.

The conclusion of the story is shocking: Armand learns that his child is "not white" (83) not because of Désirée but because of himself. It was his mother who was "cursed with the brand of slavery" (84) and she and her husband (Armand's father) sought to conceal this fact from him. Armand comes to despise his wife and child when he learns—or so it seems—that Désirée is black: this is the explanation that he gives to himself and to Désirée. He loathes himself for making such a marriage in the first place.

I am not sure I can prove this, but I have the feeling that Chopin wants us to perceive an ambiguity in the ending of her story. The meaning on the surface is that when Armand reads his mother's letter, he suddenly realizes what he had never known. But there may be a deeper meaning. Possibly it is the case that now Armand is finding confirmation from his mother of an identity—who he is—that he has known was, or could be, true. Driving away Désirée is, in truth, a desperate effort to cast out the self that is "not white" (84).

The more we delve into "Désirée's Baby," the more it becomes Armand's story: to me, he is its central character. In this respect, it is noteworthy that when the story was first published in a magazine, it was titled "The Father of Désirée's Baby" (Knights xxv). I think that this title is better than the one that Chopin settled on, because it puts the focus on Armand. It could be that in the end he learns the truth about who he is. It also could be that in the end he is forced to see something he might have suspected all along—something he could not believe ever could be possible.

We thus find ourselves asking a two-part question about Armand: What does he know, and what might he not want to know? Could he really have been so blind as never to have imagined the possibility that he at last discovers at the end—that the "not white" (83) blood is his own? Perhaps. To me, however, it seems just as likely that he suspected this possibility but could not face it. We do not want to accept the truth about who we might be, about who we are.

[New page]

Hodges 4

Works Cited

Chopin, Kate. "Désirée's Baby." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 80-84. Print.

Toth, Emily. Unveiling Kate Chopin. Jackson: U of Mississippi, 1999. Print.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Has Gus Hodges chosen a good title for his paper? Why or why not?
2. Do you think it is good strategy to begin a paper with a quotation from a secondary source? Why or why not?
3. The student begins his closing paragraph with a question. Is this strategy effective? Why or why not?
4. Do you agree with this student's decision to center his paper on a single lengthy quote? Please explain your answer.
5. Let's now consider the paper as a whole. What is the writer's thesis? Does the writer provide evidence? Does he prove his thesis?
6. If you were to give the writer of this paper one piece of advice for improving his paper, what would it be?
7. Hodges makes an intriguing claim about Armand. Do you agree with him or not? Can you locate evidence in the text to support the student's feeling about what Armand has known, or might have known, all along?
8. Is the final paragraph effective? Why or why not?

From Reading to Writing to Revising: Drafting a Comparison Essay

Kate Chopin

The Storm

I

The leaves were so still that even Bibi thought it was going to rain. Bobinôt, who was accustomed to converse on terms of perfect equality with his little son, called the child's attention to certain sombre clouds that were rolling with sinister intention from the west, accompanied by a sullen, threatening roar. They were at Friedheimer's store and decided to remain there till the storm had passed. They sat within the door on two empty kegs. Bibi was four years old and looked very wise.

"Mama'll be 'fraid, yes," he suggested with blinking eyes.

"She'll shut the house. Maybe she got Sylvie helpin' her this evenin'," Bobinôt responded reassuringly.

"No; she ent got Sylvie. Sylvie was helpin' her yistiday," piped Bibi.

Bobinôt arose and going across to the counter purchased a can of shrimps, of which Calixta was very fond. Then he returned to his perch on the keg and sat stolidly holding the can of shrimps while the storm burst. It shook the wooden store and seemed to be ripping great furrows in the distant field. Bibi laid his little hand on his father's knee and was not afraid.

II

Calixta, at home, felt no uneasiness for their safety. She sat at a side window sewing furiously on a sewing machine. She was greatly occupied and did not notice the approaching storm. But she felt very warm and often stopped to mop her face on which the perspiration gathered in beads. She unfastened her white sacque at the throat. It began to grow dark, and suddenly realizing the situation she got up hurriedly and went about closing windows and doors.

Out on the small front gallery[1] she had hung Bobinôt's Sunday clothes to air and she hastened out to gather them before the rain fell. As she stepped outside, Alcée Laballière rode in at the gate. She had not seen him very often since her marriage, and never alone. She stood there with Bobinôt's coat in her hands, and the big rain drops began to fall. Alcée rode his horse under the shelter of a side projection where the chickens had huddled and there were plows and a harrow piled up in the corner.

"May I come and wait on your gallery till the storm is over, Calixta?" he asked.

"Come 'long in, M'sieur Alcée."

His voice and her own startled her as if from a trance, and she seized Bobinôt's vest. Alcée, mounting to the porch, grabbed the trousers and snatched Bibi's braided jacket that was about to be carried away by a sudden gust of wind. He expressed an intention to remain outside, but it was soon apparent that he might as well have been out in the open: the water beat in upon the boards in driving sheets, and he went inside, closing the door after him. It was even necessary to put something beneath the door to keep the water out.

"My! what a rain! It's good two years sence it rain' like that," exclaimed Calixta as she rolled up a piece of bagging and Alcée helped her to thrust it beneath the crack.

She was a little fuller of figure than five years before when she married; but she had lost nothing of her vivacity. Her blue eyes still retained their melting quality; and her yellow hair, dishevelled by the wind and rain, kinked more stubbornly than ever about her ears and temples.

The rain beat upon the low, shingled roof with a force and clatter that threatened to break an entrance and deluge them there. They were in the dining room—the sitting room—the general utility room. Adjoining was her bed room, with Bibi's couch along side her own. The door stood open, and the room with its white, monumental bed, its closed shutters, looked dim and mysterious.

[1]gallery porch, or passageway along a wall, open to the air but protected by a roof supported by columns.

Alcée flung himself into a rocker and Calixta nervously began to gather up from the floor the lengths of a cotton sheet which she had been sewing.

"If this keeps up, Dieu sait[2] if the levees goin' to stan' it!" she exclaimed.

"What have you got to do with the levees?"

"I got enough to do! An' there's Bobinôt with Bibi out in that storm—if he only didn' left Friedheimer's!"

"Let us hope, Calixta, that Bobinôt's got sense enough to come in out of a cyclone."

She went and stood at the window with a greatly disturbed look on her face. She wiped the frame that was clouded with moisture. It was stiflingly hot. Alcée got up and joined her at the window, looking over her shoulder. The rain was coming down in sheets obscuring the view of far-off cabins and enveloping the distant wood in a gray mist. The playing of the lightning was incessant. A bolt struck a tall chinaberry tree at the edge of the field. It filled all visible space with a blinding glare and the crash seemed to invade the very boards they stood upon.

Calixta put her hands to her eyes, and with a cry, staggered backward. Alcée's arm encircled her, and for an instant he drew her close and spasmodically to him.

"Bonté!"[3] she cried, releasing herself from his encircling arm and retreating from the window, "the house'll go next! If I only knew w'ere Bibi was!" She would not compose herself; she would not be seated. Alcée clasped her shoulders and looked into her face. The contact of her warm, palpitating body when he had unthinkingly drawn her into his arms, had aroused all the old-time infatuation and desire for her flesh.

"Calixta," he said, "don't be frightened. Nothing can happen. The house is too low to be struck, with so many tall trees standing about. There! aren't you going to be quiet? say, aren't you?" He pushed her hair back from her face that was warm and steaming. Her lips were as red and moist as pomegranate seed. Her white neck and a glimpse of her full, firm bosom disturbed him powerfully. As she glanced up at him the fear in her liquid blue eyes had given place to a drowsy gleam that unconsciously betrayed a sensuous desire. He looked down into her eyes and there was nothing for him to do but to gather her lips in a kiss. It reminded him of Assumption.[4]

"Do you remember—in Assumption, Calixta?" he asked in a low voice broken by passion. Oh! she remembered; for in Assumption he had kissed her and kissed and kissed her; until his senses would well nigh fail, and to save her he would resort to a desperate flight. If she was not an immaculate dove in those days, she was still inviolate; a passionate creature whose very defenselessness had made her defense, against which his honor forbade him to prevail. Now—well, now—her lips seemed in a manner free to be tasted, as well as her round, white throat and her whiter breasts.

They did not heed the crashing torrents, and the roar of the elements made her laugh as she lay in his arms. She was a revelation in that dim, mysterious chamber; as white as the couch she lay upon. Her firm, elastic flesh that was knowing for the first time its birthright, was like a creamy lily that the sun invites to contribute its breath and perfume to the undying life of the world.

The generous abundance of her passion, without guile or trickery, was like a white flame which penetrated and found response in depths of his own sensuous nature that had never yet been reached.

[2]Dieu sait God only knows.
[3]Bonté! Heavens!
[4]Assumption a parish (i.e., a county) in southeast Louisiana.

When he touched her breasts they gave themselves up in quivering ecstasy, inviting his lips. Her mouth was a fountain of delight. And when he possessed her, they seemed to swoon together at the very borderland of life's mystery.

He stayed cushioned upon her, breathless, dazed, enervated, with his heart beating like a hammer upon her. With one hand she clasped his head, her lips lightly touching his forehead. The other hand stroked with a soothing rhythm his muscular shoulders.

The growl of the thunder was distant and passing away. The rain beat softly upon the shingles, inviting them to drowsiness and sleep. But they dared not yield.

The rain was over; and the sun was turning the glistening green world into a place of gems. Calixta, on the gallery, watched Alcée ride away. He turned and smiled at her with a beaming face; and she lifted her pretty chin in the air and laughed aloud.

III

Bobinôt and Bibi, trudging home, stopped without at the cistern to make themselves presentable.

"My! Bibi, w'at will yo' mama say! You ought to be ashame'. You oughtn' put on those good pants. Look at 'em! An' that mud on yo' collar! How you got that mud on yo' collar, Bibi? I never saw such a boy!" Bibi was the picture of pathetic resignation. Bobinôt was the embodiment of serious solicitude as he strove to remove from his own person and his son's the signs of their tramp over heavy roads and through wet fields. He scraped the mud off Bibi's bare legs and feet with a stick and carefully removed all traces from his heavy brogans. Then, prepared for the worst—the meeting with an over-scrupulous housewife, they entered cautiously at the back door.

Calixta was preparing supper. She had set the table and was dripping coffee at the hearth. She sprang up as they came in.

"Oh, Bobinôt! You back! My! but I was uneasy. W'ere you been during the rain? An' Bibi? he ain't wet? he ain't hurt?" She had clasped Bibi and was kissing him effusively. Bobinôt's explanations and apologies which he had been composing all along the way, died on his lips as Calixta felt him to see if he were dry, and seemed to express nothing but satisfaction at their safe return.

"I brought you some shrimps, Calixta," offered Bobinôt, hauling the can from his ample side pocket and laying it on the table.

"Shrimps! Oh, Bobinôt! you too good fo' anything!" and she gave him a smacking kiss on the cheek that resounded. "J'vous reponds,[5] we'll have a feas' to night! umph-umph!"

Bobinôt and Bibi began to relax and enjoy themselves, and when the three seated themselves at table they laughed much and so loud that anyone might have heard them as far away as Laballière's.

IV

Alcée Laballière wrote to his wife, Clarisse, that night. It was a loving letter, full of tender solicitude. He told her not to hurry back, but if she and the babies liked it at Biloxi, to stay a month longer. He was getting on nicely; and though he missed them, he was willing to bear the separation a while longer—realizing that their health and pleasure were the first things to be considered.

[5]J'vous reponds Take my word; let me tell you.

V

As for Clarisse, she was charmed upon receiving her husband's letter. She and the babies were doing well. The society was agreeable; many of her old friends and acquaintances were at the bay. And the first free breath since her marriage seemed to restore the pleasant liberty of her maiden days. Devoted as she was to her husband, their intimate conjugal life was something which she was more than willing to forego for a while.

So the storm passed and everyone was happy.

[1898]

Student Work: Comparison Notes

A student in an "Introduction to Literature" class was asked to compare any two of three stories by Kate Chopin presented in this and the previous chapters ("Ripe Figs," page 25–26; "The Story of an Hour," page 65; and "The Storm," page 87). She settled on "The Story of an Hour" and "The Storm." We print the final version of her essay, preceded by a page of notes (a synthesis of earlier notes) that she prepared on her computer shortly before she wrote her first draft.

Resemblances or differences greater?
Resemblances
Theme: release from marital bonds; liberated women
Setting: nature plays a role in both springtime in "Hour," storm in "Storm"
Characterization: in both stories, no villains forces of nature compel Clarisse presumably happier without husband both seem to emphasize roles of women
Differences
Ending: "Hour" sad (LM unfulfilled); "Storm" happy all characters seem content
    But endings different in that "Hour" ends suddenly, surprise
    "Storm" not surprising at very end.
Overall view (theme?):
    "Hour" very restricted view; only one person is of much interest (LM); Josephine interesting only in terms of LM (contrast)
    In "Storm," Cal. and Alc. interesting; but also interesting are simple Bobinot and even the child, and also even Clarisse, who sort of has the last word Possible titles:
    Two Women
    New Women
    Tragic Louise, Comic Calixta
    Louise, Calixta, and Clarisse
    Tone as key difference? Tragic vs. comic

Student Comparison Essay: "Two New Women"

Let's turn to the essay generated from these notes. This paper takes the ideas that conclude the brainstorming notes, specifically those that emphasize tone, comedy, and tragedy, and uses them to create a thesis and to organize the paper. As you read the essay, consider how it makes clear comparisons between the two stories and uses those comparisons to provide organization.

Linda Hernandez

Professor Welsh

English 150

18 February 2016

Two New Women

It is not surprising that two stories by an author somewhat resemble each other. What is especially interesting about Kate Chopin's "The Story of an Hour" and "The Storm" is that although they both deal with women who achieve a sense of new life or growth outside the bonds of marriage, the stories differ greatly in what we call tone. "The Story of an Hour" is bittersweet, or perhaps even bitter and tragic, whereas "The Storm" is romantic and in some ways comic.

The chief similarity is that Louise Mallard in "The Story of an Hour" and Calixta in "The Storm" both experience valuable, affirming, liberating sensations that a traditional moral view would condemn. Mrs. Mallard, after some moments of deep grief, feels a great sense of liberation when she learns of the death of her husband. She dies almost immediately after this experience, but even though she is never physically unfaithful to her husband, there is a sort of mental disloyalty, at least from a traditional point of view. Calixta's disloyalty is physical, not merely mental. Unlike Louise Mallard, Calixta does go to bed with a man who is not her husband. But Calixta, as we will see, is treated just about as sympathetically as is Mrs. Mallard.

Louise Mallard is sympathetic because she does grieve for her husband, and because Chopin suggests that Mallard's sense of freedom is natural, something associated with the spring, the "delicious breath of rain," and "the tops of trees that were all aquiver with the new spring life" (57). Furthermore, Chopin explicitly says that Mallard loved her husband. But Chopin also tells us that one aspect of the marriage was a "powerful will bending her" (57). For all of these reasons, then—Mrs. Mallard's genuine grief, the association of her new feeling with the power of nature, and the assertion that Mrs. Mallard loved her husband but was at least in some degree subject to his will—the reader sympathizes with Mrs. Mallard.

In her presentation of Calixta, too, Chopin takes care to make the unfaithful woman a sympathetic figure. As in "The Story of an Hour," nature plays a role. Here, instead of nature or the outside world being a parallel to the woman's emotions, nature in the form of a storm exerts pressure on the woman. We are told that "the water beat in upon the boards in driving sheets" (82), and a bolt of lightning causes Calixta to stagger backward, into Alcée's arms. These forces of outside nature are parallel to a force of nature within Calixta. Chopin tells us that during the sexual union Calixta's "firm, elastic flesh . . . was knowing for the first time its birthright" (83). And in one additional way, too, Chopin guards against the reader's condemning Calixta. We learn, at the end of the story, that Alcée's wife, Clarisse, is quite pleased to be free from her husband for a while:

> And the first free breath since her marriage seemed to restore the pleasant liberty of her maiden days. Devoted as she was to her husband, their intimate conjugal life was something which she was more than willing to forego for a while. (84)

Since Clarisse is portrayed as somewhat pleased to be relieved of her husband for a while, we probably do not see Alcée as a villainous betrayer of his wife. The story seems to end pleasantly, like a comedy, with everybody happy.

In Louise Mallard and in Calixta we see two women who achieve new lives, although in the case of Louise Mallard the reader is surprised to learn in the last sentence that the achievement lasts only a few moments. By "new lives" I mean emancipation from their husbands, but what is especially interesting is that in both cases Chopin guides the reader to feel that although in fact both women behave in ways that would be strongly condemned by the codes of Chopin's day, and even by many people today, neither woman (as Chopin presents her) is blameworthy. Mrs. Mallard is presented almost as a tragic victim, and Calixta is presented almost as a figure in a very pleasant comedy.

Hernandez 3

[New page]

Hernandez 4

Works Cited

Chopin, Kate. "The Storm." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 87-91. Print.

—"The Story of an Hour." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 65-66. Print.

The Comparison Essay: Organization Analyzed

A few comments on this student's essay may help us to see how the student engaged in effective comparison.

- The title announces the topic.
- The first paragraph announces the thesis, the point that will be argued. The thesis provides a direct comparison of the two stories being analyzed, asserting how these two stories share similarities and exhibit a crucial difference.
- The paper's body follows a clear organization, devoting one paragraph to the similarities between the stories, followed by paragraphs on each of the stories that emphasize how they differ from each other.
- The second paragraph begins by getting directly to the point: "The chief similarity is. . . ." This paragraph continues to make direct comparisons between the two stories, often directly juxtaposing the stories' main characters in one sentence.

- The third and fourth paragraph each focus on one of the stories for analysis but develop the comparison by making references to the other story.
- The third paragraph advances the argument by giving evidence, introduced by a word that implies reasoning: because.
- The writer provides further evidence in the form of short relevant quotations from the story.
- The final paragraph summarizes but does not boringly repeat the paper's key comparison; that is, it does not merely say, "Thus, we see. . . ." Rather, it presents the argument in a new, fresh way.

Your Turn: Additional Stories for Analysis

Dagoberto Gilb

Born in Los Angeles, California, in 1950, Dagoberto Gilb was raised by a Spanish-speaking mother from Mexico. While Gilb was working in the construction trades and as carpenter, he started writing stories that explored the Hispanic and working-class culture of the American Southwest. He has written several award-winning novels, short story collections, and nonfiction essays.

Love in L.A.

Jake slouched in a clot of near motionless traffic, in the peculiar gray of concrete, smog, and early morning beneath the overpass of the Hollywood Freeway on Alvarado Street. He didn't really mind because he knew how much worse it could be trying to make a left onto the onramp. He certainly didn't do that every day of his life, and he'd assure anyone who'd ask that he never would either. A steady occupation had its advantages and he couldn't deny thinking about that too. He needed an FM radio in something better than this '58 Buick he drove. It would have crushed velvet interior with electric controls for the L.A. summer, a nice warm heater and defroster for the winter drives at the beach, a cruise control for those longer trips, mellow speakers front and rear of course, windows that hum closed, snuffing out that nasty exterior noise of freeways. The fact was that he'd probably have to change his whole style. Exotic colognes, plush, dark nightclubs, maitais and daiquiris, necklaced ladies in satin gowns, misty and sexy like in a tequila ad. Jake could imagine lots of possibilities when he let himself, but none that ended up with him pressed onto a stalled freeway.

Jake was thinking about this freedom of his so much that when he glimpsed its green light he just went ahead and stared bye bye to the steadily employed. When he turned his head the same direction his windshield faced, it was maybe one second too late. He pounced the brake pedal and steered the front wheels away from the tiny brakelights but the smack was unavoidable. Just one second sooner and it would only have been close. One second more and he'd be crawling up the Toyota's trunk. As it was, it seemed like only a harmless smack, much less solid than the one against his back bumper.

Jake considered driving past the Toyota but was afraid the traffic ahead would make it too difficult. As he pulled up against the curb a few carlengths ahead, it occurred to him that the traffic might have helped him get away too. He slammed the car door twice to make sure it was closed fully and to give himself another second more, then toured front and rear of his Buick for damage on or near the bumpers. Not an impressionable scratch even in the chrome. He perked up. Though the car's beauty was secondary to its ability to start and move, the body and paint were clean except for a few minor dings. This stood out as one of his few clearcut accomplishments over the years.

Before he spoke to the driver of the Toyota, whose looks he could see might present him with an added complication, he signaled to the driver of the car that hit him, still in his car and stopped behind the Toyota, and waved his hands and shook his head to let the man know there was no problem as far as he was concerned. The driver waved back and started his engine.

"It didn't even scratch my paint," Jake told her in that way of his. "So how you doin? Any damage to the car? I'm kinda hoping so, just so it takes a little more time and we can talk some. Or else you can give me your phone number now and I won't have to lay my regular b.s. on you to get it later."

He took her smile as a good sign and relaxed. He inhaled her scent like it was clean air and straightened out his less than new but not unhip clothes.

"You've got Florida plates. You look like you must be Cuban."

"My parents are from Venezuela."

"My name's Jake." He held out his hand.

"Mariana."

They shook hands like she'd never done it before in her life.

"I really am sorry about hitting you like that." He sounded genuine. He fondled the wide dimple near the cracked taillight. "It's amazing how easy it is to put a dent in these new cars. They're so soft they might replace waterbeds soon." Jake was confused about how to proceed with this. So much seemed so unlikely, but there was always possibility. "So maybe we should go out to breakfast somewhere and talk it over."

"I don't eat breakfast."

"Some coffee then."

"Thanks, but I really can't."

"You're not married, are you? Not that that would matter that much to me. I'm an openminded kinda guy."

She was smiling. "I have to get to work."

"That sounds boring."

"I better get your driver"s license," she said.

Jake nodded, disappointed. "One little problem," he said. "I didn't bring it. I just forgot it this morning. I'm a musician," he exaggerated greatly, "and, well, I dunno, I left my wallet in the pants I was wearing last night. If you have some paper and a pen I"ll give you my address and all that."

He followed her to the glove compartment side of her car.

"What if we don't report it to the insurance companies? I'll just get it fixed for you."

"I don't think my dad would let me do that."

"Your dad? It's not your car?"

"He bought it for me. And I live at home."

"Right." She was slipping away from him. He went back around to the back of her new Toyota and looked over the damage again. There was the trunk lid, the bumper, a rear panel, a taillight.

"You do have insurance?" she asked, suspicious, as she came around the back of the car.

"Oh yeah," he lied.

"I guess you better write the name of that down too."

He made up a last name and address and wrote down the name of an insurance company an old girlfriend once belonged to. He considered giving a real phone number but went against that idea and made one up.

"I act too," he lied to enhance the effect more. "Been in a couple of movies."

She smiled like a fan.

"So how about your phone number?" He was rebounding maturely.

She gave it to him.

"Mariana, you are beautiful," he said in his most sincere voice.

"Call me," she said timidly.

Jake beamed. "We'll see you, Mariana," he said holding out his hand. Her hand felt so warm and soft he felt like he'd been kissed.

Back in his car he took a moment or two to feel both proud and sad about his performance. Then he watched the rear view mirror as Mariana pulled up behind him. She was writing down the license plate numbers on his Buick, ones that he'd taken off a junk because the ones that belonged to his had expired so long ago. He turned the ignition key and revved the big engine and clicked into drive. His sense of freedom swelled as he drove into the now moving street traffic, though he couldn"t stop the thought about that FM stereo radio and crushed velvet interior and the new car smell that would even make it better.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Gilb sets his story on a traffic-filled highway in L.A. Why is this an interesting setting for Jake and his daydreams? How does this setting capture elements of contemporary life in L.A.?
2. How does Jake turn a negative event into an opportunity to pick up a woman? Trace the specific phrases that he uses to try to attract Mariana.
3. At the beginning of the story, Jake "was thinking about this freedom," and at the end of the story, Jake's "sense of freedom swelled." Why is freedom important to Jake? Does Jake achieve any form of freedom within this story? Write a short response paper that explores the concept of freedom and Jake's unique understanding of it.
4. Why does Mariana give Jake her phone number? How and why does Jake recreate himself for Mariana? What sort of identities does Jake construct? Why are Jake's fictional versions of himself successful?
5. Why is this short story titled, "Love in L.A."? How is this story a commentary on love?

Elizabeth Tallent

A professor at Stanford University in California, Elizabeth Tallent was born in Washington, DC, in 1954. Her stories explore the challenges of marriage and family, investigating the emotional complexities of human relationships. She has been published in magazines, including the New Yorker and Esquire, and her work has been selected for the Best American Short Stories and Best American Essays collections.

No One's a Mystery

For my eighteenth birthday Jack gave me a five-year diary with a latch and a little key, light as a dime. I was sitting beside him scratching at the lock, which didn't seem to want to work, when he thought he saw his wife's Cadillac in the distance, coming toward us. He pushed me down onto the dirty floor of the pickup and kept one hand on my head while I inhaled the musk of his cigarettes in the dashboard ashtray and sang along with Rosanne Cash on the tape deck. We'd been drinking tequila and the bottle was between his legs, resting up against his crotch, where the seam of his Levi's was bleached linen-white, though the Levi's were nearly new. I don't know why his Levi's always bleached like that, along the seams and at the knees. In a curve of cloth his zipper glinted, gold.

"It's her," he said. "She keeps the lights on in the daytime. I can't think of a single habit in a woman that irritates me more than that." When he saw that I was going to stay still he took his hand from my head and ran it through his own dark hair.

"Why does she?" I said.

"She thinks it's safer. Why does she need to be safer? She's driving exactly fifty-five miles an hour. She believes in those signs: 'Speed Monitored by Aircraft.' It doesn't matter that you can look up and see that the sky is empty."

'She'll see your lips move, Jack. She'll know you're talking to someone."

"She'll think I'm singing along with the radio."

He didn't lift his hand, just raised the fingers in salute while the pressure of his palm steadied the wheel, and I heard the Cadillac honk twice, musically; he was driving easily eighty miles an hour. I studied his boots. The elk heads stitched into the leather were bearded with frayed thread, the toes were scuffed, and there was a compact wedge of muddy manure between the heel and the sole—the same boots he'd been wearing for the two years I'd known him. On the tape deck Rosanne Cash sang, "Nobody's into me, no one's a mystery."

"Do you think she's getting famous because of who her daddy is or for herself!?" Jack said.

"There are about a hundred pop tops on the floor, did you know that? Some little kid could cut a bare foot on one of these, Jack."

"No little kids get into thiis truck except for you."

"How come you let it get so dirty?"

"'How come,'" he mocked. "You even sound like a kid. You can get back into the seat now, if you want. She's not going to look over her shoulder and see you."

"How do you know?"

"I just know," he said. "Like I know I'm going to get meat loaf for supper. It's in the air. Like I know what you'll be writing in that diary."

"What will I be writing?" I knelt on my side of the seat and craned around to look at the butterfly of dust printed on my jeans. Outside the window Wyoming was dazzling in the heat. The wheat was fawn and yellow and parted smoothly by the thin dirt road. I could smell the water in the irrigation ditches hidden in the wheat.

"Tonight you'll write, 'I love Jack. This is my birthday present from him. I can't imagine anybody loving anybody more than I love Jack.'"

"I can't."

"In a year you'll write, 'I wonder what I ever really saw in Jack. I wonder why I spent so many days just riding around in his pickup. It's true he taught me something about sex. It's true there wasn't ever much else to do in Cheyenne.'"

"I won't write that."

"In two years you'll write, 'I wonder what that old guy's name was, the one with the curly hair and the filthy dirty pickup truck and time on his hands.'"

"I won't write that."

"No?"

"Tonight I'll write, 'I love Jack. This is my birthday present from him. I can't imagine anybody loving anybody more than I love Jack.'"

"No, you can't," he said. "You can't imagine it."

"In a year I'll write, 'Jack should be home any minute now. The table's set—my grandmother's linen and her old silver and the yellow candles left over from the wedding—but I don't know if I can wait until after the trout a la Navarra to make love to him.'"

"lt must have been a fast divorce."

"In two years I'll write, 'Jack should be home by now. Little Jack is hungry for his supper. He said his first word today besides "Mama" and "Papa." He said "kaka."'"

Jack laughed. "He was probably trying to finger-paint with kaka on the bathroom wall when you heard him say it."

"In three years I'll write, 'My nipples are a little sore from nursing Eliza Rosamund.'"

"Rosamund. Every little girl should have a middle name she hates."

"'Her breath smells like vanilla and her eyes are just Jack's color of blue.'"

"That's nice," Jack said.

"So, which one do you like?"

"I like yours," he said. "But I believe mine."

"It doesn't matter. I believe mine."

"Not in your heart of hearts, you don't."

"You're wrong."

"I'm not wrong," he said. "And her breath would smell like your milk, and it's kind of a bittersweet smell, if you want to know the truth."

[1985]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. How would you describe the relationship at the heart of this story? Is this a love relationship? Is this a love story? The narrator states, "I can't imagine anybody loving anybody more than I love Jack." Notice that this line is repeated and appears twice in the story. Who makes this statement first? What does this statement reveal about the love it expresses?
2. The narrator and Jack try to predict what the narrator will write in her diary one, two, and three years in the future. What are the different stories they create about the future? The previous story in this chapter,"Love in L.A.," as well as the story in Chapter 3, "On Seeing the 100% Perfect Girl," also feature storytelling. In these stories, love seems to necessitate making up stories. Examine and compare the stories that are told in each story: What types of stories are told and why?
3. Why does the story open with the narrator being pushed to the floor of the pickup truck? What does this action represent?
4. The story contains vivid descriptions of several different settings: the setting of the dirty inside of the car, the Wyoming wheat fields outside the car window, and the imagined table set with wedding candles. Read each description closely, annotating the passage. What words seem most effective and meaningful?
5. What do you think the narrator will write in the diary in one, two, and three years' time? Engage in some creative thinking, and write those diary entries. Then, write Jack's response to each entry.

Junot Díaz

Considered one of America's most important contemporary authors, Junot Díaz is a Dominican American author whose writing often features characters who bridge American and Latin American culture. His novel, The Brief Wondrous Life of Oscar Wao (2007), won the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction, and in 2012, he received a MacArthur "genius grant" fellowship. He majored in English and studied creative writing at Rutgers University and then earned an MFA in creative writing from Cornell University. He currently teaches creative writing at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT).

How to Date a Brown Girl (Black Girl, White Girl, or Halfie)

Wait for your brother and your mother to leave the apartment. You've already told them that you're feeling too sick to go to Union City to visit that tía who likes to squeeze your nuts. (He's gotten big, she'll say.) And even though your moms knows you ain't sick you stuck to your story until finally she said, Go ahead and stay, malcriado.

Clear the government cheese from the refrigerator. If the girl's from the Terrace stack the boxes behind the milk. If she's from the Park or Society Hill hide the cheese in the cabinet above the oven, way up where she'll never see. Leave yourself a reminder to get it out before morning.or your moms will kick your ass. Take down any embarrassing photos of your family in the campo, especially the one with the half-naked kids dragging a goat on a rope leash. The kids are your cousins and by now they're old enough to understand why you're doing what you're doing. Hide the pictures of yourself with an Afro. Make sure the bathroom is presentable. Put the basket with all the crapped-on toilet paper under the sink. Spray the bucket with Lysol, then close the cabinet.

Shower, comb, dress. Sit on the couch and watch TV. If she's an outsider her father will be bringing her, maybe her mother. Neither of them want her seeing any boys from the Terrace—people get stabbed in the Terrace—but she's strong-headed and this time will get her way. If she's a whitegirl you know you'll at least get a hand job.

The directions were in your best handwriting, so her parents won't think you're an idiot. Get up from the couch and check the parking lot. Nothing. If the girl's local, don't sweat it. She'll flow over when she's good and ready. Sometimes she'll run into her other friends and a whole crowd will show up at your apartment and even though that means you ain't getting shit it will be fun anyway and you'll wish these people would come over more often. Sometimes the girl won't flow over at all and the next day in school she'll say sorry, smile and you'll be stupid enough to believe her and ask her out again.

5 Wait and after an hour go out to your corner. The neighborhood is full of traffic. Give one of your boys a shout and when he says, Are you still waiting on that bitch? say, Hell yeah.

Get back inside. Call her house and when her father picks up ask if she's there. He'll ask, Who is this? Hang up. He sounds like a principal or a police chief, the sort of dude with a big neck, who never has to watch his back. Sit and wait. By the time your stomach's ready to give out on you, a Honda or maybe a Jeep pulls in and out she comes.

Hey, you'll say.

Look, she'll say. My mom wants to meet you. She's got herself all worried about nothing.

Don't panic. Say, Hey, no problem. Run a hand through your hair like the whiteboys do even though the only thing that runs easily through your hair is Africa. She will look good. The white ones are the ones you want the most, aren't they, but usually the out-of-towners are black, blackgirls who grew up with ballet and Girl Scouts, who have three cars in their driveways. If she's a halfie don't be surprised that her mother is white. Say, Hi. Her moms will say hi and you'll see that you don't scare her, not really. She will say that she needs easier directions to get out and even though she has the best directions in her lap give her new ones. Make her happy.

10 You have choices. If the girl's from around the way, take her to El Cibao for dinner. Order everything in your busted-up Spanish. Let her correct you if she's Latina and amaze her if she's black. If she's not from around the way, Wendy's will do. As you walk to the restaurant talk about school. A local girl won't need stories about the neighborhood but the other ones might. Supply the story about the loco who'd been storing canisters of tear gas in his basement for years, how one day the canisters cracked and the whole neighborhood got a dose of the military-strength stuff. Don't tell her that your moms knew right away what it was, that she recognized its smell from the year the United States invaded your island.

Hope that you don't run into your nemesis, Howie, the Puerto Rican kid with the two killer mutts. He walks them all over the neighborhood and every now and then the mutts corner themselves a cat and tear it to shreds, Howie laughing as the cat flips up in the air, its neck twisted around like an owl, red meat showing through the soft fur. If his dogs haven't cornered a cat, he will walk behind you and ask, Hey, Yunior, is that your new fuckbuddy?

Let him talk. Howie weighs about two hundred pounds and could eat you if he wanted. At the field he will turn away. He has new sneakers, and doesn't want them muddy. If the girl's an outsider she will hiss now and say, What a fucking asshole. A homegirl would have been yelling back at him the whole time, unless she was shy. Either way don't feel bad that you didn't do anything. Never lose a fight on a first date or that will be the end of it.

Dinner will be tense. You are not good at talking to people you don't know. A halfie will tell you that her parents met in the Movement, will say, Back then people thought it a radical thing to do. It will sound like something her parents made her memorize. Your brother once heard that one and said, Man, that sounds like a whole lot of Uncle Tomming to me. Don't repeat this.

Put down your hamburger and say, It must have been hard.

15 She will appreciate your interest. She will tell you more. Black people, she will say, treat me real bad. That's why I don't like them. You'll wonder how she feels about Dominicans. Don't ask. Let her speak on it and when you're both finished eating walk back into the neighborhood. The skies will be magnificent. Pollutants have made Jersey sunsets one of the wonders of the world. Point it out. Touch her shoulder and say, That's nice, right?

Get serious. Watch TV but stay alert. Sip some of the Bermúdez your father left in the cabinet, which nobody touches. A local girl may have hips and a thick ass but she won't be quick about letting you touch. She has to live in the same neighborhood you do, has to deal with you being all up in her business. She might just chill with you and then go home. She might kiss you and then go, or she might, if she's reckless, give it up, but that's rare. Kissing will suffice. A whitegirl might just give it up right then. Don't stop her. She'll take her gum out of her mouth, stick it to the plastic sofa covers and then will move close to you. You have nice eyes, she might say.

Tell her that you love her hair, that you love her skin, her lips, because, in truth, you love them more than you love your own.

She'll say, I like Spanish guys, and even though you've never been to Spain, say, I like you. You'll sound smooth.

You'll be with her until about eight-thirty and then she will want to wash up. In the bathroom she will hum a song from the radio and her waist will keep the beat against the lip of the sink. Imagine her old lady coming to get her, what she would say if she knew her daughter had just lain under you and blown your name, pronounced with her eighth-grade Spanish, into your ear. While she's in the bathroom call one of your boys and say, Lo hice, loco. Or just sit back on the couch and smile.

20 But usually it won't work this way. Be prepared. She will not want to kiss you. Just cool it, she'll say. The halfie might lean back, breaking away from you. She will cross her arms, say, I hate my tits. Stroke her hair but she will pull away. I don't like anybody touching my hair, she will say. She will act like somebody you don't know. In school she is known for her attention-grabbing laugh, as high and far-ranging as a gull, but here she will worry you. You will not know what to say.

You're the only kind of guy who asks me out, she will say. Your neighbors will start their hyena calls, now that the alcohol is in them. You and the blackboys.

Say nothing. Let her button her shirt, let her comb her hair, the sound of it stretching like a sheet of fire between you. When her father pulls in and beeps, let her go without too much of a good-bye. She won't want it. During the next hour the phone will ring. You will be tempted to pick it up. Don't. Watch the shows you want to watch, without a family around to debate you. Don't go downstairs. Don't fall asleep. It won't help. Put the government cheese back in its place before your moms kills you.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. This story is written in the second person, with the narrator Yunior addressing you as "you." Do you find this effective? What does this voice do for the story? For example, does it make the story more direct or more energetic?
2. What are the interesting objects that fill Yunior's home? How do they function as symbols? What ideas do these objects express?
3. What are the interesting actions Yunior engages in as he prepares for dates? What ideas do the actions express? What activities do you like the most? What activities are the most humorous or the most unexpected?
4. Annotate the story carefully, noting the types of girls that Yunior imagines dating. What are the different types of girls? How and why does Yunior treat each type differently? Does this cataloging of different types of girls become offensive? Do you find the cataloging realistic? cruel? funny? Is Diaz critiquing or mocking this type of cataloging?
5. Although the story offers directions on dating and thus seems to grant the narrator authority on this subject, the story also reveals the narrator's self-doubt. Locate the moments in the story when the narrator reveals his anxieties and uncertainties about women and dating.

T. Coraghessan Boyle

The son of immigrants from Ireland, T. Coraghessan Boyle (the stress in his middle name is on the second syllable) was born in Peekskill, New York, in 1948. A graduate of the State University of New York, Potsdam, Boyle taught history and English in high school for several years. He then attended the Writers' Workshop at the University of Iowa and went on to receive a PhD in 1977. Boyle has won several awards for his fiction.

Greasy Lake

It's about a mile down on the dark side of Route 88.

—Bruce Springsteen

There was a time when courtesy and winning ways went out of style, when it was good to be bad, when you cultivated decadence like a taste. We were all dangerous characters then. We wore torn-up leather jackets, slouched around with toothpicks in our mouths, sniffed glue and ether and what somebody claimed was cocaine. When we wheeled our parents' whining station wagons out into the street we left a patch of rubber half a block long. We drank gin and grape juice, Tango, Thunderbird, and Bali Hai. We were nineteen. We were bad. We read André Gide[1] and struck elaborate poses to show that we didn't give a shit about anything. At night, we went up to Greasy Lake.

Through the center of town, up the strip, past the housing developments and shopping malls, street lights giving way to the thin streaming illumination of the headlights, trees crowding the asphalt in a black unbroken wall: that was the way out to Greasy Lake. The Indians had called it Wakan, a reference to the clarity of its waters. Now it was fetid and murky, the mud banks glittering with broken glass and strewn with beer cans and the charred remains of bonfires. There was a single ravaged island a hundred yards from shore, so stripped of vegetation it looked as if the air force had strafed it. We went up to the lake because everyone went there, because we wanted to snuff the rich scent of possibility on the breeze, watch a girl take off her clothes and plunge into the festering murk, drink beer, smoke pot, howl at the stars, savor the incongruous full-throated roar of rock and roll against the primeval susurrus of frogs and crickets. This was nature.

I was there one night, late, in the company of two dangerous characters. Digby wore a gold star in his right ear and allowed his father to pay his tuition at Cornell; Jeff was thinking of quitting school to become a painter/musician/headshop proprietor. They were both expert in the social graces, quick with a sneer, able to manage a Ford with lousy shocks over rutted and gutted blacktop road at eighty-five while rolling a joint as compact as a Tootsie Roll Pop stick. They could lounge against a bank of booming speakers and trade "man"s with the best of them or roll out across the dance floor as if their joints worked on bearings. They were slick and quick and they wore their mirror shades at breakfast and dinner, in the shower, in closets and caves. In short, they were bad.

I drove. Digby pounded the dashboard and shouted along with Toots & the Maytals while Jeff hung his head out the window and streaked the side of my mother's Bel Air with vomit. It was early June, the air soft as a hand on your cheek, the third night of summer vacation. The first two nights we'd been out till dawn, looking for something we never found. On this, the third night, we'd cruised the strip sixty-seven times, been in and out of every bar and club we could think of in a twenty-mile radius, stopped twice for bucket chicken and forty-cent hamburgers, debated going to a party at the house of a girl Jeff's sister knew, and chucked two dozen raw eggs at mailboxes and hitchhikers. It was 2:00 A.M.; the bars were closing. There was nothing to do but take a bottle of lemon-flavored gin up to Greasy Lake.

[1]André Gide French novelist and critic (1869–1951), much concerned with unconventional behavior.

5 The taillights of a single car winked at us as we swung into the dirt lot with its tufts of weed and washboard corrugations; '57 Chevy, mint, metallic blue. On the far side of the lot, like the exoskeleton of some gaunt chrome insect, a chopper leaned against its kickstand. And that was it for excitement: some junkie half-wit biker and a car freak pumping his girlfriend. Whatever it was we were looking for, we weren't about to find it at Greasy Lake. Not that night.

But then all of a sudden Digby was fighting for the wheel. "Hey, that's Tony Lovett's car! Hey!" he shouted, while I stabbed at the brake pedal and the Bel Air nosed up to the gleaming bumper of the parked Chevy. Digby leaned on the horn, laughing, and instructed me to put my brights on. I flicked on the brights. This was hilarious. A joke. Tony would experience premature withdrawal and expect to be confronted by grim-looking state troopers with flashlights. We hit the horn, strobed the lights, and then jumped out of the car to press our witty faces to Tony's windows; for all we knew we might even catch a glimpse of some little fox's tit, and then we could slap backs with red-faced Tony, roughhouse a little, and go on to new heights of adventure and daring.

The first mistake, the one that opened the whole floodgate, was losing my grip on the keys. In the excitement, leaping from the car with the gin in one hand and a roach clip in the other, I spilled them in the grass—in the dark, rank, mysterious nighttime grass of Greasy Lake. This was a tactical error, as damaging and irreversible in its way as Westmoreland's decision to dig in at Khe Sanh.[2] I felt it like a jab of intuition, and I stopped there by the open door, peering vaguely into the night that puddled up round my feet.

The second mistake—and this was inextricably bound up with the first was identifying the car as Tony Lovett's. Even before the very bad character in greasy jeans and engineer boots ripped out of the driver's door, I began to realize that this chrome blue was much lighter than the robin's-egg of Tony's car, and that Tony's car didn't have rear-mounted speakers. Judging from their expressions, Digby and Jeff were privately groping toward the same inevitable and unsettling conclusion as I was.

In any case, there was no reasoning with this bad greasy character—clearly he was a man of action. The first lusty Rockette[3] kick of his steel-toed boot caught me under the chin, chipped my favorite tooth, and left me sprawled in the dirt. Like a fool, I'd gone down on one knee to comb the stiff hacked grass for the keys, my mind making connections in the most dragged out, testudineous[4] way, knowing that things had gone wrong, that I was in a lot of trouble, and that the lost ignition key was my grail[5] and my salvation. The three or four succeeding blows were mainly absorbed by my right buttock and the tough piece of bone at the base of my spine.

[2]Westmoreland's decision . . . Khe Sanh General William C. Westmoreland commanded U.S. troops in Vietnam (1964–68). When the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong in 1967 attacked Khe San (or Khesanh), Westmoreland chose to defend an area of little military significance.

[3]Rockette The Rockettes, a dance troupe at Radio City Music Hall in New York City, were famous for precision and for high kicking.

10 Meanwhile, Digby vaulted the kissing bumpers and delivered a savage kung-fu blow to the greasy character's collarbone. Digby had just finished a course in martial arts for phys-ed credit and had spent the better part of the past two nights telling us apocryphal tales of Bruce Lee types and of the raw power invested in lightning blows shot from coiled wrists, ankles, and elbows. The greasy character was unimpressed. He merely backed off a step, his face like a Toltec mask, and laid Digby out with a single whistling roundhouse blow . . . but by now Jeff had got into the act, and I was beginning to extricate myself from the dirt, a tinny compound of shock, rage, and impotence wadded in my throat.

Jeff was on the guy's back, biting at his ear. Digby was on the ground, cursing. I went for the tire iron I kept under the driver's seat. I kept it there because bad characters always keep tire irons under the driver's seat, for just such an occasion as this. Never mind that I hadn't been involved in a fight since sixth grade, when a kid with a sleepy eye and two streams of mucus depending from his nostrils hit me in the knee with a Louisville slugger,[6] never mind that I'd touched the tire iron exactly twice before, to change tires: it was there. And I went for it.

I was terrified. Blood was beating in my ears, my hands were shaking, my heart turning over like a dirtbike in the wrong gear. My antagonist was shirtless, and a single cord of muscle flashed across his chest as he bent forward to peel Jeff from his back like a wet overcoat. "Motherfucker," he spat, over and over, and I was aware in that instant that all four of us—Digby, Jeff, and myself included—were chanting "motherfucker, motherfucker," as if it were a battle cry. (What happened next? the detective asks the murderer from beneath the turned-down brim of his porkpie hat. I don't know, the murderer says, something came over me. Exactly.)

Digby poked the flat of his hand in the bad character's face and I came at him like a kamikaze, mindless, raging, stung with humiliation—the whole thing, from the initial boot in the chin to this murderous primal instant involving no more than sixty hyperventilating, gland-flooding seconds—I came at him and brought the tire iron down across his ear. The effect was instantaneous, astonishing. He was a stunt man and this was Hollywood, he was a big grimacing toothy balloon and I was a man with a straight pin. He collapsed. Wet his pants. Went loose in his boots.

A single second, big as a zeppelin, floated by. We were standing over him in a circle, gritting our teeth, jerking our necks, our limbs and hands and feet twitching with glandular discharges. No one said anything. We just stared down at the guy, the car freak, the lover, the bad greasy character laid low. Digby looked at me; so did Jeff. I was still holding the tire iron, a tuft of hair clinging to the crook like dandelion fluff, like down. Rattled, I dropped it in the dirt, already envisioning the headlines, the pitted faces of the police inquisitors, the gleam of handcuffs, clank of bars, the big black shadows rising from the back of the cell … when suddenly a raw torn shriek cut through me like all the juice in all the electric chairs in the country.

[4]testudineous turtle-like (here, slow).
[5]grail the holy cup that, according to tradition, Jesus used at the Last Supper. Legend says that the person who finds this object will be saved.
[6]Louisville slugger a brand of baseball bat.

15 It was the fox. She was short, barefoot, dressed in panties and a man's shirt. "Animals!" she screamed, running at us with her fists clenched and wisps of blow-dried hair in her face. There was a silver chain round her ankle, and her toenails flashed in the glare of the headlights. I think it was the toenails that did it. Sure, the gin and the cannabis and even the Kentucky Fried may have had a hand in it, but it was the sight of those flaming toes that set us off—the toad emerging from the loaf in Virgin Spring,[7] lipstick smeared on a child: she was already tainted. We were on her like Bergman's deranged brothers—see no evil, hear none, speak none—panting, wheezing, tearing at her clothes, grabbing for flesh. We were bad characters, and we were scared and hot and three steps over the line—anything could have happened.

It didn't.

Before we could pin her to the hood of the car, our eyes masked with lust and greed and the purest primal badness, a pair of headlights swung into the lot. There we were, dirty, bloody, guilty, dissociated from humanity and civilization, the first of the Ur-crimes[8] behind us, the second in progress, shreds of nylon panty and spandex brassiere dangling from our fingers, our flies open, lips licked-there we were, caught in the spotlight. Nailed.

We bolted. First for the car, and then, realizing we had no way of starting it, for the woods. I thought nothing. I thought escape. The headlights came at me like accusing fingers. I was gone.

Ram-bam-bam, across the parking lot, past the chopper and into the feculent undergrowth at the lake's edge, insects flying up in my face, weeds whipping, frogs and snakes and red-eyed turtles splashing off into the night: I was already ankle-deep in muck and tepid water and still going strong. Behind me, the girl's screams rose in intensity, disconsolate, incriminating, the screams of the Sabine women,[9] the Christian martyrs, Anne Frank[10] dragged from the garret. I kept going, pursued by those cries, imagining cops and bloodhounds. The water was up to my knees when I realized what I was doing: I was going to swim for it. Swim the breadth of Greasy Lake and hide myself in the thick clot of woods on the far side. They'd never find me there!

20 I was breathing in sobs, in gasps. The water lapped at my waist as I looked out over the moon-burnished ripples, the mats of algae that clung to the surface like scabs. Digby and Jeff had vanished. I paused. Listened. The girl was quieter now, screams tapering to sobs, but there were male voices, angry, excited, and the high-pitched ticking of the second car's engine. I waded deeper, stealthy, hunted, the ooze sucking at my sneakers. As I was about to take the plunge—at the very instant I dropped my shoulder for the first slashing stroke—I blundered into something. Something unspeakable, obscene, something soft, wet, moss-grown. A patch of weed? A log? When I reached out to touch it, it gave like a rubber duck, it gave like flesh.

In one of those nasty little epiphanies for which we are prepared by films and TV and childhood visits to the funeral home to ponder the shrunken painted forms

[7]Virgin Spring film (1960) by Ingmar Bergman.
[8]Ur-crimes primitive crimes.
[9]Sabine women women of an ancient tribe in Rome, raped by Romans and carried off to be their wives.
[10]Anne Frank German Jewish girl (1929–45) who hid from the Nazis in an attic in Amsterdam but was found and sent to a concentration camp, where she died. Her Diary of a Young Girl has become famous.

of dead grandparents, I understood what it was that bobbed there so inadmissibly in the dark. Understood, and stumbled back in horror and revulsion, my mind yanked in six different directions (I was nineteen, a mere child, an infant, and here in the space of five minutes I'd struck down one greasy character and blundered into the waterlogged carcass of a second), thinking, The keys, the keys, why did I have to go and lose the keys? I stumbled back, but the muck took hold of my feet-a sneaker snagged, balance lost—and suddenly I was pitching face forward into the buoyant black mass, throwing out my hands in desperation while simultaneously conjuring the image of reeking frogs and muskrats revolving in slicks of their own deliquescing juices. AAAAArrrgh! I shot from the water like a torpedo, the dead man rotating to expose a mossy beard and eyes cold as the moon. I must have shouted out, thrashing around in the weeds, because the voices behind me suddenly became animated.

"What was that?"

"It's them, it's them: they tried to, tried to . . . rape me!" Sobs.

A man's voice, flat Midwestern accent. "You sons a bitches, we'll kill you!"

25 Frogs, crickets.

Then another voice, harsh, r-less, Lower East Side: "Motherfucker!" I recognized the verbal virtuosity of the bad greasy character in the engineer boots. Tooth chipped, sneakers gone, coated in mud and slime and worse, crouching breathless in the weeds waiting to have my ass thoroughly and definitively kicked and fresh from the hideous stinking embrace of a three-days-dead-corpse, I suddenly felt a rush of joy and vindication: the son of a bitch was alive! Just as quickly, my bowels turned to ice. "Come on out of there, you pansy mothers!" the bad greasy character was screaming. He shouted curses till he was out of breath.

The crickets started up again, then the frogs. I held my breath. All at once there was a sound in the reeds, a swishing, a splash: thunk-a-thunk. They were throwing rocks. The frogs fell silent. I cradled my head. Swish; swish, thunk-a-thunk. A wedge of feldspar the size of a cue ball glanced off my knee. I bit my finger.

It was then that they turned to the car. I heard a door slam, a curse, and then the sound of the headlights shattering-almost a good-natured sound, celebratory, like corks popping from the necks of bottles. This was succeeded by the dull booming of the fenders, metal on metal, and then the icy crash of the windshield. I inched forward, elbows and knees, my belly pressed to the muck, thinking of guerrillas and commandos and The Naked and the Dead.[11] I parted the weeds and squinted the length of the parking lot.

The second car—it was a Trans-Am—was still running, its high beams washing the scene in a lurid stagy light. Tire iron flailing, the greasy bad character was laying into the side of my mother's Bel Air like an avenging demon, his shadow riding up the trunks of the trees. Whomp. Whomp. Whomp-whomp. The other two guys—blond types, in fraternity jackets—were helping out with tree branches and skull-sized boulders. One of them was gathering up bottles, rocks, muck, candy wrappers, used condoms, pop-tops, and other refuse and pitching it through the window on the driver's side. I could see the fox, a white bulb behind the windshield of the '57 Chevy. "Bobbie," she whined over the thumping, "come on." The greasy character paused a moment, took one good swipe at the left taillight, and then heaved the tire iron halfway across the lake. Then he fired up the '57 and was gone.

[11]The Naked and the Dead World War II novel (1948) by Norman Mailer.

30 Blond head nodded at blond head. One said something to the other, too low for me to catch. They were no doubt thinking that in helping to annihilate my mother's car they'd committed a fairly rash act, and thinking too that there were three bad characters connected with that very car watching them from the woods. Perhaps other possibilities occurred to them as well—police, jail cells, justices of the peace, reparations, lawyers, irate parents, fraternal censure. Whatever they were thinking, they suddenly dropped branches, bottles, and rocks and sprang for their car in unison, as if they'd choreographed it. Five seconds. That's all it took. The engine shrieked, the tires squealed, a cloud of dust rose from the rutted lot and then settled back on darkness.

I don't know how long I lay there, the bad breath of decay all around me, my jacket heavy as a bear, the primordial ooze subtly reconstituting itself to accommodate my upper thighs and testicles. My jaws ached, my knee throbbed, my coccyx was on fire. I contemplated suicide, wondered if I'd need bridgework, scraped the recesses of my brain for some sort of excuse to give my parents—a tree had fallen on the car, I was blindsided by a bread truck, hit and run, vandals had got to it while we were playing chess at Digby's. Then I thought of the dead man. He was probably the only person on the planet worse off than I was. I thought about him, fog on the lake, insects chirring eerily, and felt the tug of fear, felt the darkness opening up inside me like a set of jaws. Who was he, I wondered, this victim of time and circumstance bobbing sorrowfully in the lake at my back. The owner of the chopper, no doubt, a bad older character come to this. Shot during a murky drug deal, drowned while drunkenly frolicking in the lake. Another headline. My car was wrecked; he was dead.

When the eastern half of the sky went from black to cobalt and the trees began to separate themselves from the shadows, I pushed myself up from the mud and stepped out into the open. By now the birds had begun to take over for the crickets, and dew lay slick on the leaves. There was a smell in the air, raw and sweet at the same time, the smell of the sun firing buds and opening blossoms. I contemplated the car. It lay there like a wreck along the highway, like a steel sculpture left over from a vanished civilization. Everything was still. This was nature.

I was circling the car, as dazed and bedraggled as the sole survivor of an air blitz, when Digby and Jeff emerged from the trees behind me. Digby's face was crosshatched with smears of dirt; Jeff's jacket was gone and his shirt was torn across the shoulder. They slouched across the lot, looking sheepish, and silently came up beside me to gape at the ravaged automobile. No one said a word. After a while Jeff swung open the driver's door and began to scoop the broken glass and garbage off the seat. I looked at Digby. He shrugged. "At least they didn't slash the tires," he said.

It was true: the tires were intact. There was no windshield, the headlights were staved in, and the body looked as if it had been sledgehammered for a quarter a shot at the county fair, but the tires were inflated to regulation pressure. The car was drivable. In silence, all three of us bent to scrape the mud and shattered glass from the interior. I said nothing about the biker. When we were finished, I reached in my pocket for the keys, experienced a nasty stab of recollection, cursed myself, and turned to search the grass. I spotted them almost immediately, no more than five feet from the open door, glinting like jewels in the first tapering shaft of sunlight. There was no reason to get philosophical about it: I eased into the seat and turned the engine over.

35 It was at that precise moment that the silver Mustang with the flame decals rumbled into the lot. All three of us froze; then Digby and Jeff slid into the car and slammed the door. We watched as the Mustang rocked and bobbed across the ruts and finally jerked to a halt beside the forlorn chopper at the far end of the lot. "Let's go," Digby said. I hesitated, the Bel Air wheezing beneath me.

Two girls emerged from the Mustang. Tight jeans, stiletto heels, hair like frozen fur. They bent over the motorcycle, paced back and forth aimlessly, glanced once or twice at us, and then ambled over to where the reeds sprang up in a green fence round the perimeter of the lake. One of them cupped her hands to her mouth. "Al," she called, "Hey, Al!"

"Come on," Digby hissed. "Let's get out of here."

But it was too late. The second girl was picking her way across the lot, unsteady on her heels, looking up at us and then away. She was older—twenty-five or -six—and as she came closer we could see there was something wrong with her: she was stoned or drunk, lurching now and waving her arms for balance. I gripped the steering wheel as if it were the ejection lever of a flaming jet, and Digby spat out my name, twice, terse and impatient.

"Hi," the girl said.

40 We looked at her like zombies, like war veterans, like deaf-and-dumb pencil peddlers.

She smiled, her lips cracked and dry. "Listen," she said, bending from the waist to look in the window, "you guys seen Al?" Her pupils were pinpoints, her eyes glass. She jerked her neck. "That's his bike over there—Al's. You seen him?"

Al. I didn't know what to say. I wanted to get out of the car and retch, I wanted to go home to my parents' house and crawl into bed. Digby poked me in the ribs. "We haven't seen anybody," I said.

The girl seemed to consider this, reaching out a slim veiny arm to brace herself against the car. "No matter," she said, slurring the t's, "he'll turn up." And then, as if she'd just taken stock of the whole scene-the ravaged car and our battered faces, the desolation of the place—she said: "Hey, you guys look like some pretty bad characters—been fightin', huh?" We stared straight ahead, rigid as catatonics. She was fumbling in her pocket and muttering something. Finally she held out a handful of tablets in glassine wrappers: "Hey, you want to party, you want to do some of these with me and Sarah?"

I just looked at her. I thought I was going to cry. Digby broke the silence. "No, thanks," he said, leaning over me. "Some other time."

45 I put the car in gear and it inched forward with a groan, shaking off pellets of glass like an old dog shedding water after a bath, heaving over the ruts on its worn springs, creeping toward the highway. There was a sheen of sun on the lake. I looked back. The girl was still standing there, watching us, her shoulders slumped, hand outstretched.

[1985]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Exactly what does "bad" mean in the first paragraph? Why would some young people think "it was good to be bad"? Notice that the first paragraph ends with a short sentence about Greasy Lake: "This was nature." Is the narrator saying that "bad" behavior is natural?
2. The third paragraph characterizes Digby as "dangerous" and "bad." How dangerous do you think Boyle wants us to think Digby is?

3. Suppose the story had a different title, and Greasy Lake was never mentioned in the story. Would anything be lost? In short, why does Boyle introduce the lake?
4. What do you make of the ending of the story? Why, in your view, do the boys reject the girl's offer?

Mary Hood

Mary Hood is often categorized as a Southern writer and praised for capturing Southern voices, communities, and landscapes. In her essay, "On Being a Southern Writer," she explains that, when she writes fiction, she tries to "sound like the Southern talkers." Born in Georgia in 1946, Hood continues to call Georgia her home. She has published several short-story collections, novellas, and a novel. In 1984, she was awarded the Flannery O'Connor Award for Short Fiction for the short story collection, How Far She Went.

How Far She Went

They had quarreled all morning, squalled all summer about the incidentals: how tight the girl's cut-off jeans were, the "Every Inch a Woman" T-shirt, her choice of music and how loud she played it, her practiced inattention, her sullen look. Her granny wrung out the last boiled dishcloth, pinched it to the line, giving the basin a sling and a slap, the water flying out in a scalding arc onto the Queen Anne's lace by the path, never mind if it bloomed, that didn't make it worth anything except to chiggers, but the girl would cut it by the everlasting armload and cherish it in the old chum, going to that much trouble for a weed but not bending once-un begged-to pick the nearest bean; she was sulking now. Bored. Displaced.

"And what do you think happens to a chigger if nobody ever walks by his weed?" her granny asked, heading for the house with that sidelong uneager unanswered glance, hoping for what? The surprise gift of a smile? Nothing. The woman shook her head and said it. "Nothing." The door slammed behind her. Let it.

"I hate it here!" the girl yelled then. She picked up a stick and broke it and threw the pieces—one from each hand—at the laundry drying in the noon. Missed. Missed.

Then she turned on her bare, haughty heel and set off high—shouldered into the heat, quick but not far, not far enough—no road was that long—only as far as she dared. At the gate, a rusty chain swinging between two lichened posts, she stopped, then backed up the raw drive to make a run at the barrier, lofting, clearing it clean, her long hair wild in the sun. Triumphant, she looked back at the house where she caught at the dark window her granny's face in its perpetual eclipse of disappointment, old at fifty. She stepped back, but the girl saw her.

5 "You don't know me!" the girl shouted, chin high, and ran till her ribs ached.

* * *

As she rested in the rattling shade of the willows, the little dog found her. He could be counted on. He barked all the way, and squealed when she pulled the burr from his ear. They started back to the house for lunch. By then the mailman had long come and gone in the old ruts, leaving the one letter folded now to fit the woman's apron pocket.

If bad news darkened her granny's face, the girl ignored it. Didn't talk at all, another of her distancings, her defiances. So it was as they ate that the woman summarized, "Your daddy wants you to cash in the plane ticket and buy you something. School clothes. For here."

Pale, the girl stared, defenseless only an instant before blurting out, "You're lying."

The woman had to stretch across the table to leave her handprint on that blank cheek. She said, not caring if it stung or not, "He's been planning it since he sent you here."

10 "I could turn this whole house over, dump it! Leave you slobbering over that stinking jealous dog in the dust!" The girl trembled with the vision, with the strength it gave her. It made her laugh. "Scatter the Holy Bible like confetti and ravel the crochet into miles of stupid string! I could! I will! I won't stay here!" But she didn't move, not until her tears rose to meet her color, and then to escape the shame of minding so much she fled. Just headed away, blind. It didn't matter, this time, how far she went.

* * *

The woman set her thoughts against fretting over their bickering, just went on unalarmed with chores, clearing off after the uneaten meal, bringing in the laundry, scattering corn for the chickens, ladling manure tea onto the porch flowers. She listened though. She always had been a listener. It gave her a cocked look. She forgot why she. had gone into the girl's empty room, that ungirlish, tenuous lodging place with its bleak order, its ready suitcases never unpacked, the narrow bed, the contested radio on the windowsill. The woman drew the cracked shade down between the radio and the August sun. There wasn't anything else to do.

It was after six when she tied on her rough oxfords and walked down the drive and dropped the gate chain and headed back to the creosoted shed where she kept her tools. She took a hoe for snakes, a rake, shears to trim the grass where it grew, and seed in her pocket to scatter where it never had grown at all. She put the tools and her gloves and the bucket in the trunk of the old Chevy, its prime and rust like an Appaloosa's spots through the chalky white finish. She left the trunk open and the tool handles sticking out. She wasn't going far.

The heat of the day had broken, but the air was thick, sultry, weighted with honeysuckle in second bloom and the Nu-Grape scent of kudzu. The maple and poplar leaves turned over, quaking, silver. There wouldn't be any rain. She told the dog to stay, but he knew a trick. He stowed away when she turned her back, leaped right into the trunk with the tools, then gave himself away with exultant barks. Hearing him, her court jester, she stopped the car and welcomed him into the front seat beside her. Then they went on. Not a mile from her gate she turned onto the blue gravel of the cemetery lane, hauled the gearshift into reverse to whoa them, and got out to take the idle walk down to her buried hopes, bending all along to rout out a handful of weeds from between the markers of old acquaintance. She stood there and read, slow. The dog whined at her hem; she picked him up and rested her chin on his head, then he wriggled and whined to run free, contrary and restless as a child.

The crows called strong and bold MOM! MOM! A trick of the ear to hear it like that. She knew it was the crows, but still she looked around. No one called her that now. She was done with that. And what was it worth anyway? It all came to this: solitary weeding. The sinful fumble of flesh, the fear, the listening for a return that never came, the shamed waiting, the unanswered prayers, the perjury on the certificate—hadn't she lain there weary of the whole lie and it only beginning? and a voice telling her, "Here's your baby, here's your girl," and the swaddled package meaning no more to her than an extra anything, something store-bought, something she could take back for a refund.

15 "Tie her to the fence and give her a bale of hay," she had murmured, drugged, and they teased her, excused her for such a welcoming, blaming the anesthesia, but it went deeper than that; she knew, and the baby knew: there was no love in the begetting. That was the secret, unforgivable, that not another good thing could ever make up for, where all the bad had come from, like a visitation, a punishment. She knew that was why Sylvie had been wild, had gone to earth so early, and before dying had made this child in sudden wedlock, a child who would be just like her, would carry the hurting on into another generation. A matter of time. No use raising her hand. But she had raised her hand. Still wore on its palm the memory of the sting of the collision with the girl's cheek; had she broken her jaw? Her heart? Of course not. She said it aloud: "Takes more than that."

She went to work then, doing what she could with her old tools. She pecked the clay on Sylvie's grave, new-looking, unhealed after years. She tried again, scattering seeds from her pocket, every last possible one of them. Off in the west she could hear the pulpwood cutters sawing through another acre across the lake. Nearer, there was the racket of motorcycles laboring cross-country, insect-like, distracting.

She took her bucket to the well and hung it on the pump. She had half filled it when the bikers roared up, right down the blue gravel, straight at her. She let the bucket overflow, staring. On the back of one of the machines was the girl. Sylvie's girl! Her bare arms wrapped around the shirtless man riding between her thighs. They were first. The second biker rode alone. She studied their strangers' faces as they circled her. They were the enemy, all of them. Laughing. The girl was laughing too, laughing like her mama did. Out in the middle of nowhere the girl had found these two men, some moth-musk about her drawing them (too soon!) to what? She shouted it: "What in God's—" They roared off without answering her, and the bucket of water tipped over, spilling its stain blood-dark on the red dust.

The dog went wild barking, leaping after them, snapping at the tires, and there was no calling him down. The bikers made a wide circuit of the churchyard, then roared straight across the graves, leaping the ditch and landing upright on the road again, heading off toward the reservoir.

Furious, she ran to her car, past the barking dog, this time leaving him behind, driving after them, horn blowing nonstop, to get back what was not theirs. She drove after them knowing what they did not know, that all the roads beyond that point dead-ended. She surprised them, swinging the Impala across their path, cutting them off; let them hit it! They stopped. She got out, breathing hard, and said, when she could, "She's underage." Just that. And put out her claiming hand with an authority that made the girl's arms drop from the man's insolent waist and her legs tremble.

20 "I was just riding," the girl said, not looking up.

Behind them the sun was heading on toward down. The long shadows of the pines drifted back and forth in the same breeze that puffed the distant sails on the lake. Dead limbs creaked and clashed overhead like the antlers of locked and furious beasts.

"Sheeeut," the lone rider said. "I told you." He braced with his muddy boot and leaned out from his machine to spit. The man the girl had been riding with had the invading sort of eyes the woman had spent her lifetime bolting doors against. She met him now, face to face.

"Right there, missy," her granny said, pointing behind her to the car.

The girl slid off the motorcycle and stood halfway between her choices. She started slightly at the poosh! as he popped another top and chugged the beer in one uptilting of his head. His eyes never left the woman's. When he was through, he tossed the can high, flipping it end over end. Before it hit the ground he had his pistol out and, firing once, winged it into the lake.

"Freaking lucky shot," the other one grudged.

"I don't need luck," he said. He sighted down the barrel of the gun at the woman's head. "POW!" he yelled, and when she recoiled, he laughed. He swung around to the girl: he kept aiming the gun, here, there, high, low, all around. "Y'all settle it," he said, with a shrug.

The girl had to understand him then, had to know him, had to know better. But still she hesitated. He kept looking at her, then away.

"She's fifteen," her granny said. "You can go to jail."

"You can go to hell," he said.

"Probably will," her granny told him. "I'll save you a seat by the fire." She took the girl by the arm and drew her to the car; she backed up, swung around, and headed out the road toward the churchyard for her tools and dog. The whole way the girl said nothing, just hunched against the far door, staring hard-eyed out at the pines going past.

The woman finished watering the seed in, and collected her tools. As she worked, she muttered, "It's your own kin buried here, you might have the decency to glance this way one time. . . ." The girl was finger-tweezing her eyebrows in the side mirror. She didn't look around as the dog and the woman got in. Her granny shifted hard, sending the tools clattering in the trunk.

When they came to the main road, there were the men. Watching for them. Waiting for them. They kicked their machines into life and followed, close, bumping them, slapping the old fenders, yelling. The girl gave a wild glance around at the one by her door and said, "Gran'ma?" and as he drew his pistol, "Gran'ma!" just as the gun nosed into the open window. She frantically cranked the glass up between her and the weapon, and her granny, seeing, spat, "Fool!" She never had been one to pray for peace or rain. She stamped the accelerator right to the floor.

The motorcycles caught up. Now she braked, hard, and swerved off the road into an alley between the pines, not even wide enough for the school bus, just a fire scrape that came out a quarter mile from her own house, if she could get that far. She slewed on the pine straw, then righted, tearing along the dark tunnel through the woods. She had for the time being bested them; they were left behind. She was winning. Then she hit the wallow where the tadpoles were already five weeks old. The Chevy plowed in and stalled. When she got it cranked again, they were stuck. The tires spattered mud three feet up the near trunks as she tried to spin them out, to rock them out. Useless. "Get out and run!" she cried, but the trees were too close on the passenger side. The girl couldn't open her door. She wasted precious time having to crawl out under the steering wheel. The woman waited but the dog ran on.

They struggled through the dusky woods, their pace slowed by the thick straw and vines. Overhead, in the last light, the martins were reeling free and sure after their prey.

"Why? Why?" the girl gasped, as they lunged down the old deer trail. Behind them they could hear shots, and glass breaking as the men came to the bogged car. The woman kept on running, swatting their way clear through the shoulder-high weeds. They could see the Greer cottage, and made for it. But it was ivied-over, padlocked, the woodpile dry-rotting under its tarp, the electric meterbox empty on the pole. No help there.

The dog, excited, trotted on, yelping, his lips white-flecked. He scented the lake and headed that way, urging them on with thirsty yips. On the clay shore, treeless, deserted, at the utter limit of land, they stood defenseless, listening to the men coming on, between them and home. The woman pressed her hands to her mouth, stifling her cough. She was exhausted. She couldn't think.

"We can get under!" the girl cried suddenly, and pointed toward the Greers' dock, gap-planked, its walkway grounded on the mud. They splashed out to it, wading in, the woman grabbing up the telltale, tattletale dog in her arms. They waded out to the far end and ducked under. There was room between the foam floats for them to crouch neck-deep.

The dog wouldn't hush, even then; never had yet, and there wasn't time to teach him. When the woman realized that, she did what she had to do. She grabbed him whimpering; held him; held him under till the struggle ceased and the bubbles rose silver from his fur. They crouched there then, the two of them, submerged to the shoulders, feet unsteady on the slimed lake bed. They listened. The sky went from rose to ocher to violet in the cracks over their heads. The motorcycles had stopped now. In the silence there was the glissando of locusts, the dry crunch of boots on the flinty beach, their low man-talk drifting as they prowled back and forth. One of them struck a match.

"—they in these woods we could bum 'em out."

40 The wind carried their voices away into the pines. Some few words eddied back.

"—lippy old smartass do a little work on her knees besides praying—"

Laughter. It echoed off the deserted house. They were getting closer.

One of them strode directly out to the dock, walked on the planks over their heads. They could look up and see his boot soles. He was the one with the gun. He slapped a mosquito on his bare back and cursed. The carp, roused by the troubling of the waters, came nosing around the dock, guzzling and snorting. The girl and her granny held still, so still. The man fired his pistol into the shadows, and a wounded fish thrashed, dying. The man knelt and reached for it, chuffing out his beery breath. He belched. He pawed the lake for the dead fish, cursing as it floated out of reach. He shot it again, firing at it till it sank and the gun was empty. Cursed that too. He stood then and unzipped and relieved himself of some of the beer. They had to listen to that. To know that about him. To endure that, unprotesting.

Back and forth on shore the other one ranged, restless. He lit another cigarette. He coughed. He called. "Hey! They got away, man, that's all. Don't get your shorts in a wad. Let's go."

45 "Yeah." He finished. He zipped. He stumped back across the planks and leaped to shore, leaving the dock tilting amid widening ripples. Underneath, they waited.

The bike cranked. The other ratcheted, ratcheted, then coughed, caught, roared. They circled, cut deep ruts, slung gravel, and went. Their roaring died away and away. Crickets resumed and a near frog bic-bic-bicked.

Under the dock, they waited a little longer to be sure. Then they ducked below the water, scraped out from under the pontoon, and came up into free air, slogging toward shore. It had seemed warm enough in the water. Now they shivered. It was almost night. One streak of light still stood reflected on the darkening lake, drew itself thinner, narrowing into a final cancellation of day. A plane winked its way west.

The girl was trembling. She ran her hands down her arms and legs, shedding water like a garment. She sighed, almost a sob. The woman held the dog in her arms; she dropped to her knees upon the random stones and murmured, private, haggard, "Oh, honey," three times, maybe all three times for the dog, maybe once for each of them. The girl waited, watching. Her granny rocked the dog like a baby, like a dead child, rocked slower and slower and was still.

"I'm sorry," the girl said then, avoiding the dog's inert, empty eye.

50 "It was him or you," her granny said, finally, looking up. Looking her over. "Did they mess with you? With your britches? Did they?"

"No!" Then, quieter, "No, ma'am."

When the woman tried to stand up she staggered, lightheaded, clumsy with the freight of the dog. "No, ma'am," she echoed, fending off the girl's "Let me." And she said again, "It was him or you. I know that. I'm not going to rub your face in it." They saw each other as well as they could in that failing light, in any light.

The woman started toward home, saying, "Around here, we bear our own burdens." She led the way along the weedy shortcuts. The twilight bleached the dead limbs of the pines to bone. Insects sang in the thickets, silencing at their oncoming.

"We'll see about the car in the morning," the woman said. She bore her armful toward her own moth-ridden dusk-to-dawn security light with that country grace she had always had when the earth was reliably progressing underfoot. The girl walked close behind her, exactly where she walked, matching her pace, matching her stride, close enough to put her hand forth (if the need arose) and touch her granny's back where the faded voile was clinging damp, the merest gauze between their wounds.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. "How Far She Went" opens with the granddaughter yelling, "I hate it here!" Where is she, and why does she hate being there? Why is the granddaughter referred to as a "girl"?
2. What is the family history that defines the grandmother, her daughter Sylvie, and the granddaughter? What repeated pattern defines these three women? We learn of this family history when the grandmother is tending a grave. Why is this important?
3. Write a short essay that analyzes the character of the grandmother. What evidence can you find to support the argument that she is a strong and tough woman? What statements does the grandmother make that reveals her strength? What actions reveal the grandmother's strength?
4. Think about the title of the story. If we apply this title to the granddaughter, we could say that she clearly goes "too far" in encouraging the two motorcycle-riding men. When does the granddaughter realize that she has gone too far? How can we apply this title to the grandmother?
5. What does the grandmother do to her dog? Why? How does the grandmother explain her actions? Read and reread this section of the story, adding more detailed annotations to develop your interpretation.
6. The lake provides an important setting for the climactic action of the story. How does the lake provide an escape or "getaway" for the two women? How does the lake function on a symbolic level; for example, does the lake allow for a symbolic rebirth? Compare "How Far She Went" to "Greasy Lake." How and why do both stories feature lakes? In the two stories, how does the lake provide a backdrop for violence and sexuality? Do the lakes provide an escape from violence and sexuality, or do they heighten violent and sexual actions? Are the lakes a space of death or life, of love or hate?

CHAPTER 5

The Pleasures of Reading, Writing, and Thinking about Literature

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Connect the enjoyment of literature to the critical analysis of literature
- Consider how we interact with texts as readers and writers
- Use fiction to explore how literature creates connections
- Use graphic fiction to explore how literature makes and breaks rules
- Use poetry to explore how literature emphasizes language
- Use drama to explore how literature is a performance
- Use essays to explore how literature encourages discovery
- Write a personal response paper that captures your enjoyment of the literary work

The Pleasures of Literature

As you work to develop your writing skills by engaging in a careful analysis, we hope that you won't forget a starting point for this work: enjoyment! As you read a literary work for the first time, open yourself up to it as a pleasurable experience. Don't hesitate to ask yourself what characters you liked the most, what language you found most striking, what image seemed the most beautiful, or what plot twist was the most shocking. New insights often come from "gut reactions" to a literary work. As you start to think more critically about the work, your first responses will provide a foundation for more considered and careful analysis. You will start to ask why you reacted to a character, a word, an image, or a scene, and your enjoyment of the literary work will deepen as you think it through more fully. Ultimately, you'll enjoy the process of critical analysis itself, seeing it as an extension of your enjoyment of the literary work.

Let's read a microfiction that, although short, has many enjoyable elements.

Allen Woodman

Allen Woodman is a professor of creative writing at Northern Arizona University. He has published numerous short stories, including very short stories like this one, often called "flash fiction" or "microfiction." He has published six books, including a children's picture book and a collection of humorous short stories for adults, Saved by Mr. F. Scott Fitzgerald.

Wallet

Tired of losing his wallet to pickpockets, my father, at seventy, makes a phony one. He stuffs the phony wallet with expired food coupons and losing Florida Lottery tickets and a fortune cookie fortune that reads, "Life is the same old story told over and over."

In a full-length mirror, he tries the wallet in the back pocket of his pants. It hangs out fat with desire. "All oyster," he says to me, "no pearl."

We drive to the mall where he says he lost the last one. I am the wheelman, left behind in the car, while my father cases a department store.

He is an old man, trying to act feeble and childlike, and he overdoes it like stage makeup on a community-theater actor. He has even brought a walking stick for special effect. Packages of stretch socks clumsily slip from his fingers. He bends over farther than he has bent in years to retrieve them, allowing the false billfold to rise like a dark wish and be grappled by the passing shadow of a hand,

5 Then the unexpected happens. The thief is chased by an attentive salesclerk. Others join in. The thief subdued, the clerk holds up the reclaimed item. "Your wallet, sir. Your wallet." As she begins opening it, searching for identification, my father runs toward an exit. The worthless articles float to the floor.

Now my father is in the car, shouting for me to drive away. There will be time enough for silence and rest. We are both stupid with smiles and he is shouting, "Drive fast, drive fast."

[1996]

When we read this story, we found ourselves smiling with the characters, and we hope you did, too. Let's ask some general questions about the story, considering aspects of it that you might have found pleasurable.

- Did you find the story funny? At what points in the story did you laugh or smile?
- Did you like the setup of the plot—the idea that the father is creating a "sting" that will catch a thief?
- Are there elements of the story that struck you as true, capturing the way a real person might think or act?
- Did you like the father/son relationship? Does it seem to be a caring or a loving relationship?
- Are there details in the story that you found funny, such as the father pretending to drop packages of stretch socks?
- Did you find the ending of the story to be enjoyable? Would you label it a happy ending?

As we try to determine where our pleasure in the story comes from, we must dig deeper into the literary work. The more we look at the story, the more we see. Let's continue our questioning but make the questions more specific, trying to determine what details of the story we found most enjoyable and what ideas are triggered by those details.

- As we think about the planning of the "sting" operation, what elements of it are interesting: The idea of the father wanting the pickpocket to steal something? The father's creation of a false wallet that will be the pickpocket's "reward"? The father's desire to act like a victim?
- Let's take these questions about the sting operation one step further: Is the father's plan interesting because the father is taking justice into his own hands? Is the plan interesting because the father is creating his own form of punishment for the pickpocket? Rather than just catching the thief, does the father seem to want to play with the thief?
- What details of the fake wallet are funny—and interesting? Why are the food coupons "expired" and the lottery tickets "losing" tickets? Why does the wallet have to be "fat," and what does the phrase "fat with desire" mean? Why does the father say, "All oyster, no pearl"? What does that mean?
- Let's look at the wallet even more closely. Why does the fortune cookie fortune read, "Life is the same old story told over and over"? Because this fortune is placed within quotation marks at the beginning of the story, it seems important. Does the father seem to be accepting or rejecting this fortune?
- What do you make of the father's overacting when he sets himself up as a victim? How does the description of his overacting make the story even funnier?
- At the end of the story, "the unexpected happens." Although this story is very short, it plays with our expectations, setting up a plot twist that we—and the characters—don't expect. How does the salesclerk who catches the thief "ruin" the father's plan? Why would the father want the thief to take the wallet and not to be caught?
- The end of this story is even more unexpected: The father runs away! Why is this ending exciting? Like a snowball rolling down a hill, the plot seems to pick up speed. Why does the father not stay and explain himself and the wallet?
- Let's consider the plot as a whole. Why does the father set up an elaborate plan to have his son act like a "wheelman" and then, at the end of the story, run out to the car and yell "drive fast, drive fast"? Is the father acting like a thief who needs a getaway car? Why? Isn't the father supposed to be the innocent victim?

We hope that, as you reexamine the story and question it further, your enjoyment of it will increase. The story becomes more interesting as you look at its details: The father and son are acting like robbers, the father likes overacting and creating elaborate props, and the father seems to be in it for the chase and not for catching the thief. Ultimately, the story disproves the fortune cookie fortune: It is not "the same old story told over and over." Perhaps that's why we like it.

The Pleasures of Analyzing the Texts That Surround Us

We engage in the activity of responding to texts on a daily if not hourly basis. Reading for enjoyment is something we do so constantly that we almost don't even notice it. If you define a text as constructed material that conveys a message that can be read closely, almost anything that we watch or read can be seen as a text that is worthy of analysis: a film, a TV show, a video game, advertising campaigns, a Facebook page, a blog post, or a Twitter feed. These forms of text share many qualities of literature, borrowing literary elements to be successful forms of entertainment.

We assume that you enjoy these many forms of text. Film and TV shows are obviously contemporary forms of drama, using actors, plotted action, crafted dialogue, and staged sets to tell a story. A video game allows you to enter into a carefully constructed world that uses characters, setting, and symbols to make its fictional landscape feel real. An advertising campaign often connects its visual imagery to poetic language—compressed language that is carefully chosen and sequenced to create emotional reactions. Even the digital communication that surrounds consists of texts that have literary elements: A Facebook page often aims to create a perfected person, as if he or she were a character; a blog post is an essay that conveys ideas while emphasizing the writer's voice and personal style; and a Twitter post forces readers to use short bits of language in creative ways that become poetic. Some of these texts are more artistically constructed than others, to be sure, but they all can trigger our interest and critique.

Your reactions to these many texts are probably similar to your reactions to literature: At first, you might enjoy the text, but then you might slow down and think about its meaning and create a more considered response. You might love a character in a TV show, but when the character does something unexpected in an episode, you might find yourself disturbed by it, thinking, "Why did the show have him do that?" Or, you might initially laugh at a friend's text message but then find yourself returning to it again and again, asking, "What does she really mean?" Or, you might snap a photo of an advertisement and send it to your friends, finding yourself explaining why you found it beautiful or inspirational.

As you negotiate your text-saturated world, your immediate reaction might be to like or dislike a text, but you might then ask questions about it, analyze it, and form opinions about it. This is the same type of inquiry and analysis process that underlies critical thinking and is also the process that we use to interpret literature and move toward writing about it.

The Pleasures of Authoring Texts

When you write an essay, you become an author yourself. Just as you respond to a text message by writing a quick text in return, you should respond to literary writing with writing—this is the best way to develop your critical thinking skills. Engage with thought-provoking writing by taking on the role of writer yourself. Unlike a short-story writer or poet, your essays will consist chiefly of

- analysis and
- argument (you want to persuade your reader that your analysis makes sense)

but your essay will surely also include

- exposition (you may have to define terms or summarize someone else's argument) and
- narration (you may have to summarize a plot)

and you will have to use an appropriate

- style (largely a matter of tone)

In short, when you are writing any essay, even when your emphasis is largely analytic and argumentative, you will probably use all the devices that all good writers use to hold the attention of readers and to convince readers that you have something to say that is worth hearing. Also, you will have something to offer when you think seriously about both the work you are discussing and the work you are producing that you will submit to your classmates and instructor. Read each draft in a mildly critical spirit; keep asking yourself if your imagined readers will find it convincing and engaging. Here are some of the questions that you should ask yourself:

- Have I located an interesting and engaging topic that I am excited to explore and that my reader will want to explore with me?
- Have I defined terms that may be crucial to my analysis (for instance, immoral, realistic, pathetic, tragic, sentimental)?
- Have I given just the right amount of evidence (too little evidence will leave readers unconvinced; too much evidence may bore them)?
- Do transitions take the reader easily from sentence to sentence and from paragraph to paragraph?
- Is my title engaging, does my opening paragraph arouse interest, and does my final paragraph provide an effective ending?
- Is my tone appropriate?

The point about tone is worth further comment. As a writer of arguments, you want your readers to trust you. How do writers gain the trust of readers? Usually, by being

- knowledgeable (the writer quotes accurately and does not make errors of fact),
- fair (the writer does not ignore contrary evidence), and
- courteous (the writer conveys an impression of goodwill and does not come across to the reader as a smart aleck).

Enjoy stepping into the role of author and taking on the challenge of writing a well-crafted essay.

The Pleasures of Interacting with Texts

We enjoy literature because we interact with it on many levels and in many ways: We can be entertained by it, question it, critique it, reread and reconsider it, memorize it, be inspired by it, and, of course, write about it. One of the pleasures of literature is that it forces us to think in unexpected ways—new thinking is often triggered by the interesting ways in which our minds interact with literature. Reading literature is an active endeavor, and the more that we see it as a dynamic pursuit that we can shape, the more we can enjoy it.

We interact with many types of texts in a typical day: informational alerts coming across social media, journalistic stories in the newspaper, opinionated blogs posted online, film clips on YouTube, and personal text messages received from friends. We know that different types of texts require different responses; we might quickly skim and reply to some texts, whereas we might carefully read and reread others. Literature, too, takes many forms that encourage many types of interaction. The major forms of literature include fiction, poetry, drama, and nonfiction. These types of literature can be subdivided further; for example, fiction includes short stories, novellas, novels, and graphic novels. These forms are often referred to as "genres" of literature, but genre is also used to indicate the content and style of the work, including the epic, comedy, tragedy, satire, or romance.

Let's examine the different genres of literature that we explore more fully in Part 3, Chapters 11–15: fiction, graphic fiction, poetry, drama, and the essay. Let us also look at some of the ways in which we can create active relationships with these forms of literature. Our goal is to create dynamic interactions with the sample literary works that we present here; to that end, we ask you questions in the "Joining the Conversation" section that immediately follows each work.

Interacting with Fiction: Literature as Connection

Literature often depicts human relationships, exploring characters defined by their emotional, psychological, familial, or social connections. When we read a narrative text—a poem, a play, or a piece of fiction that tells a story—we expect to encounter characters who are trying to connect with each other. The characters might achieve some sort of harmony or experience some sort of conflict and division, giving why they were or were not able to connect. What we might not think about are the ways in which the characters create connections with us.

A character provides one of the most powerful ways in which we connect to literature, giving the reader access to the emotions and thoughts that accompany a story, a poem, or a play. Characters make literature human, allowing us to put ourselves in the place of the fictional persons and imagine living in their world. While characters help us move "into" a story, characters also seem to step "outside" of the story, encouraging us to imagine them existing in our real world.

Characters are only one way in which we connect to literature. We might connect to the description of a specific place depicted in a story, be drawn to compelling images in a poem, or enjoy the patterns of sounds in a line spoken in a play. As readers, we create a multitude of connections with a literary work, and these connections are fertile ground for critical thinking and writing.

Let's turn to a short story by Jamaica Kincaid that features the relationship between a mother and daughter. In this story, you will hear two voices, one of which is that of a mother who is tutoring her adolescent daughter for her future role as a woman. In addition to this mother-daughter relationship, think about the connection that this story creates between its characters and you, the reader. The story captures a mother speaking to her daughter, but think about how that voice is also speaking to you.

Jamaica Kincaid

Jamaica Kincaid was born in 1949 on the island of Antigua, in the West Indies, which at that time was a British colony. At the age of seventeen, she emigrated to the United States, where she still lives, although much of her writing continues to be set in Antigua. She has written several novels, including Annie John and Lucy, and works of nonfiction, including essays on gardening.

Kincaid informs us that benna, mentioned early in the story, refers to "songs of the sort your parents didn't want you to sing, at first calypso and later rock and roll."

Girl

Wash the white clothes on Monday and put them on the stone heap; wash the color clothes on Tuesday and put them on the clothesline to dry; don't walk barehead in the hot sun; cook pumpkin fritters in very hot sweet oil; soak your little clothes right after you take them off; when buying cotton to make yourself a nice blouse, be sure that it doesn't have gum on it, because that way it won't hold up well after a wash; soak salt fish overnight before you cook it; is it true that you sing benna in Sunday school?; always eat your food in such a way that it won't turn someone else's stomach; on Sundays try to walk like a lady and not like the slut you are so bent on becoming; don't sing benna in Sunday school; you mustn't speak to wharf-rat boys, not even to give directions; don't eat fruits on the street—flies will follow you; but I don't sing benna on Sundays at all and never in Sunday school; this is how to sew on a button; this is how to make a buttonhole for the button you have just sewed on; this is how to hem a dress when you see the hem coming down and so to prevent yourself from looking like the slut I know you are so bent on becoming; this is how you iron your father's khaki shirt so that it doesn't have a crease; this is how you iron your father's khaki pants so that they don't have a crease; this is how you grow okra—far from the house, because okra tree harbors red ants; when you are growing dasheen, make sure it gets plenty of water or else it makes your throat itch when you are eating it; this is how you sweep a corner; this is how you sweep a whole house; this is how you sweep a yard; this is how you smile to someone you don't like too much; this is how you smile to someone you don't like at all; this is how you smile to someone you like completely; this is how you set a table for tea; this is how you set a table for dinner; this is how you set a table for dinner with an important guest; this is how you set a table for lunch; this is how you set a table for breakfast; this is how to behave in the presence of men who don't know you very well, and this way they won't recognize immediately the slut I have warned you against becoming; be sure to wash every day, even if it is with your own spit; don't squat down to play marbles—you are not a boy, you know; don't pick people's flowers—you might catch something; don't throw stones at blackbirds, because it might not be a blackbird at all; this is how to make a bread pudding; this is how to make doukona; this is how to make pepper pot; this is how to make a good medicine for a cold; this is how to make a good medicine to throw away a child before it even becomes a child; this is how to catch a fish; this is how to throw back a fish you don't like, and that way something bad won't fall on you; this is how to bully a man; this is how a man bullies you; this is how to love a man, and if this doesn't work there are other ways, and if they don't work don't feel too bad about giving up; this is how to spit up in the air if you feel like it, and this is how to move quick so that it doesn't fall on you; this is how to make ends meet; always squeeze bread to make sure it's fresh; but what if the baker won't let me feel the bread?; you mean to say that after all you are really going to be the kind of woman who the baker won't let near the bread?

[1978]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is the relationship being dramatized by the story? How would you describe the connection between the mother and her daughter?

2. What are the essential lessons the mother wants to impart to her daughter? Some of the lessons relate to tasks and chores, such as washing clothes, sewing buttons, and ironing pants. However, other lessons relate to the maturation of a young girl, including how to connect to other people and relationships with men. What categories of knowledge is the mother sharing with her daughter, and why?
3. How does the mother's voice reach out and grab the listener? What are some of the ways in which the mother's voice is constructed to sound spoken? How does the voice become a dynamic, energetic force?
4. Try reading a section of "Girl" out loud in a rhythmical pattern, giving the two speakers distinctive voices. Then reread the story, trying to incorporate the rhythms mentally into your reading. How do the rhythms compare with speech rhythms that are familiar to you?
5. What do you make of the girl's second (and last) line of dialogue in "Girl," and what do you make of the mother's response to it?
6. Think of your own connection to the story. How does the story create a strong connection between you and its characters?

Personal Response Essay

One way to capture your enjoyment of a literary work is to write a personal response paper. A personal response paper emphasizes the reader's understanding of, and reaction to, the assigned literary text. In response-focused writing, the writer typically explains what he or she finds most thought provoking—most interesting, intriguing, confusing, enjoyable, or frustrating—about the text. A response paper often emphasizes emotional reactions and can overtly explain what the writer liked and didn't like about a text. It is thus often fun to write a response paper, as it allows more subjective self-expression than an analytical paper.

A response paper is more informal than an analytical paper, but it can serve as a good starting point for interpretation. As we've emphasized, personal response is often the first step toward critical thinking. If you were completing a response paper, your writing would explore the literary work by emphasizing the ideas, opinions, and emotions that it triggered. These insights could then be used to develop an interpretation and a more argumentative paper. By asking you to focus on a close reading of the text and the reactions that reading generates, a response draft helps you to avoid focusing on plot summary or ideas that are too general. Instead, the response draft allows you to chart and assess your specific reactions to specific literary elements or specific aspects of the text. Your responses demonstrate your comprehension of the text's information, your investigation into why certain parts of the text elicit certain reactions, and your ability to generate both emotional and intellectual insights about the text.

Student Personal Response Essay: "The Narrator in Jamaica Kincaid's 'Girl': Questioning the Power of Voice"

Let's look at a sample personal response essay to see how one student takes her immediate reactions to the story and turns them into writing. The essay captures the student's emotional response but also contains many excellent interpretations of the story. These ideas could become the basis of a more formal analytical paper.

Jackie Bracken
Professor Holmes
English 101
29 January 2016

The Narrator in Jamaica Kincaid's "Girl": Questioning the Power of Voice

Presented as a monologue, Jamaica Kincaid's "Girl" records a mother's voice as she lectures her young daughter. The short story takes a unique form: it is the mother's listing of all of the activities that the girl must be able to do, from washing to eating to walking to cooking to attracting men. The mother tells the girl exactly how to do each activity, giving her precise directions. The short story is all one sentence, so that it takes the form of a never-ending lecture that overwhelms the listening girl. This voice is a very commanding one that overwhelmed me—it seemed to be commanding me as I was reading the story. At first, I did not like this overwhelming nature of the story. I think I was feeling like I was the daughter! But, on rereading the story, I began to admire the mother and her knowledge. I think the story captures the mother/daughter relationship very well, showing the power of the mother over the daughter. As I reread the short story, I admired the mother, but I also felt that the girl must be overwhelmed by the mother's power. As a result, I think the story forces the reader to question the mother/daughter relationship, asking if this is a healthy form of control.

The story shows the mother lecturing the girl, telling her all the tasks she must do. On a first reading, I was overwhelmed by the number of tasks the girl would be asked to do. The girl is being trained to be a woman and to take on many domestic duties in the household. The tasks include specific instruction on how to do numerous domestic chores such as cooking, washing, and ironing shirts. For example, the girl is told, "This is how to sew a button; this is how to make a button hole for the button you have just sewed on; this is how to hem a dress when you see the hem coming down" (122).

The girl is under pressure to perform many different jobs. As a reader, I felt the pressure that the girl was under. The reader is made to feel the weight of those responsibilities.

The mother makes this control even more meaningful by connecting that control to the girl's sexuality. Interspersed within the mother's lecture are many comments about the girl becoming a "slut" and not being able to control her relationships with men. For example, the mother's lecture about the button holes continues to say, "this is how to hem a dress when you see the hem coming down and so to prevent yourself from looking like the slut I know you are so bent on becoming" (122). The use of the shocking word "slut" reveals that the girl's sexuality worries the mother. The girl's sexuality becomes a repeated issue. I am sure the daughter has no privacy. I think the mother wants to control her daughter's psychological, emotional and sexual maturation—and gives her instructions on all aspects of her life. We do not get to hear enough from the girl to know how she feels about it, but I think she might resent these instructions.

In addition to a long list of tasks, for each task, the mother makes sure to include all possibilities on how to perform that task. For example, the mother tells the girl how to cook fish—and then later includes instructions on how to catch the fish. As a result, the girl has a huge list of responsibilities. The pattern of the mother's lecture is to start with a small activity and to then keep broadening that task out to become bigger and bigger. The mother's lecture seems to start with just a few instructions about washing, but the instructions quickly grow to include almost any job the girl might have. For example, when the girl is told how to sweep, it starts with a focused act of sweeping, but then expands to include almost every type of sweeping: the mother says "this is how you sweep a corner; this is how you sweep a whole house; this is how you sweep a yard" (122). I expected her to next say, "this is how you sweep the world"! The mother's control is not only controlling the girls' physical tasks and sexual life, but also so large that it encompasses all aspects of her life—her entire world.

I was overwhelmed by the mother's non-stop voice. I think Kincaid is making the voice extreme to make the mother's control of her daughter clear. I can see that Kincaid wants the voice to come across as extreme even if it disturbs the reader. The mother's rapid-fire listing of the tasks makes it difficult for the girl to get a word in edge-wise. She answers back to the mother when she says, "but I don't sing benna on Sundays at all and never in Sunday school," but the mother seems to be ignoring and talking right over her (122). The girl's statement is ignored and lost in the stream of the mother's words. Toward the end of the story, the girl wonders what would happen if a baker won't let the he squeeze the bread. The mother finally answers back and gives a contradictory response: "you mean to say that after all you are really going to be the kind of woman who the baker won't let near the bread?" (122). She tells the girl that she must grow into a woman who will be allowed to squeeze the bread. Thus, the mother wants to control her daughter's sexuality, but also allow her to grow into an attractive woman

Once I understood that the mother's voice was supposed to be overwhelming, I wound up liking it and respecting that it was strong. But, the mother's voice is so strong, it left me wondering if the girl would ever be able to grow into that powerful, attractive woman. I can't imagine the girl ever getting free from that voice. I questioned if the mother would allow her daughter to take over her own life. I wondered if the non-stop directions meant that the girl would not be able to experiment with her own actions, test her own knowledge, and figure out her own direction in life. The mother's lecture proves that she loves her daughter by trying to teach her. However, the lecture is so all-controlling, it makes me wonder if the girl will be able to take control of her own life.

Bracken 4

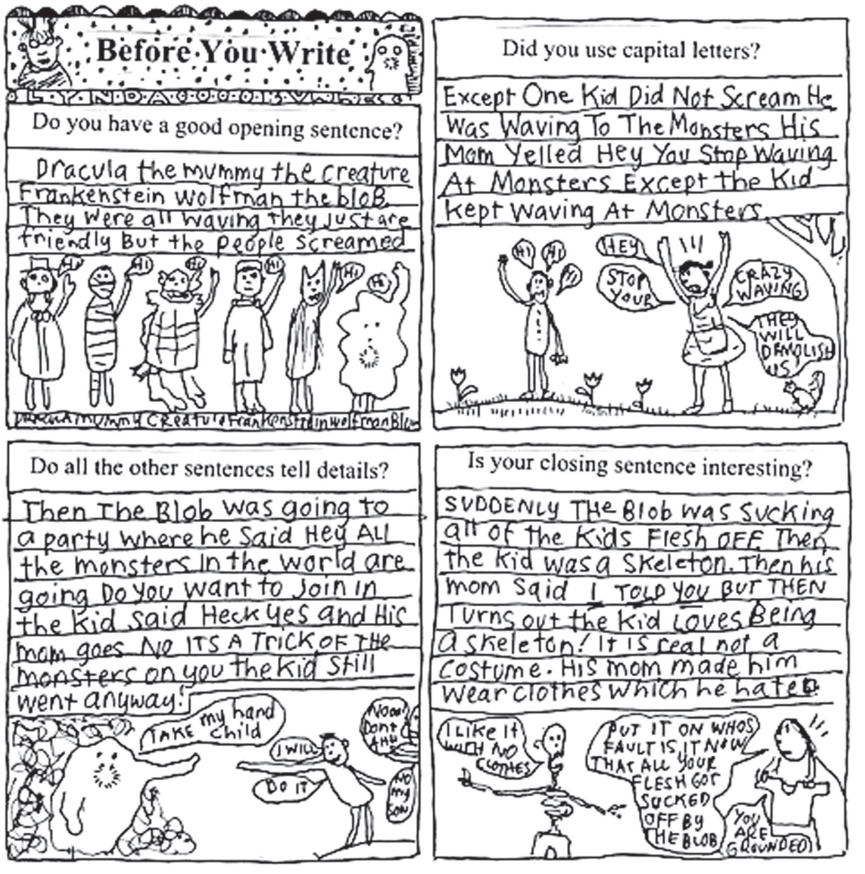
Work Cited

Kincaid, Jamaica. "Girl." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 122. Print.

Interacting with Graphic Fiction: Literature as (Making and Breaking) Rules

Why do we play board games like chess and card games like solitaire? Perhaps we find it enjoyable to have both structure and freedom: We follow strict rules while also inventing new ways to use those rules. Or, perhaps, we find it satisfying to have predictability and unpredictability: We know the steps of a game, but we don't know when and how they'll be reached. Literature fulfills some of these same desires. It sets up rules and steps that the writer invents "within," allowing the writer to balance structure and freedom, predictability and unpredictability. As a reader, you are invited to enter into the game. You can be "in the know," predicting how the literary text's rules might work and being intrigued, even entertained, by the writer's inventiveness in following or breaking those rules.

Different literary forms or genres follow different rules. In fiction, we expect to connect with characters, follow a series of events or plot, imagine a setting, and interpret symbols. In fiction, it would be strange (but not totally impossible) for a character to suddenly start speaking in rhyme; in poetry, however, we might expect a persona to express him or herself in rhyme, and we wouldn't protest that a "real" person wouldn't speak that way. When we watch a play, we similarly don't protest when a character has to speak his or her internal thoughts aloud so that the audience can hear them. In drama, we expect ideas to be expressed through dialogue and movement on the stage, rather than in lengthy descriptions that we might find in novels.



In each of these genres, we know the "rules of the game" and expect a literary work to follow those rules, or conventions. At the same time, we enjoy when a literary work breaks those rules in a purposeful or artful way. For example, some plays will feature a moment when an actor turns to and directly addresses the audience, called "breaking the fourth wall." We might enjoy this moment when the actor disrupts the illusion that the play is real and reminds us that we are watching a piece of fiction.

Much contemporary literature likes to remind us that it is fictional—and remind us of the rules it is following or not following. We say that something is meta when it refers to or comments on itself. "Meta" is a term that signals that a work is self-referential; metafiction is thus "fiction about fiction." For example, a metafictional story might contain a character who shares the author's name and who interrupts the story to say, "Wait, let me rewrite this scene." Let's look at a short graphic text that calls attention to the storytelling it is engaged in.

Lynda Barry

Lynda Barry (born in 1956) is an award-winning cartoonist who started her career with a weekly comic strip, "Ernie Pook's Comeek." One of these comic strips is reprinted here. She has written illustrated and graphic novels, and most recently she has experimented with innovative how-to books that use collage, journal writing, poetic language, and comics to show people how to develop their creativity.

Before You Write

[c. 1990]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. This short graphic narrative is one of Barry's weekly comic strips published as "Ernie Pook's Comeek." It is a comic strip that is comic, or funny. What strikes you as funny about this graphic narrative? In literary terms, a "comic" story typically has a happy ending. Does this story have a happy ending?

2. What elements of the graphic narrative are unexpected and thus cause the pleasure of surprise? How does the story being told contain unexpected elements? How does the graphic imagery contain unexpected elements?
3. How is this graphic narrative an example of metafiction or metanarrative? How does the writing refer to itself as writing and call attention to the writing process? Consider the instructions at the top of each frame. How is the (supposed) young writer of this comic strip following and breaking these rules of writing?
4. Much of the humor of the comic strip comes from the disconnect between the writing instructions (presumably instructions typed on a worksheet by an adult teacher) and the story that comes under the instructions. How does the teacher who made the writing instructions think about the writing process? How does the kid writing the story think about the writing process?
5. Think of the relationship between the verbal text and the visual text. How do the illustrations add more meaning to the story? Look, for example, at what the mother is saying in the images.

Interacting with Poetry: Literature as Language

It seems obvious to state that literature is made out of language—but it seems important to emphasize that literature puts more pressure on the use of words than everyday communication. The artistic, creative, and imaginative use of language is an essential component of literary expression.

In literature, ideas are compressed into words that must be "unpacked," or analyzed, in a close and detailed manner that draws out all possible meanings. Literary language can be compared to a suitcase filled with layers of a traveler's belongings; words can be opened up and unpacked, with each layer examined for possible meanings. If we unpack a suitcase and remove hiking boots, we can guess that the traveler is going hiking. However, if, by digging deeper into the suitcase, we then unpack a Spanish phrase book, a guide to Aztec ruins, and a sketch book, we will have a much clearer, richer idea of the traveler's plans. Literary language encourages the reader to open up and tease out hidden meanings. If we explore a word long enough, we can locate its multiple meanings and come to richer conclusions about the larger meaning of the work. "Unpacking" opens up language and reveals ideas that we might have missed if we had only skimmed the surface.

Poetry makes literature's interest in creative language clear. While fiction and drama use words to build up their plots and characters, poetry strips thoughts, emotions, and actions down to their essential representation in words. A poem calls attention to language as its core element, emphasizing word selection, order, and sound. Specific words are carefully placed within the larger structures of the line, stanza, and whole of the poem. It is through these deceptively simple acts that literary meaning is created. When we are exploring the importance of literary language, it makes sense to examine poetry.

Let's turn to two poems that seem to be having great fun with language, specifically the new forms of language being created today through texting and tweeting. Texts and tweets feature short, compressed language that can take imaginative forms—an everyday parallel to poetry and thus great subjects for poetry itself.

Julia Bird

Born and educated in England, Julia Bird entered a poetry contest sponsored by a British publication, the Guardian. The ground rules: Write a poem limited to the 160 characters of the mobile phone screen. Bird's poem won a Special Prize of £250 (about $400) for what the Guardian "called the most creative use of SMS 'shorthand' in a poem."

14: a txt msg poM

his is r bunsn brnr b1%,
his hair lyk fe filings
W/ac/dc going thru.
I sit by him in kemistry,
It splits my @oms
wen he :-)s @ me.

Translation
14: a text message poem.
his eyes are bunsen burner blue,
his hair like iron filings with ac/dc going through.
I sit by him in chemistry,
it splits my atoms
when he smiles at me.

[2001]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. How does this poem use language in unexpected ways? The use of "r" for "are" in line 1 is certainly not original, but do you find things in this piece that strike you as highly imaginative and especially entertaining?
2. How is the translation itself an interesting use of language? Which form of language do you prefer: the text message or the translation? Why?
3. Imagine that you are the person about whom Bird wrote her poem. Are you pleased, or not? Write a text poem in response.

With the rise of social media, contemporary poets have taken up the challenge of trying to make their creative writing fit within the constraints of internet-based communication. Just like the constraints provided by poetic forms such as the sonnet (which must be fourteen lines long that follow a set rhyme scheme) or the haiku (which is typically three lines following a pattern of 5-7-5 syllables), social media offers formal "rules" for writing that challenge the poet. For example, Twitter has a text limit of 140 characters. Let's look at how a famous contemporary poet, Billy Collins, accepts that challenge.

Billy Collins

For a biographical note on Billy Collins, see page 245.

Twitter Poem

The poem creates a space.
It hides in a tent in a forest.
Making its own bed it falls asleep in the dark,
wakes up under a lamp or the sun.

[2011]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. If this poem was not labelled a "Twitter Poem," would you know that it follows the rules of a tweet?
2. Collins explains that a poem creates its own "space." Compare the space described in the poem to the space of the internet. Is this poem creating a space for poetry within the "forest" of social media? Can you continue to interpret the poem as a commentary on today's communication?
3. How does Collins characterize poetry? Is the poem strong and forceful? Or, is it meek and passive? Why would a poet imagine a poem hiding and sleeping? Does the poem have any positive qualities, such as self-reliance? How does the last line change the image of the poem? Does it offer a hopeful image of a poem coming to life? Why do you think the poem offers the images of both "a lamp" and "the sun"?

Interacting with Drama: Literature as Performance

Literature often encourages performance. All of us at times "perform" literary works when we tell stories in public. We read a fairy tale to children, or we tell a joke to a friend. When we were children, we recited nursery rhymes, perhaps even performing them by bouncing a ball or skipping rope to the accompaniment of the lines. Moreover, we sing lullabies, hymns, birthday greetings, and national anthems, and on New Year's Eve, we may sing Robert Burns's great poem, "Auld Lang Syne."

When Robert Frost said that a poem is "a performance in words," he was not speaking of poetry recitations, though Frost himself was an expert reciter and apparently a born showman. (If Frost had a weakness as a performer, it was that he insisted on being a soloist and never gave readings with other poets: "I only go / When I'm the show.") When Frost said that a poem was a performance in words, he was saying that the writer does things with words, more or less as a juggler performs with Indian clubs or balls, as a singer performs with vocal cords and air, and as a dancer or an athlete performs with the body. The writer's artistic materials are words, which the writer manipulates into something attractive and meaningful. All forms of literature can be seen as performances—artistic creations that come to life for an audience.

Drama is the literary genre that is most obviously connected to performance. A play is meant to be spoken aloud, presented in real time and space on a stage, and acted in front of a live audience. As with fiction and poetry, the dramatic work encourages us to create an active relationship with it. When we read a play, we can't help but envision actors following the stage directions, imagine lines being spoken aloud, and see sets and props used as part of the dramatic action. Our engagement with the play makes us, the readers, into its performers. Reading a short except from a famous play, The Importance of Being Earnest, demonstrates just how enjoyable "performing" a play—imagining it come to life as you read it—can be.

Oscar Wilde

Famous for his razor-sharp wit, Oscar Wilde (1854–1900) was an Irish writer who composed plays, novels, poetry, and essays, He was one of the most popular playwrights in London in the late nineteenth century. His brilliance did not spare him the prejudice of his times: He was involved in a libel trial that accused him of homosexuality; he was found guilty and imprisoned for two years, causing ill health that precipitated his death.

Excerpt from The Importance of Being Earnest

This excerpt from Wilde's play, The Importance of Being Earnest (1895), features a young woman, Cecily, who has been creating a fictional romance for herself. In this scene, she meets the object of her predetermined affection, Algernon (whom she insists on calling Ernest), and explains how she has manufactured their love affair. The scene opens with the butler, Merriman, announcing that Algernon's one-horse carriage, called a dogcart, is ready.

[Enter MERRIMAN.]

MERRIMAN: The dog-cart is at the door, sir.

[ALGERNON looks appealingly at CECILY.]

CECILY: It can wait, Merriman for . . . five minutes.

MERRIMAN: Yes, Miss. [Exit MERRIMAN.]

ALGERNON: I hope, Cecily, I shall not offend you if I state quite frankly and openly that you seem to me to be in every way the visible personification of absolute perfection.

CECILY: I think your frankness does you great credit, Ernest. If you will allow me, I will copy your remarks into my diary. [Goes over to table and begins writing in diary.]

ALGERNON: Do you really keep a diary? I'd give anything to look at it. May I?

CECILY: Oh no. [Puts her hand over it.] You see, it is simply a very young girl's record of her own thoughts and impressions, and consequently meant for publication. When it appears in volume form I hope you will order a copy. But pray, Ernest, don't stop. I delight in taking down from dictation. I have reached 'absolute perfection.' You can go on. I am quite ready for more.

ALGERNON: [Somewhat taken aback.] Ahem! Ahem!

CECILY: Oh, don't cough, Ernest. When one is dictating one should speak fluently and not cough. Besides, I don't know how to spell a cough. [Writes as ALGERNON speaks.]

ALGERNON: [Speaking very rapidly.] Cecily, ever since I first looked upon your wonderful and incomparable beauty, I have dared to love you wildly, passionately, devotedly, hopelessly.

CECILY: I don't think that you should tell me that you love me wildly, passionately, devotedly, hopelessly. Hopelessly doesn't seem to make much sense, does it?

ALGERNON: Cecily!

[Enter MERRIMAN.]

MERRIMAN: The dog-cart is waiting, sir.

ALGERNON: Tell it to come round next week, at the same hour.

MERRIMAN: [Looks at Cecily, who makes no sign.] Yes, sir.

[Merriman retires.]

CECILY: Uncle Jack would be very much annoyed if he knew you were staying on till next week, at the same hour.

ALGERNON: Oh, I don't care about Jack. I don't care for anybody in the whole world but you. I love you, Cecily. You will marry me, won't you?

CECILY: You silly boy! Of course. Why, we have been engaged for the last three months.

ALGERNON: For the last three months?

CECILY: Yes, it will be exactly three months on Thursday.

ALGERNON: But how did we become engaged?

CECILY: Well, ever since dear Uncle Jack first confessed to us that he had a younger brother who was very wicked and bad, you of course have formed the chief topic of conversation between myself and Miss Prism. And of course a man who is much talked about is always very attractive. One feels there must be something in him, after all. I daresay it was foolish of me, but I fell in love with you, Ernest.

ALGERNON: Darling! And when was the engagement actually settled?

CECILY: On the 14th of February last. Worn out by your entire ignorance of my existence, I determined to end the matter one way or the other, and after a long struggle with myself I accepted you under this dear old tree here. The next day I bought this little ring in your name, and this is the little bangle with the true lover's knot I promised you always to wear.

ALGERNON: Did I give you this? It's very pretty, isn't it?

CECILY: Yes, you've wonderfully good taste, Ernest. It's the excuse I've always given for your leading such a bad life. And this is the box in which I keep all your dear letters. [Kneels at table, opens box, and produces letters tied up with blue ribbon.]

ALGERNON: My letters! But, my own sweet Cecily, I have never written you any letters.

CECILY: You need hardly remind me of that, Ernest. I remember only too well that I was forced to write your letters for you. I wrote always three times a week, and sometimes oftener.

ALGERNON: Oh, do let me read them, Cecily?

CECILY: Oh, I couldn't possibly. They would make you far too conceited. [Replaces box.] The three you wrote me after I had broken off the engagement are so beautiful, and so badly spelled, that even now I can hardly read them without crying a little.

ALGERNON: But was our engagement ever broken off?

CECILY: Of course it was. On the 22nd of last March. You can see the entry if you like. [Shows diary.] 'To-day I broke off my engagement with Ernest. I feel it is better to do so. The weather still continues charming.'

ALGERNON: But why on earth did you break it off? What had I done? I had done nothing at all. Cecily, I am very much hurt indeed to hear you broke it off. Particularly when the weather was so charming.

CECILY: It would hardly have been a really serious engagement if it hadn't been broken off at least once. But I forgave you before the week was out.

ALGERNON: [Crossing to her, and kneeling.] What a perfect angel you are, Cecily.

CECILY: You dear romantic boy. [He kisses her, she puts her fingers through his hair.] I hope your hair curls naturally, does it?

ALGERNON: Yes, darling, with a little help from others.

CECILY: I am so glad.

ALGERNON: You'll never break off our engagement again, Cecily?

CECILY: I don't think I could break it off now that I have actually met you. [. . .]

[1895]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. According to Cecily, what are the elements of a romantic relationship? How has Cecily fulfilled all the criteria of a romantic relationship on her own?
2. Does Cecily reveal that a romantic relationship is a performance? Through this comedy, is Wilde encouraging us to conclude that all romance contains an element of performance?
3. Part of what make this scene funny is the completeness of Cecily's delusion: She maintains her deluded sense of romance even as she explains it to Algernon. How does Algernon react? Does he talk her out of her delusion? Wilde has obviously created absurdly unrealistic characters. How does this rejection of realism make this a more enjoyable play?
4. How does the writing figure into this scene? How and why is Wilde mocking certain uses of writing? For example, what does Cecily plan to do with her diary? How does Cecily organize her letters?
5. Consider Frost's explanation that a poem is a "performance in words." How is Wilde using language as a performance? How does he juggle certain words for maximum effect? How do the words and ideas of loving "hopelessly," "charming" weather, and hair curling "with a little help from others" become comic?

Interacting with Essays: Literature as Discovery

Literature is born out of our never-ending search for meaning—our search for the "big ideas" that help us to think big thoughts. Importantly, this search is not one of locating a single right answer put in place by an author. Rather, this search is an act of interpretation, in which we help to create the meaning we seek. The big idea of a literary work is not simply given to us; we must work to locate, define, and question it. That activity is one of discovery: It allows us to determine what we think the literary work is about. When we read a literary work, we hope to gain a new idea or interesting insight: We want a reward for the intellectual effort of reading. That reward is not just for our new ideas, but also for our development of our interpretive abilities.

The literary essay is a nonfiction essay that takes a personal, reflective, or narrative form. As we will explore in Chapter 11, essays can also take argumentative or expository forms, and the essays that you write analyzing literature fall into these categories. In all of these essay forms, the writer often wrestles with a "big idea" that is important enough to write about. In more literary forms of the essay, that exploration of ideas often features a process of personal discovery. The author is not arguing an idea that he or she has already decided but, rather, is often inviting us, the readers, to take a voyage and discover ideas along with the author.

Although the literary essay explores a factual issue, it often borrows the techniques and structures of fictional literature. For example, it might feel like a story; the essay might feature moments that are given a plot-like structure to emphasize their importance, interesting character-like persons that represent specific ideas, or concerns that become theme-like as they develop through realization and insight. The essay presents carefully shaped ideas, and that shaping aligns it with literature. Although it details factual ideas, the literary essay can embellish those ideas with imaginative elements because it is exploring ideas through the unique perspective of the author; that perspective can include creative interpretations, observations, reflections, dreams, hopes, fears, and delusions—all of the stuff that makes human thought an interesting and unique journey.

In the following essay, Anna Lisa Raya charts a process of discovery, specifically self-discovery, which focuses on language and race. Let's explore how her essay allows us, in turn, to discover new ideas about race and identity in America.

Anna Lisa Raya

Anna Lisa Raya, daughter of a second-generation Mexican American father and a Puerto Rican mother, grew up in Los Angeles, California, but went to Columbia University in New York. While an undergraduate at Columbia, she wrote and published this essay on identity.

It's Hard Enough Being Me

When I entered college, I discovered I was Latina. Until then, I had never questioned who I was or where I was from: My father is a second-generation Mexican-American, born and raised in Los Angeles, and my mother was born in Puerto Rico and raised in Compton, Calif. My home is El Sereno, a predominantly Mexican neighborhood in L.A. Every close friend I have back home is Mexican. So I was always just Mexican. Though sometimes I was just Puerto Rican–like when we would visit Mamo (my grandma) or hang out with my Aunt Titi.

Upon arriving in New York as a first-year student, 3000 miles from home, I not only experienced extreme culture shock, but for the first time I had to define myself according to the broad term "Latina." Although culture shock and identity crisis are common for the newly minted collegian who goes away to school, my experience as a newly minted Latina was, and still is, even more complicating. In El Sereno, I felt like I was part of a majority, whereas at the College I am a minority.

I've discovered that many Latinos like myself have undergone similar experiences. We face discrimination for being a minority in this country while also facing criticism for being "whitewashed" or "sellouts" in the countries of our heritage. But as an ethnic group in college, we are forced to define ourselves according to some vague, generalized Latino experience. This requires us to know our history, our language, our music, and our religion. I can't even be a content "Puerto Mexican" because I have to be a politically-and-socially-aware-Latina-with-a-chip-on-my-shoulder-because-of-how-repressed-I-am-in-this-country.

I am none of the above. I am the quintessential imperfect Latina. I can't dance salsa to save my life, I learned about Montezuma and the Aztecs in sixth grade, and I haven't prayed to the Virgen de Guadalupe in years.

5 Apparently I don't even look Latina. I can't count how many times people have just assumed that I'm white or asked me if I'm Asian. True, my friends back home call me güera ("whitey") because I have green eyes and pale skin, but that was as bad as it got. I never thought I would wish my skin were a darker shade or my hair a curlier texture, but since I've been in college, I have—many times.

Another thing: My Spanish is terrible. Every time I call home, I berate my mama for not teaching me Spanish when I was a child. In fact, not knowing how to speak the language of my home countries is the biggest problem that I have encountered, as have many Latinos. In Mexico there is a term, pocha, which is used by native Mexicans to ridicule Mexican-Americans. It expresses a deep-rooted antagonism and dislike for those of us who were raised on the other side of the border. Our failed attempts to speak pure, Mexican Spanish are largely responsible for the dislike. Other Latin American natives have this same attitude. No matter how well a Latino speaks Spanish, it can never be good enough.

Yet Latinos can't even speak Spanish in the U.S. without running the risk of being called "spic" or "wetback." That is precisely why my mother refused to teach me Spanish when I was a child. The fact that she spoke Spanish was constantly used against her: It prevented her from getting good jobs, and it would have placed me in bilingual education—a construct of the Los Angeles public school system that has proved to be more of a hindrance to intellectual development than a help.

To be fully Latina in college, however, I must know Spanish. I must satisfy the equation: Latina [equals] Spanish-speaking.

So I'm stuck in this black hole of an identity crisis, and college isn't making my life any easier, as I thought it would. In high school, I was being prepared for an adulthood in which I would be an individual, in which I wouldn't have to wear a Catholic school uniform anymore. But though I led an anonymous adolescence, I knew who I was. I knew I was different from white, black, or Asian people. I knew there was a language other than English that I could call my own if I only knew how to speak it better. I knew there were historical reasons why I was in this country, distinct reasons that make my existence here easier or more difficult than other people's existence. Ultimately, I was content.

10 Now I feel pushed into a corner, always defining, defending, and proving myself to classmates, professors, or employers. Trying to understand who and why I am, while understanding Plato or Homer, is a lot to ask of myself.

A month ago, I heard three Nuyorican (Puerto Ricans born and raised in New York) writers discuss how New York City has influenced their writing. One problem I have faced as a young writer is finding a voice that is true to my community. I was surprised and reassured to discover that as Latinos, these writers had faced similar pressures and conflicts as myself; some weren't even taught Spanish in childhood. I will never forget the advice that one of them gave me that evening: She said that I need to be true to myself. "Because people will always complain about what you are doing—you're a 'gringa' or a 'spic' no matter what," she explained. "So you might as well do things for yourself and not for them."

I don't know why it has taken 20 years to hear this advice, but I'm going to give it a try. Soy yo and no one else. Punto.[1]

[1994]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Raya opens her essay by explaining how she discovers the different racial categories she might belong to. In her first paragraph, Raya says that, although her parents are American citizens, until she went to New York she "was always just Mexican" or "just Puerto Rican." Why do you suppose she thought this way? Then, when she goes to college in New York, she is a "Latina." What does this change in terminology represent?
2. In her second paragraph, Raya says that in New York she "had to" define herself as "Latina," and in her third paragraph, she says that many members of "minority" communities "are forced" to define themselves. In paragraph 10, she says, "Now I feel pushed into a corner, always defining, defending, and proving myself to classmates, professors, or employers. Trying to understand who and why I am, while understanding Plato or Homer, is a lot to ask. . . ." Is Raya saying that both the majority culture and the minority culture force her to define herself? Drawing on your own experience, give your views on whether it is a good thing or a bad thing (or some of each) to be forced to define oneself in terms of ethnicity.
3. Today, the words Latino and Latina are common, but until perhaps fifteen years ago, Spanish-speaking people from Mexico, Central America, and South America were called Hispanics or Latin Americans. Do you think these terms are useful, or do you think that the differences between, say, a poor black woman from Cuba and a rich white man from Argentina are so great that it makes very little sense to put them into the same category, whether the category is called Latino, Hispanic, or Latin American? Why, incidentally, do you think that Latino/Latina is now preferred to Hispanic?
4. In paragraph 7, Raya speaks of the Los Angeles bilingual educational program as "a construct of the Los Angeles public school system that has proved to be more of a hindrance to intellectual development than a help." If you have been in a bilingual educational program, evaluate the program. Did it chiefly help you or chiefly hinder you? Explain.
5. In her last two paragraphs, Raya explains that after an acquaintance told her to be true to herself, she concluded, "Soy yo" ("I'm me," or "I'm myself"). You may recall that in Hamlet Polonius says to his son Laertes, "This above all: to thine own self be true" (1.3.78). But what does it mean to be true to oneself? Presumably, one doesn't behave immorally, but beyond that, what does one do? For instance, if a friend suggested to Raya that she might enjoy (and intellectually profit from) taking a course in Latin American literature, in making a decision, what self would she be true to?
6. In your own life, you make many decisions each day. Are many of them based on being true to yourself? Again, putting aside questions concerning immorality, do you think you have a "self" that you are true to? If so, is this self, at least in part, based on ethnicity?

[1] Soy yo . . . Punto I'm me . . . Period. (Editors' note.)

Your Turn: Additional Poems, Stories, and Essays for Pleasurable Analysis

Poems

Jimmy Santiago Baca

Jimmy Santiago Baca, of Chicano and Apache descent, was born in 1952. When he was two years old, his parents divorced, and a grandparent brought him up until he was five years old, at which time he was placed in an orphanage in New Mexico. He ran away when he was eleven years old, lived on the streets, took drugs, and at the age of twenty was convicted of drug possession. In prison, he taught himself to read and write, and he began to compose poetry. A fellow inmate urged him to send some poems to Mother Jones magazine, and the work was accepted. In 1979, Louisiana State University Press published a book of his poems, Immigrants in Our Own Land. Since then, he has published several other books.

Green Chile

I prefer red chile over my eggs and potatoes for breakfast.
Red chile ristros° decorate my door,
dry on my roof, and hang from eaves.
They lend open-air vegetable stands historical grandeur, and gently swing with an air of festive welcome.
I can hear them talking in the wind, haggard, yellowing, crisp, rasping tongues of old men, licking the breeze.

But grandmother loves green chile.
When I visit her,
she holds the green chile pepper
in her wrinkled hands.
Ah, voluptuous, masculine an air of authority and youth simmers from its swan-neck stem, tapering to a flowery collar, fermenting resinous spice.
A well-dressed gentleman at the door
my grandmother takes sensuously in her hand, rubbing its firm glossed sides,
caressing the oily rubbery serpent,
with mouth-watering fulfillment,
fondling its curves with gentle fingers.
Its bearing magnificent and taut
as flanks of a tiger in mid-leap, she thrusts her blade into and cuts it open, with lust

3 ristras strings.

on her hot mouth, sweating over the stove, bandanna round her forehead,
mysterious passion on her face
as she serves me green chile con carne between soft warm leaves of corn tortillas, with beans and rice—her sacrifice to her little prince.
I slurp from my plate
with last bit of tortilla, my mouth burns and I hiss and drink a tall glass of cold water.

All over New Mexico, sunburned men and women drive rickety trucks stuffed with gunny sacks of green chile, from Belen, Veguita, Willard, Estancia, San Antonio y Socorro, from fields to roadside stands, you see them roasting green chile in screen-sided homemade barrels, and for a dollar a bag, we relive this old, beautiful ritual again and again.

[1989]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Sensory imagery appeals to any of the five senses: touch, sight, smell, taste, and hearing. Reread "Green Chile," and annotate its sensory imagery, noting what senses are addressed. What words are used to trigger each sense? How and why does Baca appeal to the senses to capture the powerful appeal of the green chile?
2. In the second stanza, the poem uses sexual imagery to describe the grandmother's love of the chile. What does the grandmother do to the chile, which is compared to a "well-dressed gentleman"? Does Rios convey the sensuous nature of cooking and eating? What words do you find to be the most successful in conveying the sensual nature of food? Does Rios succeed in capturing the enjoyment of the chile?
3. The last stanza provides a sudden shift in setting, tone, and imagery. What ideas are addressed in this stanza? Why does Rios add this stanza? Do you like that it leaves the grandmother's kitchen behind? How does this stanza place eating green chile in a larger context? In your opinion, would the poem be more or less successful if it did not contain this last stanza?
4. Alberto Rio's Nani" and Jimmy Santiago Baca's "Green Chile" both describe eating food prepared by a grandmother. How would you compare the two poems? What is the relationship between the speaker and the grandmother that each poet is trying to capture? What is the relationship between food and family that each poet is trying to capture?

Alberto Rios

The poems of Alberto Rios (1952–) capture his Mexican American heritage, often using magical realism to convey the experience of bridging two cultures. Rios teaches at Arizona State University and in 2013 was named the Inaugural Poet Laureate of Arizona. He has published several collections of poetry, three short-story collections, and a memoir. He has won numerous awards for his poetry, including six Pushcart Prizes and the Arizona Governor's Arts.

*Nani

Sitting at her table, she serves the sopa de arroz° to me instinctively, and I watch her,
the absolute mamá, and eat words
I might have had to say more out of embarrassment. To speak, now-foreign words I used to speak, too, dribble down her mouth as she serves me albondigas.° No more than a third are easy to me.
By the stove she does something with words and looks at me only with her back. I am full. I tell her
I taste the mint, and watch her speak smiles at the stove. All my words make her smile. Nani never serves herself, she only watches me with her skin, her hair. I ask for more.

I watch the mamá warming more tortillas for me. I watch her fingers in the flame for me.
Near her mouth, I see a wrinkle speak of a man whose body serves the ants like she serves me, then more words from more wrinkles about children, words about this and that, flowing more easily from these other mouths. Each serves as a tremendous string around her, holding her together. They speak nani was this and that to me and I wonder just how much of me will die with her, what were the words
I could have been, was. Her insides speak through a hundred wrinkles, now, more than she can bear, steel around her, shouting, then, What is this thing she serves?

She ask me if I want more.
I own no words to stop her.
Even before I speak, she serves.

[1982]

* Nani "grandmother."
2 sopa de arroz rice soup. 9 albondigas meatballs.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. The poem's speaker describes eating rice soup and meatballs served by his nani, or grandmother. This meal, however, seems to be more about language than food. He explains that he "eats words" (line 4). What does this mean? What does it mean that his nani's words are "now-foreign" (line 7)?
2. The poem's speaker offers the image that his nani's words are "a tremendous string around her, holding her together" (lines 28–29). How is his grandmother's identity connected to words? How does she use words? What does she do with words?
3. The poem's speaker connects the grandmother's words to his own identity, explaining that he wonders "what were the words I could have been, was" (lines 33–34). Does this realization give the poem an emotional resonance? For example, does this line convey a sense of sadness?
4. Examine the last stanza of the poem. Why does the speaker not stop his grandmother from serving more food? Write a response paper that explains the relationship between the speaker and his nani, using the poem's ending as a starting point.

William Carlos Williams

William Carlos Williams (1883–1963) was the son of an English traveling salesman and a Basque-Jewish woman. The couple met in Puerto Rico and settled in Rutherford, New Jersey, where Williams was born. He spent his life there, practicing as a pediatrician and writing poems in the moments between appointments.

This Is Just to Say

I have eaten
the plums that were in the icebox

and which you were probably saving for breakfast

Forgive me
they were delicious
so sweet and so cold

[1934]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Williams's poem is famous for its simplicity. In your opinion, is this poem successful? How does this poem play with our expectations of poetry? Can a direct and straightforward statement be a poem? Or, do you expect a poem to be complex and difficult to understand? Try rewriting a stanza of the poem, using your own words to convey the same images and ideas. Does your rewriting become longer and more complex than the original poem? Can stripping down a poem to its essential words be a difficult—and artistic—activity?

2. Why is the poem broken down into three stanzas? How does each stanza contain a different action or thought? Does each stanza add a new layer of meaning to the poem?
3. The last lines of the poem offer an excuse as to why the speaker has eaten the plums. Do these words help you to feel the attraction of the plums? Compare Williams's poem with Helen Chasin's "The Word Plum." How do both poets try to capture the appeal of the fruit? Which language appeals to you more: Williams's direct statement or Chasin's sensuous imagery? How would you explain each poet's strategy for, or approach to, describing a plum?

Helen Chasin

Born in 1938, Helen Chasin grew up in Brooklyn, New York, and attended Radcliffe College. In addition to teaching at Emerson College, she has served as a Bread Loaf Scholar in Poetry at Middlebury College and a Bunting Institute Fellow at Harvard University. Her poems are often praised for their use of warmth and playfulness to address serious aspects of social and personal change.

The Word Plum

The word plum is delicious

pout and push, luxury of self-love, and savoring murmur full in the mouth and falling like fruit

taut skin pierced, bitten, provoked into juice, and tart flesh question and reply, lip and tongue of pleasure.

[1968]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Chasin's title and first line of the poem makes it clear that she is focusing on the word plum rather than on the plum itself. However, she also makes it clear that the word conveys the qualities of the fruit. What aspects of the fruit are captured in the word plum?
2. How is speaking the word plum like eating plum? How does Chasin make us think about the relationship between speaking and eating? For example, how does Chasin emphasize the mouth? What is "full in the mouth" (line 4)?
3. What are your favorite words in this poem? How does Chasin call attention to the power of words? As she investigates how the word plum conveys meaning, how does Chasin herself use evocative words? Look carefully at the words that Chasin uses and how she organizes them. For example, note all of the verbs that she uses to capture the action of speaking the word plum. Also, note the sounds that are emphasized and repeated.

Gary Soto

Born in 1952, Gary Soto grew up in one of the barrios, or urban Mexican American neighborhoods, of Fresno, California. His poetry often depicts the daily life of growing up in this community. His parents and grandparents worked as farm laborers, and Soto worked in the area's fields and factories. Inspired by the literature that he discovered in a library, including works by Hemingway and Steinbeck, Soto took creative writing classes at California State University, Fresno, and studied with the famous poet Philip Levine. He earned a graduate degree in creative writing at the University of California–Irvine. A prolific author, he has written eleven collections of poetry for adults, three novels, a memoir, and numerous works for children and young adults.

Oranges

The first time I walked
With a girl, I was twelve,
Cold, and weighted down
With two oranges in my jacket.
December. Frost cracking
Beneath my steps, my breath
Before me, then gone,
As I walked toward
Her house, the one whose Porch light burned yellow
Night and day, in any weather.
A dog barked at me, until
She came out pulling
At her gloves, face bright
With rouge. I smiled,
Touched her shoulder, and led
Her down the street, across
A used car lot and a line
Of newly planted trees,
Until we were breathing
Before a drugstore. We Entered, the tiny bell
Bringing a saleslady
Down a narrow aisle of goods.
I turned to the candies
Tiered like bleachers,
And asked what she wanted—
Light in her eyes, a smile
Starting at the corners
Of her mouth. I fingered
A nickle in my pocket,
And when she lifted a chocolate

That cost a dime,
I didn't say anything.
I took the nickle from
My pocket, then an orange,
And set them quietly on
The counter. When I looked up,
The lady's eyes met mine,
And held them, knowing
Very well what it was all About.

Outside,
A few cars hissing past,
Fog hanging like old
Coats between the trees.
I took my girl's hand
In mine for two blocks.
Then released it to let
Her unwrap the chocolate.
I peeled my orange
That was so bright against
The gray of December
That, from some distance,
Someone might have thought
I was making a fire in my hands.

[1983]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is the exchange that takes place with the shopkeeper? Is the exchange one of money or something more? Why is this exchange important?
2. How does Soto's word choice, or diction, capture the realities of the narrator's neighborhood? How would you characterize the style and level of the language: simple, ornate, complex, academic, or straightforward? Why is the style of Soto's language a good match for his subject matter?
3. Soto's last line describes the orange as "making a fire in my hands." Write a short interpretation of this image. How can an orange be a fire? Why does the narrator have a fire in his hands? Is this image positive or negative? Why does the poem end with this image?
4. Consider the young girl featured in the poem. How do we know that she enjoys this first neighborhood date? Why is her choice of the chocolate important? What does the chocolate represent?

Sarah N. Cleghorn

Sarah N. Cleghorn (1876–1959) was born in Manchester, Vermont. A Quaker, she was active in pacifist, antivivisectionist, and women's suffrage movements. Among her many books are The True Ballad of Glorious Harriet Tubman (1933) and an autobiography, Threescore (1936).

The Golf Links

The golf links lie so near the mill
    That almost every day
The laboring children can look out
    And see the men at play.

[1917]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Check the meanings of ironic, satiric, and sarcastic in a dictionary, and decide which, if any, of these words applies well to Cleghorn's poem.
2. The poem was published in 1917, when child labor was common. (Children as young as ten years old worked as much as fifteen hours a day in mills. In 1916—a year before the poem was published—Congress had passed the Child Labor Act, but in 1918 the Supreme Court struck down the act, arguing that Congress did not have the right to control labor within a state.) Today, however, child labor in the United States is virtually nonexistent. Is there any point, then, in reading this poem? Set forth your response in a brief argument, perhaps of two paragraphs.

Stevie Smith

The British poet Florence Margaret "Stevie" Smith (1902–71) is known for using deceptively simple language to explore complex themes. Although her poems address topics such as death and religion, they are often light, witty, and playful, as seen in "Not Waving but Drowning." She wrote three novels and nine volumes of poetry, and she often published her poetry with accompanying doodles and drawings.

Not Waving but Drowning

Nobody heard him, the dead man,
But still he lay moaning:
I was much further out than you thought
And not waving but drowning.
Poor chap, he always loved larking
And now he's dead
It must have been too cold for him his heart gave way,
They said.

Oh, no no no, it was too cold always (Still the dead one lay moaning)
I was much too far out all my life
And not waving but drowning.

[1957]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is the meaning of the title, "Not Waving but Drowning"? How does the title explain the poem's focus on "the dead man"? Did you find the poem's presentation of a dead man unexpected?

2. Who are the different speakers in the poem? Map the different speakers, stanza by stanza. How are these different speakers explaining the event of the drowning?
3. In line 9, the dead man explains, "I was much too far out all my life." What does this mean? How does this line connect a description of swimming to a more abstract description of how the man lived his life? Does this line help to explain his life and his death?

STORIES

AMBROSE BIERCE

Ambrose Bierce (1842–1914?) was born in Horse Creek, Ohio, but soon his family moved to Indiana, where at the age of nineteen he enlisted in the Union Army. In the next four years, he fought in several of the bloodiest battles of the Civil War, was wounded twice, and rose to the rank of lieutenant. After the war, he worked as a journalist in San Francisco, England, and again in San Francisco. In 1912, he went to Mexico to cover the Mexican Revolution, but he disappeared there, and it is assumed that he died in 1914.

Bierce's literary reputation rests chiefly on one story, reprinted here, but he wrote other stories of interest—some about the supernatural—as well as a witty, cynical book called The Devil's Dictionary. Here is a sample definition: "Marriage. The state or condition of a community consisting of a master, a mistress, and two slaves, making in all, two."

An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge

1

A man stood upon a railroad bridge in northern Alabama, looking down into the swift water twenty feet below. The man's hands were behind his back, the wrists bound with a cord. A rope closely encircled his neck. It was attached to a stout cross-timber above his head and the slack fell to the level of his knees. Some loose boards laid upon the sleepers[1] supporting the metals of the railway supplied a footing for him and his executioners—two private soldiers of the Federal army, directed by a sergeant who in civil life may have been a deputy sheriff. At a short remove upon the same temporary platform was an officer in the uniform of his rank, armed. He was a captain. A sentinel at each end of the bridge stood with his rifle in the position known as "support," that is to say, vertical in front of the left shoulder, the hammer resting on the forearm thrown straight across the chest—a formal and unnatural position, enforcing an erect carriage of the body. It did not appear to be the duty of these two men to know what was occurring at the center of the bridge; they merely blockaded the two ends of the foot planking that traversed it.

Beyond one of the sentinels nobody was in sight; the railroad ran straight away into a forest for a hundred yards, then, curving, was lost to view. Doubtless there was an outpost farther along. The other bank of the stream was open ground—a gentle acclivity topped with a stockade of vertical tree trunks, loop-holed for rifles, with a single embrasure through which protruded the muzzle of a brass cannon commanding the bridge. Midway of the slope between bridge and fort were the spectators—a single company of infantry in line, at "parade rest," the butts of the rifles on the ground, the barrels inclining slightly backward against the right shoulder, the hands crossed upon the stock. A lieutenant stood at the right of the line, the point of his sword upon the ground, his left hand resting upon his right. Excepting the group of four at the center of the bridge, not a man moved. The company faced the bridge, staring stonily, motionless. The sentinels, facing the banks of the stream, might have been statues to adorn the bridge. The captain stood with folded arms, silent, observing the work of his subordinates, but making no sign. Death is a dignitary who when he comes announced is to be received with formal manifestations of respect, even by those most familiar with him. In the code of military etiquette silence and fixity are forms of deference.

[1] sleepers railroad crossties.

The man who was engaged in being hanged was apparently about thirty-five years of age. He was a civilian, if one might judge from his habit, which was that of a planter. His features were good—a straight nose, firm mouth, broad forehead, from which his long, dark hair was combed straight back, falling behind his ears to the collar of his well-fitting frock-coat. He wore a mustache and pointed beard, but no whiskers; his eyes were large and dark gray, and had a kindly expression which one would hardly have expected in one whose neck was in the hemp. Evidently this was no vulgar assassin. The liberal military code makes provision for hanging many kinds of persons, and gentlemen are not excluded.

The preparations being complete, the two private soldiers stepped aside and each drew away the plank upon which he had been standing. The sergeant turned to the captain, saluted and placed himself immediately behind that officer, who in turn moved apart one pace. These movements left the condemned man and the sergeant standing on the two ends of the same plank, which spanned three of the crossties of the bridge. The end upon which the civilian stood almost, but not quite, reached a fourth. This plank had been held in place by the weight of the captain; it was now held by that of the sergeant. At a signal from the former the latter would step aside, the plank would tilt and the condemned man go down between two ties. The arrangement commended itself to his judgment as simple and effective. His face had not been covered nor his eyes bandaged. He looked a moment at his "unsteadfast footing," then let his gaze wander to the swirling water of the stream racing madly beneath his feet. A piece of dancing driftwood caught his attention and his eyes followed it down the current. How slowly it appeared to move! What a sluggish stream!

5 He closed his eyes in order to fix his last thoughts upon his wife and children. The water, touched to gold by the early sun, the brooding mists under the banks at some distance down the stream, the fort, the soldiers, the piece of drift—all had distracted him. And now he became conscious of a new disturbance. Striking through the thought of his dear ones was a sound which he would neither ignore nor understand, a sharp, distinct, metallic percussion like the stroke of a blacksmith's hammer upon the anvil; it had the same ringing quality. He wondered what it was, and whether immeasurably distant or near by—it seemed both. Its recurrence was regular, but as slow as the tolling of a death knell. He awaited each stroke with impatience and—he knew not why—apprehension. The intervals of silence grew progressively longer; the delays became maddening. With their greater infrequency the sounds increased in strength and sharpness. They hurt his ear like the thrust of a knife; he feared he would shriek. What he heard was the ticking of his watch.

He unclosed his eyes and saw again the water below him. "If I could free my hands," he thought, "I might throw off the noose and spring into the stream. By diving I could evade the bullets and, swimming vigorously, reach the bank, take to the woods and get away home. My home, thank God, is as yet outside their lines; my wife and little ones are still beyond the invader's farthest advance."

As these thoughts, which have here to be set down in words, were flashed into the doomed man's brain rather than evolved from it the captain nodded to the sergeant. The sergeant stepped aside.

2

Peyton Farquhar was a well-to-do planter, of an old and highly respected Alabama family. Being a slave owner and like other slave owners a politician he was naturally an original secessionist and ardently devoted to the Southern cause. Circumstances of an imperious nature, which it is unnecessary to relate here, had prevented him from taking service with the gallant army that had fought the disastrous campaigns ending with the fall of Corinth,[2] and he chafed under the inglorious restraint, longing for the release of his energies, the larger life of the soldier, the opportunity for distinction. That opportunity, he felt, would come, as it comes to all in war time. Meanwhile he did what he could. No service was too humble for him to perform in aid of the South, no adventure too perilous for him to undertake if consistent with the character of a civilian who was at heart a soldier, and who in good faith and without too much qualification assented to at least a part of the frankly villainous dictum that all is fair in love and war.

One evening while Farquhar and his wife were sitting on a rustic bench near the entrance to his grounds, a gray-clad soldier rode up to the gate and asked for a drink of water. Mrs. Farquhar was only too happy to serve him with her own white hands. While she was fetching the water her husband approached the dusty horseman and inquired eagerly for news from the front.

"The Yanks are repairing the railroads," said the man, "and are getting ready for another advance. They have reached the Owl Creek bridge, put it in order and built a stockade on the north bank. The commandant has issued an order, which is posted everywhere, declaring that any civilian caught interfering with the railroad, its bridges, tunnels or trains will be summarily hanged. I saw the order."

"How far is it to the Owl Creek bridge?" Farquhar asked.

"About thirty miles."

"Is there no force on this side the creek?"

"Only a picket post half a mile out, on the railroad, and a single sentinel at this end of the bridge."

"Suppose a man—a civilian and student of hanging—should elude the picket post and perhaps get the better of the sentinel," said Farquhar, smiling, "what could he accomplish?"

The soldier reflected. "I was there a month ago," he replied, "I observed that the flood of last winter had lodged a great quantity of driftwood against the wooden pier at this end of the bridge. It is now dry and would burn like tow."

The lady had now brought the water, which the soldier drank. He thanked her ceremoniously, bowed to her husband and rode away. An hour later, after nightfall, he repassed the plantation, going northward in the direction from which he had come. He was a Federal scout.

[2] Corinth Corinth, Mississippi, where Confederate forces were defeated, 3–4 October, 1862.

3

As Peyton Farquhar fell straight downward through the bridge he lost consciousness and was as one already dead. From this state he was awakened—ages later, it seemed to him—by the pain of a sharp pressure upon his throat, followed by a sense of suffocation. Keen, poignant agonies seemed to shoot from his neck downward through every fiber of his body and limbs. These pains appeared to flash along well-defined lines of ramification and to beat with an inconceivably rapid periodicity. They seemed like streams of pulsating fire heating him to an intolerable temperature. As to his head, he was conscious of nothing but a feeling of fulness—of congestion. These sensations were unaccompanied by thought. The intellectual part of his nature was already effaced; he had power only to feel, and feeling was torment. He was conscious of motion. Encompassed in a luminous cloud, of which he was now merely the fiery heart, without material substance, he swung through unthinkable arcs of oscillation, like a vast pendulum. Then all at once, with terrible suddenness, the light about him shot upward with the noise of a loud plash; a frightful roaring was in his ears, and all was cold and dark. The power of thought was restored; he knew that the rope had broken and he had fallen into the stream. There was no additional strangulation; the noose about his neck was already suffocating him and kept the water from his lungs. To die of hanging at the bottom of a river!—the idea seemed to him ludicrous. He opened his eyes in the darkness and saw above him a gleam of light, but how distant, how inaccessible! He was still sinking, for the light became fainter and fainter until it was a mere glimmer. Then it began to grow and brighten, and he knew that he was rising toward the surface—knew it with reluctance, for he was now very -comfortable. "To be hanged and drowned," he thought, "that is not so bad; but I do not wish to be shot. No; I will not be shot; that is not fair."

He was not conscious of an effort, but a sharp pain in his wrist apprised him that he was trying to free his hands. He gave the struggle his attention, as an idler might observe the feat of a juggler, without interest in the outcome. What splendid effort!—what magnificent, what superhuman strength! Ah, that was a fine endeavor! Bravo! The cord fell away; his arms parted and floated upward; the hands dimly seen on each side in the growing light. He watched them with new interest as first one and then the other pounced upon the noose at his neck. They tore it away and thrust it fiercely aside, its undulations resembling those of a water-snake. "Put it back, put it back!" He thought he shouted these words to his hands, for the undoing of the noose had been succeeded by the direst pang that he had yet experienced. His neck ached horribly; his brain was on fire; his heart, which had been fluttering faintly, gave a great leap, trying to force itself out at his mouth. His whole body was racked and wrenched with an insupportable anguish! But his disobedient hands gave no heed to the command. They beat the water vigorously with quick, downward strokes, forcing him to the surface. He felt his head emerge; his eyes were blinded by the sunlight; his chest expanded convulsively, and with a supreme and crowning agony his lungs engulfed a great draught of air, which instantly he expelled in a shriek!

He was now in full possession of his physical senses. They were, indeed, preternaturally keen and alert. Something in the awful disturbance of his organic system had so exalted and refined them that they made record of things never before perceived. He felt the ripples upon his face and heard their separate sounds as they struck. He looked at the forest on the bank of the stream, saw the individual trees, the leaves and the veining of each leaf—saw the very insects upon them: the locusts, the brilliant-bodied flies, the gray spiders stretching their webs from twig to twig. He noted the prismatic colors in all the dewdrops upon a million blades of grass. The humming of the gnats that danced above the eddies of the stream, the beating of the dragon-flies' wings, the strokes of water-spider's legs, like oars which had lifted their boat—all these made audible music. A fish slid along beneath his eyes and he heard the rush of its body parting the water.

He had come to the surface facing down the stream; in a moment the visible world seemed to wheel slowly round, himself the pivotal point, and he saw the bridge, the fort, the soldiers upon the bridge, the captain, the sergeant, the two privates, his executioners. They were in silhouette against the blue sky. They shouted and gesticulated, pointing at him. The captain had drawn his pistol, but did not fire; the others were unarmed. Their movements were grotesque and horrible, their forms gigantic.

Suddenly he heard a sharp report and something struck the water smartly within a few inches of his head, spattering his face with spray. He heard a second report, and saw one of the sentinels with his rifle at his shoulder, a light cloud of blue smoke rising from the muzzle. The man in the water saw the eye of the man on the bridge gazing into his own through the sights of the rifle. He observed that it was a gray eye and remembered having read that gray eyes were keenest, and that all famous marksmen had them. Nevertheless, this one had missed.

A counter-swirl had caught Farquhar and turned him half round; he was again looking into the forest on the bank opposite the fort. The sound of a clear, high voice in a monotonous singsong now rang out behind him and came across the water with a distinctness that pierced and subdued all other sounds, even the beating of the ripples in his ears. Although no soldier, he had frequented camps enough to know the dread significance of that deliberate, drawling, aspirated chant; the lieutenant on shore was taking a part in the morning's work. How coldly and pitilessly—with what an even, calm intonation, presaging, and enforcing tranquility in the men—with what accurately measured intervals fell those cruel words:

"Attention, company! . . . Shoulder arms! . . . Ready! . . . Aim! . . . Fire!"

25 Farquhar dived—dived as deeply as he could. The water roared in his ears like the voice of Niagara, yet he heard the dulled thunder of the volley and, rising again toward the surface, met shining bits of metal, singularly flattened, oscillating slowly downward. Some of them touched him on the face and hands, then fell away, continuing their descent. One lodged between his collar and neck; it was uncomfortably warm and he snatched it out.

As he rose to the surface, gasping for breath, he saw that he had been a long time under water; he was perceptibly farther down stream—nearer to safety. The soldiers had almost finished reloading; the metal ramrods flashed all at once in the sunshine as they were drawn from the barrels, turned in the air, and thrust into their sockets. The two sentinels fired again, independently and ineffectually.

The hunted man saw all this over his shoulder; he was now swimming vigorously with the current. His brain was as energetic as his arms and legs; he thought with the rapidity of lightning.

"The officer," he reasoned, "will not make that martinet's error a second time. It is as easy to dodge a volley as a single shot. He has probably already given the command to fire at will. God help me, I cannot dodge them all!"

An appalling plash within two yards of him was followed by a loud, rushing sound, diminuendo,[3] which seemed to travel back through the air to the fort and died in an explosion which stirred the very river to its deeps! A rising sheet of water curved over him, fell down upon him, blinded him, strangled him! The cannon had taken a hand in the game. As he shook his head free from the commotion of the smitten water he heard the deflected shot humming through the air ahead, and in an instant it was cracking and smashing the branches in the forest beyond.

30 "They will not do that again," he thought; "the next time they will use a charge of grape.[4] I must keep my eye upon the gun; the smoke will apprise me—the report arrives too late; it lags behind the missile. That is a good gun."

Suddenly he felt himself whirled round and round—spinning like a top. The water, the banks, the forests, the now distant bridge, fort and men—all were commingled and blurred. Objects were represented by their colors only; circular horizontal streaks of color—that was all he saw. He had been caught in a vortex and was being whirled on with a velocity of advance and gyration that made him giddy and sick. In a few moments he was flung upon the gravel at the foot of the left bank of the stream—the southern bank—and behind a projecting point which concealed him from his enemies. The sudden arrest of his motion, the abrasion of one of his hands on the gravel, restored him, and he wept with delight. He dug his fingers into the sand, threw it over himself in handfuls and audibly blessed it. It looked like diamonds, rubies, emeralds; he could think of nothing beautiful which it did not resemble. The trees upon the bank were giant garden plants; he noted a definite order in their arrangement, inhaled the fragrance of their blooms. A strange, roseate light shone through the spaces among their trunks and the wind made in their branches the music of aeolian harps. He had no wish to perfect his escape—was content to remain in that enchanting spot until retaken.

A whiz and rattle of grapeshot among the branches high above his head roused him from his dream. The baffled cannoneer had fired him a random farewell. He sprang to his feet, rushed up the sloping bank, and plunged into the forest.

All that day he traveled, laying his course by the rounding sun. The forest seemed interminable; nowhere did he discover a break in it, not even a woodman's road. He had not known that he lived in so wild a region. There was something uncanny in the revelation.

By nightfall he was fatigued, footsore, famishing. The thought of his wife and children urged him on. At last he found a road which led him in what he knew to be the right direction. It was as wide and straight as a city street, yet it seemed untraveled. No fields bordered it, no dwelling anywhere. Not so much as the barking of a dog suggested human habitation. The black bodies of the trees formed a straight wall on both sides, terminating on the horizon in a point, like a diagram in a lesson in perspective. Overhead, as he looked up through this rift in the wood, shone great golden stars looking unfamiliar and grouped in strange constellations. He was sure they were arranged in some order which had a secret and malign significance. The wood on either side was full of singular noises, among which—once, twice, and again—he distinctly heard whispers in an unknown tongue.

35 His neck was in pain and lifting his hand to it he found it horribly swollen. He knew that it had a circle of black where the rope had bruised it. His eyes felt congested; he could no longer close them. His tongue was swollen with thirst; he relieved its fever by thrusting it forward from between his teeth into the cold air. How softly the turf had carpeted the untraveled avenue—he could no longer feel the roadway beneath his feet!

[3] diminuendo decreasing in loudness.
[4] grapeshot a cluster of small iron balls fired from a cannon.

Doubtless, despite his suffering, he had fallen asleep while walking, for now he sees another scene—perhaps he has merely recovered from a delirium. He stands at the gate of his own home. All is as he left it, and all bright and beautiful in the morning sunshine. He must have traveled the entire night. As he pushes open the gate and passes up the wide white walk, he sees a flutter of female garments; his wife, looking fresh and cool and sweet, steps down from the veranda to meet him. At the bottom of the steps she stands waiting, with a smile of ineffable joy, an attitude of matchless grace and dignity. Ah, how beautiful she is! He springs forward with extended arms. As he is about to clasp her he feels a stunning blow upon the back of the neck; a blinding white light blazes all about him with a sound like the shock of a cannon—then all is darkness and silence!

Peyton Farquhar was dead; his body, with a broken neck, swung gently from side to side beneath the timbers of the Owl Creek bridge.

[1891]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Characterize Peyton Farquhar. If you think Bierce makes him sympathetic, consider the ways in which Bierce does so.
2. Early in the story, the narrator says, "The liberal military code makes provision for hanging many kinds of people, and gentlemen are not excluded." How would you characterize the tone of this sentence? What, if anything, does the sentence contribute to the story?
3. Do you think that Bierce takes sides, suggesting that the North—or the South—is morally superior? What evidence can you offer to support your view?
4. Is the ending a complete surprise? Do some passages in the story suggest—at least on rereading—that perhaps Farquhar has not escaped? If so, point out a few.
5. What do you think of the title of the story? How does it compare with, for example, "Peyton Farquhar," or "Peyton Farquhar's Escape," or "The Hanging at Owl Creek Bridge"?

Margaret Atwood

One of the most original and important voices in contemporary fiction, Margaret Atwood is a Canadian author who is best known for her novels, including The Handmaid's Tale (1985), The Robber Bride (1993), and Oryx and Crake (2003). In 2000, her novel The Blind Assassin won the prestigious Booker Prize, England's annual prize for the best fiction in the English language. She also writes poetry, essays, and short fiction. Atwood explores difficult contemporary topics by weaving fantastical elements into stories that depict dystopian worlds, environmental crises, and suppressed peoples. Atwood was born in Ottawa, Canada, in 1939 and grew up in Ontario and Quebec. She received a BA from the University of Toronto and an MA from Radcliffe College.

Happy Endings

John and Mary meet.
What happens next?
If you want a happy ending, try A.

A

John and Mary fall in love and get married. They both have worthwhile and remunerative jobs which they find stimulating and challenging. They buy a charming house. Real estate values go up. Eventually, when they can afford live-in help, they have two children, to whom they are devoted. The children turn out well. John and Mary have a stimulating and challenging sex life and worthwhile friends. They go on fun vacations together. They retire. They both have hobbies which they find stimulating and challenging. Eventually they die. This is the end of the story.

B

Mary falls in love with John but John doesn't fall in love with Mary. He merely uses her body for selfish pleasure and ego gratification of a tepid kind. He comes to her apartment twice a week and she cooks him dinner, you'll notice that he doesn't even consider her worth the price of a dinner out, and after he's eaten the dinner he fucks her and after that he falls asleep, while she does the dishes so he won't think she's untidy, having all those dirty dishes lying around, and puts on fresh lipstick so she'll look good when he wakes up, but when he wakes up he doesn't even notice, he puts on his socks and his shorts and his pants and his shirt and his tie and his shoes, the reverse order from the one in which he took them off. He doesn't take off Mary's clothes, she takes them off herself, she acts as if she's dying for it every time, not because she likes sex exactly, she doesn't, but she wants John to think she does because if they do it often enough surely he'll get used to her, he'll come to depend on her and they will get married, but John goes out the door with hardly so much as a good-night and three days later he turns up at six o'clock and they do the whole thing over again.

Mary gets run-down. Crying is bad for your face, everyone knows that and so does Mary but she can't stop. People at work notice. Her friends tell her John is a rat, a pig, a dog, he isn't good enough for her, but she can't believe it. Inside John, she thinks, is another John, who is much nicer. This other John will emerge like a butterfly from a cocoon, a Jack from a box, a pit from a prune, if the first John is only squeezed enough.

One evening John complains about the food. He has never complained about the food before. Mary is hurt.

5 Her friends tell her they've seen him in a restaurant with another woman, whose name is Madge. It's not even Madge that finally gets to Mary: it's the restaurant. John has never taken Mary to a restaurant. Mary collects all the sleeping pills and aspirins she can find, and takes them and a half a bottle of sherry. You can see what kind of a woman she is by the fact that it's not even whiskey. She leaves a note for John. She hopes he'll discover her and get her to the hospital in time and repent and then they can get married, but this fails to happen and she dies.

John marries Madge and everything continues as in A.

C

John, who is an older man, falls in love with Mary, and Mary, who is only twenty-two, feels sorry for him because he's worried about his hair falling out. She sleeps with him even though she's not in love with him. She met him at work. She's in love with someone called James, who is twenty-two also and not yet ready to settle down.

John on the contrary settled down long ago: this is what is bothering him. John has a steady, respectable job and is getting ahead in his field, but Mary isn't impressed by him, she's impressed by James, who has a motorcycle and a fabulous record collection. But James is often away on his motorcycle, being free. Freedom isn't the same for girls, so in the meantime Mary spends Thursday evenings with John. Thursdays are the only days John can get away.

John is married to a woman called Madge and they have two children, a charming house which they bought just before the real estate values went up, and hobbies which they find stimulating and challenging, when they have the time. John tells Mary how important she is to him, but of course he can't leave his wife because a commitment is a commitment. He goes on about this more than is necessary and Mary finds it boring, but older men can keep it up longer so on the whole she has a fairly good time.

10 One day James breezes in on his motorcycle with some top-grade California hybrid and James and Mary get higher than you'd believe possible and they climb into bed. Everything becomes very underwater, but along comes John, who has a key to Mary's apartment. He finds them stoned and entwined. He's hardly in any position to be jealous, considering Madge, but nevertheless he's overcome with despair. Finally he's middle-aged, in two years he'll be bald as an egg and he can't stand it. He purchases a handgun, saying he needs it for target practice—this is the thin part of the plot, but it can be dealt with later—and shoots the two of them and himself.

Madge, after a suitable period of mourning, marries an understanding man called Fred and everything continues as in A, but under different names.

D

Fred and Madge have no problems. They get along exceptionally well and are good at working out any little difficulties that may arise. But their charming house is by the seashore and one day a giant tidal wave approaches. Real estate values go down. The rest of the story is about what caused the tidal wave and how they escape from it. They do, though thousands drown, but Fred and Madge are virtuous and lucky. Finally on high ground they clasp each other, wet and dripping and grateful, and continue as in A.

E

Yes, but Fred has a bad heart. The rest of the story is about how kind and understanding they both are until Fred dies. Then Madge devotes herself to charity work until the end of A. If you like, it can be "Madge," "cancer," "guilty and confused," and "bird watching."

F

If you think this is all too bourgeois, make John a revolutionary and Mary a counterespionage agent and see how far that gets you. Remember, this is Canada. You'll still end up with A, though in between you may get a lustful brawling saga of passionate involvement, a chronicle of our times, sort of.

* * *

15 You'll have to face it, the endings are the same however you slice it. Don't be deluded by any other endings, they're all fake, either deliberately fake, with malicious intent to deceive, or just motivated by excessive optimism if not by downright sentimentality.

The only authentic ending is the one provided here:

John and Mary die. John and Mary die. John and Mary die.

* * *

So much for endings. Beginnings are always more fun. True connoisseurs, however, are known to favor the stretch in between, since it's the hardest to do anything with.

That's about all that can be said for plots, which anyway are just one thing after another, a what and a what and a what.

20 Now try How and Why.

[1983]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. "Happy Endings" is an example of metafiction: fiction that self-consciously comments on fiction, calling attention to its artificial and constructed status. How does "Happy Endings" call attention to storytelling conventions? For example, as the title emphasizes, readers want a story to have a happy ending. How does Atwood satirize that desire? What other expectations do we have for a plot? How does Atwood call attention to those expectations?
2. "Happy Endings" provides serious commentary on human relationships, but it is also very funny. Highlight the lines that you found humorous. Why are these lines funny? How do Atwood's language, character, and plot twists bring humor the story?
3. Variations "B" and "C" are quite dark. Is Atwood trying to convey a message about gender relationships and sexuality? Why does Atwood present plots that include unhappiness, mistreatment, getting "run-down," and being too "settled down"? Why do these stories end with violence? Continue this list of inquiry questions about these two sections, and use those questions to organize your note taking.
4. "Happy Endings" concludes what the statement, "That's about all that can be said for plots, which anyway are just one thing after another, a what and a what and a what. Now try How and Why." What does Atwood mean by "a what and a what and a what" and "How and Why"? How do these final lines address the purpose of storytelling?
5. Write a new variation, "G," for "Happy Endings." What would your variation emphasize? Can your variation satirize a certain genre or type of storytelling? Can your variation present a serious theme in a comic fashion?

Essay

George Saunders

Born in 1958 in Amarillo, Texas, George Saunders worked as a geophysicist in the oil fields of Sumatra, Indonesia, and as a doorman, a roofer, and a "knuckle-puller" in a slaughterhouse before becoming a writer. He earned an MFA degree in creative writing from Syracuse University, New York, and started publishing his short stories while working as a writer for pharmaceutical and engineering companies. He now teaches in the Syracuse MFA program. His writing is widely praised for its use of unexpected perspectives to critique American culture's emphasis on work, wealth, consumption, and the media. His short stories have earned him numerous accolades, including being named as one of the best writers under the age of forty by The New Yorker magazine and one of the top one hundred most creative people in entertainment by Entertainment Weekly magazine. He was awarded a MacArthur "genius grant" Fellowship in 2006. He gave this convocation speech at Syracuse University in 2013.

Commencement Speech on Kindness

Down through the ages, a traditional form has evolved for this type of speech, which is: Some old fart, his best years behind him, who, over the course of his life, has made a series of dreadful mistakes (that would be me), gives heartfelt advice to a group of shining, energetic young people, with all of their best years ahead of them (that would be you).

And I intend to respect that tradition.

Now, one useful thing you can do with an old person, in addition to borrowing money from them, or asking them to do one of their old-time "dances," so you can watch, while laughing, is ask: "Looking back, what do you regret?" And they'll tell you. Sometimes, as you know, they'll tell you even if you haven't asked. Sometimes, even when you've specifically requested they not tell you, they'll tell you.

So: What do I regret? Being poor from time to time? Not really. Working terrible jobs, like "knuckle-puller in a slaughterhouse?" (And don't even ASK what that entails.) No. I don't regret that. Skinny-dipping in a river in Sumatra, a little buzzed, and looking up and seeing like 300 monkeys sitting on a pipeline, pooping down into the river, the river in which I was swimming, with my mouth open, naked? And getting deathly ill afterwards, and staying sick for the next seven months? Not so much. Do I regret the occasional humiliation? Like once, playing hockey in front of a big crowd, including this girl I really liked, I somehow managed, while falling and emitting this weird whooping noise, to score on my own goalie, while also sending my stick flying into the crowd, nearly hitting that girl? No. I don't even regret that.

5 But here's something I do regret:

In seventh grade, this new kid joined our class. In the interest of confidentiality, her Convocation Speech name will be "ELLEN." ELLEN was small, shy. She wore these blue cat's-eye glasses that, at the time, only old ladies wore. When nervous, which was pretty much always, she had a habit of taking a strand of hair into her mouth and chewing on it.

So she came to our school and our neighborhood, and was mostly ignored, occasionally teased ("Your hair taste good?"—that sort of thing). I could see this hurt her. I still remember the way she'd look after such an insult: eyes cast down, a little gut-kicked, as if, having just been reminded of her place in things, she was trying, as much as possible, to disappear. After awhile she'd drift away, hair-strand still in her mouth. At home, I imagined, after school, her mother would say, you know: "How was your day, sweetie?" and she'd say, "Oh, fine." And her mother would say, "Making any friends?" and she'd go, "Sure, lots."

Sometimes I'd see her hanging around alone in her front yard, as if afraid to leave it.

And then—they moved. That was it. No tragedy, no big final hazing.

10 One day she was there, next day she wasn't.

End of story.

Now, why do I regret that? Why, forty-two years later, am I still thinking about it? Relative to most of the other kids, I was actually pretty nice to her. I never said an unkind word to her. In fact, I sometimes even (mildly) defended her.

But still. It bothers me.

So here's something I know to be true, although it's a little corny, and I don't quite know what to do with it:

15 What I regret most in my life are failures of kindness.

Those moments when another human being was there, in front of me, suffering, and I responded . . . sensibly. Reservedly. Mildly.

Or, to look at it from the other end of the telescope: Who, in your life, do you remember most fondly, with the most undeniable feelings of warmth?

Those who were kindest to you, I bet.

It's a little facile, maybe, and certainly hard to implement, but I'd say, as a goal in life, you could do worse than: Try to be kinder.

20 Now, the million-dollar question: What's our problem? Why aren't we kinder?

Here's what I think:

Each of us is born with a series of built-in confusions that are probably somehow Darwinian. These are: (1) We're central to the universe (that is, our personal story is the main and most interesting story, the only story, really); (2) we're separate from the universe (there's US and then, out there, all that other junk—dogs and swing-sets, and the State of Nebraska and low-hanging clouds and, you know, other people), and (3) we're permanent (death is real, o.k., sure—for you, but not for me).

Now, we don't really believe these things—intellectually we know better-but we believe them viscerally, and live by them, and they cause us to prioritize our own needs over the needs of others, even though what we really want, in our hearts, is to be less selfish, more aware of what's actually happening in the present moment, more open, and more loving.

So, the second million-dollar question: How might we DO this? How might we become more loving, more open, less selfish, more present, less delusional, etc., etc?

25 Well, yes, good question.

Unfortunately, I only have three minutes left.

So let me just say this. There are ways. You already know that because, in your life, there have been High Kindness periods and Low Kindness periods, and you know what inclined you toward the former and away from the latter. Education is good; immersing ourselves in a work of art: good; prayer is good; meditation's good; a frank talk with a dear friend; establishing ourselves in some kind of spiritual tradition—recognizing that there have been countless really smart people before us who have asked these same questions and left behind answers for us.

Because kindness, it turns out, is hard—it starts out all rainbows and puppy dogs, and expands to include . . . well, everything.

One thing in our favor: Some of this "becoming kinder" happens naturally, with age. It might be a simple matter of attrition: As we get older, we come to see how useless it is to be selfish—how illogical, really. We come to love other people and are thereby counter-instructed in our own centrality. We get our butts kicked by real life, and people come to our defense, and help us, and we learn that we're not separate, and don't want to be. We see people near and dear to us dropping away, and are gradually convinced that maybe we too will drop away (someday, a long time from now). Most people, as they age, become less selfish and more loving. I think this is true. The great Syracuse poet, Hayden Carruth, said, in a poem written near the end of his life, that he was "mostly Love, now."

30 And so, a prediction, and my heartfelt wish for you: As you get older, your self will diminish and you will grow in love. YOU will gradually be replaced by LOVE. If you have kids, that will be a huge moment in your process of self-diminishment. You really won't care what happens to YOU, as long as they benefit. That's one reason your parents are so proud and happy today. One of their fondest dreams has come true: You have accomplished something difficult and tangible that has enlarged you as a person and will make your life better, from here on in, forever.

Congratulations, by the way.

When young, we're anxious—understandably—to find out if we've got what it takes. Can we succeed? Can we build a viable life for ourselves? But you—in particular you, of this generation-may have noticed a certain cyclical quality to ambition. You do well in high-school, in hopes of getting into a good college, so you can do well in the good college, in the hopes of getting a good job, so you can do well in the good job so you can. . . .

And this is actually O.K. If we're going to become kinder, that process has to include taking ourselves seriously—as doers, as accomplishers, as dreamers. We have to do that, to be our best selves.

Still, accomplishment is unreliable. "Succeeding," whatever that might mean to you, is hard, and the need to do so constantly renews itself (success is like a mountain that keeps growing ahead of you as you hike it), and there's the very real danger that "succeeding" will take up your whole life, while the big questions go untended.

35 So, quick, end-of-speech advice: Since, according to me, your life is going to be a gradual process of becoming kinder and more loving: Hurry up. Speed it along. Start right now. There's a confusion in each of us, a sickness, really: selfishness. But there's also a cure. So be a good and proactive and even somewhat desperate patient on your own behalf-seek out the most efficacious anti-selfishness medicines, energetically, for the rest of your life.

Do all the other things, the ambitious things—travel, get rich, get famous, innovate, lead, fall in love, make and lose fortunes, swim naked in wild jungle rivers (after first having it tested for monkey poop)—but as you do, to the extent that you can, err in the direction of kindness. Do those things that incline you toward the big questions, and avoid the things that would reduce you and make you trivial. That luminous part of you that exists beyond personality—your soul, if you will—is as bright and shining as any that has ever been. Bright as Shakespeare's, bright as Gandhi's, bright as Mother Teresa's. Clear away everything that keeps you separate from this secret luminous place. Believe it exists, come to know it better, nurture it, share its fruits tirelessly.

And someday, in 80 years, when you're 100, and I'm 134, and we're both so kind and loving we're nearly unbearable, drop me a line, let me know how your life has been. I hope you will say: It has been so wonderful.

Congratulations, Class of 2013.

I wish you great happiness, all the luck in the world, and a beautiful summer.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Saunders's speech examines the theme of regret. What are the events in his life that he should regret but doesn't? What is his biggest regret? Explain why his memories of Ellen have become a regret that he is still thinking about "forty-two years later."
2. Saunders's speech emphasizes kindness. Using Saunders's speech, define kindness. Continuing to work with this speech, provide examples of the type of kindness that Saunders wants us to practice. If you had to go out and engage in a specific act of kindness right now, what would it be?
3. As part of explaining why humans are not kinder, Saunders explains three "built in confusions" that shape us. Examine each of these confusions in turn. Do you agree that they define our approach to the world? Can you see these confusions operating in yourself or in those around you?
4. Reread the end of Saunders's speech, in which he offers his advice on how to replace the self with love and kindness. Now, put the speech aside and attempt to summarize its central ideas in your own words. What are the most important ideas that you would like to take away from this speech?

This page intentionally left blank

This page intentionally left blank

This page intentionally left blank

This page intentionally left blank

This page intentionally left blank

CHAPTER 6

Close Reading: Paraphrase, Summary, and Explication

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Define literature, its characteristics and its forms
- Perform a close reading
- Write a paraphrase, summary, and explication
- Understand how explication includes commentary and argument

What Is Literature?

Perhaps the first thing to say is that it is impossible to define literature in a way that will satisfy everyone. And perhaps the second thing to say is that, in the last twenty years or so, some serious thinkers have argued that it is impossible to set off certain verbal works from all others and, on some basis or other, to designate them as literature. For one thing, it is argued, a work is just marks on paper or sounds in the air. The audience (reader or listener) turns these marks or sounds into something with meaning, and different audiences will construct different meanings out of what they read or hear. There are texts (birthday cards, sermons, political speeches, magazines, novels that sell by the millions and novels that don't sell at all, poems, popular songs, editorials, and so forth), but there is nothing that should be given the special title of "literature."

Although there is something to be said for the idea that literature is just an honorific word and not a collection of work embodying eternal truths and eternal beauty, let's make the opposite assumption, at least for a start. Let's assume that certain verbal works are of a distinct sort—whether because the author shapes them or because a reader perceives them a certain way—and that we can call these works literature. But what are these works like?

Literature and Form

We all know why we value a newspaper or a textbook or an atlas, but why do we value a verbal work that doesn't give us the latest news or important information about business cycles or the names of the capitals of nations? About one thousand years ago, a Japanese woman, Shikibu Murasaki, or Lady Murasaki (978?–1026), offered an answer in The Tale of Genji, a book often called the world's first novel. During a discussion about reading fiction, one of the characters gives an opinion as to why a writer tells a story:

> Again and again writers find something in their experience, or see something in the life around them, that seems so important they cannot bear to let it pass into oblivion. There must never come a time, the writer feels, when people do not know about this.

Literature is about human experiences, but the experiences in literature are not simply the shapeless experiences—the chaotic passing scene—captured by a mindless, unselective video camera. Poets, dramatists, and storytellers find or impose a shape on scenes (for instance, the history of two lovers), giving readers things to value—written or spoken accounts that are memorable not only for their content but also for their form—the shape of the speeches, of the scenes, of the plots. (Later, we will see that form and content are inseparable, but for now, for our purposes, we can talk about them separately.)

Because this discussion of literature is brief, we will illustrate the point by looking at one of the briefest literary forms, the proverb. Consider this statement:

> A rolling stone gathers no moss.

Now let's compare it with a paraphrase (a restatement, a translation into other words):

> If a stone is always moving around, vegetation won't have a chance to grow on it.

What makes the original version more powerful, more memorable? Surely, much of the answer is that the original is more concrete and its form is more shapely. At the risk of being heavy-handed, we can analyze the shapeliness thus: Stone and moss (the two nouns in the sentence) each contain one syllable; rolling and gathers (the two words of motion) each contain two syllables, with the accent on the first syllable. Notice, too, the nice contrast between stone (hard) and moss (soft).

The reader probably feels this shapeliness unconsciously rather than perceives it consciously. That is, these connections become apparent when one starts to analyze a literary work, but the literary work can have its effect on a reader even before the reader analyzes the work. As T. S. Eliot said in his essay on Dante (1929), "Genuine poetry can communicate before it is understood." Indeed, our first reading of a work, when, so to speak, we are all eyes and ears (and the mind is highly receptive rather than sifting for evidence), is sometimes the most important reading. Experience proves that we can feel the effects of a work without yet understanding how the effects are achieved.

Most readers will probably agree that

- the words in the proverb are paired interestingly and meaningfully;
- the sentence is not simply information but is also (to quote one of Robert Frost's definitions of literature) "a performance in words";
- what the sentence is, we might say, is no less significant than what the sentence says;
- the sentence as a whole forms a memorable picture, a small but complete world, hard and soft, inorganic and organic, inert and moving;
- the idea set forth is simple—partly because it is highly focused and therefore leaves out a lot—but it is also complex;

- by virtue of the contrasts, and, again, even by the pairing of monosyllabic nouns and of disyllabic words of motion, it is unified into a pleasing whole.

For all of its specificity and its compactness—the proverb contains only six words—it expands our minds.

A Brief Exercise: Take a minute to think about some other proverb, for instance, "Look before you leap," "Finders keepers," "Haste makes waste," or "Absence makes the heart grow fonder." Paraphrase it, and then ask yourself why the original is more interesting and more memorable than your paraphrase.

Form and Meaning

Let's turn now to a work that is not much longer than a proverb—a very short poem by Robert Frost (1874–1963).

Robert Frost

For a biographical note, see page 246.

The Span of Life

The old dog barks backward without getting up.
I can remember when he was a pup.

[1936]

What makes this short statement a poem rather than a set of sentences? When we examine the lines for their literary elements, we notice several things:

- The poem is set off on the page by its title (somewhat as a picture is set off by a frame or a sculpture is set off by a pedestal) and the white space around it; it appears, so to speak, in a spotlight.
- The rhyme ("up/pup") is a device that distinguishes verse from ordinary prose.
- There is a contrast between the first words ("The old dog") and the last word ("pup").
- The two lines strike a balance: The first line describes the dog as it is now, old, and (after a reflective pause that the author forces on the reader by providing a period) the second line describes the speaker's memory of the young dog, leaving us with an implication about our own lives. Thus, the first line offers an observation, and the second line offers a meditation.
- The use of language is skillful, and not only in finding a rhyme. For instance, in "old dog," the speaker must pause a moment between the two words so that each d is sounded separately, and the k sounds in bark and backward make the first line (about an old dog) somewhat awkward and creaky, compared to the more speakable—let's say more jingling—second line (about a puppy). Moreover, in the first line, after the opening The, the next four syllables are all stressed fairly heavily ("old dog barks back"), and there are stresses on the second syllable of without, on the first syllable of getting, and on up, for a total of seven stresses in ten syllables—very effortful!—whereas, in the second line, there are at most four stresses: I, mem (in remember), he, and pup (I probably does not get much emphasis, so there are really only three significant stresses in the second line). Readers may differ about exactly how much stress to put on a given syllable, but surely all readers will agree that the first line is heavier and requires more effort to say than the second, which is sprightlier. Most readers will agree that, in the first line, they may stress fairly heavily seven or eight syllables, whereas, in the second line, they may stress only three or four syllables:

The óld dóg bárks báckward withoút gétting úp.
Í can remémber when hé was a púp.

We can say, therefore, that the form (a relatively effortful, hard-to-speak line, followed by a bouncy line) shapes and is part of the content (a description of a dog that no longer has the energy or the strength to leap up, followed by a memory of the dog as a puppy).

Thinking further about Frost's poem, we notice something else about the form. The first line is about a dog, but the second line is about a dog and a human being ("I can remember"). The speaker must be getting on, too. And, although nothing is said about the dog as a symbol of human life, surely the reader, prompted by the title of the poem, makes a connection between the life span of a dog and that of a human being. Part of what makes the poem effective is that this point is not stated explicitly, not belabored. Readers have the pleasure of making the connection for themselves—under Frost's careful guidance.

Everyone knows that puppies are frisky and that old dogs are not—although perhaps not until we encountered this poem did we think twice about the fact that "the old dog barks backward without getting up." Or let's put it this way:

- Many people may have noticed this behavior, but
- perhaps only Frost thought (to use Lady Murasaki's words), "There must never come a time . . . when people do not know about this." And,
- fortunately for all of us, Frost had the ability to put his perception into memorable words.

Part of what makes this poem especially memorable is the relationship between the two lines. Neither line in itself is very special, but, because of the counterpoint, the whole is more than the sum of the parts. Skill in handling language, obviously, is indispensable if the writer is to produce literature. A person may know a great deal about dogs and may be a great lover of dogs, but knowledge and love are not enough equipment to write even a two-line poem about a dog (or the span of life, or both). Poems, like other kinds of literature, are produced by people who know how to delight us with verbal performances.

We can easily see that Robert Frost's "The Span of Life" is a work of literature—a work that uses language in a special way—if we contrast it with another short work in rhyme:

Thirty days hath September,
April, June, and November;
All the rest have thirty-one
Excepting February alone,
Which has twenty-eight in fine,
Till leap year gives it twenty-nine.

This information is important, but it is only information. The lines rhyme, giving the work some form, but there is nothing very interesting about it. (Perhaps you will want to take issue with this opinion.) The poem is true and therefore useful, but it is not of compelling interest, probably because it only tells us facts rather than shows or presents human experience. We all remember the lines, but they offer neither the pleasure of an insight nor the pleasure of an interesting tune. "Thirty days" has nothing of what the poet Thomas Gray said characterizes literature: "Thoughts that breathe, and words that burn."

Close Reading: Reading in Slow Motion

Throughout this book, we focus on the skills required by a careful study of literary language. Close reading is perhaps the most familiar name for this technique of heightened responsiveness to the words on the page. But another, employed by the literary critics Reuben A. Brower and Richard Poirier, may be even better. They refer to "reading in slow motion." Brower, for example, speaks of "slowing down the process of reading to observe what is happening, in order to attend very closely to the words, their uses, and their meanings." This sort of reading, he explains, involves looking and listening with special alertness, slowly, without rushing or feeling impatient if a work puzzles us at first encounter.[1]

As Brower and Poirier point out, sometimes we are so intrigued or moved by a writer's technique and way with words that we are led to slow down our reading, lingering over verbal details and vivid images—"a watersmooth-silver/stallion" in Cummings's poem about Buffalo Bill (page 324), or "Babette danced out to where the fig-trees were," in Chopin's "Ripe Figs" (page 25). Or, we find that we want to return to a poem, or to a key section of a story or a scene in a play, to articulate—"slow motion" style—why it has affected us as powerfully as it has.

Close, or slow-motion, reading can help you to understand and enjoy a work that at first seems strange or obscure. When we examine a piece of literature with care and intensity, we are not taking it apart in a destructive way but, instead, are seeking to satisfy our curiosity about how the writer organized it. And, almost always, our increased understanding of the work results in increased enjoyment. Our understanding of a poem is almost always made better by close reading. That is, our ideas become deeper, more interesting, and more rewarding.

This point is clarified when we recall what it's like to watch a scene from a movie in slow motion, or a TV replay in slow motion of a touchdown run in a football game. In slow-motion film, we perceive details that we might otherwise have missed—the subtle changes in expression on an actress's face, for example, or the interplay of gestures among performers at a climactic moment in the action. Similarly, seeing a touchdown multiple times in slow motion, and perhaps from a half-dozen camera angles, reveals to us how the play developed, who made the crucial blocks, where the defense failed. The touchdown was exciting when it took place, and it remains exciting—and frequently it becomes more so—when we slow it down in order to study and talk about it.

This chapter and the next explore how we move from close reading to analysis. As we slow down our reading of a literary work, we are able to understand it more fully. We can demonstrate this understanding by being able to paraphrase or summarize its meaning. A paraphrase is a direct restatement of a specific idea in a literary text, whereas a summary is a more general overview of a literary text's main ideas. Both a paraphrase and a summary emphasize the correct understanding of the literary work developed though close reading.

[1]The quotation is taken from Brower's introduction to In Defense of Reading: A Reader's Approach to Literary Criticism, ed. Reuben A. Brower and Richard Poirier (1962). See also Brower, The Fields of Light: An Experiment in Critical Reading (1951); and Poirier, Poetry and Pragmatism (1992).

Explication and analysis take that understanding of the text and use it as the foundation for arguments about the text's meaning. Explication and analysis emphasize the ideas, opinions, and interpretations generated by close reading. Both approaches are based on the principle that responding well to literature means

- acquiring the ability to read it closely;
- practicing this skill to become better and better at it;
- explaining and demonstrating in critical essays what we have learned.

However, the two terms, while related to one another, differ in their emphasis. An explication moves from beginning to end of an entire work (if it is fairly short) or of a section of a work; it is sustained, meticulous, thorough, and systematic. An analysis builds upon the habits of attention that we have gained from explicating texts and passages of texts, creating a focused argument about selected aspects of the text. Because an explication works through a text line by line, it is a good way to start working on the transformation of close reading into interpretation and argument.

Let's turn to explication first and learn what we can discover about literature through it. As you'll see, one of the things we quickly realize is that close reading of literary works makes us not only better readers but also better writers, attuned more sharply and sensitively to the organization of the language in our own prose.

Exploring a Poem and Its Meaning

Selecting a short poem for close reading will allow us to generate a paraphrase, summary, and explication of it. The following short poem is by Langston Hughes (1902–67), an African American writer who is well known for the central role that he played in the Harlem Renaissance.

Langston Hughes

For a biographical note, see page 429.

Harlem

What happens to a dream deferred?

Does it dry up
like a raisin in the sun?
Or fester like a sore—
And then run?
Does it stink like rotten meat?
Or crust and sugar over—
like a syrupy sweet?

Maybe it just sags
like a heavy load.

Or does it explode?

[1951]

Different readers will respond at least somewhat differently to any work. On the other hand, because writers want to communicate, they try to control their readers' responses, and they count on their readers to understand the denotations of words as they understand them. Hughes assumed that his readers knew that Harlem was the site of a large African American community in New York City. A reader who confuses the title of the poem with Haarlem in the Netherlands will wonder what this poem is saying about the tulip-growing center in northern Holland. Let's assume that the reader understands that Hughes is talking about Harlem, New York. Let's also assume that the reader understands that Hughes is exploring the dreams of African Americans who live in a society dominated by whites.

Explication is based on the assumption that the poem contains a meaning and that, by studying the work thoughtfully, we can unfold the meaning or meanings. Let's explore how the close reading of a poem can generate a paraphrase and a summary that convey the ideas of the poem accurately. Then, we can see how that close reading can lead to an effective explication.

Paraphrase

A paraphrase is a direct restatement of another text's ideas in your own words. Paraphrasing typically restates a focused portion of the text, rewriting it to clarify its meaning and express its ideas in your own style. A paraphrase does not analyze the text but, rather, conveys its key information.

You will want to use paraphrase to demonstrate your understanding of the text without copying the work's original wording and style. Paraphrase must not repeat the original text's words. If you do this, you must put the words inside quotation marks and cite the source. When you are writing a paraphrase, you must present the text's ideas in your own style and cite the source of the text, as it has provided the ideas that you are using. All paraphrases must be cited. A paraphrase is typically around the same length as the material that it is citing.

It might be helpful to think of a paraphrase as a type of translation in the same language—a translation of material that may in its original form be somewhat obscure to a reader. A native speaker of English will not need a paraphrase of "Thirty days hath September," although a nonnative speaker might be puzzled by two things: the meaning of hath and the inverted word order. For such a reader, "September has thirty days" would be a helpful paraphrase.

Although a paraphrase seeks to make clear the basic meaning of the original, if the original is even a little more complex than "Thirty days hath September," the paraphrase will, in the process of clarifying something, lose something because the substitution of one word for another will change the meaning. "Shut up" and "Be quiet" do not say exactly the same thing; the former (in addition to asking for quiet) says that the speaker is rude or perhaps that the speaker feels little respect for the auditor, but the paraphrase loses all of this.

Still, a paraphrase can be a first step in helping a reader to understand a line that includes an obsolete word or phrase, or a word or phrase that is current only in one region. In a poem by Emily Dickinson (1830–86), the following line appears:

> The sun engrossed the East. . . .

"Engrossed" here has (perhaps among other meanings) a special commercial meaning, "to acquire most or all of a commodity; to monopolize the market," so a paraphrase of the line might say

> The sun took over all of the East.

It is worth mentioning that you should always have at your elbow a good desk dictionary, such as the current American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language. Writers—especially poets—expect you to pay close attention to every word. When a word puzzles you, look it up.

Idioms, as well as words, can puzzle a reader. The Anglo-Irish poet William Butler Yeats (1865–1939) begins one poem with

> The friends that have it I do wrong. . . .

Because the idiom "to have it" (meaning "to believe that," "to think that") will be unfamiliar to many American readers today, a discussion of the poem might include a paraphrase—a rewording in more familiar language, such as

> The friends who think that I am doing the wrong thing. . . .

Perhaps the rest of the poem is immediately clear, but in any case, here is the entire poem, followed by a paraphrase:

> The friends that have it I do wrong
> When ever I remake a song,
> Should know what issue is at stake:
> It is myself that I remake.

Now for the paraphrase:

> The friends who think that I am doing the wrong thing when I revise one of my poems should be informed what the important issue is: I'm not just revising a poem—rather, I am revising myself (my thoughts, feelings).

Here, as with any paraphrase, the meaning is not translated exactly; there is some distortion. If "song" in the original is clarified by "poem" in the paraphrase, it is also altered; the paraphrase loses the sense of lyricism that is implicit in "song." Further, "Should know what issue is at stake" (in the original) is ambiguous. Does "should" mean "ought," as in "You should know better than to speak so rudely," or does it mean "deserve to be informed," as in "You ought to know that I am thinking about quitting"?

Granted that a paraphrase may miss a great deal, a paraphrase often helps you, or your reader, to understand at least the surface meaning, and the act of paraphrasing will usually help you to understand at least some of the implied meaning. Furthermore, a paraphrase makes you see that the original writer's words (if the work is a good one) are exactly right, better than any words we might substitute. It becomes clear that what is said in the original—not only the rough idea expressed, but also the precise tone with which it is expressed—is a sharply defined experience.

Student Work: Paraphrase

Bill Horner, a student taking a composition class, was asked to paraphrase the first line of Hughes's poem, "Harlem." He was asked to create a short paraphrase that he could then use in his paper assignment if needed.

He examined the first line of the poem:

> What happens to a dream deferred?

Although the line is short, the concept of a "dream deferred" is complex. Bill came up with the following paraphrase:

> What results occur when hopes are unfulfilled?

Bill then inserted this paraphrase into a sentence and added a citation:

> In the first line of his poem, Hughes asks us to consider what results occur when hopes are unfulfilled (1).

Bill has translated the phrase "dream deferred" into"unfulfilled hopes." As a paraphrase, this is excellent, but let's recollect that this translating of an author's words into equivalent words removes some of the power and meaning of the words. Hughes does not say "hopes"; he says "dream." And he does not say "unfulfilled"; he says "deferred." You might ask yourself exactly what differences there are between these words. Next, after you have read the poem several times, you might think about which expression is more meaningful, "unfulfilled hopes" or "dream deferred," and why.

Summary

A summary is a synopsis of the main points of a work. Compared to a paraphrase, a summary is a more comprehensive overview of the text's overarching ideas or arguments. A summary is usually much shorter than the original text. It must therefore select and condense the text's most important information into a coherent overview. You can position a summary as a short supporting section within an analytical essay. A summary typically provides an overview of a source's central ideas in order for you to then analyze, develop, or apply those ideas within your larger argument. As with a paraphrase, all summaries must be cited.

A summary of a work of literature usually gives the gist of the plot. It lets the reader know that X happened, then Y happened, and then Z happened, but it does not concern itself, for instance, with evaluating whether the happenings are plausible. Normally, in your analytic/argumentative essays, you will not summarize because you can assume that your readers are familiar with the works that you are discussing, but if, for instance, you are comparing an assigned text with another text that your readers probably don't know, you may want to offer a summary in order to help them follow the argument that you will be developing.

Consider this summary of Chopin's "The Story of an Hour" (page 65):

> A newspaper office reports that Brently Mallard has been killed in a railroad accident. When the news is gently broken to Mrs. Mallard by her sister Josephine, Mrs. Mallard weeps wildly and then shuts herself up in her room, where she sinks into an armchair. Staring dully through the window, she sees the signs of spring, and then an unnameable sensation possesses her. She tries to reject it but finally abandons herself to it. Renewed, she exults in her freedom, in the thought that at last the days will be her own. She finally comes out of the room, embraces her sister, and descends the stairs. A moment later her husband—who in fact had not been in the accident—enters. Mrs. Mallard dies—of the joy that kills, according to the doctors' diagnosis.

Here are a few principles that govern summaries:

1. A summary is much briefer than the original. It is not a paraphrase—a word-by-word translation of someone's words into your own. A paraphrase is usually at least as long as the original, but a summary is rarely longer than one-fourth of the original and is usually much shorter. A novel may be summarized in a few paragraphs, or even in one paragraph.

2. A summary usually achieves its brevity by omitting almost all of the concrete details of the original and by omitting minor characters and episodes. Notice that the summary of "The Story of an Hour" omits the friend of the family, omits specifying the signs of spring, and omits the business of the sister imploring Mrs. Mallard to open the door.
3. A summary is as accurate as possible, given the limits of space. It has no value if it misrepresents the point of the original.
4. A summary is normally written in the present tense. Thus, "A newspaper office reports . . . , Mrs. Mallard weeps. . . ."
5. If the summary is brief (say, fewer than 250 words), it may be given as a single paragraph. If you are summarizing a long work, you may feel that a longer summary is needed. In this case, your reader will be grateful to you if you divide the summary into paragraphs. As you draft your summary, you may find natural divisions. For instance, the scene of the story may change midway, giving you the opportunity to use two paragraphs. Or you may want to summarize a five-act play in five paragraphs.
6. The writer of a summary need not make the points in the same order as that of the original. If the writer of an essay has delayed revealing the main point until the end of the essay, the summary may rearrange the order, stating the main point first. Occasionally, if the original author has presented the elements of an argument in a disorderly or confusing sequence, a summary may be written to disengage the author's argument from its confusing structure.
7. Because a summary is clearly a report of someone else's views, it must be cited. Use quotation marks and citations for all direct quotations from the original. It is not necessary to specify "he says" or "she goes on to prove." From the opening sentence of a summary, it should be clear that what follows is what the original author says.

Summaries have their place in essays, but remember that a summary is not an analysis; it is only an overview of the information in the work, not an interpretation of that work.

Student Work: Summary

With these tips in mind, let's see how Bill tackles writing a summary of Hughes's poem. In contrast to a paraphrase, which focused on restating one line, a summary will attempt to encompass an overview of the entire work, especially when the work is short.

Bill reminds himself that he needs to convey the information in the poem and not express his opinions about the poem. He comes up with the following summary paragraph:

> Langston Hughes's poem explores the results that occur when hopes are left unfulfilled. The poem opens with a question that asks what happens to deferred dreams. The poem answers that question by offering a series of images, with each image filling a line or two of the poem. The dream is compared to a raisin drying in the sun, to a running sore, and to stinking, rotten meat. The dream is also compared to a sweet that gets a sugary crust on it and to a heavy load that sags. In the final line of the poem, Hughes asks if the deferred dream will explode.

This strikes us as a strong summary because it encapsulates the entire poem in a concise paragraph. It displays the following key characteristics of a summary:

- it demonstrate the writer's understanding of the original text;
- it demonstrates the writer's ability to convey the original text's information accurately; and
- it demonstrates the writer's ability to select and organize the most important information in the original text.

Because the poem is short, the summary is able to review all of the poem's main images. The summary moves through the images in order, repeating many of Hughes's words, without simply quoting each line verbatim. The summary emphasizes the opening and closing lines of the poem by putting information about those lines into their own sentences. By not offering an interpretation of the poem, the summary remains informative without becoming argumentative. The summary captures the central ideas and images of the poem, but, of course, much of the power of the poem has been removed.

Both summary and paraphrase are helpful in that, once performed, they ensure that you have read the literary work carefully and understand its central information. After having practiced writing a summary or a paraphrase, you are ready to write an explication, which allows you express your sense of the meaning of the work.

Explication

A line-by-line or episode-by-episode commentary on what is going on in a text is an explication (literally, an unfolding or spreading out). An explication does not deal with the writer's life and times, and it is not a paraphrase or a rewording, although it may include paraphrasing. Rather, it is a commentary that reveals your sense of the meaning of the work and its structure.

When we explicate a text, we attempt to create a detailed account of its meaning based on a careful line-by-line close reading. Because it focuses intently on the text at hand, explication often works with poetry, which rewards the line-level reading and rereading. We ask questions about the meanings of words, the implications of metaphors and images, and the speaker's tone of voice as we initially hear it and it develops and perhaps changes. How is the literary work put together? How did the writer organize it to prompt from me the response that I had (and am having) to it? How does it begin, what happens next, and what happens after that? And so on, through to the end.

It takes some skill to work your way along in an explication without saying, "In line one. . . . In the second line. . . . In the third line. . . ." This sounds mechanical and formulaic. Make good use of transitional words and phrases so that your commentary will feel to your reader more natural, with a better pace and rhythm. For example: "The speaker begins by suggesting. . . . The poem then shifts in direction. . . . In the next paragraph, however, the narrator implies. . . ."

An explication captures your understanding of the literary work, revealing your ideas about and interpretations of it. However, we would not label this type of writing as a fully "analytical" paper, as it is not selecting ideas for emphasis, not making a focused argument out of those ideas, and not organizing the paper around those ideas. Rather, an explication attempts to explain the original work as a whole and lets the work dictate the flow of ideas. Although an explication paper will have a thesis and advance an interpretation, and thus contain analysis, explication is best understood as a line-by-line commentary rather than an analytical paper.

Working toward an Explication

In preparing to write an explication, first type on a computer, or handwrite, the complete text of the work that you will explicate—usually a poem but sometimes a short passage of prose. Don't photocopy it; the act of typing or writing it will help you to get into the piece, word by word, comma by comma. Type or write it double-spaced so that you will have room for your annotations as you study the piece. It's advisable to make a few photocopies (or to print a few copies, if you are using a computer) before you start annotating so that, if one page gets too cluttered with annotations, you can continue working on a clean copy. Or, you may want to use one copy for a certain kind of annotation—let's say, those concerning imagery—and other copies for other kinds of annotation—let's say, those concerning meter or wordplay. If you are writing on a computer, you can highlight words, boldface them, put them in capital letters (for instance, to indicate accented syllables), and so forth.

Student Work: Annotations

Let's turn to the brainstorming writing that leads to an explication of the poem, a detailed examination of the whole. Here are Bill's preliminary jottings on the poem:

These annotations chiefly get at the structure of the poem, the relationship of its parts. Bill notices that the poem begins with a line set off by itself and ends with a line set off by itself, and he also notices that each of these lines is a question. Further, he indicates that each of these two lines is emphasized in other ways: The first begins farther to the left than any of the other lines—as though the other lines are subheadings or in some way subordinate to the first line—and the last is italicized.

Student Work: Journal Entries

Bill later wrote these entries in his journal:

> Feb. 18. Since the title is "Harlem," it's obvious that the "dream" is by African American people. Also, obvious that Hughes thinks that if the "dream" doesn't become real there may be riots ("explode"). I like "raisin in the sun" (maybe because I like the play), and I like the business about "a syrupy sweet"—much more pleasant than the festering sore and the rotten meat. But if the dream becomes "sweet," what's wrong with that? Why should something "sweet" explode?
>
> Feb. 21. Prof. McCabe said to think of structure or form of a poem as a sort of architecture, a building with a foundation, floors, etc., topped by a roof—but since we read a poem from top to bottom, it's like a building upside down. Title is foundation (even though it's at top); last line is roof, capping the whole. As you read, you add layers. Foundation of "Harlem" is a question (first line). Then, set back a bit from foundation, or built on it by white space, a tall room (7 lines high, with 4 questions); then, on top of this room, another room (lines, statement, not a question). Funny; I thought that in poems all stanzas are the same number of lines. Then—more white space, so another unit—the roof. Man, this roof is going to fall in—"explodes." Not just the roof, maybe the whole house.
>
> Feb. 21, p.m. I get it; one line at start, one line at end; both are questions, but the last sort of says (because it is in italics) that it is the most likely answer to the question of the first line. The last line is also a question, but it's still an answer. The big stanza (7 lines) has 4 questions: 2 lines, 2 lines, 1 line, 2 lines. Maybe the switch to 1 line is to give some variety, so as not to be dull? It's exactly in the middle of the poem. I get the progress from raisin in the sun (dried, but not so terrible), to festering sore and to stinking meat, but I still don't see what's so bad about "a syrupy sweet." Is Hughes saying that after things are very bad they will get better? But why, then, the explosion at the end?
>
> Feb. 23. "Heavy load" and "sags" in next-to-last stanza seem to me to suggest slaves with bales of cotton, or maybe poor cotton pickers dragging big sacks of cotton. Or maybe people doing heavy labor in Harlem. Anyway, very tired. Different from running sore and stinking meat earlier; not disgusting, but pressing down, deadening. Maybe worse than a sore or rotten meat—a hard, hopeless life. And then the last line. Just one line, no fancy (and disgusting) simile. In fact, no simile at all. This is a metaphor, not a simile. Boom! Not just pressed down and tired, like maybe some racist whites think (hope?) blacks will be. Bang! Will there be survivors?

Student Work: Listing

Drawing on these notes in his journal, Bill wrote down a list of several key ideas to guide him through a draft of his explication essay. The organization of the draft posed no problem; in an explication, the writer simply follows the organization of the original text. Bill thus focuses his notes on his understanding of the meaning of the poem rather than on the organization of his ideas. Although Bill's notes were written down on paper, you may find that composing such notes on your computer works just as well.

11 lines; short, but powerful; explosive Question (first line)
answers (set off by space and also indented)
"raisin in the sun": shrinking
"sore" } disgusting
"rotten meat"
"syrupy sweet": relief from disgusting comparisons final question (last line): explosion?
explosive (powerful) because:
short, condensed, packed in italics
stands by self—like first line no fancy comparison; very direct

Student Explication Essay: "Langston Hughes's 'Harlem'"

Here is Bill's final explication essay. See if you can trace his "unfolding" of the Hughes poem as he explains his understanding of it.

Bill Horner

Professor McCabe

English 122

6 January 2016

Langston Hughes's "Harlem"

"Harlem" is a poem that is only eleven lines long, but it is charged with power. It explodes. Hughes sets the stage, so to speak, by telling us in the title that he is talking about Harlem. In the first line of his poem, Hughes asks, "What happens to a dream deferred?", encouraging us to consider what results occur when hopes are unfulfilled. The rest of the poem is set off by being indented, as though it is the answer to his question. This answer is in three parts (three stanzas, of different lengths).

In a way, it is wrong to speak of the answer, since the rest of the poem consists of questions, but I think Hughes means that each question (for instance, does a "deferred" hope "dry up / like a raisin in the sun?") really is an answer, something that really has happened and that will happen again. The first question, "Does it dry up / like a raisin in the sun?," is a famous line (2–3). To compare hope to a raisin dried in the sun is to suggest a terrible shrinking. The next two comparisons are to a "sore" (4) and to "rotten meat" (6). These comparisons are less clever, but they are very effective because they are disgusting. Then, maybe because of the disgusting comparisons, he gives a comparison that is not at all disgusting. In this comparison, he says that maybe the "dream deferred" will "crust over— / like a syrupy sweet" (7–8).

The seven lines with four comparisons are followed by a stanza of two lines with just one comparison:

Maybe it just sags like a heavy load (9–10).

So if we thought that this postponed dream might finally turn into something "sweet," we were kidding ourselves. Hughes comes down to earth, in a short stanza, with an image of a heavy load, which probably also calls to mind images of people bent under heavy loads, maybe of cotton, or maybe just any sort of heavy load carried by African Americans in Harlem and elsewhere.

The opening question ("What happens to a dream deferred?") was followed by four questions in seven lines, but now, with "Maybe it just sags / like a heavy load" (9–10), we get a statement, as though the poet at last has found an answer. But at the end we get one more question, set off by itself and in italics: "Or does it explode?" (11). This line itself is explosive for three reasons: It is short, it is italicized, and it is a stanza in itself. It's also interesting that this line, unlike the earlier lines, does not use a simile. It uses a metaphor. It's almost as though Hughes is saying, "O.K., we've had enough fancy ways of talking about this terrible situation; here it is, 'boom.' "

[New page]

Horner 3

Work Cited

Hughes, Langston. "Harlem." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 170. Print.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Bill Horner's explication suggests that the comparison with "a syrupy sweet" deliberately misleads the reader into thinking that the ending will be happy, and it thus serves to make the real ending even more powerful. In class, another student suggested that Hughes may be referring to African Americans who adopt a smiling manner in order to cope with an oppressive society. Which explanation do you prefer, and why? What do you think of combining the two?

   Does some method or principle help us decide which interpretation is correct? Can we, in fact, talk about a "correct" interpretation, or only about a plausible or implausible interpretation and an interesting or uninteresting interpretation?
2. In The Collected Poems of Langston Hughes (1994), the editors title this poem "Harlem." But, in the Selected Poems of Langston Hughes (1959), published when the poet was still alive, the poem is titled "Dream Deferred." Which title do you think is more effective? Do you interpret the poem differently, depending on how it is titled? How might a reader—who knew nothing about Hughes—respond to the poem if he or she came upon it with the title "Dream Deferred"?

Explication as Argument

We have said that an explication unfolds or opens up or interprets a work by calling attention to such things as the speaker's tone of voice and the implications in images. It might seem, then, to be an objective report, the sort of explanatory writing that is called expository rather than argumentative.

But because literature makes considerable use of connotations and symbolic meanings—"A rolling stone gathers no moss" is not essentially a statement about stones and moss but about something else—readers may differ in what they understand words to mean. The writer of an explication not only examines the meanings of specific words and images but also, having come to a conclusion about what the details add up to, argues an interpretation and supports a thesis.

What distinguishes argument from exposition is this: In argument, some statements are offered as reasons for others. Because writers of arguments assume that their readers may not at the outset share their views, in their writing they offer evidence to support their assertions.

If you reread Bill Horner's explication of "Harlem," you will notice that in speaking of the line "Or does it explode?" Bill says, "This line is explosive for three reasons." He then specifies the three reasons. That is, he argues his case, presenting three pieces of supporting evidence: Hughes's line is short, it is italicized, and it is a stanza in itself.

True, much of Horner's explication is expository writing when he says that the poem consists of "three parts (three stanzas, of different lengths)." There can be little disagreement between writer and reader here, although perhaps a reader might respond, "No, the title is also part of the poem, so the poem consists of four parts." A reader who is looking for an argument—in the sense of a quarrel, not in the sense of a reasoned discussion—can find it with almost any piece of writing. But, again, our point is that because expository writing does not assume a difference of opinion, it chiefly sets forth information rather than seek to make a case. Argumentative writing, on the other hand, assumes that it must set forth information in a way that persuades the reader of its truth, which means that it must give evidence.

Pure exposition—let's say, information about how to register for classes or information about what is likely to be on the final examination—is not concerned with persuading readers to accept a thesis. But an explication, even though it might seem only to clarify the meanings of the words in a poem, argues a thesis about the work as a whole.

Notice Bill Horner's opening sentence:

> "Harlem" is a poem that is only eleven lines long, but it is charged with power.

What is Horner's thesis? Certainly not that the poem is "only eleven lines long"—a writer hardly needs to argue for this assertion. Rather, Horner's thesis is that the poem "is charged with power." In the rest of the explication, he offers evidence that supports this assertion. To persuade us, he points out that certain lines are indented, that certain figures of speech have certain implications, and that the last stanza is italicized and consists of only one line.

You may disagree: You may not think the poem "is charged with power," and you may think that Horner has misread certain lines. We mentioned, in our first topic for "Critical Thinking and Writing," that when Horner offered this interpretation in class, another student saw a different meaning in "syrupy sweet" (line 8). But, if you disagree, whether with the reading as a whole or with the interpretation of a single image, it's not enough to assert that you disagree. You will have to offer an argument, which is to say, you will have to set forth reasons in your effort to persuade your readers.

Your goal in an explication is to present your insights about aspects of the poem's language. Even more, you want these insights to add up to a whole. When related to one another, they should enable your reader to understand the poem, overall, more clearly and to enjoy it more fully. Ask yourself, as you study the poem and develop your draft of the paper,

What is my thesis (my central point, my argument, my claim)?

This question will help you to make your essay coherent and unified. It is a reminder that an explication is more than a set of observations. The best explications make use of details to teach the reader something new about the poem as a whole.

✔CHECKLIST: Drafting an Explication

Overall Considerations

- ☐ Does the explication work its way through the poem, line by line? Does the explication provide a commentary on the poem as a whole?
- ☐ Does the commentary support a unified interpretation of the poem? Is this interpretation positioned as the paper's thesis?
- ☐ Does the explication convey information about the poem accurately and then offer ideas and interpretations about that information?
- ☐ Does the poem imply a story of some sort, for instance, the speaker's account of a love affair or of a response to nature? If so, what is its beginning, middle, and end?
- ☐ If you detect a story in the speaker's mind, a change of mood—for instance, a shift from bitterness that a love affair has ended to hope for its renewal—is this change communicated in part by the connotations of certain words? By syntax? By metrical shifts?
- ☐ Do the details of the explication all cohere into a meaningful whole? If so, your explication will largely be an argument on behalf of this thesis.

Detailed Considerations

- ☐ If the poem has a title other than the first line, what are the implications of the title?
- ☐ Are there clusters or patterns of imagery, for instance, religious images, economic images, or images drawn from nature? If so, how do they contribute to the meaning of the poem?
- ☐ Is irony (understatement or overstatement) used? To what effect?
- ☐ How do the connotations of certain words (for instance, dad rather than father) help to establish the meaning?
- ☐ What are the implications of the syntax—for instance, of notably simple or notably complex sentences? What do such sentences tell us about the speaker?
- ☐ Do metrical variations occur? If so, what is their significance?
- ☐ Do rhyming words have some meaningful connection, as in the clichés moon and June, dove, and love?
- ☐ What are the implications of the poem's appearance on the page—for example, of an indented line or of the stanzaic pattern? (If the poem consists of two stanzas of four lines each, does the second stanza offer a reversal of the first?)

Student Argumentative Explication Essay: "Giving Stamps Personality in 'Stamp Collecting'"

Let's examine a student paper that provides another example of an explication essay, written in response to the following poem.

Cathy Song

Born in 1955 and raised in Hawaii, Cathy Song is of Korean and Chinese descent. Her poetry often draws on this rich ancestry, exploring themes of family, gender, and identity. Her poems have been praised by reviewers for their compelling narratives and evocative imagery.

Stamp Collecting

The poorest countries have the prettiest stamps
as if impracticality were a major export shipped with the bananas, t-shirts and coconuts.
Take Tonga, where the tourists, expecting a dramatic waterfall replete with birdcalls,
are taken to see the island's peculiar mystery:
hanging bats with collapsible wings like black umbrellas swing upside down from fruit trees.
The Tongan stamp is a fruit.
The banana stamp is scalloped like a butter-varnished seashell.
The pineapple resembles a volcano, a spout of green on top,
and the papaya, a tarnished goat skull.

They look impressive,
these stamps of countries without a thing to sell except for what is scraped, uprooted and hulled from their mule-scratched hills.
They believe in postcards,
in portraits of progress: the new dam;
a team of young native doctors
wearing stethoscopes like exotic ornaments;
the recently constructed "Facultad de Medicina,"
a building as lack-lustre as an American motel.

The stamps of others are predictable.
Lucky is the country that possesses indigenous beauty.
Say a tiger or queen.
The Japanese can display to the world their blossoms: a spray of pink on green.
Like pollen, they drift, airborne.
But pity the country that is bleak and stark.
Beauty and whimsey are discouraged as indiscreet.
Unbreakable as their climate, a monument of ice.

[1988]

Let's examine how LaTina Johnson, a student in a composition course, uses an explication paper to make sense of "Stamp Collecting." Like the work by Bill Horner that we explored earlier in this chapter, LaTina's paper unfolds the meaning of a poem by tracing its ideas stanza by stanza and line by line. Unlike Bill's paper, this assignment tackles a longer and more complex poem, so every line of the poem cannot be addressed. This paper needs to be more selective and, as result, starts to shape its explication into a more analytical paper. In addition, this paper develops a strong thesis that emphasizes the poem's interest in a country's self-image and the poem's use of imagery. These focusing ideas are repeated throughout the paper and in the conclusion. This paper still uses the structure of the poem to structure its own ideas and organization, but it demonstrates just how argumentative an explication can become. As it becomes more argumentative and focused, an explication paper starts to evolve into an analytical paper. This paper serves as a good transition into our next chapter and its emphasis on analysis.

LaTina Johnson
Professor Wynne
English 122
1 February 2016

Giving Stamps Personality in "Stamp Collecting"

Cathy Song's poem "Stamp Collecting" uses the images on stamps to capture the cultures of different countries. She presents a series of three types of countries: poor countries, beautiful countries, and bleak countries. Each type of country is described through the stamp it might issue. As the poem shows, each country's hopes and failures are translated into the vivid imagery of a stamp. The stamp gives a personality to each country, describing the type of human emotions that country might have. Stanza by stanza, the poem moves through a series of stamps and describes the stamps' unique imagery, using that imagery to create a different cultural personality for each type of country.

Song shows how stamps use imagery that creates sensory impressions and creates cultural associations. In the first stanza, the poor countries are described as having the most exotic stamps. Song opens the poem by explaining, "The poorest countries/have the prettiest stamps/as if impracticality were a major export" (1–3). The stamps are impractical because they have excess beauty and detail, even though the poor countries have no resources. The stamps make the country seem human by expressing this human quality of "impracticality." In the first stanza, the stamps of Tonga are held up as an example. She shows how Tonga itself is exotic and strange by describing the strange bats that live there and are a "peculiar mystery" (7). Each stamp has a fruit that is presented in a uniquely memorable way: the "banana stamp is scalloped like a butter-varnished seashell," the "pineapple resembles a volcano," and the papaya looks like a "tarnished goat skull" (11–13). Song uses this list of similes to show how Tonga's exotic fruits are made even more exotic on their stamps. The stamps seem extreme and "over the top" in their imagery. The beauty, strangeness, and mystery of Tonga are captured in the imagery on their stamps.

These poor countries' stamps also show a second human quality: the belief in human progress. Song explains that these stamps will be placed on postcards: the countries "believe in postcards,/in portraits of progress" (19). The postcards show pictures of new dams, doctors, and hospitals. Although these countries' stamps and postcards express the hope for human progress, Song's poem makes it clear that the stamps do not match the reality of the country. The stamps are created by "countries without a thing to sell/except for what is scraped, uprooted, and hulled/from their mule-scratched hill" (15–17). Song's use of the strong verbs "scraped, uprooted, and hulled" shows how these countries are tough places to live, and the people are still dependent on land and human labor (16). Although the stamps put out a glamorous image, these countries have a culture of struggle. Song's poem shows that these countries' stamps are trying to make up for a lack of resources. The stamps and postcards seem to try to hide the poor country's reality, but wind up revealing that reality.

Song devotes these two stanzas to the poor countries' stamps, while the stamps of beautiful countries and bleak countries each receive only one short stanza each. Just like the stamps she describes, Song's first two stanzas are filled with visual beauty: they are long and detailed, and contain vivid, memorable images. These first two stanzas have a feeling of being "over the top," just like the stamps they describe.

The third stanza is shorter and describes the stamps of countries that are "predictable" (24). Song implies that these countries are more successful and wealthy. These countries can use images that show an "indigenous beauty./Say a tiger or a queen" (26). The image of a tiger conveys beauty and strength, while the image of a queen conveys beauty and stability. The poem states that countries that use these images are "lucky" (25). Such a country is lucky to have a culture that is more successful and predictable. Although that culture might not be as exotic or interesting as the culture of the poor counties, it can represent itself in beautiful stamps. Song uses a Japanese stamp to illustrate the idea of a predictable stamp created by an established culture. She describes the stamp's image of blossoms: "A spray of pink on green/Like pollen, they drift, airborne" (28–29). This image has a feeling of lightness and easiness. Unlike the exotic stamp from Tonga, this Japanese stamp does not have to try hard to impress or surprise its viewer. The Japanese culture seems secure and at ease.

The final short stanza describes the stamps of a country that is "bleak and stark" (30). Song prejudices us against this country by telling us to "pity" it (30). The stamps of this type of country are "serious" and filled with imagery of "factories, tramways and areoplanes" (34). The "beauty" and "whimsy" of the imagery of the other stamps is rejected (31). Instead, these stamps "issue serious statements" (33). The countries are described as "unbreakable as their climate, a monument of ice" (32). Compared to the exotic stamps of Tonga and the light stamps of Japan, these stamps are cold and unapproachable. Song captures the hard, cold nature of these countries in the image of a stamp that shows "athletes marbled into statues" (35). These stamps are empty of life. These stamps capture the personality of countries that "turn their noses upon the world." Instead of believing in progress or having a sense of beauty, these bleak countries try to present their bleakness as a type of strength. The poem ends by describing how these stamps and these countries offer "an unrelenting procession/of a grim, historic profile" (37–38). These stamps reveal the cold unhappiness that defines these countries.

Paul 3

Although a stamp might seem small and trivial, it can be a mirror of a country. The stamp provides a way of personifying the country, showing how a country can be exotic and hoping for progress, light and secure in its identity, or cold and needing to convey its strength. Each stamp captures a country's personality. "Stamp Collecting" uses vivid imagery to show how a stamp gives a country a visual identity. The poem emphasizes that these stamps reveal more than the country might want revealed—the stamps show not only the strengths but also the weaknesses of a country. As Song's poem convincingly shows, a stamp is a country's self-image.

[New page]

Paul 4

Work Cited

Song, Kathy. "Stamp Collecting." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 183. Print.

Your Turn: Additional Poems for Explication

The basic assignment here is to explicate the poems, but your instructor may also ask you to respond to some or all of the questions that follow each poem.

William Shakespeare

William Shakespeare (1564–1616), born in Stratford-upon-Avon in England, is chiefly known as a dramatic poet, but he also wrote nondramatic poetry. In 1609, a volume of 154 of his sonnets was published, apparently without his permission. Probably he chose to keep his sonnets unpublished, not because he thought that they were of little value, but because it was more prestigious to be an amateur (unpublished) poet than a professional (published) poet. Although the sonnets were published in 1609, they were probably written in the mid-1590s, when there was a vogue for sonneteering. A contemporary writer in 1598 said that Shakespeare's "sugared Sonnets [circulate] among his private friends."

Sonnet 73

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs° where late the sweet birds sang.
In me thou see'st the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west,
Which by-and-by black night doth take away,
Death's second self that seals up all in rest.
In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.

This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

[c. 1592, pub. 1609]

4 choir the part of the church where services are sung.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In the first quatrain (the first four lines), to what "time of year" does Shakespeare compare himself? In the second quatrain (lines 5–8), to what does he compare himself? In the third? If the sequence of the three quatrains were reversed, what would be gained or lost?
2. In line 8, what is "Death's second self"? What implications do you perceive in "seals up all in rest," as opposed, for instance, to "brings most welcome rest"?
3. In line 13, exactly what is "This"?
4. In line 14, suppose in place of "To love that well which thou must leave ere long," Shakespeare had written "To love me well whom thou must leave ere long." What, if anything, would have been gained or lost?
5. What insights into your own feelings and experiences does this poem give you? Please explain, being as specific as you can.

JOHN DONNE

John Donne (1572–1631) was born into a Roman Catholic family in England, but, in the 1590s, he abandoned that faith. In 1615, he became an Anglican priest and soon was known as a great preacher. One hundred sixty of his sermons survive, including one with the famous line, "No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less . . . ; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee." From 1621 until his death, he was dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. His love poems (often bawdy and cynical) are his early work, and his "Holy Sonnets" (among the greatest religious poems written in English) are his later work.

Holy Sonnet XIV

Batter my heart, three-personed God; for you
As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend;
That I may rise and stand, o'erthrow me, and bend
Your force, to break, blow, burn, and make me new.
I, like an usurped town, to another due,
Labor to admit you, but oh, to no end.
Reason, your viceroy in me, me should defend,
But is captived, and proves weak or untrue.
Yet dearly I love you, and would be loved fain,
But am betrothed unto your enemy:
Divorce me, untie, or break that knot again,
Take me to you, imprison me, for I
Except you enthrall me, never shall be free,
Nor ever chaste, except you ravish me.

[1633]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Explain the paradoxes (apparent contradictions) in lines 2, 3, 13, and 14. Explain the double meanings of "enthrall" (line 13) and "ravish" (line 14).
2. In lines 1–4, what is God implicitly compared to (considering especially lines 2 and 4)? How does this comparison lead into the comparison that dominates lines 5–8? What words in lines 9–12 are especially related to the earlier lines?
3. What is gained by piling up verbs in lines 2–4?
4. Are sexual references necessarily irreverent in a religious poem? Present a brief argument in which you say yes, and then another argument in which you say no. Make each argument as convincing as you can.

Emily Brontë

Emily Brontë (1818–48) spent most of her short life (she died of tuberculosis) in an English village on the Yorkshire moors. The sister of Charlotte Brontë (author of Jane Eyre*) and of Anne Brontë, Emily is best known for her novel* Wuthering Heights (1847), but she was a considerable poet, and her first significant publication (1846) was in a volume of poems by the three sisters.

Spellbound

The night is darkening round me,
The wild winds coldly blow;
But a tyrant spell has bound me
And I cannot, cannot go.
The giant trees are bending

Their bare boughs weighed with snow.
And the storm is fast descending,
And yet I cannot go.
Clouds beyond clouds above me,
Wastes beyond wastes below;
But nothing drear can move me;
I will not, cannot go.

[1837]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What exactly is a spell, and what does it mean to be spellbound?
2. What difference, if any, would it make if the first line said "has darkened" instead of "is darkening"?
3. What difference would it make, if any, if lines 4 and 12 were switched?
4. What does "drear" (line 11) mean? Is this word too unusual? Should the poet have used a more familiar word?
5. Describe the speaker's state of mind. Have you ever experienced anything like this yourself? What was the situation, and how did you move beyond it?

Li-Young Lee

Li-Young Lee was born in 1957 in Jakarta, Indonesia, of Chinese parents. In 1964, his family brought him to the United States. He was educated at the University of Pittsburgh, the University of Arizona, and the State University of New York, Brockport. He now lives in Chicago, where he works as an artist.

I Ask My Mother to Sing

She begins, and my grandmother joins her.
Mother and daughter sing like young girls.
If my father were alive, he would play his accordion and sway like a boat.

I've never been in Peking, or the Summer Palace, nor stood on the great Stone Boat to watch the rain begin on Kuen Ming Lake, the picnickers running away in the grass.

But I love to hear it sung;
how the waterlilies fill with rain until they overturn, spilling water into water, then rock back, and fill with more.

Both women have begun to cry.
But neither stops her song.

[1986]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Why might the speaker ask the women to sing?
2. Why do the women cry? Why do they continue to sing?
3. Is this poem simple, or complex, or both? Please point to specific details to support your argument.

RANDALL JARRELL

Randall Jarrell (1914–65)—the accent in Jarrell is on the second syllable—was educated at Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tennessee, where he majored in psychology. After serving with the air force in World War II as a control tower operator, he taught in several colleges and universities, meanwhile establishing a reputation as a poet and a literary critic.

The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner

From my mother's sleep I fell into the State,
And I hunched in its belly till my wet fur froze.
Six miles from earth, loosed from its dream of life,
I woke to black flak and the nightmare fighters.
When I died they washed me out of the turret with a hose. 5

[1955]

Jarrell has furnished an explanatory note: "A ball turret was a plexiglass sphere set into the belly of a B-17 or B-24, and inhabited by two .50 caliber machine-guns and one man, a short small man. When this gunner tracked with his machine-guns a fighter attacking his bomber from below, he revolved with the turret; hunched upside-down in his little sphere, he looked like the fetus in the womb. The fighters which attacked him were armed with cannon firing explosive shells. The hose was a steam hose."

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is implied in the first line? In line 4: "I woke to . . . nightmare"? Taking account of the title, do you think that "wet fur" is literal or metaphoric, or both? Do you find the simplicity of the last line anticlimactic? How does it continue the metaphor of birth?
2. Why do you think Jarrell ended each line with punctuation?

CHAPTER 7

Analysis: Inquiry, Interpretation, and Argument

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Define analysis and describe the process for analyzing literary texts
- Use inquiry to ask productive questions about a literary text
- Develop an interpretation of a literary text
- Choose a topic and develop an analytical thesis
- Create a strong argument that expresses your interpretation of the text

Analysis

In the previous chapter, we explored explication, a form of writing that works its way line by line though a literary work to uncover its meaning. Explication is a method used chiefly in the study of fairly short poems or brief extracts from essays, stories, novels, and plays. In writing about works that are longer than a page or two, a more common approach than explicating is analyzing (literally, separating the work into parts in order to better understand the whole). Through literary analysis, we aim to come to a deeper understanding of the work, exploring the ideas and issues that it addresses. Through this exploration, we generate an interpretation that takes the form of an argument supported by evidence.

In an analytical essay, we cannot address all of the details in a complex literary text, so we select an element or facet of the text for in-depth exploration, explaining how understanding that part helps us to understand the larger meaning of the text. An analysis of, say, The Color Purple may consider the functions of the setting or the uses that certain minor characters serve; an analysis of Hamlet may consider the comic passages or the reasons for Hamlet's delay; an analysis of Death of a Salesman may consider the depiction of women or the causes of Willy Loman's failure. An analytical essay usually advances a central argument or thesis and offers supporting arguments—reasons, explanations, evidence—that develop the thesis.

Most of the writing that you will do in college—not only in your English courses but also in courses in history, sociology, economics, fine arts, and philosophy—will involve analysis, a method we commonly use in thinking about complex matters and in attempting to account for our responses to them. When we are watching Venus Williams play tennis, we may admire her serve, her backhand, or the execution of several brilliant plays, and then think more generally about the concentration and flexibility that allow her to capitalize on her opponent's momentary weakness. And, of course, when we want to improve our own game, we try to analyze our performance. When writing is our game, we analyze our responses to a work, trying to name them and account for them. We analyze our notes, looking for ideas that connect, searching for significant patterns, and later we analyze our drafts, looking for strengths and weaknesses. Similarly, in peer review, we analyze the draft of a fellow student, seeing how the parts (individual words, sentences, whole paragraphs, the tentative title, and so on) relate to one another and fit together as a whole.

Understanding Analysis as a Process of Inquiry, Interpretation, and Argument

It can be helpful to think of analysis as a natural process or method of thinking. Literature is inherently thought provoking: It encourages us to start analyzing it right away. Any time that we have asked, "Why did that character do that?" we have started the process of analysis. We want to harness this type of thinking and use it in our writing. Let's break down this process of analysis into concrete steps that you can take as you work with a literary work.

- Before you begin analysis, remind yourself that all work with literature begins with close reading. Close reading is a careful and attentive reading of literature. In close reading, you "notice what you notice" and start to select aspects of the text for further thought.
- Analysis starts with inquiry, or the process of asking interesting and revealing questions about the text. Analysis also encourages arguing with yourself—asking yourself questions about your inferences, assumptions, definitions, and evidence.
- Analysis then encourages interpretation, in which you determine what you think the text means as you form answers to your questions. Interpretation requires that you break down the whole into parts, explore the relationship between the parts, and put the parts back together again to determine key ideas. Interpretation often focuses on connecting the "big ideas" or concepts raised by the text to the specific details or evidence presented by the text.
- Analysis is typically best expressed in an argument, in which you present your opinions about the text as a well-organized, logical, and insightful sequence of ideas.

To develop an analysis of a work, we must engage in inquiry and interpretation; we must formulate questions and answer them. We can approach a literary work with a variety of questions that will help us start thinking analytically:

- What is the function of the setting in this story or play?
- Why has this character been introduced?
- What is the author trying to tell us?
- How has this idea been developed and made more complex?
- How exactly can we describe the work's tone?
- What is the difference in assumptions between this essay and another one?

After starting with helpful general questions such as these, your analysis will start to generate more specific questions, focusing on the ideas that you see as central to the text.

Analyzing a Story from the Hebrew Bible: The Judgment of Solomon

A brief analysis of a very short story about King Solomon, from the Hebrew Bible (often called the Old Testament), may be useful here. Because the story is short, the analysis can consider all or almost all of the story's parts, and therefore the analysis can seem relatively complete. ("Seem relatively complete" because the analysis will, in fact, be far from complete, since the number of reasonable things that can be said about a work is almost as great as the number of its readers. Also, a given reader might, at a later date, offer a different reading from what that reader offers today.)

The following story about King Solomon, customarily called the Judgment of Solomon, appears in the Hebrew Bible, in the latter part of the third chapter of the book called 1 Kings or First Kings, probably written in the mid-sixth century BCE. The translation is from the King James Version of the Bible (1611).

Two expressions in the story need clarification: (1) The woman who "overlaid" her child in her sleep rolled over on the child and suffocated it; and (2) it is said of a woman that her "bowels yearned upon her son," that is, her heart longed for her son. (In Hebrew psychology, the bowels were thought to be the seat of emotion.)

The Judgment of Solomon

Then came there two women, that were harlots, unto the king, and stood before him. And the one woman said, "O my lord, I and this woman dwell in one house, and I was delivered of a child with her in the house. And it came to pass the third day after that I was delivered, that this woman was delivered also: and we were together; there was no stranger in the house, save we two in the house. And this woman's child died in the night; because she overlaid it. And she arose at midnight, and took my son from beside me, while thine handmaid slept, and laid it in her bosom, and laid her dead child in my bosom. And when I rose in the morning to give my child suck, behold, it was dead: but when I considered it in the morning, behold, it was not my son, which I did bear."

And the other woman said, "Nay; but the living is my son, and the dead is thy son." And this said, "No; but the dead is thy son, and the living is my son." Thus they spake before the king.

Then said the king, "The one saith, 'This is my son that liveth, and thy son is dead': and the other saith, 'Nay; but thy son is the dead, and my son is the living.'" And the king said, "Bring me a sword." And they brought a sword before the king. And the king said, "Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the other."

Then spake the woman whose the living child was unto the king, for her bowels yearned upon her son, and she said, "O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it." But the other said, "Let it be neither mine nor thine, but divide it."

5 Then the king answered and said, "Give her the living child, and in no wise slay it: she is the mother thereof."

And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him to do judgment.

Developing an Analysis of the Story

How can we analyze this story? Let's begin by analyzing the form or the shape of the story. One form or shape that we notice is this:

> The story moves from a problem to a solution.

We can also say, still speaking of the overall form, that:

> The story moves from quarreling and talk of death to unity and talk of life.

In short, the story has a happy ending, a form that (because it provides an optimistic view of life and also a sense of completeness) gives most people pleasure.

In thinking about a work of literature, it is always useful to take notice of the basic form of the whole, the overall structural pattern. Doubtless you are already familiar with many basic patterns, for example, > tragedy (joy yielding to sorrow) and > romantic comedy (angry conflict yielding to joyful union).

If you think even briefly about verbal works, you'll notice the structures or patterns that govern songs, episodes in soap operas, political speeches (beginning with the candidate's expression of pleasure at being in Duluth and ending with "God bless you all"), detective stories, westerns, and so on. And, just as viewers of western films experience one western in the context of others, so readers experience one story in the context of similar stories, and one poem in the context of other poems.

Looking at its form, we can start to explore the ideas that are expressed through that form. We can say that The Judgment of Solomon is a sort of detective story: There is a death, followed by a conflict in the testimony of the witnesses, and then a solution by a shrewd outsider. Consider Solomon's predicament. Ordinarily in literature, characters are sharply defined and individualized, yet the essence of a detective story is that the culprit should not be easily recognized as wicked, and here nothing seems to distinguish the two petitioners. Solomon is confronted by "two women, that were harlots." Until late in the story—that is, up to the time Solomon suggests dividing the child—they are described only as "the one woman," "the other woman," "the one," "the other."

Does the story suffer from weak characterization? If we think analytically about this issue, we realize that the point surely is not to make each woman distinct. Rather, the point is (until late in the story) to make the women as alike as possible so that we cannot tell which of the two is speaking the truth. Like Solomon, we have nothing to go on; neither witness is known to be more honest than the other, and there are no other witnesses to support or refute either woman.

Analysis is concerned with

- seeing the relationships between the parts of a work, but it is also concerned with
- taking notice of what is not in the work.

A witness would destroy the story, or turn it into an utterly different story. Another thing missing from this story is an explicit editorial comment or interpretation, except for the brief remark at the end that the people "feared the king." If we had read the story in the Geneva Bible (1557–60), which is the translation of the Bible that Shakespeare was familiar with, we would have found a marginal comment: "Her motherly affection herein appeareth that she had rather endure the rigour of the lawe, than see her child cruelly slaine." Would you agree that it is better, at least in this story, for the reader to draw conclusions than for the storyteller explicitly to point them out?

Solomon wisely contrives a situation in which these two claimants, who seem so similar, will reveal their true natures: The mother will reveal her love, and the liar will reveal her hard heart. The early symmetry (the competing identities of the two women) pleases the reader, and so does the device by which we can at last distinguish between the two women.

But even near the end there is a further symmetry. To save the child's life, the true mother gives up her claim, crying out, "Give her the living child, and in no wise slay it." The author (or, rather, the translator who produced this part of the King James Version) takes these very words, with no change whatsoever, and puts them into Solomon's mouth as the king's final judgment. Solomon too says, "Give her the living child, and in no wise slay it," but now the sentence takes on a new meaning. In the first sentence, "her" refers to the liar (the true mother says to give the child to "her"); in Solomon's sentence, "her" refers to the true mother: "Give her the living child. . . ." Surely we take pleasure in the fact that the very words by which the mother renounces her child are the words (1) that reveal to Solomon the truth and that (2) Solomon uses to restore the child to his mother.

In our analysis, we have talked chiefly about the relations of parts, and we have tried to explain why the two women in this story are not distinct until Solomon finds a way to reveal their distinctive natures: If the story is to demonstrate Solomon's wisdom, the women must seem identical until Solomon can show that they differ. We can start to imagine a paper that makes the argument that the two women must be seen as interchangeable in order for Solomon's discovery of the mother—and his use of a key question to differentiate of them—to have real power.

But our analysis could have gone into some other topic. Let's consider several possibilities. A student might begin by asking this question: Although it is important for the women to be highly similar, why are they harlots? (It is too simple to answer that the women in the story are harlots, because the author is faithfully reporting a historical episode in Solomon's career. The story is widely recognized as a folktale that is also found in other ancient cultures.) One possible reason for making the women harlots is that the story demands that there be no witnesses; by using harlots, the author disposed of husbands, parents, and siblings who might otherwise be expected to live with the women. A second possible reason is that the author wanted to show that Solomon's justice extended to all, not only to respectable folk. Third, perhaps the author wished to reject or to complicate the stereotype of the harlot as a thoroughly disreputable person. The author rejected or complicated the harlot by introducing another (and truer?) stereotype, the mother motivated by overwhelming maternal love.

Opening Up Additional Ways to Analyze the Story

One sign of a good analytical approach to a literary work is that it opens the work up for further thinking. Although in an analytical essay, you must ultimately select one idea for development, the brainstorming required by analysis will often lead to many good ideas that must be considered and put aside. As you formulate an analysis, you might imagine many alternative "ways in" to the work. Let's consider some of the other ways in which The Judgment of Solomon could be analyzed.

1. Another kind of analytical essay might go beyond the structure of the individual work, to the relation of the work to some larger whole. For instance, the writer might approach The Judgment of Solomon from the point of view of gender criticism (discussed in Appendix A): In this story, it might be argued, wisdom is an attribute only of a male; women are either deceitful or emotional. From this point, the writer might set out to create a research essay on gender in a larger whole, using certain books of the Hebrew Bible.

2. We might also analyze the story in the context of other examples of what scholars call Wisdom Literature (the Book of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, for instance). Notice that Solomon's judgment leads the people to fear him—because his wisdom is great, formidable, and God-inspired.

   It happens that we do not know who wrote The Judgment of Solomon, but the authors of most works of literature that came later are known, and therefore some critics seek to analyze a given work within the context of the author's life. Evidence drawn from the author's biography would be used to support an interpretation. For some other critics, the larger context would be the reading process, which includes the psychology of the reader. (Biographical criticism and reader-response criticism are discussed in Appendix A.)
3. Still another analysis—again, remember that a work can be analyzed from many points of view—might examine two or more translations of the story. You do not need to know Hebrew in order to compare an early seventeenth-century translation with a twentieth-century version, such as that of the New Jerusalem Bible or the Revised English Bible. You might argue that one version is, on literary grounds, more effective. Such an essay might include an attempt, by means of a comparison, to analyze the effect of the archaic language of the King James Version. Does the somewhat unfamiliar language turn a reader off, or does it add mystery, dignity, or authority to the tale—valuable qualities perhaps not found in the modern version? By the way, in the Revised English Bible, Solomon does not exactly repeat the mother's plea. The mother says, "Let her have the baby," and Solomon then says, "Give the living baby to the first woman." In the New Jerusalem Bible, after the mother says, "Let them give her the live child," Solomon says, "Give the live child to the first woman." If you prefer one version to the other two, why not try to analyze the reasons for your preference?
4. Finally, it should be mentioned that an analysis of the structure of a work, in which the relationships of the parts to the whole are considered, allows the work to be regarded as independent of the external world. If we argue, say, that literature should in all respects reflect life, and we want to analyze the work against reality as we see it, we may find ourselves severely judging The Judgment of Solomon. We might ask if it is likely that a great king would bother to hear the case of two prostitutes quarreling over a child or if it is likely that the false claimant would really call for the killing of the child. Similarly, to take an absurd example, an analysis of this story in terms of its ability to evoke laughter would be laughable. The point is this: An analysis will be interesting and useful to a reader only insofar as the aim of the analysis seems reasonable.

Analyzing a Story from the New Testament: The Parable of the Prodigal Son

Let's now look at another brief story from the Bible, this one from the Gospel according to Luke, in the New Testament. Luke, the author of the third of the four Gospels, was a second-generation Christian. He was probably a Roman, though some early accounts refer to him as a Syrian; in any case, he wrote in Greek, probably composing the Gospel in about 80–85 CE. In Luke 15:11-32, the author reports a story that Jesus told. This story, which occurs only in Luke's Gospel, is of a type called a parable, an extremely brief narrative from which a moral may be drawn.

The Parable of the Prodigal Son

And he said, "A certain man had two sons: and the younger of them said to his father, 'Father, give me a portion of goods that falleth to me.' And he divided unto them his living. And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living.

"And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land, and he began to be in want. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country, and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. And when he came to himself, he said, 'How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger? I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants."'

"And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son.' But the father said to his servants, 'Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him, and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet. And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it, and let us eat, and be merry. For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found.' And they began to be merry.

"Now his elder son was in the field, and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing. And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant. And he said unto him 'Thy brother is come, and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound.' And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and entreated him. And he answering said to his father 'Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment, and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with friends: but as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf.' And he said unto him, 'Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again: and was lost, and is found.'"

Asking Questions That Trigger an Analysis of the Story

Now that you've read The Parable of the Prodigal Son, how would you start to analyze it? Looking at our analysis of The Judgment of Solomon, can you follow a similar process to explore the form of this story and the ideas that it expresses? What interesting situation does the story dramatize, and what ideas are revealed by this situation? What parts of the story are most interesting to you? How do those parts of the story come together to create the story's whole or its larger meaning?

In order to understand a literary work, we must question it. In sections following the literary works that appear in this anthology, we pose questions about them. These questions may stimulate your thinking and thus help you write. Our concern as teachers of writing is not so much with the answers to these questions as with your use of the questions to start a process of open-ended thinking. We believe, and we ask you to believe, that there are no "right" answers, only more or less persuasive ones, to most questions about literature—as about life. Our aim is to help you to pose questions that will stimulate your best thinking.

Inquiry—question asking—starts the process of analysis. Following are some questions that can help you to form your analysis of The Judgment of Solomon.

1. In talking about The Judgment of Solomon, we commented on certain repetitions (two women, for example) and contrasts (for example, troubled beginning, happy ending), which help to give shape to the story. What parallels or contrasts (or both) do you find in the parable of the prodigal son? What function does the older brother serve? If he were omitted, what, if anything, would be lost? (Characterize him, partly by comparing him with the younger brother and with the father.)
2. Is the father foolish and sentimental? Do you approve or disapprove of his behavior at the end? In a short argumentative essay (250–500 words), support your thesis.
3. Jesus told the story, so it must have had a meaning that was consistent with his other teachings. Christians customarily interpret the story as meaning that God (like the father in the parable) rejoices in the return of a sinner. What meaning, if any, can it have for readers who are not Christians? Explain your answer.
4. Does this parable present an argument? Can you offer a counterargument to the parable?

From Inquiry to Interpretation to Argument: Developing an Analytical Paper

If a story is short enough, you may be able to examine everything in it that you think is worth commenting on, but even if it is short, you may nevertheless decide to focus on one element, such as the setting, or the construction of the plot, or the connection between two characters, or the degree of plausibility. A close examination of one or more specific elements will allow you to explain the ideas that you feel are most central to the work. Let's read a story by Ernest Hemingway, one of America's most famous twentieth-century fiction writers, and see what elements of the story two different student writers choose to emphasize.

Ernest Hemingway

Ernest Hemingway (1899–1961) was born in Oak Park, Illinois. After graduating from high school in 1917, he worked on the Kansas City Star but left to serve as a volunteer ambulance driver in Italy, where he was wounded in action. He returned home, married, and then served as European correspondent for the Toronto Star, but he soon focused on writing fiction. In 1922, he settled in Paris, where he moved in a circle of American expatriates that included Ezra Pound, Gertrude Stein, and F. Scott Fitzgerald. It was in Paris that he wrote stories and nov- els about what Gertrude Stein called a "lost generation" of rootless Americans in Europe. (For Hemingway's reminiscences of the Paris years, see his posthumously published A Moveable Feast.) He served as a journalist during the Spanish Civil War and during World War II, but he was also something of a private soldier.

After World War II, his reputation ebbed, though he was still active as a writer (for instance, he wrote The Old Man and the Sea in 1952). In 1954, Hemingway was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature; in 1961, depressed by a sense of failing power, he took his own life.

Cat in the Rain

There were only two Americans stopping at the hotel. They did not know any of the people they passed on the stairs on their way to and from their room. Their room was on the second floor facing the sea. It also faced the public garden and the war monument. There were big palms and green benches in the public garden. In the good weather there was always an artist with his easel. Artists liked the way the palms grew and the bright colors of the hotels facing the gardens and the sea. Italians came from a long way off to look up at the war monument. It was made of bronze and glistened in the rain. It was raining. The rain dripped from the palm trees. Water stood in pools on the gravel paths. The sea broke in a long line in the rain and slipped back down the beach to come up and break again in a long line in the rain. The motor cars were gone from the square by the war monument. Across the square in the doorway of the café a waiter stood looking out at the empty square.

The American wife stood at the window looking out. Outside right under their window a cat was crouched under one of the dripping green tables. The cat was trying to make herself so compact that she would not be dripped on.

"I'm going down and get that kitty," the American wife said.

"I'll do it," her husband offered from the bed.

"No, I'll get it. The poor kitty is out trying to keep dry under a table."

The husband went on reading, lying propped up with the two pillows at the foot of the bed.

"Don't get wet," he said.

The wife went downstairs and the hotel owner stood up and bowed to her as she passed the office. His desk was at the far end of the office. He was an old man and very tall.

"Il piove,"[1] the wife said. She liked the hotel-keeper.

"Si, si, Signora, brutto tempo. It is very bad weather."

He stood behind his desk in the far end of the dim room. The wife liked him. She liked the deadly serious way he received any complaints. She liked his dignity. She liked the way he wanted to serve her. She liked the way he felt about being a hotel-keeper. She liked his old, heavy face and big hands.

Liking him she opened the door and looked out. It was raining harder. A man in a rubber cape was crossing the empty square to the café. The cat would be around to the right. Perhaps she could go along under the eaves. As she stood in the doorway an umbrella opened behind her. It was the maid who looked after their room.

"You must not get wet," she smiled, speaking Italian. Of course, the hotel-keeper had sent her.

[1]Il piove It's raining (Italian).

With the maid holding the umbrella over her, she walked along the gravel path until she was under their window. The table was there, washed bright green in the rain, but the cat was gone. She was suddenly disappointed. The maid looked up at her.

"Ha perduto qualque cosa, Signora?"[2]

"There was a cat," said the American girl.

"A cat?"

"Si, il gatto."

"A cat?" the maid laughed. "A cat in the rain?"

"Yes," she said, "under the table." Then. "Oh. I wanted it so much. I wanted a kitty."

When she talked English the maid's face tightened.

"Come, Signora," she said. "We must get back inside. You will be wet."

"I suppose so," said the American girl.

They went back along the gravel path and passed in the door. The maid stayed outside to close the umbrella. As the American girl passed the office, the padrone bowed from his desk. Something felt very small and tight inside the girl. The padrone made her feel very small and at the same time really important. She had a momentary feeling of being of supreme importance. She went on up the stairs. She opened the door of the room. George was on the bed, reading.

"Did you get the cat?" he asked, putting the book down.

"It was gone."

"Wonder where it went to," he said, resting his eyes from reading.

She sat down on the bed.

"I wanted it so much," she said. "I don't know why I wanted it so much. I wanted that poor kitty. It isn't any fun to be a poor kitty out in the rain."

George was reading again.

She went over and sat in front of the mirror of the dressing table looking at herself with the hand glass. She studied her profile, first one side and then the other. Then she studied the back of her head and her neck.

"Don't you think it would be a good idea if I let my hair grow out?" she asked, looking at her profile again.

George looked up and saw the back of her neck, clipped close like a boy's.

"I like it the way it is."

"I get so tired of it," she said. "I get so tired of looking like a boy."

George shifted his position in the bed. He hadn't looked away from her since she started to speak.

"You look pretty darn nice," he said.

She laid the mirror down on the dresser and went over to the window and looked out. It was getting dark.

"I want to pull my hair back tight and smooth and make a big knot at the back that I can feel," she said. "I want to have a kitty to sit on my lap and purr when I stroke her."

"Yeah?" George said from the bed.

"And I want to eat at a table with my own silver and I want candles. And I want it to be spring and I want to brush my hair out in front of a mirror and I want a kitty and I want some new clothes."

"Oh, shut up and get something to read," George said. He was reading again.

His wife was looking out of the window. It was quite dark now and still raining in the palm trees.

[2]Ha . . . Signora Have you lost something, Madam?

"Anyway, I want a cat," she said, "I want a cat. I want a cat now. If I can't have long hair or any fun, I can have a cat."

45 George was not listening. He was reading his book. His wife looked out of the window where the light had come on in the square.

Someone knocked at the door.

"Avanti,"[3] George said. He looked up from his book.

In the doorway stood the maid. She held a big tortoise-shell cat pressed tight against her and swung down against her body.

"Excuse me," she said, "the padrone asked me to bring this for the Signora."

[1925]

Close Reading

Careful close reading is the best way to start the analysis process. When you read a story—or, perhaps more accurately, when you reread a story before discussing it or writing about it—you'll find it helpful to jot an occasional note (for instance, a brief response or a question) in the margins and to underline or highlight passages that strike you as especially interesting. Here is part of the story, along with the annotations of a student in a college writing course, Tom Yanagi.

Student Work: Annotation

The cat was trying to make herself so compact that she would not be dripped on.

"I'm going down and get that kitty," the American wife said.

He doesn't make a move

Is he making a joke? Or maybe he just isn't even thinking about what he is saying?

"I'll do it," her husband offered from the bed.

"No, I'll get it. The poor kitty is out trying to keep dry under a table."

The husband went on reading, lying propped up with the two pillows at the foot of the bed.

still doesn't move

"Don't get wet," he said.

contrast with the husband

The wife went downstairs and the hotel owner stood up and bowed to her as she passed the office. His desk was at the far end of the office. He was an old man and very tall.

"Il piove," the wife said. She liked the hotel-keeper.

"Si, si, Signora, brutto tempo. It is very bad weather."

He stood behind his desk in the far end of the dim room. The wife liked him. She liked the deadly serious way he received any complaints. She liked his dignity. She liked the way he wanted to serve her. She liked the way he felt about being a hotel-keeper. She liked his old, heavy face and big hands.

She respects him and she is pleased by the attention he shows to emphasize the bad weather??

Liking him she opened the door and looked out. It was raining harder. A man in a rubber cape was crossing the empty square to the café. The cat would be around to the right.

[3]Avanti Come in.

Inquiry Questions

Everything in a story is presumably important, but if you have read the story once, probably something has especially interested (or puzzled) you, such as the relationship between two people or the way the end of the story is connected to the beginning. On rereading, then, pen in hand, you'll find yourself noticing things that you missed or didn't find especially significant on your first reading and first annotation. Now that you know the end of the story, you will read the beginning in a different way.

If your instructor asks you to think about certain questions, you'll keep them in mind while you reread, and you'll find ideas coming to you. In "Cat in the Rain," suppose you are asked (or you ask yourself) if the story might just as well be about a dog in the rain. Would anything be lost?

Following are a few questions that you can ask of almost any story. (On pages 455–57, we give a fuller list.) After scanning the questions, you will want to reread the story, pen in hand, and then note your responses, either on a sheet of paper or on your computer. As you write, it will be helpful to go back and reread the story or at least parts of it.

1. What happens? In two or three sentences—say, in twenty-five to fifty words—summarize what happens in the story. What are the most important events?
2. What sorts of people are the chief characters? In "Cat in the Rain," the chief characters are George, George's wife, and the innkeeper (the padrone). Note the traits that each seems to possess, and next to each trait, briefly give some supporting evidence.
3. What especially pleased or displeased you in the story? Devote at least a sentence or two to the end of the story. Do you find the end satisfying? Why or why not?
4. Have you any thoughts about the title? If so, what are they? If the story did not have a title, what would you call it?

After you have made your own notes, compare them with responses to these same questions by the student, Tom Yanagi. No two readers will respond in exactly the same way, but all readers can examine their responses and try to account for them, at least in part. If your responses are substantially different, how do you account for the differences?

Student Work: Inquiry Notes

1. What happens?
   A Summary:
   A young wife, stopping with her husband at an Italian hotel, from her room sees a cat in the rain. She goes to get it, but it is gone, and so she returns empty-handed. A moment later the maid knocks at the door, holding a tortoise-shell cat.

2. What sorts of people are the chief characters?
   The characters and evidence:
   The woman.
   —kind-hearted (pities cat in rain)
   —appreciates innkeeper's courtesy ("liked the way he wanted to serve her") and admires him ("She liked his dignity")

—unhappy (wants a cat, wants to change her hair, wants to eat at a table with her own silver)
The husband, George.
—not willing to put himself out (says he'll go to garden to get cat but doesn't move)
—doesn't seem very interested in wife (hardly talks to her—he's reading; tells her to "shut up")
—but he does say he finds her attractive ("You look pretty darn nice")
The innkeeper.
—serious, dignified ("She liked the deadly serious way he received any complaints. She liked his dignity") courteous, helpful (sends maid with umbrella; at end sends maid with cat)

3. What especially pleased or displeased you in the story?
   Dislikes and likes:
   —"Dislikes" is too strong, but I was disappointed that more didn't happen at the end. What is the husband's reaction to the cat? Or his final reaction to his wife? I mean, what did he think about his wife when the maid brings the cat? And, for that matter, what is the wife's reaction? Is she satisfied? Or does she realize that the cat can't really make her happy?
   —Now for the likes. (1) I guess I did like the way it turned out; it's sort of a happy ending, I think, since she wants the cat and gets it. (2) I also especially like the innkeeper. Maybe I like him partly because the wife likes him, and if she likes him he must be nice. And he is nice—very helpful.

4. Have you any thoughts about the title?
   The title:
   —I don't suppose that I would have called it "Cat in the Rain," but I don't know what I would have called it. Maybe "An American Couple in Italy." Or maybe "The Innkeeper." I really do think that the innkeeper is very important, even though he only has a few lines. He's very impressive—not only to the girl, but to me (and maybe to all readers), since at the end of the story we see how careful the innkeeper is.
   —But the more I think about Hemingway's title, the more I think that maybe it also refers to the girl. Like the "poor kitty" in the rain, the wife is in a pretty bad situation. "It isn't any fun to be a poor kitty out in the rain." Of course the woman is indoors, but her husband generates lots of unpleasant weather. She may as well be out in the rain. She says "I want to have a kitty to sit on my lap and purr when I stroke her." This shows that she wants to be affectionate and that she also wants to have someone respond to her affection. She is like a cat in the rain.

Tom's responses probably include statements that you want to take issue with. Or, perhaps you feel that the student did not even mention some things that you think are important. You may want to make notes on the student's inquiry notes and raise some questions about them in class.

Interpretation Brainstorming

Good inquiry questions trigger brainstorming and the development of ideas that move beyond the initial question. For example, Tom used his inquiry notes to develop the following detailed journal entry. His instructor asked the class to revisit their inquiry notes, to locate an interesting idea, and to continue to write about that idea in their journals. This more concentrated writing encourages interpretation or the explanation of your understanding of the meaning of the text. The interpretive stance, focused and developed further, can lead to a paper's topic. Let's take a look at Tom's developing analysis of the story in his journal writing.

Student Work: Journal Writing

As I look back on my inquiry notes and think about the story a second time, one of my "dislikes" becomes a "like." I like the way Hemingway shows the husband. I don't mean that I like the man himself, but I like the way Hemingway shows he is such a bastard—not getting off the bed to get the cat, telling his wife to shut up and read.

Another thing about him is that the one time he says something nice about her, it's about her hair, and she isn't keen on the way her hair is. She says it makes her look "like a boy," and she is "tired" of looking like a boy. There's something wrong with this marriage. George hardly pays attention to his wife, but he wants her to look like a boy. Maybe the idea is that this macho guy wants to keep her looking like an inferior (immature) version of himself. He doesn't seem to want to recognize her individuality or see her as a unique person with any power in the situation.

Perhaps this is represented by the way she is referred to as an "American wife." This term gets repeated. The word "wife" is repeated, but we never learn her name. That becomes her identity. George certainly doesn't seem interested in letting her fulfill herself as a woman.

I like the way Hemingway shows us the relation between the husband and wife (even though the relation is pretty bad), and I like the innkeeper. Even if the relation with the couple ends unhappily, the story has a sort of happy ending, so far as it goes, since the innkeeper does what he can to please his guest: he sends the maid, with the cat. There's really nothing more that he can do.

The more I think about it, the more I feel that the ending is as happy as it can be. George is awful. When his wife says "I want a cat and I want a cat now," Hemingway tells us "George was not listening." And then, a moment later, almost like a godmother the maid appears and grants the wife's wish.

The Argument-Centered Paper

In preparation for writing a draft for a paper, Tom reread the story and reexamined his annotations on the story, inquiry notes, and journal entry. As he looked over his own notes, he jotted down possible thesis ideas and subpoints that he could use to develop the body of his paper. His paper focuses on the idea of the main character being referred to as an "American wife" and how that term reflects her relationship with her husband. As you read this essay, see if you can see find traces of Tom's earlier inquiry and interpretation notes: What ideas did he start to develop in the brainstorming stages?

Student Argument Essay: "Hemingway's American Wife"

Tom Yanagi
Professor Costello
English 10B
21 December 2015

Hemingway's American Wife

My title alludes not to any of the four women to whom Hemingway was married, but to "the American wife" who is twice called by this term in his short story "Cat in the Rain." We first meet her in the first sentence of the story ("There were only two Americans stopping at the hotel"), and the next time she is mentioned (apart from a reference to the wife and her husband as "they") it is as "the American wife," at the beginning of the second paragraph of the story. The term is used again at the end of the third paragraph.

She is, then, at least in the early part of this story, just an American or an American wife—someone identified only by her nationality and her marital status, but not at all by her personality, her individuality, her inner self. She first becomes something of an individual when she separates herself from her husband by leaving the hotel room and going to look for a cat that she has seen in the garden, in the rain. This act of separation, however, has not the slightest effect on her husband, who "went on reading" (200).

When she returns, without the cat, he puts down his book and speaks to her, but it is obvious that he has no interest in her, beyond as a physical object ("You look pretty darn nice"). This comment is produced when she says she is thinking of letting her hair grow out because she is "so tired of looking like a boy" (201). Why, a reader wonders, does her husband, who has paid almost no attention to her up to now, assure her that she looks "pretty darn nice"? I think it is reasonable to conclude that he wants her to look like someone who is not truly a woman, in particular someone who is immature. That she does not feel she has much identity is evident when she continues to talk about letting her hair grow, and she says "I want to pull my hair back tight and smooth and make a big knot at the back that I can feel" (201). Long hair is, or at least was, the traditional sign of a woman; she wants long hair, and at the same time she wants to keep it under her control by tying it in a "big knot," a knot that she can feel, a knot whose presence reminds her, because she can feel it, of her feminine nature.

She goes on to say that she wants to brush her hair "in front of a mirror." That is, she wants to see and to feel her femininity, since her husband apparently—so far as we can see in the story, at least—scarcely recognizes it or her. Perhaps her desire for the cat ("I want a cat") is a veiled way of saying that she wants to express her animal nature, and not be simply a neglected woman who is made by her husband to look like a boy. Hemingway tells us, however, that when she looked for the cat in the garden she could not find it, a sign, I think, of her failure to break from the man. At the end of the story the maid brings her the cat, but a woman cannot just be handed a new nature and accept it, just like that. She has to find it herself, and in herself, so I think the story ends with "the American wife" still nothing more than an American wife.

[New page]

Work Cited

Hemingway, Ernest. "Cat in the Rain." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 200-02. Print.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

As you consider whether you liked the essay or not, a few comments and questions may be useful.

1. Do you find the essay interesting? Explain your response.
2. Do you find the essay well written? Explain your response.
3. Do you find the argument convincing? Can you suggest ways of strengthening it, or do you think the argument is mistaken? Carefully reread "Cat in the Rain," taking note of passages that give further support to this student's argument or that seem to challenge or qualify it.
4. We often say that a good critical essay sends us back to the literary work with a fresh point of view. Our rereading differs from our earlier reading. Does this essay change your reading of Hemingway's story?

From Inquiry to an Analytical Paper: A Second Example

Another student, Holly Klein, wrote about "Cat in the Rain," but she thought about it partly in terms of a familiar saying: "Love means never having to say you're sorry." Following are her inquiry notes, her journal writing, and the essay that she developed from these idea-generating steps. Holly did not use the general inquiry questions suggested above. Instead, while taking brainstorming notes on her computer, she generated her own questions and answered them. Her brainstorming is thus very personal, which guarantees a more original interpretation of the work. Notice how Holly includes lots of quotations in her questions and answers. She is already using evidence to support and develop her ideas, and that evidence will certainly appear in her essay.

Student Work: Inquiry Notes

1. The cat: Can we be certain that the cat at the end of the story is the cat that the woman saw in the rain? When we first hear about the cat in the rain we are not told anything about its color, and at the end of the story we are not told that the tortoiseshell cat is wet. I think there are two cats. I think this is important. She is willing to take any cat, as long as it is something she can love.

2. The cat again! What does the cat represent? The cat seems to represent the child that the wife wants to have. The way she talks about the cat makes it sound like a longed-for child: "Oh. I wanted it so much. I wanted a kitty." And: "Anyway, I want a cat," she said, "I want a cat. I want a cat now. If I can't have long hair or any fun, I can have a cat." She is wanting something to love. The way that she keeps repeating that she wants the cat reveals how unhappy she is.

3. Relationship to padrone. These lines struck me as really strange:

   "As the American girl passed the office, the padrone bowed from his desk. Something felt very small and tight inside the girl. The padrone made her feel very small and at the same time really important. She had a momentary feeling of being of supreme importance."

   What do these line mean? Is there anything sexual here? I guess I do think something sexual is happening here, but I'm not sure exactly why. The wife seems to feel this strange excitement when seeing the padrone. She feels both small and important. I think that Hemingway is trying to explain being attracted to someone else, even though you are married. So, Hemingway has to show the conflict that feeling creates in the wife. She feels both small and important. I think it is important that she feels both of these things and that she feels them inside, which makes it sound sexual.

4. Happiness: Is it true that love stories are about people who are happy in love, or are they mostly about people who are unhappy? I think Hemingway is showing us that love can lead to unhappiness. This is a very unhappy couple, but that is what makes them interesting. If Hemingway's lovers were happy and spent their time cooing at each other, the story probably would have been boring. Unhappiness seems to be the key idea that story is exploring—perhaps this is a good paper topic?

5. Biographical information: How can we connect biographical information to the story? How does knowing about Hemingway's own life help me to understand the story? As we learned in class, Hemingway wrote the story in Italy, when his wife Hadley was pregnant. In a letter to F. Scott Fitzgerald he said,

   > Cat in the Rain wasn't about Hadley. . . . When I wrote that we were at Rapallo but Hadley was 4 months pregnant with Bumby. The Inn Keeper was the one at Cortina D'Ampezzo. . . . Hadley never made a speech in her life about wanting a baby because she had been told various things by her doctor and I'd—no use going into all that. (Letters 180)

   As we talked about in class, I think Hemingway knew his marriage was on the rocks and that he was going to get a divorce. This helps me to understand the story and makes the story more interesting. I think Hemingway wanted to show an unhappy couple, putting some of his own life into the story.

What types of questions and answers would you generate to help develop an interpretation of the story? No two readers will respond in exactly the same way, but all readers can examine their responses and try to account for them, at least in part. Can you imagine new questions or ideas that neither Tom Yanagi nor Holly Klein address?

Let's turn now to Holly's journal writing to see how she continues to develop her questions and answers, moving toward her own interpretation of the story.

Student Work: Journal Writing

Although this story features a married couple in a hotel at the sea, there is not much romantic passion in this story. Even though they seem to be on vacation, this couple seems unhappy. Are these people in love?

Is it true that love stories are about people who are happy in love, or are they mostly about people who are unhappy? Many lovers may suffer and some even die (Leonardo DiCaprio in Titanic), but aren't they happy anyway? They are happy in their unhappiness. (And Rose—Kate Winslet—survives, happy and unhappy in her love.)

Is "Cat" really a love story anyway? Yes, in the sense it is about people who must at least at some time in the past have been lovers—happy lovers—but who now seem stuck with each other. The wife still seems to be in love, or maybe she is trying to bring a dead love back to life. But she is unhappy—and who wouldn't be, with a husband like hers? She says that she is going out in the rain to get the cat, and he doesn't even pay attention. He just goes on reading, obviously uninterested in what she is doing. Later, when she is talking about what she wants, he even tells her, "Oh, shut up and get something to read." This statement really struck me—it was here that I saw how much the husband ignored her. He wants the wife to be quiet and not bother him—not bother him with her wants and desires. I think this is what is leading to her unhappiness.

The story seems to be focusing on the unhappiness that exists in any relationship. The wife keeps mentioning unfulfilled desires: she wants a long hair, a table with silver, and candles. These desires become focused on the cat. Her desire for the cat becomes an expression of her unhappiness. She is able to show her unhappiness—I think this is because women are more able to express their unhappiness in words. Her husband keeps ignoring her, so she repeats her interest in the cat again and again. She does not explicitly say that she is unhappy, but she does express a desire for a life different from the one she is now living.

Student Analytical Essay: "Hemingway's Unhappy Lovers"

Here is the final version of Holly Klein's essay:

Holly Klein

Professor Chung

English 1102

17 December 2015

Hemingway's Unhappy Lovers

In class someone suggested that Romeo and Juliet is not so much about how happy two people are but about how unhappy they are. This statement, which at first I thought was ridiculous, now strikes me as true, or for the most part true. The lovers in Romeo and Juliet and in West Side Story, to name only some of the most famous lovers, would not give up being in love, but during most of the time they are unhappy. I have heard a saying, "Love means not ever having to say you are sorry," but some of these lovers, and other lovers in daytime television programs, are always saying they are sorry, and always feeling sorry for themselves. And we feel sorry for them. Our interest in them is not in their happiness, but in their unhappiness.

Certainly in Ernest Hemingway's "Cat in the Rain" the woman is unhappy—and who would not be unhappy, with a husband like hers? She says she is going out into the rain to get the cat, and he says "Don't get wet" (200), and he goes right on reading, obviously uninterested in what his wife is doing, or in her needs. The wife never explicitly says she is unhappy, but it is obvious that she is. Her husband pays very little attention to her, and then, when he does—he goes so far as to say "You look pretty darn nice"—it is only after she tells him she wants to change her appearance: "I get so tired of looking like a boy." When she adds that she wants to change her hair, his response is, "Yeah?" And a moment later he says, "Oh, shut up and get something to read" (201). At this point in the story, when the husband made this statement, I suddenly realized that these lovers are unhappy. If Hemingway's lovers were happy and spent their time cooing at each other, the story probably would have been boring.

What is interesting here is, paradoxically, the man's lack of interest in his wife—he is probably affectionate only when he wants sex—and the woman's basic unhappiness. Her unhappiness is revealed partly by her almost desperate attempt to give affection to the cat, and to receive some affection from it: "I want to have a kitty to sit on my lap and purr when I stroke her" (201). The wife keeps mentioning unfulfilled desires. For example, she explains that she wants long hair, and imagines eating at a table with silver and candles and imagines brushing her hair in front of a mirror. The husband does not want to be bothered with these desires, which leads him to tell her to "shut up." These unfulfilled wants become focused on the cat, and she repeatedly states that she wants the cat. The wife's desire for the cat, then, becomes an expression of her unhappiness.

Many people probably do not make a distinction between the attitudes of men and women toward love, and they therefore do not distinguish between the responses of men and of women to love stories. I think it is probably true that most love stories are chiefly about unhappiness, but it is probably also true that women in love are more likely than men to express in words their unhappiness. (I think there are psychological or sociological studies that support this view.) In any case, in support of the idea that love stories are chiefly about unhappiness, I can say that "Cat in the Rain" interested me not because the lovers keep expressing their romantic passion but because the man does not express his love, and the woman expresses her frustration. In this story about lovers, the man is in bed—but he spends most of his time reading in bed, and (as I said) about the best he can say to the woman is that she looks "pretty darn nice." The wife holds our interest because she is unhappy, stuck with this guy, and she is so grateful for a kind word from the hotel-keeper. She does not explicitly say that she is desperately unhappy, but she does express very vigorously a desire for a life different from the one she is now living, and we do feel that (at least for her) love is not just a "mood," as it probably is for the man, but is a matter of "life or death." She is, so to speak, dying to be loved.

Klein 3

[New page]

Klein 4

Work Cited

Hemingway, Ernest. "Cat in the Rain." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 200-02. Print.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

We can ask about this essay the same questions that we asked about the previous student essay:

1. Do you find the essay interesting? Explain your response.
2. Do you find the essay well written? Explain your response.
3. Do you find the argument convincing? Can you suggest ways of strengthening it, or do you think the argument is mistaken? Carefully reread "Cat in the Rain," taking note of passages that give further support to this student's argument or that seem to challenge or qualify it.

4. We often say that a good critical essay sends us back to the literary work with a fresh point of view. Our rereading differs from our earlier reading. Does this essay change your reading of Hemingway's story?

We can also ask one additional question:

5. Sometimes writers make their essays far too impersonal, removing every trace of the writer as an individual human being, a distinct person. Do you think that this writer goes too far in the other direction, making the essay too personal? If you think that she does, what advice would you give her, to help her strike the right balance?

Breaking Down the Analytical Essay

Let's explore how inquiry and interpretation get written up as an argument. Each writing assignment will require its own kind of thinking, but let us provide a few principles that are relevant to analytical writing about literature:

1. Assume that your reader has already read the work that you are discussing but is not thoroughly familiar with it—and, of course, does not know what you think and how you feel about the work. Early in your essay, name the author, the work, and your thesis.
2. Do not tell the plot (or, at most, summarize it very briefly); instead, tell your reader what the work is about (not what happens, but what the happenings add up to).
3. Whether you are writing about character, plot, meter, or anything else, you will probably be telling your reader something about how the work functions, that is, how it develops. The stages by which a work advances may sometimes be marked fairly clearly. For instance, a poem of two stanzas may ask a question in the first stanza and give an answer in the second stanza, or it may express a hope in the first stanza and reveal a doubt in the second stanza. Novels are customarily divided into chapters, and even a short story may be printed with numbered parts. Virtually all works are built from parts, whether or not the parts are labeled.
4. In telling the reader how each part leads to the next or how each part arises from what has come before, you will probably comment on such things as (in a story) changes in a character's state of mind—marked perhaps by a change in the setting—or (in a poem) changes in the speaker's tone of voice—for instance, from eager to resigned or from cautious to enthusiastic. Probably you will not only be describing the development of character, tone, or plot, but also (and more important) you will be advancing your own thesis by offering evidence that supports the thesis.

Choosing a Topic and Developing a Thesis

As you move from your brainstorming and note-taking phases, you'll have to single out an appropriate topic for your paper. This topic will center your paper on a main idea, and your thesis will then present an argument about that idea. What is an appropriate topic? First, it must be a topic that you can work up some interest in, or your writing will be mechanical and dull. (We say "work up some interest" because interest is commonly the result of some effort.) Second, an appropriate topic is compassable—that is, it is something you can discuss with reasonable attention to detail in the few pages (and few days) you have to devote to it. If a work is fairly long, almost surely you will write an analysis of some part of it.

Unless you have lots of time for reflection and revision, you cannot write a meaningful essay of five hundred words or even a thousand words on "Shakespeare's Hamlet " or "The Fiction of Alice Walker." At that length, you cannot even write on "Character in Hamlet" or "Symbolism in Walker's The Color Purple." And probably you won't really want to write on such topics anyway; probably one character or one symbol has caught your interest. Think of something in your annotations or "response writing" (described in Chapter 3) that has caught your attention. Trust your feelings; you are likely onto something interesting.

In Chapter 3, we talked about the value of asking yourself questions as part of the critical thinking process. To find an appropriate topic, ask yourself such questions as:

1. What purpose does this serve? For instance, why is this scene in the novel or play? Why is there a comic grave digger in Hamlet? Why are these lines unrhymed? Why did the author call the work by this title? Why are these characters unable to come to an agreement?
2. Why do I have this response? Why do I feel that this work is more profound (or amusing, or puzzling) than another work? How did the author make this character funny or dignified or pathetic? How did the author communicate the idea that this character is a bore without boring me?
3. Can I think both outward and inward—to both larger concepts and smaller details? How does this scene allow me to both think about larger abstract ideas and look closely at the specific evidence that it provides? How does this work's imagery (or voice, or setting, or character) use specific words to introduce larger conceptual ideas?

The first of these questions, "What purpose does this serve?" requires that you identify yourself with the author, wondering, for example, whether the opening scene is the best possible for the story. The second question, "Why do I have this response?" requires that you trust your feelings. If you are amused, or puzzled, or annoyed, assume that these responses are appropriate and follow them up, at least until a rereading of the work provides other responses. If you make notes reporting your responses and later think about them, you will probably find that you can select a topic. The third question, "Can I think both outward and inward?" asks you to locate a topic that will allow you to explore larger conceptual ideas (such as love, envy, balance, or justice) while rooting them in the specific details of the text (such as, in "Cat in the Rain," that a spouse can express a need for love in how she responds to other people and animals).

A fourth valuable way to find a thesis is to test a published comment against your response to a work. Perhaps somewhere you have seen—say, in a textbook—a statement about the nature of fiction, poetry, or drama. Maybe you have heard that a tragic hero has a "flaw." Don't simply accept the remark. Test it against your reading of the work. Interpret the word published broadly. Students and instructors publish their opinions—offer them to a public—when they utter them in class. Think about something said in class; students who pay close attention to what their peers say learn a great deal.

Given an appropriate topic, you will find your essay easier to write and the finished version of it clearer and more persuasive if, at some point in your preparation, in note taking or in writing a first draft, you have converted your topic into a thesis (a proposition, a point, an argument) and have constructed a thesis statement (a sentence stating your overall point).

Let's dwell a moment on the distinction between a topic and a thesis. It may be useful to think of it this way: A topic is a subject (for example, "The role of Providence in Hamlet"); to arrive at a thesis, you have to make an arguable assertion (for example, "The role of Providence in Hamlet is not obvious, but it is crucial").

Some theses are more promising than others. Consider this thesis:

> The role of Providence in Hamlet is interesting.

This sentence asserts a thesis, but it is vague and provides little direction and little help in generating ideas and in shaping your essay. Let's try again. It's almost always necessary to try again and again, because the process of writing is, in large part, a process of trial and error, of generating better and better ideas by evaluating—selecting or rejecting—ideas and options.

> The role of Providence is evident in the Ghost.

This is much better, and it could stimulate ideas for an interesting essay. Let's assume the writer rereads the play, looking for further evidence, and comes to believe that the Ghost is only one of several manifestations of Providence. The writer may stay with the Ghost or may (especially if the paper is long enough to allow for such a thesis to be developed) alter the thesis thus:

> The role of Providence is not confined to the Ghost but is found also in the killing of Polonius, in the surprising appearance of the pirate ship, and in the presence of the poisoned chalice.

Strictly speaking, the thesis here is given in the first part of the sentence ("The role of Providence is not confined to the Ghost"); the rest of the sentence provides an indication of how the argument will be supported.

Every literary work suggests its own topics for analysis to an active reader, and all essayists must set forth their own theses, but if you begin by seeking to examine one of your responses, you will soon be able to stake out a topic and to formulate a thesis.

Developing an Argument

Introductory Paragraphs

As the poet Byron said, at the beginning of a long section of his poem, Don Juan, "Nothing so difficult as a beginning." Woody Allen thinks so, too. In an interview, he said that the toughest part of writing is "to go from nothing to the first draft."

We can give two pieces of advice:

1. The opening paragraph is unimportant. It's great if you can write a paragraph that will engage your readers and let them know where the essay will be taking them, but, if you can't come up with such a paragraph, just put down anything in order to prime the pump.

2. The opening paragraph is extremely important. It must engage your readers, and, probably by means of a thesis sentence, it should let the readers know where the essay will be taking them.

The contradiction here is only apparent, not real. The first point is relevant to the opening paragraph of a draft; the second point is relevant to the opening paragraph of the final version. Almost all writers—professionals as well as amateurs—find that the first paragraphs in their drafts are false starts. Don't worry about the opening paragraphs of your draft; you'll revise your opening later. (Surprisingly, your first paragraph may often be deleted altogether; your second paragraph, you may find, is where your essay truly begins.)

When you are writing a first draft, you need something—almost anything—to break the ice. In your finished paper, however, the opening cannot be mere throat clearing. The opening must be interesting.

Among the commonest uninteresting* openings are these:

1. A dictionary definition ("Webster says . . .").
2. A restatement of your title. The title is (let's assume) "Romeo's Maturation," and the first sentence says, "This essay will study Romeo's maturation." True, there is an attempt at a thesis statement here, but there is no information beyond what has already been given in the title. There is no information about you, either—that is, no sense of your response to the topic, as there would be in, say, "Romeo and Juliet covers less than one week, but within this short period, Romeo is impressively transformed from a somewhat comic, infatuated boy to a thoughtful, tragic hero."
3. A platitude such as "Ever since the beginning of time, men and women have fallen in love." Such a sentence may be fine if it helps you to start creating a draft, but because it sounds canned and because it is insufficiently interesting, it should not remain in your final version.

What is left? What is a good way for a final version to begin? Your introductory paragraph will be interesting if it gives information, and it will be pleasing if the information provides a focus—that is, if it goes beyond the title to let the reader know exactly what your topic is and where you are headed.

Let's assume that you agree: An opening paragraph should be interesting and focused. Doubtless you will find your own ways of fulfilling these goals, but you might consider using one of the following time-tested methods.

1. Establish a connection between life and literature. We have already suggested that a platitude ("Ever since the beginning of time, men and women have fallen in love") makes a poor beginning because it is dull, but you may find another way of relating the work to daily experience. For instance:

> Doubtless the popularity of Romeo and Juliet (the play has been with us for more than four hundred years) is partly due to the fact that it deals with a universal experience. Still, no other play about love is so much a part of our culture that the mere mention of the names of the lovers immediately calls up an image. But when we say that so-and-so is "a regular Romeo," exactly what do we mean? And exactly what sort of lover is Romeo?

2. Give an overview that provides a focusing concept. Here is an example:

> Langston Hughes's "Harlem" is about the destruction of the hopes of African Americans. More precisely, Hughes begins by asking "What happens to a dream deferred?" and then offers several possibilities, the last of which is that it may "explode."

3. Include a quotation. The previous example illustrates this approach. Here is another example:

> One line from Langston Hughes's poem "Harlem," "A raisin in the sun," has become famous, but its fame is, in a sense, accidental; Lorraine Hansberry happened to use it for the title of a play. Doubtless she used it because it is impressive, but, in fact, the entire poem is worthy of its most famous line.

4. Use a definition. We have suggested that a definition introduced by the phrase "Webster says . . ." is boring, but consider this approach:

> When we say that a character is the hero of a story, we usually mean that he is the central figure, and we probably imply that he is manly. But, in Kafka's "The Metamorphosis," the hero is most unmanly.

5. Introduce a critical stance. If your approach is feminist, or psychoanalytic, or Marxist, or whatever, you may want to say so at the start. Here's an example:

> Feminists have called our attention to the unfunny sexism of mother-in-law jokes, comments about women hooking men into marriage, and so forth. We can now see that the stories of James Thurber, long thought to be wholesome fun, are unpleasantly sexist.

We do not say that these are the only ways to begin, and we certainly do not suggest that you pack all five approaches into an opening paragraph. We are saying that, after you have done some brainstorming and have written some drafts, you may want to think about using one of these methods for your opening paragraph.

Middle Paragraphs

The middle, or body, of your essay will develop your thesis by offering supporting evidence. Ideas for the body should emerge from the sketchy outline that you made after you reviewed your brainstorming notes or journal.

1. Be sure that each paragraph makes a specific point. Each paragraph should contain a specific conceptual idea that works to develop your thesis. You can think of each paragraph as developing a subpoint that furthers the overarching idea in your thesis.
2. Be sure that each paragraph contains meaningful evidence. Each point should be sufficiently developed with evidence. A brief quotation is often the best evidence. Make sure to explain how your evidence develops your point. Do not simply "drop" the quotation into the paragraph without explaining how you are interpreting it or connecting it into the larger ideas of the paragraph. Make your understanding of the quotation a key part of the paragraph.
3. Be sure that each paragraph is coherent. Read each sentence, starting with the second sentence, to see how it relates to the preceding sentence. Does it clarify, extend, reinforce, or add an example? If you can't find the relationship, the sentence probably does not belong where it is. Rewrite it, move it, or delete it.
4. Be sure that the connections between paragraphs are clear. Transitional words and phrases, such as "Furthermore," "On the other hand," and "In the next stanza," will often give readers all the help they need in seeing how your points are connected.

5. Be sure that the paragraphs are in the best possible order. A good way to test the organization of your paragraphs is to jot down the topic sentence or topic idea of each paragraph and then to see if your jottings form a reasonable sequence.

Concluding Paragraphs

Concluding paragraphs, like opening paragraphs, are especially important, if only because they are so conspicuous. Readers often skim first paragraphs and last paragraphs to see if an essay is worth reading. In conclusions, as in openings, say something interesting that captures your "key ideas." It is not interesting to say, "Thus, we see that Hamlet . . ." (and you go on to echo your title or your first sentence).

What should you do? When you are revising a draft, you might keep in mind the following widely practiced principles. They are not inflexible rules, but they often work.

1. Hint that the end is near. Expressions such as "Finally," "One other point must be discussed," and "In short" alert the reader that the end is near and help to keep the reader from feeling that the essay ends abruptly.
2. Reassert the thesis, but put it in a new light that shows how your thesis has developed. Replace "I have shown that Romeo and Hamlet are similar in some ways" with a more extended explanation, like the following:

> These similarities suggest that, in some respects, Romeo is an early study for Hamlet. Both are young men in love, both seek by the force of their passion to shape the world according to their own desires, and both die in the attempt. But, compared with Hamlet, who at the end of the play understands everything that has happened, Romeo dies in happy ignorance; Romeo is spared the pain of knowing that his own actions will destroy Juliet, whereas Hamlet dies with the painful knowledge that his kingdom has been conquered by Norwegian invaders.

3. Offer an evaluation. You may find it appropriate to conclude your analysis with an evaluation:

> Romeo is as convincing as he needs to be in a play about young lovers, but, from first to last, he is a relatively uncomplicated figure, the ardent lover. Hamlet is a lover, but he is also a good deal more, a figure whose complexity reveals a more sophisticated or a more mature author. Only five or six years separate Romeo and Juliet from Hamlet, but one feels that, in those few years, Shakespeare made a quantum leap in his grasp of human nature.

4. Include a brief, significant quotation from the work. Here's an example:

> Romeo has won the hearts of audiences for almost four centuries, but, for all his charm, he is in the last analysis concerned only with fulfilling his own passion. Hamlet, on the other hand, at last fulfills not only his own wish but also that of the Ghost, his father. "Remember me," the Ghost says, when he first appears to Hamlet and asks for revenge. Throughout the play, Hamlet does remember the Ghost, and, finally, at the cost of his own life, Hamlet succeeds in avenging his dead father.

Coherence in Paragraphs: Using Transitions

In addition to having a unified point and a reasonable organization, a good paragraph is coherent; that is, the connections between ideas in the paragraph are clear. Coherence can often be achieved by inserting the right transitional words or by taking care to repeat key words.

Richard Wagner, commenting on his work as a composer of operas, once said, "The art of composition is the art of transition," for his art moved from note to note, measure to measure, scene to scene. Transitions establish connections between ideas; they alert readers to the way in which you are conducting your argument. Here are some of the most common transitional words and phrases.

1. Amplification or likeness: similarly, likewise, and, also, again, second, third, in addition, furthermore, moreover, finally
2. Emphasis: chiefly, equally, indeed, even more important
3. Contrast or concession: but, on the contrary, on the other hand, by contrast, of course, however, still, doubtless, no doubt, nevertheless, granted that, conversely, although, admittedly
4. Example: for example, for instance, as an example, specifically, consider as an illustration, that is, such as, like
5. Consequence or cause and effect: thus, so, then, it follows, as a result, therefore, hence
6. Restatement: in short, that is, in effect, in other words
7. Place: in the foreground, further back, in the distance
8. Time: afterward, next, then, as soon as, later, until, when, finally, last, at last
9. Conclusion: finally, therefore, thus, to sum up

✔ CHECKLIST: Revising Paragraphs

- ☐ Does the paragraph say anything? Does it have substance, or is it mere padding?
- ☐ Does the paragraph have a topic sentence? If so, is it in the best place? If the paragraph doesn't have a topic sentence, might adding one improve the paragraph? Or, does it have a clear topic idea?
- ☐ If the paragraph is an opening paragraph, is it interesting enough to attract and hold a reader's attention? If it is a later paragraph, does it clearly evolve from the previous paragraph and lead into the next paragraph?
- ☐ Does the paragraph contain some principle of development—for instance, from the general to the particular?
- ☐ Does each sentence clearly follow from the preceding sentence? Have you provided transitional words or cues to guide your reader? Would it be useful to repeat certain key words for clarity?
- ☐ What is the purpose of the paragraph? Do you want to summarize, tell a story, give an illustration, concede a point, or something else? Is your purpose clear to you, and does the paragraph fulfill your purpose?
- ☐ Is the closing paragraph effective and not a restatement of the obvious?

From Inquiry to Interpretation to Argument: Organizing Ideas in an Analytical Paper

James Joyce

James Joyce (1882–1941) was born into a middle-class family in Dublin, Ireland. His father drank and became increasingly irresponsible and unemployable, and the family sank in the social order. Still, Joyce received a strong classical education at excellent Jesuit schools and at University College, Dublin, where he studied modern languages. In 1902, at the age of twenty, he left Ireland so that he might spend the rest of his life writing about life in Ireland. ("The shortest way to Tara," he said, "is via Holyhead," that is, the shortest way to the heart of Ireland is to take a ship away from Ireland.) In Trieste, Zurich, and Paris, he supported his family in a variety of ways, sometimes teaching English in a Berlitz language school. His fifteen stories, collected under the title of Dubliners, were written between 1904 and 1907, but he could not get them published until 1914. (The story we present here, "Eveline," comes from Dubliners.) Next came a highly autobiographical novel, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1916). Ulysses (1922), a complex novel covering eighteen hours in Dublin, was for some years banned by the United States Post Office, although few, if any, readers today find it offensive. Joyce spent most of the rest of his life working on Finnegans Wake (1939).

Nine years before he succeeded in getting Dubliners published, Joyce described the manuscript in these terms:

> My intention was to write a chapter of the moral history of my country and I chose Dublin for the scene because that city seemed to me the centre of paralysis.… I have written it for the most part in a style of scrupulous meanness and with the conviction that he is a very bold man who dares to alter in the presentment, still more to deform, whatever he has seen and heard.

Araby

North Richmond Street, being blind,[1] was a quiet street except at the hour when the Christian Brothers' School set the boys free. An uninhabited house of two stories stood at the blind end, detached from its neighbors in a square ground. The other houses of the street, conscious of decent lives within them, gazed at one another with brown imperturbable faces.

The former tenant of our house, a priest, had died in the back drawing-room. Air, musty from having long been enclosed, hung in all the rooms, and the waste room behind the kitchen was littered with old useless papers. Among these I found a few papercovered books, the pages of which were curled and damp: The Abbot, by Walter Scott, The Devout Communicant and The Memoirs of Vidocq.[2] I liked the last best because its leaves were yellow. The wild garden behind the house contained a central apple-tree and a few straggling bushes under one of which I found the late tenant's rusty bicycle-pump. He had been a very charitable priest; in his will he had left all his money to institutions and the furniture of his house to his sister.

[1]blind a dead-end street. (All notes are by the editors.)
[2]The Abbot one of Scott's popular historical romances (1820); The Devout Communicant a Catholic religious manual published in the eighteenth century; The Memoirs of Vidocq the memoirs of the chief of the French detective force (1829).

When the short days of winter came dusk fell before we had well eaten our dinners. When we met in the street the houses had grown sombre. The space of sky above us was the colour of everchanging violet and towards it the lamps of the street lifted their feeble lanterns. The cold air stung us and we played till our bodies glowed. Our shouts echoed in the silent street. The career of our play brought us through the dark muddy lanes behind the houses where we ran the gauntlet of the rough tribes from the cottages, to the back doors of the dark dripping gardens where odours arose from the ashpits, to the dark odorous stables where a coachman smoothed and combed the horse or shook music from the buckled harness. When we returned to the street light from the kitchen windows had filled the areas. If my uncle was seen turning the corner we hid in the shadow until we had seen him safely housed. Or if Mangan's sister came out on the doorstep to call her brother in to his tea we watched her from our shadow peer up and down the street. We waited to see whether she would remain or go in and, if she remained, we left our shadow and walked up to Mangan's steps resignedly. She was waiting for us, her figure defined by the light from the half-opened door. Her brother always teased her before he obeyed and I stood by the railings looking at her. Her dress swung as she moved her body and the soft rope of her hair tossed from side to side.

Every morning I lay on the floor in the front parlour watching her door. The blind was pulled down to within an inch of the sash so that I could not be seen. When she came out on the doorstep my heart leaped. I ran to the hall, seized my books and followed her. I kept her brown figure always in my eye and, when we came near the point at which our ways diverged, I quickened my pace and passed her. This happened morning after morning. I had never spoken to her, except for a few casual words, and yet her name was like a summons to all my foolish blood.

5 Her image accompanied me even in places the most hostile to romance. On Saturday evenings when my aunt went marketing I had to go to carry some of the parcels. We walked through the flaring streets, jostled by drunken men and bargaining women, amid the curses of labourers, the shrill litanies of shop-boys who stood on guard by the barrels of pigs' cheeks, the nasal chanting of street-singers, who sang a come-all-you about O'Donovan Rossa,[3] or a ballad about the troubles in our native land. These noises converged in a single sensation of life for me: I imagined that I bore my chalice safely through a throng of foes. Her name sprang to my lips at moments in strange prayers and praises which I myself did not understand. My eyes were often full of tears (I could not tell why) and at times a flood from my heart seemed to pour itself out into my bosom. I thought little of the future. I did not know whether I would ever speak to her or not or, if I spoke to her, how I could tell her of my confused adoration. But my body was like a harp and her words and gestures were like fingers running upon the wires.

One evening I went into the back drawing-room in which the priest had died. It was a dark rainy evening and there was no sound in the house. Through one of the broken panes I heard the rain impinge upon the earth, the fine incessant needles of water playing in the sodden beds. Some distant lamp or lighted window gleamed below me. I was thankful that I could see so little. All my senses seemed to desire to veil themselves and, feeling that I was about to slip from them, I pressed the palms of my hands together until they trembled, murmuring: O love! O love! many times.

[3]come-all-you a topical song that began "Come all you gallant Irishmen"; O'Donovan Rossa Jeremiah O'Donovan (1831–1915), a popular Irish leader who was jailed by the British for advocating violent rebellion.

At last she spoke to me. When she addressed the first words to me I was so confused that I did not know what to answer. She asked me was I going to Araby.

I forget whether I answered yes or no. It would be a splendid bazaar, she said; she would love to go.

—And why can't you? I asked.

While she spoke she turned a silver bracelet round and round her wrist. She could not go, she said, because there would be a retreat that week in her convent. Her brother and two other boys were fighting for their caps and I was alone at the railings. She held one of the spikes, bowing her head towards me. The light from the lamp opposite our door caught the white curve of her neck, lit up her hair that rested there and, falling, lit up the hand upon the railing. It fell over one side of her dress and caught the white border of a petticoat, just visible as she stood at ease.

—It's well for you, she said.

—If I go, I said, I will bring you something.

What innumerable follies laid waste my waking and sleeping thoughts after that evening! I wished to annihilate the tedious intervening days. I chafed against the work of school. At night in my bedroom and by day in the classroom her image came between me and the page I strove to read. The syllables of the word Araby were called to me through the silence in which my soul luxuriated and cast an Eastern enchantment over me. I asked for leave to go to the bazaar on Saturday night. My aunt was surprised and hoped it was not some Freemason[4] affair. I answered few questions in class, I watched my master's face pass from amiability to sternness; he hoped I was not beginning to idle. I could not call my wandering thoughts together. I had hardly any patience with the serious work of life which, now that it stood between me and my desire, seemed to me child's play, ugly monotonous child's play.

On Saturday morning I reminded my uncle that I wished to go to the bazaar in the evening. He was fussing at the hallstand, looking for the hat-brush, and answered me curtly:

—Yes, boy, I know.

As he was in the hall I could not go into the front parlour and lie at the window. I left the house in bad humour and walked slowly towards the school. The air was pitilessly raw and already my heart misgave me.

When I came home to dinner my uncle had not yet been home. Still it was early. I sat staring at the clock for some time and, when its ticking began to irritate me, I left the room. I mounted the staircase and gained the upper part of the house. The high cold empty gloomy rooms liberated me and I went from room to room singing. From the front window I saw my companions playing below in the street.

Their cries reached me weakened and indistinct and, leaning my forehead against the cool glass, I looked over at the dark house where she lived. I may have stood there for an hour, seeing nothing but the brown-clad figure cast by my imagination, touched discreetly by the lamplight at the curved neck, at the hand upon the railings and at the border below the dress.

[4]Freemason Irish Catholics viewed the Masons as their Protestant enemies.

When I came downstairs again I found Mrs Mercer sitting at the fire. She was an old garrulous woman, a pawnbroker's widow, who collected used stamps for some pious purpose. I had to endure the gossip of the tea-table. The meal was prolonged beyond an hour and still my uncle did not come. Mrs Mercer stood up to go: she was sorry she couldn't wait any longer, but it was after eight o'clock and she did not like to be out late, as the night air was bad for her. When she had gone I began to walk up and down the room, clenching my fists. My aunt said:

—I'm afraid you may put off your bazaar for this night of Our Lord.

At nine o'clock I heard my uncle's latchkey in the halldoor. I heard him talking to himself and heard the hallstand rocking when it had received the weight of his overcoat. I could interpret these signs. When he was midway through his dinner I asked him to give me the money to go to the bazaar. He had forgotten.

—The people are in bed and after their first sleep now, he said.

I did not smile. My aunt said to him energetically:

—Can't you give him the money and let him go? You've kept him late enough as it is.

My uncle said he was very sorry he had forgotten. He said he believed in the old saying: All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. He asked me where I was going and, when I had told him a second time he asked me did I know The Arab's Farewell to His Steed.[5] When I left the kitchen he was about to recite the opening lines of the piece to my aunt.

I held a florin tightly in my hand as I strode down Buckingham Street towards the station. The sight of the streets thronged with buyers and glaring with gas recalled to me the purpose of my journey. I took my seat in a third-class carriage of a deserted train. After an intolerable delay the train moved out of the station slowly. It crept onward among ruinous houses and over the twinkling river. At Westland Row Station a crowd of people pressed to the carriage doors; but the porters moved them back, saying that it was a special train for the bazaar. I remained alone in the bare carriage. In a few minutes the train drew up beside an improvised wooden platform. I passed out on to the road and saw by the lighted dial of a clock that it was ten minutes to ten. In front of me was a large building which displayed the magical name.

I could not find any sixpenny entrance and, fearing that the bazaar would be closed, I passed in quickly through a turnstile, handing a shilling to a weary-looking man. I found myself in a big hall girdled at half its height by a gallery. Nearly all the stalls were closed and the greater part of the hall was in darkness. I recognised a silence like that which pervades a church after a service. I walked into the center of the bazaar timidly. A few people were gathered about the stalls which were still open. Before a curtain, over which the words Café Chantant were written in coloured lamps, two men were counting money on a salver. I listened to the fall of the coins.

Remembering with difficulty why I had come I went over to one of the stalls and examined porcelain vases and flowered tea-sets. At the door of the stall a young lady was talking and laughing with two young gentlemen. I remarked their English accents and listened vaguely to their conversation.

—O, I never said such a thing!

—O, but you did!

—O, but I didn't!

[5]The Arab's Farewell to His Steed "The Arab to His Favorite Steed" was a popular sentimental poem by Caroline Norton (1808–77).

—Didn't she say that?

—Yes! I heard her.

—O, there's a . . . fib!

Observing me the young lady came over and asked me did I wish to buy anything. The tone of her voice was not encouraging; she seemed to have spoken to me out of a sense of duty. I looked humbly at the great jars that stood like eastern guards at either side of the dark entrance to the stall and murmured:

35 —No, thank you.

The young lady changed the position of one of the vases and went back to the two young men. They began to talk of the same subject. Once or twice the young lady glanced at me over her shoulder.

I lingered before her stall, though I knew my stay was useless, to make my interest in her wares seem the more real. Then I turned away slowly and walked down the middle of the bazaar. I allowed the two pennies to fall against the sixpence in my pocket. I heard a voice call from one end of the gallery that the light was out. The upper part of the hall was now completely dark.

Gazing up into the darkness I saw myself as a creature driven and derided by vanity; and my eyes burned with anguish and anger.

[1905]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Joyce wrote a novel called A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1916). Write an essay of about five hundred words on "Araby" as a portrait of the artist as a boy.
2. In an essay of about five hundred words, consider the role of images of darkness and blindness and what they reveal to you about "Araby" as a story about the fall from innocence into painful awareness.
3. How old, approximately, is the narrator of "Araby" at the time of the experience he describes? How old is he at the time he tells his story? On what evidence do you base your estimates?
4. The boy, apparently an only child, lives with an uncle and aunt rather than with parents. Why do you suppose Joyce put him in this family setting rather than some other?
5. The story is rich in images of religion. This in itself is not surprising, for the story is set in Roman Catholic Ireland, but the religious images are not simply references to religious persons or objects. In an essay of 500–750 words, discuss how these images reveal the narrator's state of mind.

Finding and Organizing an Interpretation

The short story "Araby" contains a complex exploration of a young man's love. Let's see how a student, Madelyn Mackenzie, captures her reactions to the story in inquiry notes, organizes them in an outline, and transforms them into an essay. Her essay provides a good example of a clearly organized approach to analysis. Madelyn selects a literary element—the setting—for close exploration. She develops a set of concepts relating to that literary element, focusing on the imagination and how it conflicts with reality. In order to develop her ideas, she creates three strong subpoints. Those subpoints become the organizational structure of her essay.

Student Work: Inquiry Notes

Questions: As I read this story, I had many questions:
–Why is the narrator so obsessed with his neighbor friend's sister? What triggers this obsession?
–Why does he focus on getting the girl a gift? Why does he want to show his love for her by giving her something?
–Why does he focus on the bazaar? Why does that become such a meaningful place?
–My main question has to do with the ending: Why does it have to end in such a negative way? He seems to realize that his ideals of love are shattered? Why?

In order to answer these questions, I could look at these literary elements:
–What is the main character's key qualities?
–What are the different settings that come into play?
–What imagery is used in the story?

As I think about my questions, I am coming up with three types of ideas. The first focuses on the narrator. He seems to be strangely obsessed with his friend's sister. But, the more I think about it, this seems to be a typical case of first love (like "puppy love" or a "crush")? His love is very unrealistic and very idealized. His love becomes an obsession (like when he looks at her by lying on the floor). What seems to be unique, and even positive, is his imagination. He has a powerful imagination that seems to be feeding into this love. For example, I love how he re-imagines the market. He can't help but imagine that his love will come true.

My second idea has to do with the setting. The setting of the story is actually negative. The street is described as dark and broken. His world seems to be one of routine. The home life is a bit depressing—he is told promises that aren't quite upheld. But, the bazaar seems to be a magical setting. It is very exciting and full of promise. This place becomes imagined as the solution to the narrator's drams of love: he will get the girl a wonderful gift at the bazaar.

As I noted in my questions, I am most concerned with the ending. This is my third idea. Why does it have to end in such a negative way? The narrator's dreams are shattered! The bazaar is not this magical place, but a place of frustration and fear. He realizes he isn't going to get the girl. I guess this is reality, but I was hoping for a happier ending. Perhaps this is the story's way of showing what the process of growing up is. Perhaps everyone's unrealistic first love has to end this way. We have to learn to deal with disappointment.

Student Work: Outlining

Initial Notes:

Setting as a key element in the story
–Setting of the town, the streets
–Setting of the house
–Setting of the bazaar
–Also settings are transformed by the imagination

So, these settings can be imagined as settings of love, possibility

–The story traces the narrator's belief that he can achieve love, but at the end there is the failure of that belief. The story turns negative at the end.

–The setting goes through a transformation, too? Does the way the setting is used change?
–At first, the setting is dark, but the imagination has hope–it is positive in the face of that dark setting.
–At the end, the setting is the magical and exotic bazaar. But, this space does not meet his expectations—not place of love/hope. So, this is the space where the narrator loses his hope for future love.
–The paper can track this shift.

Organizing ideas:

Contrast these settings: Daily, everyday world vs. World of imagination

Thesis topic: Reality vs. Imagination shown in setting Subpoint development:
–Step 1. Imagination overcomes dark setting (imagination: hope for love)
–Step 2: Imagination becomes overactive, really wants love, starts to get frustrated
–Step 3: Imagination is overwhelmed by the setting of the bazaar. It is disproved or undermined by the setting, giving us the negative ending.

Student Analytical Essay: "Everyday and Imagined Settings in 'Araby'"

Let's take a look at the essay that Madelyn Mackenzie wrote using her inquiry notes and outlining.

Mackenzie 1

Madelyn Mackenzie

Professor Rodriguez

English 102-26

12 February 2016

Everyday and Imagined Settings in "Araby"

James Joyce's "Araby" features two settings: the daily world of the narrator and the exotic world of the "Araby" bazaar. By contrasting these two settings, the story is able to contrast the world of everyday work, which is full of stress and broken dreams, and the world of the imagination, which is full of hope and promised fulfillment. The world of the imagination is very powerful, as it entices the narrator to the bazaar. The world of everyday pressure proves more powerful, however, and it ultimately reveals that the imagination creates false hopes. The setting emphasizes this conflict and its resolution by showing how, first, the imagination overcomes the narrator's dark setting by encouraging love; second, the imagination starts to become too extreme and is replaced by frustration with the setting; and, third, the imagination is undermined and disproved by the setting of the unwelcoming bazaar. In each of these crucial developments, the setting shows the narrator's conflicted emotions, which are the result of the conflict between reality and the imagination.

The story opens with the young narrator describing his dark, depressing setting, and explaining how his love of his neighbor adds life to that setting. The unnamed narrator's imagination is consumed by love for the unnamed sister of his friend, Mangan. This love fires up his imagination. As a first step in the story's exploration of imagination, the imagination is powerful and transforms his setting from dreary to magical. Describing his everyday setting, the narrator explains that he lives on a "blind" (i.e. dead-end) street, in a "musty" and "littered" house where a priest died, and with a yard filled with "a few straggling bushes" and a "rusty bicycle pump" (221). His activities take place in this dark setting with associations of death (the priest) and decay (the rusty pump). As he plays, it grows dark and the "the houses had grown somber" (221).

Against this depressing backdrop, the narrator's imagination conjures up a magical world of love. The romance book he found in the dead priest's room may have filled his thoughts with love and imagination. He describes himself as watching Mangan's sister, going as far as lying on the floor and watching her through a crack in the window sash (221). He then describes a scene in which his romantic imagination transforms his everyday setting. His love transforms the physical setting into a psychological setting. He goes to the Saturday market, a setting that he describes as "most hostile to romance" (221). Although he travels through "flaring streets, jostled by drunken men and bargaining woman," and hears the sounds of "curses of laborours" and "the shrill litanies of shop-boys who stood on guard by the barrels of pigs' cheeks," his imagination transforms his setting (221). As if he was a knight in shining armor, he protects his sensation of love from these rude foes and "imagined that I bore my chalice safely through a throng of foes" (221). In this scene, the narrator shows his imagination's ability to transform his dark physical setting into a vivid psychological setting of love.

As the second phase in the development of the imagination, the imagination becomes so powerful that it starts to disturb the narrator's everyday life. When the girl finally speaks to the narrator, she makes an innocent remark that turns the narrator's imagination into a form of ecstasy and a form of torture. In his first conversation with the girl, she asks if he is going to the "Araby" bazaar; she imagines that it will be "splendid" and wishes she could go, which seems to increase the power of the narrator's imagination (222). He replies that he is going to the bazaar and promises to bring her something from it. After this exchange, he can think of nothing else. The story captures this mood of hope—the mood of a first crush. If he can bring home a worthy gift, he might win the girl's love. The bazaar becomes a setting so magical that it could give the girl to him.

Imagining the bazaar, the narrator explains that he becomes sick of his everyday setting: "I wished to annihilate the tedious intervening days. I chafed against the work of school" (222). His imagination becomes more and more powerful. He creates a romantic setting for "Araby," using the girl's enthusiasm as a starting point for a romantic image of the bazaar. He admits that his imagination has become extreme: "The syllables of the word Araby were called to me through the silence in which my soul luxuriated and cast an Eastern enchantment over me" (222). The setting reflects this psychological state: his fantasy has only briefly replaced the real setting of his real world. However, his description admits that this powerful imagination might not be positive; he hints that his psychological obsession had become out of control.

The conflict between his everyday world and his overactive imagination comes to a head when the narrator actually visits the "Araby" bazaar. The setting of the bazaar forces the narrator to confront both his dark and depressing everyday world and the tawdriness of triviality of what he had imagined as a romantic world. In this third development of the imagination, reality and fantasy are brought together, and reality must win out over imagination. Importantly, this conflict takes place in the bazaar setting. This setting has the potential to be magical: if an everyday market can be transformed by the narrator's imagination, why can't an exotic bazaar? However, this setting becomes the space that forces the narrator to realize that his dreams will not become a reality.

The bazaar setting shows the imagination becoming overwhelmed by the real world. The bazaar has imaginative possibilities; for example, the narrator must enter the "the large building which displayed the magical name." However, the narrator comes too late; it is already closing and whatever magic it might have had is disappearing. The bazaar is described as "Nearly all the stalls were closed and the greater part of the hall was in darkness. I recognized a silence like that which pervades a church after a service" (223). The magical bazaar, which promised exotic treasures and gifts of love, has become dark and silent. The setting of the bazaar has become like the narrator's everyday setting. The contrast between the imagination and reality becomes striking when the narrator looks at the bazaar stall. He can see nothing that he wants to buy. Instead, he must listen to the counting of coins and the arguing of the stall owners. There is no magic and no romance in the bazaar space. At the end of the short story, the narrator becomes surrounded by dark: "the upper part of the hall was completely dark" (000). As darkness starts to settle into the bazaar, the narrator looks into the darkness and sees himself. His dark setting has captured his changed mood. He realizes he "is a creature driven and derided by vanity," not driven by worthy romance and love.

The everyday setting overwhelms the romantic fantasies of the narrator. The end of the story describes the narrator "gazing up into the darkness" as though he sees the darkness of his setting for the first time. The narrator cannot maintain his fantasy of love for the girl in such a dark world. The setting shows the narrator's coming of age: he starts the story able to transform his setting with his imagination, but ends the story with his imagination crushed by reality. The story ends on a negative, but realistic note. The narrator is forced to leave his childish imagination behind. The setting of "Araby" becomes the crucial representation of this conflict between reality and the imagination and shows the ultimate defeat of the imagination.

[New page]

Work Cited

Joyce, James. "Araby." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 220-24. Print.

From Inquiry to Interpretation to Argument: Maintaining an Interpretation in an Analytical Paper

Aphra Behn

Aphra Behn (1640–89) is regarded as the first English woman to have made a living by writing. Not much is known of her life, but she seems to have married a London merchant of Dutch descent and, after his death, to have served as a spy in the Dutch Wars (1665–67). After her return to England, she took up playwriting, and she gained fame with The Rover (1677). Behn also wrote novels, the most important of which is Oroonoko, or The Royal Slave (1688), which is among the first works in English to express empathy for enslaved Africans.

Song: Love Armed

Love in fantastic triumph sate,
Whilst bleeding hearts around him flowed,
For whom fresh pains he did create,
And strange tyrannic power he showed:
From thy bright eyes he took his fire,
Which round about in sport he hurled;
But 'twas from mine he took desire,
Enough to undo the amorous world.
From me he took his sighs and tears:
From thee, his pride and cruelty;
From me, his languishments and fears;
And every killing dart from thee.
Thus thou and I the god have armed
And set him up a deity;
But my poor heart alone is harmed,
Whilst thine the victor is, and free.

[16XX]

Maintaining Interpretive Interest Notes

The subject is Aphra Behn's "Song: Love Armed." In order to trace the development of an essay on this poem, we begin with a set of inquiry notes and two short entries in a journal kept by a first-year student, Geoffrey Sullivan. We then follow these entries with Geoffrey's completed essay.

Student Work: Inquiry Notes

Key questions:

1. Who is speaking?
   The speaker seems to be a man who talks of the suffering he is undergoing. I am thinking it is a man due to the convention of the man being active in love (but it could be a woman, reflecting Aphra Behn as the woman author.) Does he seem to enjoy his plight? We often enjoy songs of unhappy love—maybe that is how the speaker is explaining his plight

2. Who is he speaking to? How is she described/characterized?
   He seems to be speaking to the woman ("thee"). She is said to exhibit "pride and cruelty" (line 10).

3. What is the action or event or issue being described?
   I am trying to figure out exactly what is going on, but it seems like Love has taken this pride and cruelty from the woman. Then, he seems to take "killing darts" from her. Are these being used against the speaker? Love is also taking "sighs and tears" and "languishments and fears" from the speaker. Love seems to be collecting all of these elements of broken love from the narrator.

4. What images stand out?
   The description of the bleeding heart at the beginning works to grab the reader. The opening describes Love as a person, which is a powerful image (I like the idea of him having tyrannic power—of being a tyrant!).

5. Further questions:
   Would men enjoy the poem more than women? Would a woman think this is unfair (that women are portrayed as mean)?

Student Work: Journal Writing

October 10. The title "Song: Love Armed" puzzled me at first; funny, I somehow was thinking of the expression "strong-armed" and at first I didn't understand that "Love" in this poem is a human—no, not a human, but the god Cupid, who has a human form—and that he is shown as armed, with darts and so forth. The poem focuses on key emotions: pride and cruelty, languishments and fears.

October 13. This god of "Love" is Cupid, and so he is something like what is on a valentine card—Cupid with his bow and arrow. But valentine cards just show cute little Cupids, and in this poem Cupid is a real menace. He causes lots of pain ("bleeding hearts," "tears," "killing dart," etc.). So what is Aphra Behn telling us about the god of Love, or love as an emotion? That love hurts? And she is singing about it! But we do sing songs about how hard life is. But do we sing them when we are really hurting, or only when we are pretty well off and just thinking about being hurt?

When you love someone and they don't return your love, it hurts, but even when love isn't returned it still gives some intense pleasure. Strange, but I think true. I wouldn't say that love always has this two-sided nature, but I do see the idea that love can have two sides, pleasure and pain. And love takes two people—the lover and beloved. Maybe there's also something to the idea that "opposites attract." Anyway, Aphra Behn seems to be talking about men vs. women, pain vs. pleasure, power vs. weakness, etc. Pairs, opposites. And in two stanzas (a pair of stanzas?).

Student Analytical Essay: "The Double Nature of Love'"

The following essay makes use of some, but not all, of Geoffrey preliminary notes, and it includes much that he did not think of until he reread his inquiry notes, reread the poem, and began drafting the essay.

Geoffrey Sullivan

Professor Morawski

English 2G

31 January 2016

The Double Nature of Love

Aphra Behn's "Song: Love Armed" is in two stanzas, and it is about two people, "me" and "thee," that is, you and I, the lover and the woman he loves.

I think the speaker is a man, since according to the usual code men are supposed to be the active lovers and women are the (relatively) passive people who are loved. In this poem, the beloved—the woman, I think—has "bright eyes" (line 5) that provide the god of Love with fire, and she also provides the god with "pride and cruelty" (10). This of course is the way the man sees it if a woman does not respond to him; if she does not love him in return, she is (he thinks) arrogant and cruel. What does the man give to Love? He provides "desire" (7), "sighs and tears" (9), "languishments and fears" (11). None of this sounds very manly, but the joke is that the god of Love—which means love—can turn a strong man into a crybaby when a woman does not respond to him.

Although both stanzas are clever descriptions of the god of Love, the poem is not just a description. Of course there is not a plot in the way that a short story has a plot, but there is a sort of a switch at the end, giving the story something of a plot. The poem is, say, ninety percent expression of feeling and description of love, but during the course of expressing feelings and describing love something happens, so there is a tiny story. The first stanza sets the scene ("Love in fantastic triumph sate" [1]) and tells of some of the things that the speaker and the woman contributed to the god of Love. The woman's eyes provided Love with fire, and the man's feelings provided Love with "desire" (7). The second stanza goes on to mention other things that Love got from the speaker ("sighs and tears" [9]), and other things that Love got from the beloved ("pride and cruelty" [10]), and in line 13 the poet says, "Thus thou and I the god have armed," so the two humans share something. They have both given Love his weapons. But—and this is the story I spoke of—the poem ends by emphasizing their difference: Only the man is "harmed," and the woman is the "victor" because her heart is not captured, as the man's heart is. In the battle that Love presides over, the woman is the winner; the man's heart has fallen for the woman, but, according to the last line, the woman's heart remains "free."

We have all seen the god of Love on valentine cards, a cute little Cupid armed with a bow and arrow. But despite the bow and arrow that the Valentine Day Cupid carries, I think that until I read Aphra Behn's "Song: Love Armed" I had never really thought about Cupid as powerful and as capable of causing real pain. On valentine cards, he is just cute, but when I think about it, I realize the truth of Aphra Behn's concept of love. Love is (or can be) two-sided, whereas the valentine cards show only the sweet side.

I think it is interesting to notice that although the poem is about the destructive power of love, it is fun to read. I am not bothered by the fact that the lover is miserable. Why? I think I enjoy the poem, rather than am bothered by it, because he is enjoying his misery. After all, he is singing about it, sort of singing in the rain, telling anyone who will listen about how miserable he is, and he is having a very good time doing it.

[New page]

Sullivan 3

Work Cited

Behn, Aphra. "Love Armed." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 231. Print.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What do you think of the essay's title? Is it sufficiently interesting and focused?
2. What are the writer's chief points? Are they clear, and are they adequately developed?
3. Do you think Geoffrey Sullivan is too concerned with himself and that he loses sight of the poem? Or do you find it interesting that he connects the poem with life?
4. Focus on the writer's use of quotations. Does he effectively introduce and examine quoted lines and phrases?
5. What grade would you give Geoffrey's essay? What evidence can you offer to support your evaluation?

✔CHECKLIST: Editing a Draft

- ☐ Is the title of my essay interesting?
- ☐ Do I identify the subject of my essay (author and title) early in the essay?
- ☐ What is my thesis? Do I state it soon enough (perhaps even in the title) and keep it in view?
- ☐ Is the organization reasonable? Does each point lead into the next without irrelevancies and without anticlimaxes?
- ☐ Is each paragraph unified by a topic sentence or a topic idea? Are there adequate transitions from one paragraph to the next?
- ☐ Are generalizations supported by appropriate evidence, especially by brief quotations from the text?
- ☐ Is the opening paragraph interesting and, by its end, focused on the topic? Is the final paragraph conclusive without being repetitive?
- ☐ Is the tone appropriate? No sarcasm, no apologies, no condescension?
- ☐ If there is a summary, is it as brief as possible, given its purpose?
- ☐ Are the quotations adequately introduced, and are they accurate? Do they provide evidence and let the reader hear the author's voice, or do they merely add words to the essay?
- ☐ Is the present tense used to describe what the author does and the action of the work ("Shakespeare shows," "Hamlet dies")?

- ☐ Have I kept in mind the needs of my audience, for instance, by defining unfamiliar terms or by briefly summarizing works or opinions with which the reader may be unfamiliar?
- ☐ Is documentation provided where necessary?
- ☐ Are the spelling and punctuation correct? Are other mechanical matters (such as margins, spacing, and citations) in correct form? Have I proofread my essay carefully?
- ☐ Is the essay properly identified—author's name, instructor's name, course number, and date?

Your Turn: Additional Short Stories and Poems for Analysis

Stories

Edgar Allan Poe

Edgar Allan Poe (1809–49) was the son of traveling actors. His father abandoned the family almost immediately, and his mother died when he was two years old. As a child, Poe was adopted—though never legally—by a prosperous merchant and his wife in Richmond, Virginia. The tensions were great, aggravated by Poe's drinking and heavy gambling, and, in 1827, Poe left Richmond for Boston. He wrote, served briefly in the army, attended West Point (but left within a year), and became an editor for the remaining eighteen years of his life. It was during these years, too, that he wrote the poems, essays, and fiction—especially detective stories and horror stories—that have made him famous.

The Cask of Amontillado

The thousand injuries of Fortunato I had borne as I best could, but when he ventured upon insult, I vowed revenge. You, who so well know the nature of my soul, will not suppose, however, that I gave utterance to a threat. At length I would be avenged; this was a point definitely settled—but the very definitiveness with which it was resolved precluded the idea of risk. I must not only punish, but punish with impunity. A wrong is unredressed when retribution overtakes its redresser. It is equally unredressed when the avenger fails to make himself felt as such to him who has done the wrong.

It must be understood that neither by word nor deed had I given Fortunato cause to doubt my good will. I continued, as was my wont, to smile in his face, and he did not perceive that my smile now was at the thought of his immolation.

He had a weak point—this Fortunato—although in other regards he was a man to be respected and even feared. He prided himself on his connoisseurship in wine. Few Italians have the true virtuoso spirit. For the most part their enthusiasm is adopted to suit the time and opportunity to practice imposture upon the British and Austrian millionaires. In painting and gemmary Fortunato, like his countrymen, was a quack, but in the matter of old wines he was sincere. In this respect I did not differ from him materially;—I was skillful in the Italian vintages myself, and bought largely whenever I could.

It was about dusk, one evening during the supreme madness of the carnival season, that I encountered my friend. He accosted me with excessive warmth, for he had been drinking much. The man wore motley. He had on a tight-fitting parti-striped dress, and his head was surmounted by the conical cap and bells. I was so pleased to see him, that I thought I should never have done wringing his hand.

I said to him—"My dear Fortunato, you are luckily met. How remarkably well you are looking to-day! But I have received a pipe[1] of what passes for Amontillado, and I have my doubts."

"How?" said he, "Amontillado? A pipe? Impossible! And in the middle of the carnival?"

"I have my doubts," I replied; "and I was silly enough to pay the full Amontillado price without consulting you in the matter. You were not to be found, and I was fearful of losing a bargain."

"Amontillado!"

"I have my doubts."

"Amontillado!"

"And I must satisfy them."

"Amontillado!"

"As you are engaged, I am on my way to Luchesi. If any one has a critical turn, it is he. He will tell me—"

"Luchesi cannot tell Amontillado from Sherry."

"And yet some fools will have it that his taste is a match for your own."

"Come, let us go."

"Whither?"

"To your vaults."

"My friend, no; I will not impose upon your good nature. I perceive you have an engagement. Luchesi—"

"I have no engagement; come."

"My friend, no. It is not the engagement, but the severe cold with which I perceive you are afflicted. The vaults are insufferably damp. They are encrusted with nitre."

"Let us go, nevertheless. The cold is merely nothing. Amontillado! You have been imposed upon; and as for Luchesi, he cannot distinguish Sherry from Amontillado."

Thus speaking, Fortunato possessed himself of my arm. Putting on a mask of black silk, and drawing a roquelaure[2] closely about my person, I suffered him to hurry me to my palazzo.

There were no attendants at home; they had absconded to make merry in honor of the time. I had told them that I should not return until the morning, and had given them explicit orders not to stir from the house. These orders were sufficient, I well knew, to insure their immediate disappearance, one and all, as soon as my back was turned.

I took from their sconces two flambeaux, and giving one to Fortunato, bowed him through several suites of rooms to the archway that led into the vaults. I passed down a long and winding staircase, requesting him to be cautious as he followed. We came at length to the foot of the descent, and stood together on the damp ground of the catacombs of the Montresors.

[1]pipe wine cask.

[2]roquelaure short cloak.

The gait of my friend was unsteady, and the bells upon his cap jingled as he strode.

"The pipe," said he.

"It is farther on," said I; "but observe the white web-work which gleams from these cavern walls."

He turned towards me, and looked into my eyes with two filmy orbs that distilled the rheum of intoxication.

"Nitre?" he asked, at length.

"Nitre," I replied. "How long have you had that cough?"

"Ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!"

My poor friend found it impossible to reply for many minutes.

"It is nothing," he said, at last.

"Come," I said, with decision, "we will go back; your health is precious. You are rich, respected, admired, beloved; you are happy, as once I was. You are a man to be missed. For me it is no matter. We will go back; you will be ill, and I cannot be responsible. Besides, there is Luchesi—"

"Enough," he said; "the cough is a mere nothing: it will not kill me. I shall not die of a cough."

"True—true," I replied; "and, indeed, I had no intention of alarming you unnecessarily—but you should use all proper caution. A draught of this Medoc will defend us from the damps."

Here I knocked off the neck of a bottle which I drew from a long row of its fellows that lay upon the mould.

"Drink," I said, presenting him the wine.

He raised it to his lips with a leer: He paused and nodded to me familiarly, while his bells jingled.

"I drink," he said, "to the buried that repose around us."

"And I to your long life."

He again took my arm, and we proceeded.

"These vaults," he said, "are extensive."

"The Montresors," I replied, "were a great and numerous family."

"I forget your arms."

"A huge human foot d'or, in a field azure; the foot crushes a serpent rampant whose fangs are imbedded in the heel."

"And the motto?"

"Nemo me impune lacessit."[3]

"Good!" he said.

The wine sparkled in his eyes and the bells jingled. My own fancy grew warm with the Medoc. We had passed through walls of piled bones, with casks and puncheons intermingling, into the inmost recesses of the catacombs. I paused again, and this time I made bold to seize Fortunato by an arm above the elbow.

"The nitre!" I said; "see, it increases. It hangs like moss upon the vaults. We are below the river's bed. The drops of moisture tickle among the bones. Come, we will go back ere it is too late. Your cough—"

"It is nothing," he said; "let us go on. But first, another draught of the Medoc."

I broke and reached him a flagon of De Grâve. He emptied it at a breath. His eyes flashed with a fierce light. He laughed and threw the bottle upwards with a gesticulation I did not understand.

[3]Nemo me impune lacessit No one dare attack me with impunity (the motto of Scotland).

I looked at him in surprise. He repeated the movement—a grotesque one.

"You do not comprehend?" he said.

"Not I," I replied.

"Then you are not of the brotherhood."

"How?"

"You are not of the masons."[4]

"Yes, yes," I said, "yes, yes."

"You? Impossible! A mason?"

"A mason," I replied.

"A sign," he said.

"It is this," I answered, producing a trowel from beneath the folds of my roquelaure.

"You jest," he exclaimed, recoiling a few paces. "But let us proceed to the Amontillado."

"Be it so," I said, replacing the tool beneath the cloak, and again offering him my arm. He leaned upon it heavily. We continued our route in search of the Amontillado. We passed through a range of low arches, descended, passed on, and descending again, arrived at a deep crypt, in which the foulness of the air caused our flambeaux rather to glow than flame.

At the most remote end of the crypt there appeared another less spacious. Its walls had been lined with human remains piled to the vault overhead, in the fashion of the great catacombs of Paris. Three sides of this interior crypt were still ornamented in this manner. From the fourth the bones had been thrown down, and lay promiscuously upon the earth, forming at one point a mound of some size. Within the wall thus exposed by the displacing of the bones, we perceived a still interior recess, in depth about four feet, in width three, in height six or seven. It seemed to have been constructed for no especial use within itself, but formed merely the interval between two of the colossal supports of the roof of the catacombs, and was backed by one of their circumscribing walls of solid granite.

It was in vain that Fortunato, uplifting his dull torch, endeavored to pry into the depths of the recess. Its termination the feeble light did not enable us to see.

"Proceed," I said; "herein is the Amontillado. As for Luchesi—"

"He is an ignoramus," interrupted my friend, as he stepped unsteadily forward, while I followed immediately at his heels. In an instant he had reached the extremity of the niche, and finding his progress arrested by the rock, stood stupidly bewildered. A moment more and I had fettered him to the granite. In its surface were two iron staples, distant from each other about two feet, horizontally. From one of these depended a short chain, from the other a padlock. Throwing the links about his waist, it was but the work of a few seconds to secure it. He was too much astounded to resist. Withdrawing the key I stepped back from the recess.

"Pass your hand," I said, "over the wall; you cannot help feeling the nitre. Indeed it is very damp. Once more let me implore you to return. No? Then I must positively leave you. But I must first render you all the little attentions in my power."

"The Amontillado!" ejaculated my friend, not yet recovered from his astonishment.

"True," I replied; "the Amontillado."

As I said these words I busied myself among the pile of bones of which I have before spoken. Throwing them aside, I soon uncovered a quantity of building-stone and mortar. With these materials and with the aid of my trowel, I began vigorously to wall up the entrance of the niche.

[4]of the masons i.e., a member of the Freemasons, an international secret fraternity.

I had scarcely laid the first tier of masonry when I discovered that the intoxication of Fortunato had in a great measure worn off. The earliest indication I had of this was a low moaning cry from the depth of the recess. It was not the cry of a drunken man. There was then a long and obstinate silence. I laid the second tier, and the third, and the fourth; and then I heard the furious vibrations of the chain. The noise lasted for several minutes, during which, that I might hearken to it with the more satisfaction, I ceased my labors and sat down upon the bones. When at last the clanking subsided, I resumed the trowel, and finished without interruption the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh tier. The wall was now nearly upon a level with my breast. I again paused, and holding the flambeaux over the masonwork, threw a few feeble rays upon the figure within.

A succession of loud and shrill screams, bursting suddenly from the throat of the chained form, seemed to thrust me violently back. For a brief moment I hesitated—I trembled. Unsheathing my rapier, I began to grope with it about the recess; but the thought of an instant reassured me. I placed my hand upon the solid fabric of the catacombs, and felt satisfied. I reapproached the wall. I replied to the yells of him who clamored. I re-echoed—I aided—I surpassed them in volume and in strength. I did this, and the clamorer grew still.

It was now midnight, and my task was drawing to a close. I had completed the eighth, the ninth, and the tenth tier. I had finished a portion of the last and the eleventh; there remained but a single stone to be fitted and plastered in. I struggled with its weight; I placed it partially in its destined position. But now there came from out the niche a low laugh that erected the hairs upon my head. It was succeeded by a sad voice, which I had difficulty in recognizing as that of the noble Fortunato. The voice said—

"Ha! ha! ha!—he! he! he!—a very good joke indeed—an excellent jest. We will have many a rich laugh about it at the palazzo—he! he! he!—over our wine—he! he! he!"

"The Amontillado!" I said.

"He! he! he!—he! he! he!—yes, the Amontillado. But is it not getting late? Will not they be awaiting us at the palazzo, the Lady Fortunato and the rest? Let us be gone."

"Yes," I said, "let us be gone."

"For the love of God, Montresor!"

"Yes," I said, "for the love of God!"

But to these words I hearkened in vain for a reply. I grew impatient. I called aloud;

"Fortunato!"

No answer. I called again;

"Fortunato!"

No answer still, I thrust a torch through the remaining aperture and let it fall within. There came forth in return only a jingling of the bells. My heart grew sick—on account of the dampness of the catacombs. I hastened to make an end of my labor. I forced the last stone into its position; I plastered it up. Against the new masonry I reerected the old rampart of bones. For the half of a century no mortal has disturbed them. In pace requiescat![5]

[1846]

[5]In pace requiescat! May he rest in peace!

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. To whom does Montresor tell his story? The story he tells happened fifty years earlier. Do we have any clue as to why he tells it now?
2. At the end of the story, we learn that the murder occurred fifty years ago. Would the story be equally effective if Poe had had Montresor reveal this fact at the outset? Why, or why not?
3. Poe sets Montresor's story at dusk, "during the supreme madness of the carnival season." What is the "carnival season"? (If you are uncertain as to the meaning of "carnival," consult a dictionary.) What details of the story derive from the setting?
4. In the first line, Montresor declares, "The thousand injuries of Fortunato I had borne as I best could, but when he ventured upon insult, I vowed revenge." Do we ever learn what those injuries and that insult were? What do we learn about Montresor from this declaration?
5. How does Montresor characterize Fortunato? What details of his portrait unwittingly enlist our sympathy for Fortunato? Does Montresor betray any sympathy for his victim?
6. "The Cask of Amontillado" is sometimes referred to as a "horror tale." Do you think it has anything in common with horror movies? If so, what? (You might begin by making a list of the characteristics of horror movies.) Why do people take pleasure in horror movies? Does this story offer any of the same sorts of pleasure? In any case, why might a reader take pleasure in this story? Set forth your response in an argument of 250–500 words.
7. Construct a definition of madness (you may want to do a little research, but if you make use of your findings, be sure to give credit to your sources) and write an essay of 500–750 words, arguing whether or not Montresor is mad. (Note: You may want to distinguish between Montresor at the time of the killing and Montresor at the time of his narration.)

Leslie Marmon Silko

Leslie Marmon Silko was born in 1948 in Albuquerque, New Mexico, and grew up on the Laguna Pueblo Reservation some fifty miles to the west. Of her family she says,

> We are mixed blood—Laguna, Mexican, white.… All those languages, all those ways of living are combined, and we live somewhere on the fringes of all three. But I don't apologize for this any more—not to whites, not to full bloods—our origin is unlike any other. My poetry, my storytelling rise out of this source.

After graduating from the University of New Mexico in 1969, Silko entered law school but soon left to become a writer. She taught for two years at Navajo Community College at Many Farms, Arizona, and then went to Alaska for two years, where she studied Eskimo-Aleut culture and worked on a novel, Ceremony. After returning to the Southwest, she taught at the University of Arizona and then at the University of New Mexico.

In addition to writing stories, a novel, and poems, Silko wrote the screenplay for Marlon Brando's film Black Elk. In 1981, she was awarded a MacArthur Foundation genius grant.

The Man to Send Rain Clouds

One

They found him under a big cottonwood tree. His Levi jacket and pants were faded light-blue so that he had been easy to find. The big cottonwood tree stood apart from a small grove of winterbare cottonwoods which grew in the wide, sandy arroyo. He had been dead for a day or more, and the sheep had wandered and scattered up and down the arroyo. Leon and his brother-in-law, Ken, gathered the sheep and left them in the pen at the sheep camp before they returned to the cottonwood tree. Leon waited under the tree while Ken drove the truck through the deep sand to the edge of the arroyo. He squinted up at the sun and unzipped his jacket—it sure was hot for this time of year. But high and northwest the blue mountains were still deep in snow. Ken came sliding down the low, crumbling bank about fifty yards down, and he was bringing the red blanket.

Before they wrapped the old man, Leon took a piece of string out of his pocket and tied a small gray feather in the old man's long white hair. Ken gave him the paint. Across the brown wrinkled forehead he drew a streak of white and along the high cheekbones he drew a strip of blue paint. He paused and watched Ken throw pinches of corn meal and pollen into the wind that fluttered the small gray feather. Then Leon painted with yellow under the old man's broad nose, and finally, when he had painted green across the chin, he smiled.

"Send us rain clouds, Grandfather." They laid the bundle in the back of the pickup and covered it with a heavy tarp before they started back to the pueblo.

They turned off the highway onto the sandy pueblo road. Not long after they passed the store and post office they saw Father Paul's car coming toward them. When he recognized their faces he slowed his car and waved for them to stop. The young priest rolled down the car window.

"Did you find old Teofilo?" he asked loudly.

Leon stopped the truck. "Good morning, Father. We were just out to the sheep camp. Everything is O.K. now."

"Thank God for that. Teofilo is a very old man. You really shouldn't allow him to stay at the sheep camp alone."

"No, he won't do that any more now."

"Well, I'm glad you understand. I hope I'll be seeing you at Mass this week—we missed you last Sunday. See if you can get old Teofilo to come with you." The priest smiled and waved at them as they drove away.

Two

Louise and Teresa were waiting. The table was set for lunch, and the coffee was boiling on the black iron stove. Leon looked at Louise and then at Teresa.

"We found him under a cottonwood tree in the big arroyo near sheep camp. I guess he sat down to rest in the shade and never got up again." Leon walked toward the old man's head. The red plaid shawl had been shaken and spread carefully over the bed, and a new brown flannel shirt and pair of stiff new Levis were arranged neatly beside the pillow. Louise held the screen door open while Leon and Ken carried in the red blanket. He looked small and shriveled, and after they dressed him in the new shirt and pants he seemed more shrunken.

It was noontime now because the church bells rang the Angelus.[1] They ate the beans with hot bread, and nobody said anything until after Teresa poured the coffee.

Ken stood up and put on his jacket. "I'll see about the grave-diggers. Only the top layer of soil is frozen. I think it can be ready before dark."

Leon nodded his head and finished his coffee. After Ken had been gone for a while, the neighbors and clanspeople came quietly to embrace Teofilo's family and to leave food on the table because the grave-diggers would come to eat when they were finished.

Three

The sky in the west was full of pale-yellow light. Louise stood outside with her hands in the pockets of Leon's green army jacket that was too big for her. The funeral was over, and the old men had taken their candles and medicine bags and were gone. She waited until the body was laid into the pickup before she said anything to Leon. She touched his arm, and he noticed that her hands were still dusty from the corn meal that she had sprinkled around the old man. When she spoke, Leon could not hear her.

"What did you say? I didn't hear you."

"I said that I had been thinking about something."

"About what?"

"About the priest sprinkling holy water for Grandpa. So he won't be thirsty."

Leon stared at the new moccasins that Teofilo had made for the ceremonial dances in the summer. They were nearly hidden by the red blanket. It was getting colder, and the wind pushed gray dust down the narrow pueblo road. The sun was approaching the long mesa where it disappeared during the winter. Louise stood there shivering and watching his face. Then he zipped up his jacket and opened the truck door. "I'll see if he's there."

Ken stopped the pickup at the church, and Leon got out; and then Ken drove down the hill to the graveyard where people were waiting. Leon knocked at the old carved door with its symbols of the Lamb. While he waited he looked up at the twin bells from the king of Spain with the last sunlight pouring around them in their tower.

The priest opened the door and smiled when he saw who it was. "Come in! What brings you here this evening?"

The priest walked toward the kitchen, and Leon stood with his cap in his hand, playing with the earflaps and examining the living room—the brown sofa, the green armchair, and the brass lamp that hung down from the ceiling by links of chain. The priest dragged a chair out of the kitchen and offered it to Leon.

"No thank you, Father. I only came to ask you if you would bring your holy water to the graveyard."

The priest turned away from Leon and looked out the window at the patio full of shadows and the dining-room windows of the nuns' cloister across the patio. The curtains were heavy, and the light from within faintly penetrated; it was impossible to see the nuns inside eating supper. "Why didn't you tell me he was dead? I could have brought the Last Rites anyway."

Leon smiled. "It wasn't necessary, Father."

The priest stared down at his scuffed brown loafers and the worn hem of his cassock. "For a Christian burial it was necessary."

[1]The Angelus a devotional prayer commemorating the Annunciation (the angel Gabriel's announcement delivered to Mary of the Incarnation of God in the human form of Jesus).

His voice was distant, and Leon thought that his blue eyes looked tired.

"It's O.K., Father, we just want him to have plenty of water."

30 The priest sank down in the green chair and picked up a glossy missionary magazine. He turned the colored pages full of lepers and pagans without looking at them.

"You know I can't do that, Leon. There should have been the Last Rites and a funeral Mass at the very least."

Leon put on his green cap and pulled the flaps down over his ears. "It's getting late, Father. I've got to go."

When Leon opened the door Father Paul stood up and said, "Wait." He left the room and came back wearing a long brown overcoat. He followed Leon out the door and across the dim churchyard to the adobe steps in front of the church. They both stooped to fit through the low adobe entrance. And when they started down the hill to the graveyard only half of the sun was visible above the mesa.

The priest approached the grave slowly, wondering how they had managed to dig into the frozen ground, and then he remembered that this was New Mexico, and saw the pile of cold loose sand beside the hole. The people stood close to each other with little clouds of steam puffing from their faces. The priest looked at them and saw a pile of jackets, gloves, and scarves in the yellow, dry tumbleweeds that grew in the graveyard. He looked at the red blanket, not sure that Teofilo was so small, wondering if it wasn't some perverse Indian trick—something they did in March to ensure a good harvest—wondering if maybe old Teofilo was actually at sheep camp corraling the sheep for the night. But there he was, facing into a cold dry wind and squinting at the last sunlight, ready to bury a red wool blanket while the faces of the parishioners were in shadow with the last warmth of the sun on their backs.

35 His fingers were stiff, and it took them a long time to twist the lid off the holy water. Drops of water fell on the red blanket and soaked into dark icy spots. He sprinkled the grave and the water disappeared almost before it touched the dim, cold sand; it reminded him of something—he tried to remember what it was, because he thought if he could remember he might understand this. He sprinkled more water; he shook the container until it was empty, and the water fell through the light from sundown like August rain that fell while the sun was still shining, almost evaporating before it touched the wilted squash flowers.

The wind pulled at the priest's brown Franciscan robe and swirled away the corn meal and pollen that had been sprinkled on the blanket. They lowered the bundle into the ground, and they didn't bother to untie the stiff pieces of new rope that were tied around the ends of the blanket. The sun was gone, and over on the highway the eastbound lane was full of headlights. The priest walked away slowly. Leon watched him climb the hill, and when he had disappeared within the tall, thick walls, Leon turned to look up at the high blue mountains in the deep snow that reflected a faint red light from the west. He felt good because it was finished, and he was happy about the sprinkling of the holy water, now the old man could send them big thunderclouds for sure.

[1969]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. How would you describe the response of Leon, Ken, Louise, and Teresa to Teofilo's death? To what degree does it resemble or differ from responses to death that you are familiar with?
2. How do the funeral rites resemble or differ from those of your community?

3. How well does Leon understand the priest? How well does the priest understand Leon?
4. At the end of the story, we are told that Leon "felt good." Do you assume that the priest also felt good? What evidence supports your view?
5. From what point of view is the story told? Mark the passages where the narrator enters a character's mind, and then explain what, in your opinion, Silko gains (or loses) by doing so.

Poems

Billy Collins

Born in New York City in 1941, Collins is a professor of English at Lehman College of the City University of New York. He is the author of several books of poetry and the recipient of numerous awards, including one from the National Endowment for the Arts. Collins's Sailing Alone around the Room: New and Selected Poems was published in 2001; in the same year, he was appointed poet laureate of the United States.

Introduction to Poetry

I ask them to take a poem and hold it up to the light like a color slide or press an ear against its hive.

I say drop a mouse into a poem and watch him probe his way out, or walk inside the poem's room

and feel the walls for a light switch.

I want them to waterski across the surface of a poem waving at the author's name on the shore.

But all they want to do is tie the poem to a chair with rope and torture a confession out of it.

They begin beating it with a hose to find out what it really means.

[1988]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Billy Collins has said of this poem, "It's about the teaching of poetry to students." What is Collins recommending? What is he objecting to?
2. One critic has said that "Introduction to Poetry" is a "good poem" but that lines 9–16 "should have come first"—that Collins should first have stated the bad way in which students often react and then come forward with the right way. Prepare an argument in which you agree with this critic's comment, and then prepare an argument in which you disagree. Which of the two arguments do you find more convincing?

3. Which image in the poem do you think is the most effective? Is there an image that you think is not effective, that is confusing or awkward, or that you cannot understand?
4. Are the final two stanzas disturbing? Too disturbing? In their tone, are these stanzas similar to, or different from, the preceding stanzas?
5. If someone asked, "What's the best way to teach poetry?" what would you say?
6. This is a relatively short poem, just sixteen lines long. Please try to memorize it. Is this hard or easy for you? Does memorizing poems help you to enjoy poetry more? A lot, or a little? Not at all?

Robert Frost

Robert Frost (1874–1963) was born in California. After his father's death in 1885, Frost's mother took the family to New England, where she taught in high schools in Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Frost studied for part of one term at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, then did various jobs (including teaching), and from 1897 to 1899 was enrolled as a special student at Harvard. He later farmed in New Hampshire, published a few poems in local newspapers, left the farm and taught again, and in 1912 left for England, where he hoped to achieve more popular success as a writer. By 1915, he had won a considerable reputation, and he returned to the United States, settling on a farm in New Hampshire and cultivating the image of the country-wise farmer-poet. In fact, he was well read in the classics, in the Bible, and in English and American literature.

Among Frost's many comments about literature, here are three: "Writing is unboring to the extent that it is dramatic"; "Every poem is . . . a figure of the will braving alien entanglements"; and, finally, a poem "begins in delight and ends in wisdom. . . . It runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion."

The Road Not Taken

Two roads diverged in a yellow wood,
And sorry I could not travel both
And be one traveler, long I stood
And looked down one as far as I could
To where it bent in the undergrowth;

Then took the other, as just as fair,
And having perhaps the better claim,
Because it was grassy and wanted wear;
Though as for that the passing there
Had worn them really about the same,

And both that morning equally lay
In leaves no step had trodden black.
Oh, I kept the first for another day!
Yet knowing how way leads on to way,
I doubted if I should ever come back.

I shall be telling this with a sigh
Somewhere ages and ages hence:

Two roads diverged in a wood, and I
I took the one less traveled by,
And that has made all the difference. 20

[1916]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. If "The Road Not Taken" consisted of only the first and last stanzas, we would probably feel that Frost was talking about a clear-cut choice between two distinctive ways of life—for instance, the life of a poet or the life of a farmer. The poem does not consist only of the first and last stanzas, however. What do the two middle stanzas do? Do they complicate the poem in an interesting way? Or, do they make a muddle of it? Please explain.
2. The poem is often interpreted as Frost's statement that he chose the life of a poet. Yet, Frost on several occasions said that he was spoofing the indecisiveness of a friend and fellow-poet, Edward Thomas. Given the fact that the middle stanzas suggest that the two roads are pretty much the same, and given the fact that the speaker in the last stanza does seem to playfully mock himself ("I shall be telling this with a sigh / Somewhere ages and ages hence"), do you think that we should or should not take the poem as a serious statement about the decisions we must make? Please explain.

JOHN KEATS

John Keats (1795–1821), son of a London stable keeper, was taken out of school when he was fifteen years old and apprenticed to a surgeon and apothecary. In 1816, he was licensed to practice as an apothecary-surgeon, but he almost immediately abandoned medicine and decided to make a career as a poet. His progress was amazing: He published books of poems—to mixed reviews—in 1817, 1818, and 1820, before dying of tuberculosis at the age of twenty-five. Today he is esteemed as one of England's greatest poets.

Ode on a Grecian Urn

I

Thou still unravished bride of quietness,
  Thou foster-child of silence and slow time,
Sylvan historian, who canst thus express
  A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:
What leaf-fringed legend haunts about thy shape 5
  Of deities or mortals, or of both,
  In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?
  What men or gods are these? What maidens loth?
What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
  What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy? 10

II

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
  Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;

Not to the sensual° ear, but, more endeared,
Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:
Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave
Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve;
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

III

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring adieu;
And, happy melodist, unwearied,
For ever piping songs for ever new;
More happy love! more happy, happy love!
For ever warm and still to be enjoyed,
For ever panting, and for ever young;
All breathing human passion far above,
That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
A burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

IV

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
And all her silken flanks with garlands drest?
What little town by river or sea shore,
Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
Is emptied of this folk, this pious morn?
And, little town, thy streets for evermore
Will silent be; and not a soul to tell
Why thou art desolate can e'er return.

V

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! with brede°
Of marble men and maidens overwrought,
With forest branches and the trodden weed;
Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought
As doth eternity: Cold Pastoral!
When old age shall this generation waste,
Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
"Beauty is truth, truth beauty,"—that is all
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.

[1820]

13 sensual sensuous.
41 brede design.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In the first stanza, Keats calls the urn an "unravished bride of quietness," a "foster-child of silence and slow time," and a "Sylvan historian." Paraphrase each of these terms.
2. How much sense does it make to say that "Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard / Are sweeter" (lines 11–12)?
3. In the second stanza, Keats says that the youth will forever sing, the trees will forever have their foliage, and the woman will forever be beautiful. But what words in the stanza suggest that this scene is not entirely happy? Where else in the poem is it suggested that there are painful aspects to the images on the urn?
4. What arguments can you offer to support the view that "Beauty is truth, truth beauty"?
5. There is much uncertainty about whether everything in the last two lines should be enclosed within quotation marks, or only "Beauty is truth, truth beauty." If only these five words from line 49 should be enclosed within quotation marks, does the speaker address the rest of line 49 and the whole of line 50 to the urn or to the reader of the poem?

Martín Espada

Martín Espada was born in Brooklyn in 1957. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Wisconsin and a law degree from Northeastern University. A poet who publishes regularly, Espada teaches creative writing at the University of Massachusetts–Amherst.

Bully

Boston, Massachusetts, 1987

In the school auditorium, the Theodore Roosevelt statue is nostalgic
for the Spanish-American War, each fist lonely for a saber,
or the reins of anguish-eyed horses,
or a podium to clatter with speeches
glorying in the malaria of conquest.
But now the Roosevelt school is pronounced Hernández.
Puerto Rico has invaded Roosevelt with its army of Spanish-singing children in the hallways,
brown children devouring
the stockpiles of the cafeteria, children painting Taáno ancestors that leap naked across murals.
Roosevelt is surrounded by all the faces
he ever shoved in eugenic spite and cursed as mongrels, skin of one race, hair and cheekbones of another.

Once Marines tramped
from the newsreel of his imagination;
now children plot to spray graffiti in parrot-brilliant colors across the Victorian mustache and monocle.

[1990]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What was Theodore Roosevelt famous for? If you are not sure, consult an encyclopedia. In the first stanza of "Bully," what words best express Espada's attitude toward Roosevelt?
2. In the second stanza, what does Espada mean when he says "Puerto Rico has invaded Roosevelt"? What does he mean by an "army of Spanish-singing children"? What are the Taíno?
3. What does "bully" mean as a noun? As an adjective?
4. Roosevelt was a great believer in America as a "melting pot." What is this theory? Do you think there is a great deal to it, something to it, or nothing to it? Why?
5. In one of Roosevelt's speeches, he states "Every immigrant who comes here should be required within five years to learn English or leave the country." What do you think of this idea? Why? Suppose that, for some reason (perhaps political, perhaps economic), you decided to spend the rest of your life in, say, Argentina, or Germany, or Israel, or Nigeria. Do you think the government might reasonably require you to learn the national language? Support your response with reasons.

CHAPTER 8

Pushing Analysis Further: Reinterpreting and Revising

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Define interpretation and describe the process for interpreting literary texts
- Evaluate your response to literature
- Use different strategies to develop your analytical writing, including rethinking first responses, exploring literary form, and emphasizing concepts and insights
- Use revision to strengthen your analytical thinking and writing

Interpretation and Meaning

We can define interpretation as

- a setting forth of your understanding of a literary work's meaning or
- a setting forth of your understanding of one or more of the meanings of a work of literature.

This question of meaning versus meanings deserves an explanation. Although some critics believe that a work of literature has a single meaning (the meaning it had for the author), most critics hold that a work has several meanings, for instance, the meaning it had for the author, the meaning(s) it had for its first readers (or viewers, if the work is a drama), the meaning(s) it had for later readers, and the meaning(s) it has for us today.

Take Hamlet (1600–01), for example. Perhaps this play about a man who has lost his father had a very special meaning for Shakespeare, who had recently lost his own father. Further, Shakespeare had earlier lost a son named Hamnet, a variant spelling of Hamlet. The play, then, may have had important psychological meanings for Shakespeare, but the audience could not have shared (or even known) those meanings.

What did the play mean to Shakespeare's audience? Perhaps the original audience of Hamlet—people living in a monarchy, presided over by Queen Elizabeth I—were especially concerned with the issue (specifically raised in Hamlet) of whether a monarch's subjects ever have the right to overthrow the monarch. But, obviously, for twenty-first-century Americans, the interest in the play lies elsewhere, and the play must mean something else. If we are familiar with Freud, we may see in the play a young man who subconsciously lusts after his mother and seeks to kill his father (in the form of Claudius, Hamlet's uncle). Or, we may see the play as being largely about an alienated young man in a bourgeois society. Or, we may see the work as a meditation on the character of a person who thinks too much and acts too little. The interpretations are countless.

This multitude of possible meanings is exactly what makes literature art. Literature encourages imagination and creativity on the part of the reader, not just the author. The analytical essay emphasizes the reader's meaning-making abilities. The reader creates his or her own understanding of the work and creates a convincing explanation of that understanding, to be shared with his or her own readers; in this way, the creative energy of the literary work informs the creative thinking shared through an analytical paper.

Is the Author's Intention a Guide to Meaning?

Shouldn't we be concerned, you might ask, with the intention of the author? The question is reasonable, but it presents difficulties, as the members of the U.S. Supreme Court find when they try to base their decisions on the original intent of the writers of the Constitution. First, for older works, we almost never know what the intention was. Authors did not leave comments about their intentions. We have Hamlet, but we do not have any statement of Shakespeare's intention concerning this or any other play. It might be argued that we can deduce Shakespeare's intention from the play itself, but to argue that we should study the play in the light of Shakespeare's intention and that we can know his intention by studying the play is to argue in a circle. We can say that Shakespeare must have intended to write a tragedy (if he intended to write a comedy, he failed), but we cannot go much further in talking about his intention.

Even if an author has gone on record expressing an intention, we may think twice before accepting the statement as definitive. The author may be speaking facetiously, deceptively, mistakenly, or unconvincingly. For instance, Thomas Mann said, probably sincerely and accurately, that he wrote one of his novels merely in order to entertain his family, but we may nevertheless take the book seriously and find it to be profound.

What Characterizes a Sound Interpretation?

Even the most vigorous advocates of the idea that meaning is indeterminate do not believe that all interpretations are equally significant. Rather, they believe that an interpretive essay is offered against a background of ideas, shared by essayist and reader, as to what constitutes a persuasive argument. Although a literary work encourages interpretation, there will be weak interpretations and strong interpretations. A strong interpretative essay (even if it is characterized as "interpretive free play" or "creative engagement") will have to be

- coherent,
- plausible, and
- rhetorically effective.

The presentation—the rhetoric—as well as the interpretation is significant. This means that the essayist cannot merely set down random expressions of feeling or unsupported opinion. The essayist must, on the contrary, convincingly argue a thesis—that is, point to evidence so that the reader will not only know what the essayist believes but also will understand why he or she believes it.

There are lots of ways of making sense (and even more ways of making nonsense), but one important way of helping readers to see things from your point of view is to do your best to face all the complexities of a work. Put it this way: Some interpretations strike a reader as better than others because they are more inclusive, that is, because they account for more of the details of the work. The less satisfactory interpretations leave a reader pointing to aspects of the work—to some parts of the whole—and saying, "Yes, but your explanation doesn't take account of. . . ."

This does not mean that a reader must feel that a persuasive interpretation says the last word about the work. We always realize that a work—if we value it highly—is richer than the discussion; again, however, for us to value an interpretation, we must find the interpretation plausible and inclusive.

Interpretation often depends on making connections not only among elements of the work (for instance, among the characters in a story or among the images in a poem), and among the work and other works by the author, but also on making connections between a particular work and a cultural context. The cultural context usually includes other writers and specific works of literature, since any given literary work participates in a tradition. That is, if a work looks toward life, it also looks toward other works. A sonnet is about human experience, but it is also part of a tradition of sonnet writing. The more works of literature you are familiar with, the better equipped you will be to interpret any particular work. Here is how Robert Frost put it, in the preface to Aforesaid, a book of verse published in 1954:

> A poem is best read in the light of all the other poems ever written. We read A the better to read B (we have to start somewhere; we may get very little out of A). We read B the better to read C, C the better to read D, D the better to go back and get something more out of A. Progress is not the aim, but circulation. The thing is to get among the poems where they hold each other apart in their places as the stars do.

Precisely because a literary work generates multiple meanings informed by details within the work and connections beyond the work, it provides an opportunity to develop your critical thinking abilities. Let's explore how to take an initial interpretation and continue to push it to become more meaningful, resulting in a stronger analytical paper.

Interpreting Pat Mora's "Immigrants"

Let's think about interpreting a short poem by a contemporary poet, Pat Mora.

Pat Mora

Of Mexican American descent, Pat Mora was born in 1942 in El Paso, Texas. She writes poetry, nonfiction, and children's books that explore the border between Mexico and America, emphasizing its cultural diversity and flexible bilingual language. A energetic advocate of the pleasure of reading books, which she calls "bookjoy," Mora supports several literacy initiatives and founded what she calls "Children's Day, Book Day, El dia de los ninos, El dia de los libros," a literacy celebration often know as Día.

Immigrants

wrap their babies in the American flag, feed them mashed hot dogs and apple pie,
name them Bill and Daisy,
buy them blonde dolls that blink blue eyes or a football and tiny cleats before the baby can even walk, speak to them in thick English,
hallo, babee, hallo.
whisper in Spanish or Polish when the babies sleep, whisper in a dark parent bed, that dark parent fear, "Will they like our boy, our girl, our fine american boy, our fine american girl?"

[1986]

Perhaps most readers will agree that the poem expresses or dramatizes a desire, attributed to "immigrants," that their child grow up in an Anglo mode. (Mora is not saying that all immigrants have this desire; she has simply invented one speaker who offers details about immigrants. Reader Jones may say that Mora says all immigrants have this desire, but that is Jones's interpretation.) For this reason, the parents call their children Bill and Daisy (rather than, say, José and Katarzyna) and give them blonde dolls and a football (rather than dark-haired dolls and a soccer ball). Up to this point, the parents seem a bit silly in their mimicking of Anglo ways. The second part of the poem, however, gives the reader a more interior view of the parents, and brings out the fear, hope, and worried concern that lie behind their behavior: Some unspecified "they" may not "like / our boy, our girl." Who are "they"? Most readers will probably agree that "they" refers to native-born citizens, especially the blonde, blue-eyed "all-American" Anglo types that until recently dominated the establishment in the United States.

By reviewing the ideas raised by the poem, we are well on our way to creating an interpretation of it. But it is crucial to reread the poem and continue to interpret it, developing a more sophisticated understanding of its ideas.

We can raise further questions about the interpretation of the poem.

- Exactly what does the poet mean when Mora says that immigrants "wrap their babies in the American flag"? Are we to take this literally? If not, how are we to take it?
- Why must the parent's whisper the last lines of the poem? Why can't they speak them loudly? Why are they whispered in a "dark parent bed?" What is the significance of that location?
- Why is the word "american" in the last two lines not capitalized? Is Mora imitating the nonnative speaker's uncertain grasp of English punctuation? (If so, why does Mora capitalize "American" in the first line and "Spanish" and "Polish" later in the poem?) Or, is she perhaps implying some mild reservation about becoming 100 percent American, some suggestion that, in changing from Spanish or Polish to "American," there is a loss?

A reader might seek out Mora and ask her why she didn't capitalize "american" in the last line, but Mora might not be willing to answer, or she might not give a straight answer, or she might say that she doesn't really know why—it just seemed right when she wrote the poem. Most authors do, in fact, take this last approach. When they are working as writers, they work by a kind of creative instinct, a kind of feel for the material. Later, they can look critically at their writing, but that's another sort of experience.

To return to our basic question: What characterizes a good interpretation? The short answer is evidence and especially evidence that seems to cover all relevant issues. In an essay, it is not enough merely to assert an interpretation. Your readers don't expect you to make an airtight case, but, because you are trying to help readers to understand a work—to see a work the way you do—you are obliged to

- offer reasonable supporting evidence,
- explain how the evidence develops your ideas, and
- take account of what might be set forth as counterevidence to your thesis.

Of course, your essay may originate with an intuition or an emotional response, a sense that the work is about such and such, but this intuition or emotion must then be examined, and it must stand a test of reasonableness. Your readers may not be convinced that your interpretation is right or true, but they must feel that the interpretation is plausible and in accord with the details of the work, rather than, say, highly eccentric and irreconcilable with some details.

✔CHECKLIST: Developing an Interpretation

- ☐ Do I know the work well enough to offer a thoughtful interpretation? Have I looked up the meanings of words that were unfamiliar to me? Have I engaged in enough brainstorming to develop my own ideas about the text?
- ☐ Have I discussed the work with my classmates—or at least argued with myself—so that I can reasonably believe that my interpretation makes sense?
- ☐ Have I reread the literary text and rethought my original responses? Have I taken time to reinterpret the text, add new ideas to my interpretation, or develop my interpretation by introducing new concepts or evidence?
- ☐ What is my thesis, my main point? Can I state it in a sentence?
- ☐ Does my thesis express my understanding of the literary work? Have I expressed my insights about the work? Have I avoided general, obvious, or conventional interpretations of the work?
- ☐ Have I supported my thesis with evidence, using brief quotations from the text? Have I used the evidence to develop by interpretation?
- ☐ Have I taken account of evidence that may seem to contradict my thesis?
- ☐ Have I kept my audience in mind?
- ☐ Have I given credit to all sources for borrowed words and borrowed ideas? (On avoiding plagiarism, see pages 403–404. For citation style see Appendix B.)

Strategy #1: Pushing Analysis by Rethinking First Responses

Usually, you will begin with a strong response to your reading—interest, boredom, bafflement, annoyance, shock, pleasure, or whatever. Then, if you are going to think critically about the work, you will go on to examine your response in order to understand it, to deepen it, or to change it.

How can you change a response? Critical thinking involves seeing an issue from all sides, to as great a degree as possible. As you know, in everyday usage, to criticize usually means to find fault, but, in literary studies, the term does not have a negative connotation. Rather, it means "to examine carefully." (The word criticism comes from a Greek verb meaning "to distinguish," "to decide," "to judge.") Nevertheless, in one sense, the term critical thinking does approach the everyday meaning, since critical thinking requires you to take a skeptical view of your response. You will, so to speak, argue with yourself, seeing if your response can stand up to doubts.

Let's say that you have found a story to be implausible. Ask yourself the following questions:

- Exactly what is implausible in the story?
- Is implausibility always a fault?
- If so, exactly why?

Your answers may deepen your response. Usually, you will find supporting evidence for your response, but, in your effort to distinguish and to decide and to judge, try also (if only as an exercise) to find counterevidence. See what can be said against your position. (The best lawyers, it is said, prepare two cases—their own and the other side's.) As you consider the counterevidence, you will sometimes find that it requires you to adjust your thesis. You may even find yourself developing an entirely different response. That's fine, though, of course, the paper that you ultimately hand in should clearly argue a thesis.

In short, critical thinking means examining or exploring one's own responses, by questioning and testing them. Critical thinking is not so much a skill (though it does involve the ability to understand a text) as it is a habit of mind or, rather, several habits, including

- open-mindedness,
- intellectual curiosity, and
- willingness to work.

It may involve, too, a willingness to discuss the issues with others and to do research on writing a research paper, which will be discussed in Chapter 10.

Let's explore how you can revisit a first response and develop it into a successful interpretation that demonstrates your critical thinking skills. Students in a composition course noted their first impressions of a story and then, as part of a classroom exercise, revisited those first responses and developed them further. By examining their first and second responses, we can see what elements of thinking characterize interpretive writing. After writing the first response, the class was encouraged to reread the story and their notes and to work toward an interpretation that

- makes an argument,
- contains conceptual thinking, and
- selects supporting evidence.

Although the writing is rough, the elements of a successful analytical paper are in place.

Let's turn to the literary texts that triggered this interpretive process. Some years ago, Steve Moss, a writer, editor, and publisher, began having an annual contest in which contestants submitted stories of fifty-five words or fewer (plus a title that could be as long as seven words). Let's explore three entries that were accepted for publication.[1] Following each short story is a student's first response to it and then a more developed interpretation of it.

Jeffrey Whitmore

Bedtime Story

"Careful, honey, it's loaded," he said, re-entering the bedroom.
Her back rested against the headboard. "This for your wife?"
"No. Too chancy. I'm hiring a professional."
"How about me?"
He smirked. "Cute. But who'd be dumb enough to hire a lady hit man?"
She wet her lips, sighting along the barrel.
"Your wife."

All readers will have their own responses to this story, and they will make their own evaluations as to whether it is effective. Here, we offer the first response of one of our students, followed by a more interpretive response. Although this is a rough brainstorming exercise, a comparison of the two responses reveals that the revised response is moving toward a more focused interpretation of the work. With a bit more work, it could be transformed into a compelling thesis argument.

Student Work: Response Writing Revisited

First Response: Clever; I expected a sort of child's nursery tale, and instead got a story that in part is about adults going to bed sexually—so I did get a "bedtime story" but not what I first expected. Sort of clever. The ending gets even more clever, because we didn't see it coming. The story creates a twist on the male/female relationship. The woman in the bed that he is having the affair with is the hired hitman—and he is the target! I didn't see that coming. Certainly it is clever.

Expanded Response: What do we make of the relationships set up between the man and the woman? There are only two characters—and a very very short story, so we don't expect elaborate characterization. But, even with this limited information, the man is neatly shown to be a self-satisfied jerk. He thinks he is smart—"Too chancy. I'm hiring a professional"—and he "smirked" when his girlfriend suggests she might act as a hit-man. He has a conventional superior-male idea that a woman can't do a difficult job—but at the end of the story he knows (if only for a few seconds!!) better. This is his key realization: that his lover has been hired to kill him AND that a woman can be a hired hit-man and do a good job of it. He didn't even suspect her! So, she's obviously been doing a great job of being a double-crosser. She probably even relied on his superiority complex, knowing she wouldn't even be suspected by him. Because of the way the woman has set up the last lines of the story, she is obviously smart. She's not just a "honey."

Here is the second story and a second student's response to it.

[1]Steve Moss, ed., The World's Shortest Stories (Philadelphia: Running Press, 1998).

Douglas L. Haskins

Hide and Seek

At last he would really show them. He'd picked the very best place to hide. They'd all say he could play the game better than anyone. When they found him, they'd clap their hands.

The dopes. How dumb can they get? They should have looked here first! It's so obvious.

Here in the abandoned refrigerator.

After reading the preceding short story, the student made some free writing notes that she then reread and expanded. Notice how the student moves from a personal first response to an analytical assessment in the second response. Both responses focus on the main character, but the first response is emotional and focuses on conveying the facts of the story. The expanded response becomes analytical, containing an assessment of the qualities of the narrator and a clear focus on the concept of intelligence.

Student Work: Response Writing Revisited

First Response: This story is horrible! I guess it is "effective" because it really hits me, hurts me, but it is so cruel. As I understand it, the narrator hides in an abandoned refrigerator—and presumably he dies. This is horrific. It is showing the last thoughts of a child before he dies. I don't even want to think about this scene. Frankly, I don't think a story like this should be published. It is too frightening.

Expanded Response: When I get over the emotions of horror that this story triggered, I can start to focus on the narrator. The words "dope" and "dumb" leap out at me, making me realize that the story is exploring the idea of intelligence—who is the smart one here? This kid wants to show other kids that he is smart, that "he could play the game better than anyone." What we hear are the thoughts of the kid before he died—his attempt to be a winner at the game of hide-and-seek and have his friends "clap" for him. And I think we also hear, in a way, what is said after the other kids discover his dead body: We "should have looked here first! It's so obvious." The narrator thinks he is smart, but he makes (unfortunately) a dumb choice of a hiding place. The kids who, if they find him too late, would fulfill his expectations that they are dumb—they don't think to look in the refrigerator.

Finally, we have the third story from the same collection of stories of fifty-five words or fewer, this time with only the first response from a student. We offer a series of questions that encourage you to write an expanded response.

Mark Plants

Equal Rites

"Highly irregular," said the priest.

"The diocese allows them," replied one of the men.

Overcoming a visceral dislike of same sex unions, the priest agreed to hold the ceremony quietly. There was a harpist. Both men wore tuxedos.

But the priest, even while donning her vestments, still wondered if she was doing the right thing.

Student Work: Response Writing Revisited

First Response: The twist in this story is that the priest is a woman. The story seems to be about same-sex unions, but then the story reveals that it is really interested in the gender of the priest. The shock is not that the church is allowing same-sex unions, but that the church allows woman priests. This story is obviously taking place in the not-too-distant future. I wonder if this is a comment on where the religion is headed? Maybe the church will allow women to be priests before allowing same-sex marriage?

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. How would you expand this first response, making it more analytical?
2. What key concepts appear in the first response that could provide a foundation for further thinking? For example, are you interested in the idea of gender? Or, are you interested in the idea of religion? Are there additional concepts that you would want to address?
3. The first response does not contain any direct quotations from the story. What phrases or lines from the story do you feel are the most important and would thus include in your response?

Strategy #2: Pushing Analysis by Exploring Literary Form

One of the best ways to deepen literary analysis is to examine the literary work's structures—what we might call the artfulness of the work, such as the work's meter or use of figurative language—in addition to its themes. A literary work connects form (the shape and structure that it gives to language) to content (the ideas it wants to express). Literature asks us to pay attention to both form and content, and to think about how they work together to create meaning.

In an analytical paper, you will be expected not only to explore a literary work's key ideas but also to explain how those ideas are conveyed by form. If you are looking to improve, expand, or develop a paper, you should examine how you are building an analysis of form into your paper. In order to explore form, you must work closely with textual evidence. As a result, a careful attention to the formal qualities of literature will almost always improve your writing, as it will integrate meaningful evidence into your writing.

To explore how careful attention to a formal element can improve a paper, let's turn to poetry. Because it highlights form, poetry allows us to practice seeing the connections between form and content. A poem often uses rhyme, repetition, line breaks, and stanza breaks, taking a specific shape on the page. That shape, in turn, highlights or enacts specific ideas. For example, if you are analyzing a poem that expresses frustrated anger, you may notice that the poem features fragmented lines that "break off" in mid-idea; you will want to explain how the form of the fragmented lines expresses the idea of anger. As we say elsewhere in the text, an analytical essay answers the somewhat odd-sounding question, "How does a poem mean?" in addition to the expected question, "What does the poem mean?"

In an analytical paper on a poem, you'll want to use your knowledge about poetry by locating, naming, and analyzing the poetic devices that create the poem's meaning.

Let's consider an analytical paper assignment that focuses on the formal elements of a poem, asking you to explore the poem's imagery. You might mark up the poem, locating its key images and taking marginal notes that start to question and interpret those images. You might then expand your ideas, developing them into a set of inquiry questions that focus on the issue of form: What is the poem is about? What are the ideas being expressed by the imagery in the poem? What are its most thought-provoking images in the poem? What feelings do the images evoke? What specific words are used to convey its imagery? Does the imagery take on the significance of a symbol, as we discuss in Chapter 15? And, is that symbol conventional or unique?

When you are writing an analysis, review the literary structures you have been studying. Locate those structures in the literary work, and analyze how they convey ideas. If your instructor asks you to focus on a specific literary element—for instance, meter or figurative language—reread the text, focus on that element and how it contributes to the text's meaning. In your annotations and brainstorming notes, examine your selected literary element closely. Emphasize your overarching interpretation by transforming it into a thesis argument that you set forth at the beginning of your paper. If you are interpreting a specific literary element, make sure that element is central to your thesis argument. Then, create a hierarchy of ideas, in which your secondary interpretations become subpoints in your paper, continuing to analyze the selected formal element throughout the paper. Keeping focused on a specific literary element will benefit your paper; in addition to strengthening your use of evidence, it will help you to avoid inserting a summary and overly general ideas about the text.

✔ CHECKLIST: Using Formal Evidence in an Analytical Essay

- ☐ Did I review the literary forms and structures I have been studying? Do I understand the definitions of these forms? Do I understand the examples of that form provided by this literary work, and can I locate examples of those forms in other literary works?
- ☐ Did I read the literary work closely, annotating it for the selected literary forms?
- ☐ Did I consider what seems to be the literary work's most important formal element? Does the work call attention to, for example, its use of voice, imagery, plot, setting, characterization, or dramatic irony?
- ☐ Did I emphasize the ideas being expressed though these literary forms? Did I make sure to connect form to content?
- ☐ Did I create inquiry questions that focus on the issues of form and then use those questions to deepen my analysis of the text?
- ☐ Are issues of literary form central to my thesis argument?
- ☐ Did I use issues of form to push my analytical thinking? Did I address issues of form throughout my paper?

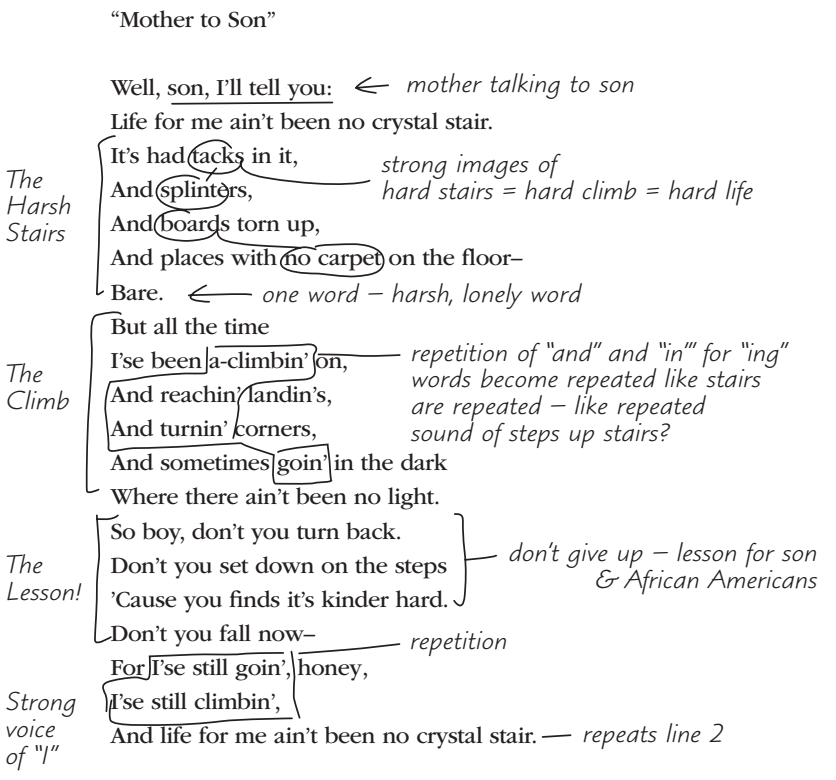
- ☐ Did I make my ideas specific by illustrating them with interesting quotations? Did I explain the formal elements used in those quotations?
- ☐ Did I use the analysis of form to come to a more sophisticated understanding of the poem's meaning?

Let's see how an exploration of literary form can be used to brainstorm ideas for a paper and develop a draft. We can turn to the annotations, inquiry notes, and final paper written by Ayn Brady, a first-year student in an introductory course on writing about literature. Her paper examines "Mother to Son," a poem written by one of the most important poets of the twentieth century, Langston Hughes. As Ayn's analysis of the poem's poetic devices shows, Hughes's poetry uses straightforward language to capture complex ideas.

Langston Hughes

For biographical information on Langston Hughes, see page 429.

Mother to Son



Well, son, I'll tell you:
Life for me ain't been no crystal stair.
It's had tacks in it,
And splinters,
And boards torn up,
And places with no carpet on the floor—
Bare.
But all the time
I'se been a-climbin' on,
And reachin' landin's,
And turnin' corners,
And sometimes goin' in the dark
Where there ain't been no light.
So boy, don't you turn back.
Don't you set down on the steps
'Cause you finds it's kinder hard.
Don't you fall now—
For I'se still goin', honey,
I'se still climbin',
And life for me ain't been no crystal stair.

[1922]

Student Work: Annotation Exploring Form

Ayn's class has been given an assignment asking them to explore how a poem's poetic form contributes to its meaning. Ayn's annotations on the poem show her first attempts to explore the poem's form. She takes notes on the poem's formal elements on the right-hand side of the poem and takes notes on the conceptual content on the left-hand side of the poem. This strategy allows her to make sure that she is giving enough consideration to the poem's form and allows her to see more clearly the patterns of poetic structure used by Hughes.

Student Work: Inquiry Notes Exploring Form

After completing her annotations, Ayn generates a series of inquiry questions that help her to analyze the poem's formal elements, including its imagery, voice, and diction. Notice how her inquiry questions help her to locate and organize evidence that she could use in her paper.

"Mother to Son"

What poetic structures or devices does this poem use to make meaning?

Right away, I notice the straightforward language, as if the speaker is speaking right at me (just like the voice is talking to the son) in everyday/colloquial language. The meaning of the poem is clear: it is conveying the difficulties of a tough life. This life is like climbing up a difficult staircase. But, how does this poem capture the difficulty of that climb? How does the poem make us feel that sense of difficulty? I guess that the question I want to answer by looking at the poem's form.

Imagery: How does the poem use imagery?

Central image = image of climbing stairs
Stairs are not glass stairs, but difficult, rough, not-easy stairs
Does this become a metaphor? Life is like climbing stairs?

What are the specific words used by the poem to build up these images?
–tacks
–splinters
–boards
–no carpet, bare
–landing
–turnings
–no light = dark
These images add up to the idea of a difficult climb—the stairs are rough and broken; they are all uphill. The words are easy to understand, but create a strong and clear image of a tough climb.

Voice: How does the poem use voice?
Poem has a strong speaking persona
Mother speaking directly to son—directly addresses him in the first line and again near end ("honey")
She directly addresses him and tells him what to do: "Don't you fall now"

Language: How does the poem use language?
The poem uses colloquial language—language that seems slangy and everyday –ain't
–climbin'
–reachin'
–turnin'
–goin'
Spoken language, as if talking directly to you.
Maybe the language itself is tired, not precise, due to difficult climb?

Pattern: How does the pattern of the words create meaning?
Repetition
–And, and, and
–I'se still, I'se still Short lines
The poem starts to feel like the stairs, like the steps going up a staircase
Maybe the poem is meant to imitate the feel of step-by-step (line-by-line) action of going up the stairs

What seems to be the key content—the meaning—of the poem? Does the form capture that meaning?
The mother is giving a lesson to her son. The key lesson is "So, boy, don't you turn back," meaning that the boy cannot give up or turn back from difficulties. He must continue up the stairs, just as she has gone up the stairs. Do not turn back, rest, or give up! Keep going! The mother shows a successful climb—the poem acts out the climb–making it clear that the climb can be done.

Can the poem be connected to a larger context?
Harlem Renaissance
The poem could be read as a comment on the larger African-American struggle against prejudice—African-Americans have had a hard and difficult climb towards equality, but they cannot give up.

Student Analytical Essay: "Accepting the Challenge of a Difficult Climb in Langston Hughes's 'Mother to Son'"

Ayn takes the interesting insights that she has generated in her inquiry notes and turns them into the following paper:

Ayn Brady

Professor Singh

English 150-32

10 March 2016

Accepting the Challenge of a Difficult Climb

Langston Hughes's "Mother to Son" centers on the key metaphor that life can be compared to the act of climbing stairs. The poem develops this metaphor by using poetic devices, focusing on the poetic language of the poem's speaker. As the title reveals, the poem features the persona of a mother. The mother describes her life as climbing stairs and expresses the feeling of climbing stairs by using colloquial language and the repetition of words and sounds. The pattern of the language sounds like the pattern of climbing up stairs one after the other. The climbing of stairs is difficult and stressful, with no break. Thus, life for the speaker has been difficult and stressful with no break. "Mother to Son" conveys the feeling of this difficult life by creating a strong speaking persona, using repetition, using colloquial language, and developing a clear metaphor.

The poem creates the persona of a mother who is talking to her son. The poem's first line is "Well son, I'll tell you," creating a speaking situation in which the mother is talking directly to the son—and to the reader (1). The speaker's voice creates a strong connection between herself and her son. She even addresses the son as "honey" towards the end of the poem. As she shares the difficulties of her life with him, the mother's voice seems honest and open. As the poem progresses, it becomes clear that the mother is giving a lesson to her son. The speaker addresses the listener directly with the key lesson "So, boy, don't you turn back," meaning that the boy cannot give up or turn back from difficulties.

The poem is told from the perspective of this persona, using the language, experiences, and knowledge of the mother. The mother has had a difficult life, which is effectively presented through the metaphor of an upward climb. The poem sets itself up to feel like a set of stairs. The poem has very short lines, like the short steps a person takes on stairs. The language repeats itself, such as repeating the word "and" at the start of six of its lines (4-6, 10-12). The repetitive language captures the repetition of climbing upwards. In addition, the mother's colloquial language, such as the use of "I'se" for "I'm," reveals that the hard work of climbing happens in everyday life (9, 18-19). Life can feel like a constant struggle and the speaker's language captures this feeling.

Through its persona and poetic language, the poem develops the metaphor that life is a difficult staircase that requires a stressful climb. The poem opens and closes with a statement that makes the comparison between life and staircase clear: the mother says "Life for me ain't been no crystal stair" (2). The metaphor of "life as staircase" is set up through a negative statement; the mother sees the possibility that life could be a crystal stair, as for example in a TV spectacular musical, but knows that her life is not that. A crystal staircase would be glittering, precious, and handled delicately. However, this speaker's life is the opposite and she opens the poem with this idea of opposition and negativity.

The metaphor of life being a difficult set of stairs is developed through clear imagery. For lines 3-7, the poem creates a staircase of short lines and gives one image per line. Each image conveys the difficulty of the climb: the speaker's stairs has "had tacks in it;" followed by "Splinters," and "boards torn up," and "places with no carpet on the floor" (3-7). Although these words describe the stairs, they are really describing the speaker's hard life. The mother has been challenged by a series of painful obstacles. Each of these lines starts with the word "and," making a repetitive pattern of sound—perhaps imitating the repetitive act of climbing a staircase. This repetition of "and," followed by strong descriptive words, makes the idea of stairs come alive. In a set of stairs, each stair is similar—and there is always another stair ahead.

The image of these difficult stairs culminates in a very effective line. Line 8 contains one word, left to stand all alone: "bare." The word "bare" is presented in a bare and lonely way that makes it meaning clear. The word can be seen as representing the mother, who must have had to stand "bare" and alone throughout her life.

After describing the stairs, the speaker explains her attitude: she continues to climb the stairs no matter what obstacles they throw in her way. Lines 9-12 shift from describing the stairs to her describing herself and her climbing activity. As the speaker describes her climbing activity, it feels real because the lines are presented in colloquial, everyday language. For example, the speaker explains "I'se been a-climbin' on," which captures the feeling of an everyday struggle that causes weariness but that has been accepted and is now part of life (9). The mother continues to describe her climbing through a list of active verbs that are presented in her unique voice: "And reachin' landin's/And turnin' corners./And sometimes goin' in the dark" (10-12). This use of "in'" for "ing" becomes a pattern. The stairs might continue one after another in repetitive pattern, but the mother will continue to climb them. The mother's description of her activity reveals that she will not give up, but sees the stairs as a challenge to be met and overcome.

In this speaking situation, the speaking mother wants to make sure that the listening son learns from her upwards climb. The mother addresses him directly, saying "So boy, don't you turn back/Don't you set down on the steps/'Cause you finds it's kinder hard./Don't you fall now—" (14-17). The mother wants her son to continue her climb. He must learn from her example and continue a forward, upward march. The mother does not want the son to take any backward steps, but urges him to continue without turning around or taking a rest. The strength of the mother's persona comes across in these lines. She ends her poem by saying "For I'se still goin' honey,/I'se still climbin'/And life for me ain't been no crystal stair" (18-20).

This final section of the poem describes the upward climb as if it were the mother's individual life, but the climb can also be read as describing the African-American experience. Knowing that Langston Hughes was African-American and wrote during the Harlem Renaissance can help to position the poem in the larger context of the African-American struggle to achieve recognition and equal rights. The mother's upward climb can be read as expressing the struggle to move forward in the face of prejudice. In this reading, the mother's climb becomes inspirational. Though faced with numerous obstacles, the mother has continued to tackle and overcome those obstacles. The boy must not let that legacy be forgotten. The boy must make sure that he picks up and continues from his mother's point in the upward climb—he cannot go backward. In this way, the boy can be seen as representing the next generation of African-Americans who are being urged to continue the struggle of the previous generation. Just like the boy, the newest generation must not lose the gains of their parents. When read this way, the metaphor of climbing stairs becomes a way of explaining the struggle for equality.

Brady 5

Hughes's "Mother to Son" is a powerful poem that makes the reader feel the difficulty of the speaker's life. The poem gains its power from the effective use of poetic devices, including voice, repetition, colloquialisms, and imagery. The challenge of constantly climbing stairs is an effective metaphor for the difficulty of moving forward in life. The poem is especially effective in expressing the difficulty of moving ahead in a life that is "bare" rather than bright with crystal. This is especially true if the speaker is an African-American woman. The speaker inspires her son and the reader to continue to fight for equality.

[New page]

Brady 6

Work Cited

Hughes, Langston. "Mother to Son." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 261. Print.

Strategy #3: Pushing Analysis by Emphasizing Concepts and Insights

Because a literary text is open-ended—it does not come right out and say, "This is what I'm about"—literary analysis asks the student to create his or her own interpretation of the text; in essence, the student says, "This is what I think the text is about." A successful interpretation is grounded in a careful close reading but does not hesitate to reach for a unique understanding of the text. In an analytical paper, you are asked to develop your critical thinking skills—to use writing about a literary work in order to push your ideas to become richer, deeper, and more complex. In analysis, you build on close reading by using writing to define, explain, and develop your most meaningful interpretation of the text. You then present that interpretation as an argument, attempting to convince your reader of your interpretation's originality and importance.

How can you develop your analytical thinking and writing to make it more sophisticated? Perhaps your instructor or a peer has said to you, "Develop your ideas further." How can you do that?

Analysis emphasizes the reader's idea-based interpretation of the text and formulation of an argument about those ideas. In its broadest sense, an analytical paper allows you to investigate how a text makes meaning. As a result, you want to emphasize your insights about the text: What unique ideas is the text triggering in your mind? What strikes you as important and interesting about the text? One way to make sure that you are developing new ideas and not just regurgitating basic information (such as providing a plot summary) is to locate the concepts that you feel are more central to the text. Position yourself as a conceptual thinker, able to see the more abstract ideas that the literary text is exploring. For example, in her paper on Langston Hughes's "Mother to Son," Ayn Brady did not limit herself to arguing that the poem depicts a woman climbing stairs. Instead, she argued that the poem addresses the more abstract idea of rising to the challenge of a difficult life. Ayn pushed this idea further and connected it to the concept of equality, specifically the African American struggle for equality.

At the same time that you are exploring abstract concepts, you want to root those concepts in the specific details of the text. As we've discussed throughout this text, an analytical paper is a testing ground for your ability to explain how smaller details connect to larger ideas. An analytical paper often explores the relationships among specific "parts" of the literary text and the contributions of those parts to the text's "whole," or its conceptual meaning. These "parts" can be the literary elements (such as character or voice) that work together to create the text's larger, more overarching ideas.

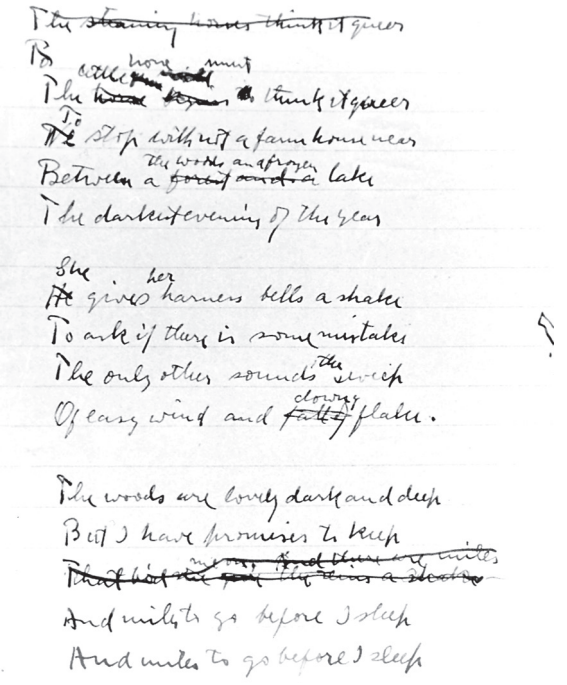
Further, as we've just seen in Ayn's paper, an analytical paper that asks the student to explore a literary work often asks for an in-depth exploration of formal elements and structures. When you are working on the paper, you should locate and interpret meaningful details and patterns in the text, using those details and patterns to trigger original interpretations. These interpretations should express a larger understanding of the literary text, using the literary elements to illuminate larger conceptual concerns.

Let's read Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" and then read two analytical essays written by first-year students. These two papers offer very different interpretations of the same poem, allowing you to see how one student's interpretation of a poem can lead to emphasizing concepts and evidence that differ greatly from another student's insights.

Robert Frost

For biographical information on Robert Frost, see page 246.

Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening



Whose woods these are I think I know.
His house is in the village though;
He will not see me stopping here
To watch his woods fill up with snow.

My little horse must think it queer
To stop without a farmhouse near
Between the woods and frozen lake
The darkest evening of the year.

He gives his harness bells a shake
To ask if there is some mistake.
The only other sound's the sweep
Of easy wind and downy flake.

The woods are lovely, dark and deep.
But I have promises to keep,
And miles to go before I sleep,
And miles to go before I sleep.

[1923]

Manuscript version of Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening." The first part is lost.

Student Analytical Essay: "Stopping by Woods—and Going On"

Let's turn to our first analytical essay on Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening." This student, Darrel Jenkins, selects specific evidence to support his unique interpretation of the poem. See if you agree with his assessment of the poem's narrator.

Darrel Jenkins
Professor Conner
English 1102
21 December 2016

Stopping by Woods—and Going On

Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" is about what the title says it is. It is also about something more than the title says.

When I say it is about what the title says, I mean that the poem really does give us the thoughts of a person who pauses (that is, a person who is "stopping") by woods on a snowy evening. (This person probably is a man, since Robert Frost wrote the poem and nothing in the poem clearly indicates that the speaker is not a man. But, and this point will be important, the speaker perhaps feels that he is not a very masculine man. For example, the speaker uses the word "lovely," which sounds more like the word a woman would use than a man.) In line 3 the speaker says he is "stopping here," and it is clear that "here" is by woods, since "woods" is mentioned not only in the title but also in the first line of the poem, and again in the second stanza, and still again in the last stanza. It is equally clear that, as the title says, there is snow, and that the time is evening. The speaker mentions "snow" (4), and "downy flake" (12), and "downy flake", and he says this is "The darkest evening of the year" (8).

But in what sense is the poem about more than the title? The title does not tell us anything about the man who is "stopping by woods," but the poem—the man's meditation—tells us a lot about him. In the first stanza he reveals that he is uneasy at the thought that the owner of the woods may see him stopping by the woods. Maybe he is uneasy because he is trespassing, but the poem does not actually say that he has illegally entered someone else's property. More likely, he feels uneasy, almost ashamed, of watching the "woods fill up with snow" (4). That is, he would not want anyone to see that he actually is enjoying a beautiful aspect of nature and is not hurrying about whatever his real business is in thrifty Yankee style.

The second stanza gives more evidence that he feels guilty about enjoying beauty. He feels so guilty that he even thinks the horse thinks there is something odd about him. In fact, he says that the horse thinks he is "queer" (5), which means "odd," but also (as is shown by The American Heritage Dictionary) can mean "gay," "homosexual." A traditional man, he sort of suggests, would not spend time looking at snow in the woods when he has work to attend to.

So far, then, the speaker in two ways has indicated that he feels insecure, though perhaps he does not realize that he has given himself away. First, he expresses uneasiness that someone might see him watching the woods fill up with snow. Second, he expresses uneasiness when he suggests that even the horse thinks he is strange or different, or at least unbusinesslike. And so in the last stanza, even though he finds the woods beautiful, he decides not to stop and to see the woods fill up with snow. And his description of the woods as "lovely" (13).—a woman's word—sounds as though he may be something less than a he-man. He seems to feel ashamed of himself for enjoying the sight of the snowy woods and for seeing them as "lovely," and so he tells himself that he has spent enough time looking at the woods and that he must go on about his business. In fact, he tells himself twice that he has business to attend to. Why? Perhaps he is insisting too much. Just as we saw that he was excessively nervous in the first stanza, afraid that someone might see him trespassing and enjoying the beautiful spectacle, now at the end he is again afraid that someone might see him loitering, and so he very firmly, using repetition as a form of emphasis, tries to reassure himself that he is not too much attracted by beauty and is a man of business who keeps his promises.

Jenkins 3

Frost gives us, then, a man who indeed is seen "stopping by woods on a snowy evening," but a man who, afraid of what society will think of him, is also afraid to "stop" long enough to fully enjoy the sight that attracts him, because he is driven by a sense that he may be seen to be trespassing and also may be thought to be unmanly. So after only a brief stop in the woods he forces himself to go on, a victim (though he probably doesn't know it) of the work ethic and of an over-simple idea of manliness.

[New page]

Jenkins 4

Work Cited

Frost, Robert. "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 269-70. Print.

Analyzing the Analytical Essay's Development of a Conceptual Interpretation

Let's examine this essay.

The title is interesting. It tells the reader which literary work will be discussed ("Stopping by Woods"), and it arouses interest, in this case by a sort of wordplay ("Stopping . . . Going On"). A title of this sort is preferable to a title that merely announces the topic, such as "An Analysis of Frost's 'Stopping by Woods'" or "On a Poem by Robert Frost."

The opening paragraph helpfully names the exact topic (Robert Frost's poem) and says that the poem is about something more than its title. The writer's thesis presumably will be a fairly specific assertion concerning what the poem is about.

The body of the essay, beginning with the second paragraph, begins to develop the thesis. The thesis perhaps can be summarized: "The speaker, insecure of his masculinity, feels ashamed that he responds with pleasure to the sight of the snowy woods." The thesis introduces the key concept of masculinity. This is Darrel's insight into the poem: that it addresses insecurities and, more specifically, insecurities about what constitutes manly thoughts and businesslike behavior. The writer's evidence in the second paragraph is that the word "lovely" is "more like the word a woman would use than a man." Readers of Darrel's essay may at this point be unconvinced by this evidence, but probably they will suspend judgment. In any case, he has offered what he considers to be evidence in support of his thesis.

The next paragraph dwells on what is said to be the speaker's uneasiness, and the following paragraph references the word "queer," which, Darrel correctly says, can mean "gay, homosexual." The question of course is whether here, in this poem, the word has this meaning. Do we agree with Darrel's assertion, in the last sentence of this paragraph, that Frost is suggesting that "A traditional man . . . wouldn't spend time looking at snow in the woods"?

Clearly, this is the way Darrel takes the poem, but is his response to these lines reasonable? After all, what Frost says is this: "My little horse must think it queer / To stop without a farmhouse near." Is it reasonable to see a reference to homosexuality (rather than merely to oddness) in this use of the word "queer"? Hasn't Darrel offered a response that, so to speak, is private? It is his response, but are we likely to share it and to agree that we see it in Frost's poem?

The next paragraph, amplifying the point that the speaker is insecure, offers as evidence the argument that "lovely" is more often a woman's word than a man's word. What do you think of Darrel's assertions that the speaker of the poem "was excessively nervous in the first stanza" and is now "afraid that someone might see him loitering"? In your opinion, does the text lend much support to Darrel's view?

The concluding paragraph effectively reasserts and clarifies Darrel's thesis, saying that the speaker hesitates to stop and enjoy the woods because "he is driven by a sense that he may be seen to be trespassing and also may be thought to be unmanly."

The big questions, then, are these:

- Is the thesis argued rather than merely asserted, and
- Is it argued convincingly?

Or, to put it another way,

- Is the evidence adequate?

Darrel certainly does argue (offer reasons) rather than merely assert, but does he offer enough evidence to make you think that his response is one that you can share? Do you think that he is correct to have positioned the concept of masculinity as central to the poem and to, more specifically, emphasized anxieties about masculinity? Has he helped you to enjoy the poem by seeing things that you may not have noticed, or has he said things that, however interesting, seem to you not to be in close contact with the poem as you see it?

Student Analytical Essay: "'Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening' as a Short Story"

Here is another interpretation of the same poem. In this paper, Sara Fong demonstrates how a poem can lead to differing interpretations by exploring two understandings of this one poem. Let's see what concepts this paper emphasizes.

Sara Fong
Professor Patel
English 102
3 December 2016

"Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" as a Short Story

Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" can be read as a poem about a man who pauses to observe the beauty of nature, and it can also be read as a poem about a man with a death wish, a man who seems to long to give himself up completely to nature and thus escape his responsibilities as a citizen. Much depends, apparently, on what a reader wants to emphasize. For instance, a reader can emphasize especially appealing lines about the beauty of nature: "The only other sound's the sweep / Of easy wind and downy flake" (11–12), and "The woods are lovely, dark and deep" (13). On the other hand, a reader can emphasize lines that show the speaker is fully aware of the responsibilities that most of us agree we have.

For instance, at the very start of the poem he recognizes that the woods are not his but are owned by someone else, and at the end of the poem he recognizes that he has "promises to keep" (14) and that before he sleeps (dies?) he must accomplish many things (go for "miles" [15]).

Does a reader have to choose between these two interpretations? I do not think so; to the contrary, I think it makes sense to read the poem as a kind of very short story, with a character whose developing thoughts make up a plot with four stages. In the first stage, the central figure is an ordinary person with rather ordinary thoughts. His very first thought is of the owner of the woods. He knows who the owner is, and since the owner lives in the village, the poet feels safe in trespassing, or at least in watching the woods "fill up with snow" (4). Then, very subtly, the poet begins to tell us that although this seems to be an ordinary person thinking ordinary thoughts, he is a somewhat special person in a special situation. First of all, the horse thinks something is strange. He shakes his bells, wondering why the driver doesn't keep moving, as presumably ordinary drivers would. Second, we are told that this is "The darkest evening of the year" (8). Frost could simply have said that the evening is dark, but he goes out of his way to make the evening a special evening.

We are now through with the first ten lines, and only six lines remain, yet in these six lines the story goes through two additional phases. The first three of these lines ("The only other sound's the sweep / Of easy wind and downy flake" [12] and "The woods are lovely, dark and deep" [13]) are probably the most beautiful lines, in the sense that they are the ones that make us say, "I wish I were there," or "I'd love to experience this." We feel that the poet has moved from the ordinary thoughts of the first stanza, about such businesslike things as who owns the woods and where the owner's house is, to less materialistic thoughts, thoughts about the beauty of the nonhuman world of nature. And now, with the three final lines, we get the fourth stage of the story, the return to the ordinary world of people, the world of "promises" (14). But this world that we get at the end is not exactly the same as the world we got at the beginning. The world at the beginning of the poem is a world of property (who owns the woods, and where the house is), but the world at the end of the poem is a world of unspecified and rather mysterious responsibilities ("promises to keep" [14], "miles to go before I sleep" [16]). It is almost as though the poet's experience of the beauty of nature—a beauty that for a moment made him forget the world of property—has in fact served to sharpen his sense that human beings have responsibilities. He clearly sees that "The woods are lovely, dark and deep" (13). and then he says (I add the italics), "But I have promises to keep" (14). The "but" would be logical if after saying that the woods are lovely, dark and deep, he had said something like "But in the daylight they look different," or "But one can freeze to death in them." The logic of what Frost says, however, is not at all clear: "The woods are lovely, dark and deep, / But I have promises to keep" (13–14). What is the logical connection? We have to supply one, something like "but, because we are human beings we have responsibilities; we can refresh ourselves by perceiving the beauties of nature, and we can even for a moment get so caught up that we seem to enter an enchanted forest ('the woods are lovely, dark and deep'), but we cannot forget our responsibilities."

My point is not that Frost ends with an important moral, and it is also not that we have to choose between saying it is a poem about nature or a poem about a man with a death wish. Rather, my point is that the poem takes us through several stages and that, although the poem begins and ends with the speaker in the woods, the speaker has undergone mental experiences—has, we might say, gone through a plot with a conflict (the appeal of the snowy woods versus the call to return to the human world). It is not a matter of good versus evil and of one side winning. Frost in no way suggests that it is wrong to feel the beauty of nature—even to the momentary exclusion of all other thoughts. But the poem is certainly not simply a praise of the beauty of nature. Frost shows us, in this mini-story or mini-drama, one character who sees the woods as property, then sees them as a place of almost overwhelming beauty, and then (maybe refreshed by this experience) rejoins the world of chores and responsibilities.

[New page]

Work Cited

Frost, Robert. "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 269-70. Print.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is the thesis of the essay? The thesis seems to support two interpretations. Is this successful?
2. How is Sara's essay organized? How does the essay introduce and develop the concepts of nature and the concept of responsibility?
3. Does Sara offer convincing evidence to support her thesis?
4. How would you compare Sara's essay to Darrel's essay? Which interpretation do you find more convincing? Which interpretation do you find more original and thought provoking?
5. Compare the evidence given by both Sara and Darrel. For example, they both quote the narrator watching the woods "fill up with snow" and the description of the woods as "lovely, dark, and deep," but they create different arguments based on that evidence. How is this possible?

Strategy #4: Pushing Analysis through Revision

The writing process emphasizes revision as a way of improving your analytical ideas and your writing style. Writing encourages the discovery of new ideas; when we write, a "light bulb" will often go off in our head, and we suddenly gain a new insight. Revision should be seen as, first, a strategy used to continue this process of creating and shaping ideas, and second, a strategy used to improve the presentation of those ideas through correct writing. Make sure to use revision to improve your interpretation and develop your analysis.

Revising for Ideas versus Mechanics

Revision starts when you draft a paper, put it aside, and then return to it with a fresh perspective. Revision asks you to reread your own writing with a critical eye: What are the strengths and weaknesses of your paper? Using this self-critique, you then redraft the paper, reworking existing writing and adding new writing. As you revise your paper, it might be helpful for you to think of yourself as taking on two roles: thinker and editor.

Critique your draft as a thinker first. Make sure that your ideas are insightful, well developed, and supported by evidence. What are your best ideas? What are your weakest ideas? What ideas need more development? What ideas need more evidence? After you feel that your ideas are your best ideas, make sure that you show them off with a clear presentation. Are your concepts clearly defined, and do they follow a logical sequence?

After you have revised your paper for its ideas, then turn to writing mechanics. Take on the role of editor, and work on the correctness of your writing. Are your sentences grammatically correct? Are you choosing the best words to convey your ideas? Are you using an academic style?

Revising Using Instructor Feedback, Peer Feedback, and Self-Critique

Your instructor may ask you to turn in your paper's first draft and give you feedback on that draft. If your instructor gives you written comments, make sure that you understand the critique being offered and know how to use those comments in order to make changes to your paper. As you analyze your instructor's comments, consider how they can be applied to the paper as a whole: How can a comment written in the margins of one paragraph be used to strengthen ideas in other sections? If your instructor is not giving you feedback on this specific paper, you should look back at earlier papers, read the instructor's comments on those papers, and apply his or her comments to this new paper. See your instructor's comments as encouraging a dialogue about your writing; if you do not understand your instructor's comments, make an appointment to discuss them.

As part of the revision process, your class might include a peer workshop session that asks your classmates to provide feedback on your writing. Your classmates' reactions will indicate the parts of the paper that they found interesting and the parts that they found unclear, helping you to locate your paper's strengths and weakness. Again, consider the "thinker" and "editor" stages of revision: Try to distinguish between comments that will help you improve your ideas and comments that will help you correct your writing style.

Much of your revision will rely on your ability to engage in self-criticism. Work on developing ways to distance yourself from your own writing so that you can read it critically. Ensure critical reading by printing your paper out and reading the entire draft with a pencil in hand, annotating it as you would a literary work. This will ensure that you read your paper critically, and do not interrupt that self-criticism with typing, which will happen if you read your paper on the computer screen rather than from a printout.

Examining a Preliminary Draft with Revision in Mind

An early draft of a paper typically captures the writer's ideas in a rough form, which then will be revised and improved. Let's read the short story "Saboteur" by Ha Jin and then read a preliminary draft of an analysis of the story by a student in a composition course. The paper assignment asks for an analysis of approximately seven pages. How can a writer generate enough ideas to fill that many pages? The student, Owen Monroe, uses the revision process to deepen his thinking and to expand the ideas presented in his first draft. His final draft is also provided, allowing us to explore how he develops his ideas.

As we consider the revision process, let's review the essay's essential parts, which become the goals of revision.

An analytic essay's basic components include:

- a clear central argument or thesis,
- a sense of ideas becoming deeper or richer as the paper progresses,
- the use of evidence—specific details and quotations—from the literary work,
- a series of well-organized paragraphs that sequentially develop the thesis, and
- the presentation of original insights in the writer's voice and in a clear, correct writing style.

The revision process can include making large-scale changes, such as redefining the paper's central idea or rearranging the order of paragraphs, and small-scale changes, such as improving word choice. It is best to work on the level of ideas first and to save working on such issues as grammatical correctness for a final step. Let's look at Owen's first draft, noting ideas that he could develop further. We can then examine what ideas he chose to expand in his revised draft.

Ha Jin

Ha Jin is the pseudonym taken by Xuefei Jin, who was born in China in 1945. Once his military service had ended, he studied the English language and then focused on English literature in his undergraduate and graduate work in Chinese universities. He came to the United States in the mid-1980s to attend graduate school at Brandeis University, and later he did advanced work in creative writing at Boston University. Ha Jin has published two books of poetry, three novels, and several collections of short stories, including Ocean of Words (1996) and Under the Red Flag (1997). He is a professor in the English department at Boston University.

Saboteur

Mr. Chiu and his bride were having lunch in the square before Muji Train Station. On the table between them were two bottles of soda spewing out brown foam and two paper boxes of rice and sauteed cucumber and pork. "Let's eat," he said to her, and broke the connected ends of the chopsticks. He picked up a slice of streaky pork and put it into his mouth. As he was chewing, a few crinkles appeared on his thin jaw.

To his right, at another table, two railroad policemen were drinking tea and laughing; it seemed that the stout, middle-aged man was telling a joke to his young comrade, who was tall and of athletic build. Now and again they would steal a glance at Mr. Chiu's table.

The air smelled of rotten melon. A few flies kept buzzing above the couple's lunch. Hundreds of people were rushing around to get on the platform or to catch buses to downtown. Food and fruit vendors were crying for customers in lazy voices. About a dozen young women, representing the local hotels, held up placards which displayed the daily prices and words as large as a palm, like FREE MEALS, AIR-CONDITIONING, and ON THE RIVER. In the center of the square stood a concrete statue of Chairman Mao, at whose feet peasants were napping, their backs on the warm granite and their faces toward the sunny sky. A flock of pigeons perched on the Chairman's raised hand and forearm.

The rice and cucumber tasted good, and Mr. Chiu was eating unhurriedly. His sallow face showed exhaustion. He was glad that the honeymoon was finally over and that he and his bride were heading back for Harbin. During the two weeks' vacation, he had been worried about his liver, because three months ago he had suffered from acute hepatitis; he was afraid he might have a relapse. But he had had no severe symptoms, despite his liver being still big and tender. On the whole he was pleased with his health, which could endure even the strain of a honeymoon; indeed, he was on the course of recovery. He looked at his bride, who took off her wire glasses, kneading the root of her nose with her fingertips. Beads of sweat coated her pale cheeks.

"Are you all right, sweetheart?" he asked.

"I have a headache. I didn't sleep well last night."

"Take an aspirin, will you?"

"It's not that serious. Tomorrow is Sunday and I can sleep in. Don't worry."

As they were talking, the stout policeman at the next table stood up and threw a bowl of tea in their direction. Both Mr. Chiu's and his bride's sandals were wet instantly.

"Hooligan!" she said in a low voice.

Mr. Chiu got to his feet and said out loud, "Comrade Policeman, why did you do this?" He stretched out his right foot to show the wet sandal.

"Do what?" the stout man asked huskily, glaring at Mr. Chiu while the young fellow was whistling.

"See, you dumped tea on our feet."

"You're lying, You wet your shoes yourself."

"Comrade Policeman, your duty is to keep order, but you purposely tortured us common citizens. Why violate the law you are supposed to enforce?" As Mr. Chiu was speaking, dozens of people began gathering around.

With a wave of his hand, the man said to the young fellow, "Let's get hold of him!"

They grabbed Mr. Chiu and clamped handcuffs around his wrists. He cried, "You can't do this to me. This is utterly unreasonable."

"Shut up!" The man pulled out his pistol. "You can use your tongue at our headquarters."

The young fellow added, "You're a saboteur, you know that? You're disrupting public order."

The bride was too petrified to say anything coherent. She was a recent college graduate, had majored in fine arts, and had never seen the police make an arrest. All she could say was, "Oh, please, please!"

The policemen were pulling Mr. Chiu, but he refused to go with them, holding the corner of the table and shouting, "We have a train to catch. We already bought the tickets."

The stout man punched him in the chest, "Shut up. Let your ticket expire." With the pistol butt he chopped Mr. Chiu's hands, which at once released the table. Together the two men were dragging him away to the police station.

Realizing he had to go with them, Mr. Chiu turned his head and shouted to his bride, "Don't wait for me here. Take the train. If I'm not back by tomorrow morning, send someone over to get me out."

She nodded, covering her sobbing mouth with her palm.

* * * *

After removing his belt, they locked Mr. Chiu into a cell in the back of the Railroad Police Station. The single window in the room was blocked by six steel bars; it faced a spacious yard, in which stood a few pines. Beyond the trees, two swings hung from an iron frame, swaying gently in the breeze. Somewhere in the building a cleaver was chopping rhythmically. There must be a kitchen upstairs, Mr. Chiu thought.

He was too exhausted to worry about what they would do to him, so he lay down on the narrow bed and shut his eyes. He wasn't afraid. The Cultural Revolution was over already, and recently the Party had been propagating the idea that all citizens were equal before the law. The police ought to be a law-abiding model for common people. As long as he remained coolheaded and reasoned with them, they probably wouldn't harm him.

Late in the afternoon he was taken to the Interrogation Bureau on the second floor. On his way there, in the stairwell, he ran into the middle-aged policeman who had manhandled him. The man grinned, rolling his bulgy eyes and pointing his fingers at him as if firing a pistol. Egg of a tortoise! Mr. Chiu cursed mentally.

The moment he sat down in the office, he burped, his palm shielding his mouth. In front of him, across a long desk, sat the chief of the bureau and a donkey-faced man. On the glass desktop was a folder containing information on his case. He felt it bizarre that in just a matter of hours they had accumulated a small pile of writing about him. On second thought he began to wonder whether they had kept a file on him all the time. How could this have happened? He lived and worked in Harbin, more than three hundred miles away, and this was his first time in Muji City.

The chief of the bureau was a thin, bald man who looked serene and intelligent. His slim hands handled the written pages in the folder in the manner of a lecturing scholar. To Mr. Chiu's left sat a young scribe, with a clipboard on his knee and a black fountain pen in his hand.

"Your name?" the chief asked, apparently reading out the question from a form.

"Chiu Maguang."

"Age?"

"Thirty-four."

"Profession?"

"Lecturer."

"Work unit?"

"Harbin University."

"Political status?"

"Communist Party member."

The chief put down the paper and began to speak. "Your crime is sabotage, although it hasn't induced serious consequences yet. Because you are a Party member, you should be punished more. You have failed to be a model for the masses and you—"

"Excuse me, sir," Mr. Chiu cut him off.

"What?"

"I didn't do anything. Your men are the saboteurs of our social order. They threw hot tea on my feet and on my wife's feet. Logically speaking, you should criticize them, if not punish them."

"That statement is groundless. You have no witness. Why should I believe you?" the chief said matter-of-factly.

"This is my evidence." He raised his right hand. "Your man hit my fingers with a pistol."

"That doesn't prove how your feet got wet. Besides, you could have hurt your fingers yourself."

"But I am telling the truth!" Anger flared up in Mr. Chiu. "Your police station owes me an apology. My train ticket has expired, my new leather sandals are ruined, and I am late for a conference in the provincial capital. You must compensate me for the damage and losses. Don't mistake me for a common citizen who would tremble when you sneeze. I'm a scholar, a philosopher, and an expert in dialectical materialism. If necessary, we will argue about this in The Northeastern Daily, or we will go to the highest People's Court in Beijing. Tell me, what's your name?" He got carried away with his harangue, which was by no means trivial and had worked to his advantage on numerous occasions.

"Stop bluffing us," the donkey-faced man broke in. "We have seen a lot of your kind. We can easily prove you are guilty. Here are some of the statements given by eyewitnesses." He pushed a few sheets of paper toward Mr. Chiu.

Mr. Chiu was dazed to see the different handwritings, which all stated that he had shouted in the square to attract attention and refused to obey the police. One of the witnesses had identified herself as a purchasing agent from a shipyard in Shanghai. Something stirred in Mr. Chiu's stomach, a pain rising to his rib. He gave out a faint moan.

"Now you have to admit you are guilty," the chief said. "Although it's a serious crime, we won't punish you severely, provided you write out a self-criticism and promise that you won't disrupt the public order again. In other words, your release will depend on your attitude toward this crime."

"You're daydreaming," Mr. Chiu cried. "I won't write a word, because I'm innocent. I demand that you provide me with a letter of apology so I can explain to my university why I'm late."

Both the interrogators smiled contemptuously. "Well, we've never done that," said the chief, taking a puff at his cigarette.

"Then make this a precedent."

"That's unnecessary. We are pretty certain that you will comply with our wishes." The chief blew a column of smoke toward Mr. Chiu's face.

At the tilt of the chief's head, two guards stepped forward and grabbed the criminal by the arms. Mr. Chiu meanwhile went on saying, "I shall report you to the Provincial Administration. You'll have to pay for this! You are worse than the Japanese military police."

They dragged him out of the room.

* * * *

After dinner, which consisted of a bowl of millet porridge, a corn bun, and a piece of pickled turnip, Mr. Chiu began to have a fever, shaking with a chill and sweating profusely. He knew that the fire of anger had gotten into his liver and that he was probably having a relapse. No medicine was available, because his briefcase had been left with his bride. At home it would have been time for him to sit in front of their color TV, drinking jasmine tea and watching the evening news. It was so lonesome in here. The orange bulb above the single bed was the only source of light, which enabled the guards to keep him under surveillance at night. A moment ago he had asked them for a newspaper or a magazine to read, but they turned him down.

Through the small opening on the door noises came in. It seemed that the police on duty were playing cards or chess in a nearby office; shouts and laughter could be heard now and then. Meanwhile, an accordion kept coughing from a remote corner in the building. Looking at the ballpoint and the letter paper left for him by the guards when they took him back from the Interrogation Bureau, Mr. Chiu remembered the old saying, "When a scholar runs into soldiers, the more he argues, the muddier his point becomes." How ridiculous this whole thing was. He ruffled his thick hair with his fingers.

He felt miserable, massaging his stomach continually. To tell the truth, he was more upset than frightened, because he would have to catch up with his work once he was back home—a paper that was due at the printers next week, and two dozen books he ought to read for the courses he was going to teach in the fall.

A human shadow flitted across the opening. Mr. Chiu rushed to the door and shouted through the hole, "Comrade Guard, Comrade Guard!"

"What do you want?" a voice rasped.

"I want you to inform your leaders that I'm very sick. I have heart disease and hepatitis. I may die here if you keep me like this without medication."

"No leader is on duty on the weekend. You have to wait till Monday."

"What? You mean I'll stay in here tomorrow?"

"Yes."

"Your station will be held responsible if anything happens to me."

"We know that. Take it easy, you won't die."

It seemed illogical that Mr. Chiu slept quite well that night, though the light above his head had been on all the time and the straw mattress was hard and infested with fleas. He was afraid of ticks, mosquitoes, cockroaches—any kind of insect but fleas and bedbugs. Once, in the countryside, where his school's faculty and staff had helped the peasants harvest crops for a week, his colleagues had joked about his flesh, which they said must have tasted nonhuman to fleas. Except for him, they were all afflicted with hundreds of bites.

More amazing now, he didn't miss his bride a lot. He even enjoyed sleeping alone, perhaps because the honeymoon had tired him out and he needed more rest.

70 The backyard was quiet on Sunday morning. Pale sunlight streamed through the pine branches. A few sparrows were jumping on the ground, catching caterpillars and ladybugs. Holding the steel bars, Mr. Chiu inhaled the morning air, which smelled meaty. There must have been an eatery or a cooked-meat stand nearby. He reminded himself that he should take this detention with case. A sentence that Chairman Mao had written to a hospitalized friend rose in his mind: "Since you are already in here, you may as well stay and make the best of it."

His desire for peace of mind originated in his fear that his hepatitis might get worse. He tried to remain unperturbed. However, he was sure that his liver was swelling up, since the fever still persisted. For a whole day he lay in bed, thinking about his paper on the nature of contradictions. Time and again he was overwhelmed by anger, cursing aloud, "A bunch of thugs!" He swore that once he was out, he would write an article about this experience. He had better find out some of the policemen's names.

It turned out to be a restful day for the most part; he was certain that his university would send somebody to his rescue. All he should do now was remain calm and wait patiently. Sooner or later the police would have to release him, although they had no idea that he might refuse to leave unless they wrote him an apology. Damn those hoodlums, they had ordered more than they could eat!

* * * *

When he woke up on Monday morning, it was already light. Somewhere a man was moaning; the sound came from the backyard. After a long yawn, and kicking off the tattered blanket, Mr. Chiu climbed out of bed and went to the window. In the middle of the yard, a young man was fastened to a pine, his wrists handcuffed around the trunk from behind He was wriggling and swearing loudly, but there was no sight of anyone else in the yard. He looked familiar to Mr. Chiu.

Mr. Chiu squinted his eyes to see who it was. To his astonishment, he recognized the man, who was Fenjin, a recent graduate from the Law Department at Harbin University. Two years ago Mr. Chiu had taught a course in Marxist materialism, in which Fenjin had enrolled. Now, how on earth had this young devil landed here?

75 Then it dawned on him that Fenjin must have been sent over by his bride. What a stupid woman! A hookworm, who only knew how to read foreign novels! He had expected that she would contact the school's Security Section, which would for sure send a cadre here. Fenjin held no official position; he merely worked in a private law firm that had just two lawyers; in fact, they had little business except for some detective work for men and women who suspected their spouses of having extramarital affairs. Mr. Chiu was overcome with a wave of nausea.

Should he call out to let his student know he was nearby? He decided not to, because he didn't know what had happened. Fenjin must have quarreled with the police to incur such a punishment. Yet this could never have occurred if Fenjin hadn't come to his rescue. So no matter what, Mr. Chiu had to do something. But what could he do?

It was going to be a scorcher. He could see purple steam shimmering and rising from the ground among the pines. Poor devil, he thought, as he raised a bowl of corn glue to his mouth, sipped, and took a bite of a piece of salted celery.

When a guard came to collect the bowl and the chopsticks, Mr. Chiu asked him what had happened to the man in the backyard. "He called our boss 'bandit,'" the guard said. "He claimed he was a lawyer or something. An arrogant son of a rabbit."

Now it was obvious to Mr. Chiu that he had to do something to help his rescuer. Before he could figure out a way, a scream broke out in the backyard. He rushed to the window and saw a tall policeman standing before Fenjin, an iron bucket on the ground. It was the same young fellow who had arrested Mr. Chiu in the square two days before. The man pinched Fenjin's nose, then raised his hand, which stayed in the air for a few seconds, then slapped the lawyer across the face. As Fenjin was groaning, the man lifted up the bucket and poured water on his head.

"This will keep you from getting sunstroke, boy. I'll give you some more every hour," the man said loudly.

Fenjin kept his eyes shut, yet his wry face showed that he was struggling to hold back from cursing the policeman, or, more likely, that he was sobbing in silence. He sneezed, then raised his face and shouted, "Let me go take a piss."

"Oh yeah?" the man bawled. "Pee in your pants."

Still Mr, Chiu didn't make any noise, gripping the steel bars with both hands, his fingers white. The policeman turned and glanced at the cell's window; his pistol, partly bolstered, glittered in the sun. With a snort he spat his cigarette butt to the ground and stamped it into the dust.

Then the door opened and the guards motioned Mr. Chiu to come out. Again they took him upstairs to the Interrogation Bureau.

The same men were in the office, though this time the scribe was sitting there empty-handed. At the sight of Mr. Chiu the chief said, "Ah, here you are. Please be seated."

After Mr. Chiu sat down, the chief waved a white silk fan and said to him, "You may have seen your lawyer. He's a young man without manners, so our director had him taught a crash course in the backyard."

"It's illegal to do that. Aren't you afraid to appear in a newspaper?"

"No, we are not, not even on TV. What else can you do? We are not afraid of any story you make up. We call it fiction. What we do care about is that you cooperate with us. That is to say, you must admit your crime."

"What if I refuse to cooperate?"

"Then your lawyer will continue his education in the sunshine."

A swoon swayed Mr. Chiu, and he held the arms of the chair to steady himself. A numb pain stung him in the upper stomach and nauseated him, and his head was throbbing. He was sure that the hepatitis was finally attacking him. Anger was flaming up in his chest; his throat was tight and clogged.

The chief resumed, "As a matter of fact, you don't even have to write out your self-criticism. We have your crime described clearly here. All we need is your signature."

Holding back his rage, Mr. Chiu said, "Let me look at that."

With a smirk the donkey-faced man handed him a sheet, which carried words:

I hereby admit that on July 13 I disrupted public order at Muji Train Station, and that I refused to listen to reason when the railroad police issued their warning. Thus I myself am responsible for my arrest. After two days' detention, I have realized the reactionary nature of my crime. From now on, I shall continue to educate myself with all my effort and shall never commit this kind of crime again.

A voice started screaming in Mr. Chiu's ears, "Lie, lie!" But he shook his head and forced the voice away. He asked the chief, "If I sign this, will you release both my lawyer and me?"

"Of course, we'll do that." The chief was drumming his fingers on the blue folder—their file on him,

Mr. Chiu signed his name and put his thumbprint under his signature.

"Now you are free to go," the chief said with a smile, and handed him a piece of paper to wipe his thumb with.

Mr. Chiu was so sick that he couldn't stand up from the chair at first try. Then he doubled his effort and rose to his feet. He staggered out of the building to meet his lawyer in the backyard, having forgotten to ask for his belt back. In his chest he felt as though there were a bomb. If he were able to, he would have razed the entire police station and eliminated all their families. Though he knew he could do nothing like that, he made up his mind to do something.

* * * *

"I'm sorry about this torture, Fenjin," Mr. Chiu said when they met.

"It doesn't matter. They are savages." The lawyer brushed a patch of dirt off his jacket with trembling fingers. Water was still dribbling from the bottoms of his trouser legs.

"Let's go now," the teacher said.

The moment they came out of the police station, Mr. Chiu caught sight of a tea stand. He grabbed Fenjin's arm and walked over to the old woman at the table. "Two bowls of black tea," he said and banded her a one-yuan note.

After the first bowl, they each had another one. Then they set out for the train station. But before they walked fifty yards, Mr. Chiu insisted on eating a bowl of tree-ear soup at a food stand. Fenjin agreed. He told his teacher, "You mustn't treat me like a guest."

"No, I want to eat something myself."

As if dying of hunger, Mr. Chiu dragged his lawyer from restaurant to restaurant near the police station, but at each place he ordered no more than two bowls of food. Fenjin wondered why his teacher wouldn't stay at one place and eat his fill.

Mr. Chiu bought noodles, wonton, eight-grain porridge, and chicken soup, respectively, at four restaurants. While eating, he kept saying through his teeth. "If only I could kill all the bastards!" At the last place he merely took a few sips of the soup without tasting the chicken cubes and mushrooms.

Fenjin was baffled by his teacher, who looked ferocious and muttered to himself mysteriously, and whose jaundiced face was covered with dark puckers. For the first time Fenjin thought of Mr. Chiu as an ugly man.

* * * *

Within a month over eight hundred people contracted acute hepatitis in Muji. Six died of the disease, including two children. Nobody knew how the epidemic had started.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Reread the ending of this story, and then write a paraphrase of it. What happens in the last two lines of the story? Why did it happen?
2. What does the title of the story mean? What is a saboteur? Look up a dictionary definition of the word. After you analyze the ending of the story, how would you explain the title of the story?
3. What is the "crime" that Mr. Chiu commits at the beginning of the story? What makes the arrest unfair? How does the context of the arrest, such as the fact that Mr. Chiu is on his honeymoon, make the arrest seem particularly unjust? Is Ha Jin offering a critique of Chinese society? As depicted in this story, what elements of Chinese society seem most problematic?
4. How does Ha Jin convey Mr. Chiu's worsening health? Annotate the story, noting particularly vivid sentences that capture Mr. Chiu's physical state. Do these descriptions start to have an impact on you as a reader? Do the descriptions make you feel the illness?
5. Who is Fenjin? What role does he play in the story?
6. Why does Mr. Chiu sign the confession? What causes him to give in to the pressure of the police? Does he compromise his principles by signing the confession?

Student Analytical Essay: "Morals in Ha Jin's 'Saboteur'" (Preliminary Draft)

Ha Jin's short story "Saboteur" tells a story of revenge. The story questions if that revenge is morally correct. The story details the unfair arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Chui and, later, his lawyer-student, Fenjin. Mr. Chui confesses to the "crime" of disrupting public order, and is then released. After being released from the prison in Muji, Mr. Chui purposely eats at several food stands, infecting the dishes with the hepatitis disease he is carrying. At the end of the story, his revenge is complete: eight hundred people in Muji have contracted hepatitis and six people have died. The story asks its readers to judge Mr. Chui as an individual and to decide if his revenge is morally right or wrong.

"Saboteur" explores the individual, asking us to judge the individual's moral actions. The short story's third-person narrator focuses on Mr. Chui as the protagonist, keeping him at the center of the story and making him a sympathetic character. He represents the idea of the individual faced with a moral challenge. When he returns from his honeymoon, Mr. Chui is filled with "exhaustion," is feeling "worried," and has just gotten over a serious hepatitis attack. A restful lunch with his wife is interrupted when a policeman throws a bowl of tea at their feet; when Mr. Chui questions their actions, he is arrested for disturbing the peace.

"Saboteur" develops the idea of the individual by showing that Mr. Chui's individual rights are abused. Mr. Chui's is treated unfairly when he is locked in jail and forced to sign a confession to his "crime" of disrupting society, a crime he did not commit. The police chief demands that Mr. Chui confess, saying, "Now you have to admit you are guilty. Although it's a serious crime, we won't punish you severely, provided you write out a self-criticism and promise that you won't disrupt the public order again" (283). The story presents Mr. Chui as a person of integrity. At first, he maintains his innocence and demands an apology. Then, he becomes increasingly sick and feverish due to his hepatitis. However, even though he is in this physical pain, he still defends his innocence. The narrator presents a complex picture of the individual, showing how Mr. Chui's external actions must reveal his internal beliefs. Fenjin comes to help Mr. Chui and is physically abused after being handcuffed to a tree. Mr. Chui feels "Anger was flaming up in his chest; his throat was tight and clogged" (285). The police manipulate Mr. Chui, telling him that they will release Fenjin only if Mr. Chui signs a confession. Mr. Chui decides to sign the confession, even though it goes against everything he believes. The narrator describes Mr. Chui's internal struggle as he decides to go against his beliefs: "A voice started screaming in Mr. Chui's ears, "lie, lie!" Mr. Chui is willing to go against his beliefs for the higher purpose of saving his lawyer-student from physical abuse.

Although Mr. Chui has been mistreated and been forced to go against his principles, our sympathy for Mr. Chui is soon tested by his act of revenge. Immediately after signing the confession paper, Mr. Chui decides on revenge, thinking that he would tear down the police department and kills their families, but he immediately admits he can't do that. We know Mr. Chui has been wronged.

We are so sympathetic to Mr. Chui as an individual that we want him to have some sort of revenge against the police: he has used his hepatitis, which was triggered by the police, to seek revenge on the city.

Because the story focuses on Mr. Chui, it is easy to see the story as most concerned with the individual. The story shows an "individual vs. society" theme: Mr. Chui has been mistreated by society and, as an individual, he needs revenge or at least to find some justice. Because Mr. Chui is presented in a sympathetic light, we want him to achieve revenge. But, we need to think about the impact that revenge has on innocent lives. If we look at the individual lives of the people who die of hepatitis, it forces us to see Mr. Chui's revenge as immoral. Examining the story through the individual helps us to ask questions about the morality and immorality of revenge.

If we remain focused only on Mr. Chui as an individual, we lose sight of some of the story's moral questions. The story presents a society that has no sense of right and wrong. The story opens with the dramatic external conflict of the policeman throwing tea at Mr. Chui's feet and arresting him. Then, when Mr. Chui is in jail, he confronts a corrupt police force that manufactures false evidence and forces a false confession. The police represent a society that has no sense of justice. Mr. Chui lives in a society that doesn't believe in truth, order, innocence, and justice. Because his society does not believe in these values, does Mr. Chui have to live by those values? "Saboteur" shows us a society in which all sense of right and wrong has been lost. Mr. Chui's actions are part of a larger society that has no sense of morally correct behavior. Although we must question Mr. Chui's actions as an individual, the story also asks us to question the larger society that led to those actions.

Work Cited

Jin, Ha. "Saboteur." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 280-86. Print.

Developing a Revision Strategy: Thesis, Ideas, Evidence, Organization, and Correctness

To guide your revision, think of the elements that make a successful paper, such as the creation of a thesis argument or the use of compelling evidence, and analyze your paper for those elements. One way of doing this is to use a checklist to guide your self-critique. We've created a checklist that outlines five basic revision steps. This list can be used to create a revision strategy, emphasizing the five elements of a paper that can be reviewed and strengthened: the thesis, idea development, evidence, organization, and correctness. We can apply this revision checklist to the rough draft of Owen's paper, exploring if and how he engages with these five revision steps as he moves toward a revised draft.

✔REVISION CHECKLIST

Strengthen Your Thesis

☐ Add focus and depth to your central argument.

Develop Your Ideas

☐ Revisit your best responses to literary form and content, adding more thinking to those responses.

Integrate and Explain Your Evidence

☐ Select and analyze rich, interesting quotations to provide evidence for your ideas.

Improve the Organization

☐ Structure your ideas to follow a clear sequence.

Clarify Your Style and Edit for Correctness

☐ Use a consistent, professional style to explain your ideas, correcting sentence structure, word usage, and grammar.

Let's look at each of these revision goals in turn.

Strengthen Your Thesis. When you examine the draft of your paper, you should start with an essential question: "Does the draft present the main idea in the form of an argument or a thesis?" Reread the draft to see if its most important, overarching idea is captured in a thesis that (1) presents a focused argument or central claim, (2) is specific to the text under consideration, and (3) indicates some of the sophisticated thinking that will be developed in the paper. Although a thesis statement is typically one sentence in length, the paragraph that includes it should contain sentences that clarify and develop its ideas. The thesis argument will need to be concise, but the full explanation of that argument becomes the thesis paragraph.

When you examine Owen Monroe's revised paper draft, note that he expands his thesis paragraph to include new ideas that he generates about the morality of Mr. Chui's society. The paper's thesis shifts from focusing on individual morality to the more complex idea that individual morality is connected to social morality. The revision process has allowed Owen to "re-see" his thesis and realize that he can make it much more interesting by adding a new argument about social morality.

Develop Your Ideas. Although you have completed a draft, you should not assume that you are done with brainstorming but, instead, view your draft as a means to continue the idea development process. The writing process itself will generate new ideas. While writing, new insights will pop into your head while you are trying to wrestle your thoughts down on paper. Although you might wish that you could predetermine all of your ideas before you start a paper, that wish ignores the fact that revision is needed precisely because it will help you generate new ideas. Once your paper is in draft form, you can see the gaps, missing pieces, and unclear ideas that need fixing—and the hints of new ideas that need developing.

Note that Owen's revised draft has become much longer. He uses the revision process to expand his thinking, adding new arguments to his paper. In Owen's first draft, ideas concerning Mr. Chui's corrupt social context are mentioned in the last paragraph. Through the revision process, these ideas are expanded, generating several new paragraphs and a new thesis argument.

Integrate and Explain Your Evidence. The revision process also focuses on the textual evidence used to develop the paper's ideas. In almost every paper, the use of quotations from the text can be improved. Are the ideas in the paper supported with carefully selected and explained quotations? Does the paper show how your opinions, thoughts, and arguments evolve out of the literary text? Have you "digested" the quotations, integrating them into your own writing?

As he rereads his draft, Owen marks any ideas that seem unsupported, that could be made richer by citing from the text, or that seem to refer to the literary text without quoting from it. For example, Owen notes that the second half of his paper contains no direct quotations, signaling a weak use of evidence. He adds additional quotations and uses them to support the new ideas that he has been developing in the drafting process. Crucially, never engage in plagiarism, which is the undocumented use of another person's words or ideas. As shown in Appendix B the use of source materials must be documented through correct citation. Owen also checks his parenthetical citations and Works Cited list.

Improve the Organization. As you improve the ideas of your paper draft, the organization of the paper may need to change to capture those ideas. As part of the revision process, you may need to revisit the paper's original outline and determine if the paper's central arguments are changing, shifting, being emphasized, or being erased.

As Owen revises his paper draft, he realizes that one of his best ideas—that Mr. Chui lives in an unjust society, making it difficult to question his morality—is buried in his last paragraph. He decides to make that idea his thesis, a central part of his paper's overarching claim. Note how the topic and concluding sentences in his first draft's last paragraph have been moved forward to the thesis paragraph in his revised draft. These ideas are then fully developed in his new body paragraphs. Also note how Owen's first draft contains paragraphs of very uneven lengths: A very long body paragraph is followed by very short paragraphs, and one of his paragraphs is only one sentence long. In his revision, Owen creates a more balanced paragraph structure. He uses paragraph breaks to emphasize the introduction of new subpoints, and he connects together paragraphs that are working on the same idea. In his final draft, Owen presents ideas that are more complex than those in his first draft, and he also presents them in a more organized and balanced fashion.

Clarify Your Style and Edit for Correctness. A final revision strategy asks you to analyze a paper for its writing style. Does the draft explain ideas in a precise way? Does the draft clarify ideas by defining key terms? Does the draft avoid generalizations? Does the draft avoid overly general references to outside ideas and, instead, use specific references to specific aspects of the text? As part of clarifying the paper's style, you should revise a draft to avoid tentative-sounding "could be," "might be," or "perhaps" phrasing. You should strive to avoid the repetition of words or phrases. Finally, you should use academic language rather than casual expressions.

As part of his revision, Owen rereads his draft, looking for places where his ideas are hidden by very general sentences, tentative claims, or nonacademic phrasing. He continues to improve his ideas by polishing his language.

Student Analytical Essay: "Individual and Social Morals in Ha Jin's 'Saboteur'" (Final Draft)

As you read Owen's final draft, refer back to his first draft. He has expanded his paper's length, meeting the expectations of the assignment. Has this increased length allowed him to improve his ideas and argument?

Owen Monroe
Professor Garcia
English 102
21 April 2016

Individual and Social Morals in Ha Jin's "Saboteur"

Ha Jin's short story "Saboteur" tells a story of revenge. The story ends with a successful act of revenge, but the story questions if that revenge is morally correct. The story details the unfair arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Chui and, later, his lawyer-student, Fenjin. Mr. Chui confesses to the "crime" of disrupting public order, and is then released. After being released from the prison in Muji, Mr. Chui purposely eats at several food stands, infecting the dishes with the hepatitis disease he is carrying. At the end of the story, his revenge is complete: we learn that eight hundred people in Muji contracted hepatitis, and "six died of the disease, including two children" (286). The story asks its readers to judge Mr. Chui as an individual and to decide if his revenge is morally right or wrong. However, if we remain focused only on Mr. Chui as an individual, we lose sight of some of the story's moral questions. "Saboteur" shows us a society in which all sense of right and wrong has been lost. Mr. Chui's actions are part of a larger society that has no sense of morally correct behavior. Although we must question Mr. Chui's actions as an individual, the story also asks us to question the larger society that led to those actions.

"Saboteur" explores the individual, asking us to judge the individual's moral actions. The short story's third-person narrator focuses on Mr. Chui as the protagonist, keeping him at the center of the story and making him a sympathetic character. He represents the idea of the individual faced with a moral challenge. The story uses direct presentation to describe his thoughts and feelings. We are explicitly told that, although he is returning from his honeymoon, Mr. Chui is filled with "exhaustion," is feeling "worried," and has just gotten over a serious hepatitis attack (280). A restful lunch with his wife is interrupted when a policeman throws a bowl of tea at their feet, wetting their sandals. The act is unfair to Mr. Chui. Although the story's two policemen are clearly provoking Mr. Chui, when he questions their actions, he is arrested for disturbing the peace. The policemen call him a "saboteur" and bring him to jail.

"Saboteur" develops the idea of the individual by showing that Mr. Chui's individual rights are abused. Mr. Chui's is treated unfairly when he is locked in jail and forced to sign a confession to his "crime" of disrupting society, a crime he did not commit. The police chief demands that Mr. Chui confess, saying, "Now you have to admit you are guilty. . . . Although it's a serious crime, we won't punish you severely, provided you write out a self-criticism and promise that you won't disrupt the public order again" (283). The story presents Mr. Chui as a person of integrity. At first, he maintains his innocence and demands an apology. Then, he becomes increasingly sick and feverish due to his hepatitis. However, even though he is in this physical pain, he still defends his innocence. He decides, "Sooner or later the police would have to release him, although they had no idea that he might refuse to leave unless they wrote him an apology. Damn those hoodlums, they had ordered more than they could eat!" (284).

The narrator presents a complex picture of the individual, showing how Mr. Chui's external actions must reveal his internal beliefs. Fenjin comes to help Mr. Chui and is physically abused after being handcuffed to a tree. Mr. Chui feels "Anger was flaming up in his chest; his throat was tight and clogged" (285). The police manipulate Mr.Chui, telling him that they will release Fenjin only if Mr. Chui signs a confession to the crime of disturbing the peace. Mr. Chui decides to sign the confession, even though it goes against everything he believes. The narrator describes Mr. Chui's internal struggle as he decides to go against his beliefs: "A voice started screaming in Mr. Chui's ears, "lie, lie!" But he shook his head and forced the voice away. He asked the chief, 'If I sign this, will you release both my lawyer and me?'" (286). Here, Mr. Chui is presented as a sympathetic character full of integrity. He is willing to go against his beliefs for the higher purpose of saving his lawyer-student from physical abuse.

Although Mr. Chui has been mistreated and been forced to go against his principles, our sympathy for Mr. Chui is soon tested by his act of revenge. Immediately after signing the confession paper, Mr. Chui decides on revenge, thinking, "If he were able to, he would have razed the entire police station and eliminated all their families. Though he knew he could do nothing like that, he made up his mind to do something" (286). We know Mr. Chui has been wronged. We are so sympathetic to Mr. Chui as an individual that we want him to have some sort of revenge against the police. However, we are not fully aware that Mr. Chui has decided on a form of revenge that will actually kill people. Because we want Mr. Chui to have revenge, we might at first support him: he has used his hepatitis, which was triggered by the police, to seek revenge on the city. However, if we look at his revenge from the victim's perspective, we realize that his revenge is morally wrong: his actions led to the deaths of six people. These innocent people died as a result of one man being imprisoned for two days.

Because the story focuses on Mr. Chui, it is easy to see the story is most concerned with the individual. The story shows an "individual vs. society" theme: Mr. Chui has been mistreated by society and, as an individual, he needs revenge or at least to find some justice. Because Mr. Chui is presented in a sympathetic light, we want him to achieve revenge. But, we need to think about the impact that revenge has on innocent lives. If we look at the individual lives of the people who die of hepatitis, it forces us to see Mr. Chui's revenge as immoral. Examining the story through the individual helps us to ask questions about the morality and immorality of revenge.

To take this thinking even further, we can look at the story as questioning society in addition to the individual. The moral questions raised by Mr.Chui's revenge become even more complex. Mr. Chui's social setting makes us question his actions on a deeper level. Is there such a thing as morally right and wrong behavior in a society where no one, not even the police, upholds right and wrong? Is Mr. Chui's revenge wrong when he lives in a society that does not seem to have any system of justice?

The story presents a society that has no sense of right and wrong. The story opens with the dramatic external conflict of the policeman throwing tea at Mr. Chui's feet and arresting him. The policeman also manipulates ideas and words. When Mr. Chui asks why the policeman threw the tea, the policeman exclaims, "You're lying. You wet your shoes yourself" (281). The policeman replaces truth with lies. He represents a society that does not believe in truth. When Mr. Chui is arrested, the second policeman charges, "You're disrupting public order" (281). In reality, it is the police who are disrupting public order. The police do not uphold public order, but create disorder. The policemen have charged Mr. Chui with their own crime: they lie and create chaos. Although they call Mr. Chui a "saboteur," they are the saboteurs (281). When Mr. Chui says that his story could appear in a newspaper and get the police into trouble, the police say, "We are not afraid of any story you make up. We call it fiction" (285). This statement is ironic because the police are saying the exact opposite of what has really happened. It is the police who are making up stories and who are presenting fiction as truth.

When Mr. Chui is in jail, he confronts a corrupt police force that manufactures false evidence and forces a false confession. The police represent a society that has no sense of justice. In this society, just like truth can be turned into lies, innocence can be turned into guilt. When Mr. Chui maintains his innocence and argues, "I am telling the truth," the police argue back, "We can easily prove you are guilty. Here are some of the statements given by eyewitnesses" (282). When Mr. Chui realizes that "in just a matter of hours they had accumulated a small pile of writing about him," it becomes obvious that the police are making up materials for his case. The police go as far as writing Mr. Chui's confession and hand him a confession that states, "I hereby admit that I disrupted public order at Muji Train Station, and that I refuse to listen to reason when the railroad police issued their warning. Thus I myself am responsible for my arrest" (286). Each statement in this confession is false. Each of Mr. Chui's innocent acts has been turned against him and made into proof of his guilt.

Mr. Chui lives in a society that doesn't believe in truth, order, innocence, and justice. Because his society does not believe in these values, does Mr. Chui have to live by those values? This story could be arguing that Mr. Chui cannot be expected to uphold positive values if those values are not part of his society. If truth, order, innocence, and justice are not used when

Mr. Chui is in jail, can society expect Mr. Chui to use those values? If Mr. Chui's society creates lies, disorder, guilt, and unfairness, then that society should expect to have those values acted out. The story could be making the point that this society needs to be punished. If this society needs to be punished, then Mr. Chui's revenge can be seen as correct.

"Saboteur" can be examined on the level of the individual and on the level of society. Mr. Chui is presented as a very sympathetic character. We know he has been mistreated as an individual, and can understand his desire for revenge. Although we might want him to achieve revenge, we also can see that innocent people died as a result of his spreading hepatitis. When we think of those innocent individuals, we can see that Mr. Chui's revenge is wrong. However, when we focus on Mr. Chui's society, we might come to a different conclusion and argue that Mr. Chui's revenge makes sense in a society that encourages lying and disorder. Mr. Chui's society punishes positive values, and that society cannot expect to be treated with fairness and kindness. Although this is a negative conclusion, "Saboteur" might be asking the reader to think about when and why a society deserves to be punished, even if that punishment hurts the individual.

[New page]

Work Cited

Jin, Ha. "Saboteur." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 280-86. Print.

Your Turn: Additional Poems and Story for Interpretation

Poems

T. S. Eliot

Thomas Stearns Eliot (1888–1965) was born into a New England family that had moved to St. Louis, Missouri. He attended a private school in Massachusetts, graduated from Harvard, and did further study in literature and philosophy in France, Germany, and England. In 1914, he began working for Lloyd's Bank in London, and three years later, he published his first book of poems (it included "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock"). In 1925, he joined a publishing firm, and in 1927, he became a British citizen and a member of the Church of England. Much of his later poetry, unlike "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," is highly religious. In 1948, Eliot received the Nobel Prize in Literature.

The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock

S'io credesse che mia risposta fosse
A persona che mai tornasse al mondo,
Questa fiamma staria senza piu scosse.
Ma perciocche giammai di questo fondo
Non torno vivo alcun, s'i' odo il vero,
*Senza tema d'infama ti rispondo.

Let us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky

Like a patient etherized upon a table;
Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,
The muttering retreats
Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels
And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells:
Streets that follow like a tedious argument
Of insidious intent
To lead you to an overwhelming question . . .
Oh, do not ask, "What is it?"
Let us go and make our visit.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.
The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window-panes,

*In Dante's Inferno 27.61–66, a damned soul who had sought absolution before committing a crime addresses Dante, thinking that his words will never reach the Earth: "If I believed that my answer were to a person who could ever return to the world, this flame would no longer quiver. But because no one ever returned from this depth, if what I hear is true without fear of infamy, I answer you."

The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the window-panes
Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening,
Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains,
Let fall upon its back the soot that falls from chimneys,
Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap,
And seeing that it was a soft October night,
Curled once about the house, and fell asleep.

And indeed there will be time
For the yellow smoke that slides along the street,
Rubbing its back upon the window-panes;
There will be time, there will be time
To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet;
There will be time to murder and create,
And time for all the works and days° of hands
That lift and drop a question on your plate;
Time for you and time for me,
And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
And for a hundred visions and revisions,
Before the taking of a toast and tea.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.

And indeed there will be time
To wonder, "Do I dare?" and, "Do I dare?"
Time to turn back and descend the stair,
With a bald spot in the middle of my hair—
[They will say: "How his hair is growing thin!"]
My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,
My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin—
[They will say: "But how his arms and legs are thin!"]
Do I dare
Disturb the universe?
In a minute there is time
For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.

For I have known them all already, known them all:—
Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons,
I have measured out my life with coffee spoons;
I know the voices dying with a dying fall°
Beneath the music from a farther room.

So how should I presume?

And I have known the eyes already, known them all—
The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase,
And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,
When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,
Then how should I begin
To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways?

29 works and days "Works and Days" is the title of a poem on farm life by Hesiod (eighth century BCE).

52 dying fall This line echoes Shakespeare's Twelfth Night 1.1.4.

And how should I presume?

And I have known the arms already, known them all—
Arms that are braceleted and white and bare
[But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!]
Is it perfume from a dress
That makes me so digress?
Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl.

And should I then presume?
And how should I begin?

. . .

Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets
And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes
Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows? . . .

I should have been a pair of ragged claws
Scuttling across the floors of silent seas.

. . .

And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully!
Smoothed by long fingers,
Asleep . . . tired . . . or it malingers,
Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me.
Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,
Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis?
But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed,
Though I have seen my head [grown slightly bald] brought in upon a platter,°

I am no prophet—and here's no great matter;
And I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker,
And in short, I was afraid.

And would it have been worth it, after all,
After the cups, the marmalade, the tea,
Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,
Would it have been worth while,
To have bitten off the matter with a smile,

To have squeezed the universe into a ball°
To roll it toward some overwhelming question,
To say: "I am Lazarus,° come from the dead,
Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all"—
If one, settling a pillow by her head,

Should say: "That is not what I meant at all.
That is not it, at all."

81–83 But . . . platter These lines allude to John the Baptist (see Matthew 14:1–11). 92 To have . . . ball This line echoes lines 41–42 of Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress" (see page 351). 94 Lazarus See Luke 16 and John 11.

And would it have been worth it, after all,
Would it have been worth while,
After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets.
After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor—
And this, and so much more?—
It is impossible to say just what I mean!
But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen:
Would it have been worth while
If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl,
And turning toward the window, should say:

"That is not it at all,
That is not what I meant at all."

. . .

No! I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be;
Am an attendant lord, one that will do
To swell a progress, start a scene or two,
Advise the prince; no doubt, an easy tool,
Deferential, glad to be of use,
Politic, cautious, and meticulous;
Full of high sentence,° but a bit obtuse;°
At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—
Almost, at times, the Fool.

I grow old . . . I grow old . . .
I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.

Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?
I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach.
I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each.

I do not think that they will sing to me.

I have seen them riding seaward on the waves
Combing the white hair of the waves blown back
When the wind blows the water white and black.

We have lingered in the chambers of the sea
By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown
Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

[1910–11]

117 full of high sentence See Chaucer's description of the Clerk of Oxford in the Canterbury Tales. 112–117 Am . . . obtuse These lines allude to Polonius and perhaps other figures in Hamlet.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. How does the speaker's name help to characterize him? What suggestions—of class, race, or personality—do you find in it? Does the title of this poem strike you as ironic? If so, how or why?

2. What qualities of big-city life are suggested in the poem? How are these qualities linked to the speaker's mood? What other details of the setting—the weather, the time of day—express or reflect his mood? What images do you find especially striking?
3. The speaker's thoughts are represented in a stream-of-consciousness monologue, that is, in what appears to be an unedited flow of thought. Nevertheless, they reveal a story. What is the story?
4. In a paragraph, characterize Prufrock as he might be characterized by one of the women in the poem, and then, in a paragraph or two, offer your own characterization of him.
5. Consider the possibility that the "you" whom Prufrock is addressing is not a listener but one aspect of Prufrock and that the "I" is another aspect of Prufrock. Given this possibility, in a paragraph characterize the "you," and in another paragraph characterize the "I."
6. Prufrock has gone to a therapist, a psychiatrist, or a member of the clergy for help. Write a five-hundred-word transcript of their session.

Thomas Hardy

Thomas Hardy (1840–1928) was born in Dorset, England, the son of a stonemason. Despite great obstacles, he studied the Classics and architecture, and in 1862 he moved to London to study and practice as an architect. Ill health forced him to return to Dorset, where he continued to work as an architect and to write. Best known for his novels, Hardy ceased writing fiction after the hostile reception of Jude the Obscure in 1896 and turned to writing lyric poetry.

The Man He Killed

"Had he and I but met
By some old ancient inn,
We should have sat us down to wet
Right many a nipperkin![°]

"But ranged as infantry,
And staring face to face,
I shot at him as he at me,
And killed him in his place.

"I shot him dead because—
Because he was my foe,
Just so: my foe of course he was;
That's clear enough; although

"He thought he'd 'list, perhaps,
Off-hand—just as I—
Was out of work—had sold his traps[°]—
No other reason why.

4 nipperkin cup.
15 traps personal belongings.

"Yes; quaint and curious war is!
You shoot a fellow down
You'd treat if met where any bar is,
Or help to half-a-crown."

[1902]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What do we learn about the speaker's life before he enlisted in the infantry? How does his diction characterize him?
2. What is the effect of the series of monosyllables in lines 7 and 8?
3. Consider the punctuation of the third and fourth stanzas. Why are the heavy, frequent pauses appropriate? What question is the speaker trying to answer?
4. In the last stanza, what attitudes toward war does the speaker express? What, from the evidence of this poem, would you infer Hardy's attitude toward war to be? Cite evidence to support your argument.

Anne Bradstreet

Born in England in 1612 and educated by her father, Anne Bradstreet emigrated to Massachusetts in 1630 and lived there until her death in 1672. She is considered the first female poet of the New World. As a Puritan writer, Bradstreet often explored her spiritual struggles and addressed themes of sin, death, and salvation. Her poetry also expressed her devotion to her husband and deep love for her eight children.

Before the Birth of One of Her Children

All things within this fading world hath end,
Adversity doth still our joyes attend;
No ties so strong, no friends so dear and sweet,
But with death's parting blow is sure to meet.
The sentence past is most irrevocable,
A common thing, yet oh inevitable.
How soon, my Dear, death may my steps attend,
How soon't may be thy Lot to lose thy friend,
We are both ignorant, yet love bids me
These farewell lines to recommend to thee,
That when that knot's untied that made us one,
I may seem thine, who in effect am none.
And if I see not half my dayes that's due,
What nature would, God grant to yours and you;
The many faults that well you know I have
Let be interr'd in my oblivious grave;
If any worth or virtue were in me,
Let that live freshly in thy memory
And when thou feel'st no grief, as I no harms,
Yet love thy dead, who long lay in thine arms.
And when thy loss shall be repaid with gains
Look to my little babes, my dear remains.

And if thou love thyself, or loved'st me,
These o protect from step Dames injury.
And if chance to thine eyes shall bring this verse,
With some sad sighs honour my absent Herse;
And kiss this paper for thy loves dear sake,
Who with salt tears this last Farewel did take.

[1678]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In this poem, Bradstreet addresses her fear of dying in childbirth. How does she come to terms with this fear? Reread the poem, and then make a list of the different ways in which she tries to prepare for death. For example, she starts by reminding herself that everyone must die. She then moves on to addressing her husband. What other rationalizations does she provide?
2. If she dies, what will Bradstreet leave behind? Find the lines that contain an explanation of her different legacies. Will these legacies help her to live beyond death?
3. Bradstreet writes many poems about her husband and children. Search the Internet for one of these poems. How would you describe Bradstreet's emotional connection to her family?
4. Look ahead to the next poem, Christina Rossetti's "After Death," which also discusses death. How would you compare these two different female narrators' stance toward death? Do these narrators ultimately accept or reject death?

Christina Rossetti

Christina Rossetti was a poet who experienced success during her lifetime, and she continues to be recognized as one of the most important poets of Victorian England. Born in 1830, she was raised in a well-educated family that valued the study of poetry, art, history, and languages. Rossetti and her three siblings pursued artistic and intellectual careers; her brother Dante Gabriel Rossetti is a famous Pre-Raphaelite painter. Christina suffered from ill health, and her poetry often features meditations on the body, death, and loss. Her poetry conveys these complex themes in a direct and powerful style. She is best known for her narrative poem, "Goblin Market," published in 1862.

After Death

The curtains were half drawn, the floor was swept
And strewn with rushes, rosemary and may
Lay thick upon the bed on which I lay,
Where through the lattice ivy-shadows crept.
He leaned above me, thinking that I slept
And could not hear him; but I heard him say,
'Poor child, poor child': and as he turned away
Came a deep silence, and I knew he wept.

He did not touch the shroud, or raise the fold
That hid my face, or take my hand in his,
Or ruffle the smooth pillows for my head:
He did not love me living; but once dead
He pitied me; and very sweet it is
To know he still is warm though I am cold.

[1862]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Who is the speaker of this poem? Where is she located? What is her physical status?
2. What is the relationship between the speaker of the poem and the man who visits her? Reread the poem to understand the emotions that underlie its direct style. What rather harsh insights does the speaker have into the man and his emotions? How have his emotions changed or evolved?
3. What are the actions of the male visitor? Why does he say "Poor child, poor child"? What are the actions of the speaker of the poem?
4. What do you make of the last line of the poem? The speaker states, "very sweet it is / To know he still is warm though I am cold." Why is this knowledge "very sweet"?

Fred Chappell

A novelist and poet, Fred Chappell was born in North Carolina in 1936 and continues to live there. He taught at the University of North Carolina–Greensboro and served as the state's poet laureate from 1997 to 2002. Some of his most ambitious story and poem collections are autobiographical and take the form of linked multivolume works.

Narcissus and Echo

Shall the water not remember Ember my hand's slow gesture, tracing above of its mirror my half-imaginary airy portrait? My only belonging longing;
is my beauty, which I take ache away and then return, as love of
of teasing playfully the one being unbeing.
whose gratitude I treasure Is your moves me. I live apart heart from myself, yet cannot not live apart. In the water's tone, stone?
that brilliant silence, a flower Hour,
whispers my name with such slight light:
moment, it seems filament of air, fare
the world become cloudswell. well.

[1983]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. A unique element of this poem is the ending of each line. Examine the italicized words closely. How do those words relate to the words that immediately precede them? What is the meaning of this relationship? After you read horizontally and understand how each italicized word connects to its line, read vertically and read the italicized words as connecting to each other in order to create a new set of lines.
2. Read the poem aloud. Then, try to write a few new lines for the poem, imitating the sound effect of the end of each line. Can you make your new lines work with both a horizontal and vertical reading?
3. The title of the poem refers to an episode in Ovid's Metamorphosis that retells the myth of Narcissus, the young man who is so beautiful that he falls in love with his own reflection when he gazes into a pool of water (he is memorialized with a narcissus flower, and we get the word narcissist from this myth). Do some Internet research on this story, learning Echo's role in it and how she earns her name. Now, return to the poem with this new understanding of its inspiration. How does the poem relate to the Narcissus and Echo story?
4. Analyze the word choice of the poem. For example, notice how the words "I" and my" are repeated. How does this word repetition emphasize the theme of the poem? What other word patterns do you notice?

STORY

JOYCE CAROL OATES

Joyce Carol Oates was born in 1938 in Millerport, New York. She won a scholarship to Syracuse University, from which she graduated (Phi Beta Kappa and valedictorian) in 1960. She then did graduate work in English, first at the University of Wisconsin and then at Rice University, but she withdrew from Rice University in order to be able to devote more time to writing. Her first collection of stories, By the North Gate, was published in 1963; since then she has published many books—stories, poems, essays, and novels. She has received many awards, has been elected to the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters, and now teaches creative writing at Princeton University.

Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?

For Bob Dylan

Her name was Connie. She was fifteen and she had a quick nervous giggling habit of craning her neck to glance into mirrors or checking other people's faces to make sure her own was all right. Her mother, who noticed everything and knew everything and who hadn't much reason any longer to look at her own face, always scolded Connie about it. "Stop gawking at yourself, who are you? You think you're so pretty?" she would say. Connie would raise her eyebrows at these familiar complaints and look right through her mother, into a shadowy vision of herself as she was right at that moment: she knew she was pretty and that was everything. Her mother had been pretty once too, if you could believe those old snapshots in the album, but now her looks were gone and that was why she was always after Connie.

"Why don't you keep your room clean like your sister? How've you got your hair fixed—what the hell stinks? Hair spray? You don't see your sister using that junk."

Her sister June was twenty-four and still lived at home. She was a secretary in the high school Connie attended, and if that wasn't bad enough—with her in the same building—she was so plain and chunky and steady that Connie had to hear her praised all the time by her mother and her mother's sisters. June did this, June did that, she saved money and helped clean the house and cooked and Connie couldn't do a thing, her mind was all filled with trashy daydreams. Their father was away at work most of the time and when he came home he wanted supper and he read the newspaper at supper and after supper he went to bed. He didn't bother talking much to them, but around his bent head Connie's mother kept picking at her until Connie wished her mother was dead and she herself was dead and it was all over. "She makes me want to throw up sometimes," she complained to her friends. She had a high, breathless, amused voice which made everything she said sound a little forced, whether it was sincere or not.

There was one good thing: June went places with girlfriends of hers, girls who were just as plain and steady as she, and so when Connie wanted to do that her mother had no objections. The father of Connie's best girlfriend drove the girls the three miles to town and left them off at a shopping plaza, so that they could walk through the stores or go to a movie, and when he came to pick them up again at eleven he never bothered to ask what they had done.

5 They must have been familiar sights, walking around that shopping plaza in their shorts and flat ballerina slippers that always scuffed the sidewalk, with charm bracelets jingling on their thin wrists; they would lean together to whisper and laugh secretly if someone passed by who amused or interested them. Connie had long dark blond hair that drew anyone's eye to it, and she wore part of it pulled up on her head and puffed out and the rest of it she let fall down her back. She wore a pull-over jersey blouse that looked one way when she was at home and another way when she was away from home. Everything about her had two sides to it, one for home and one for anywhere that was not home: her walk that could be childlike and bobbing, or languid enough to make anyone think she was hearing music in her head, her mouth which was pale and smirking most of the time, but bright and pink on these evenings out, her laugh which was cynical and drawling at home—"Ha, ha, very funny"—but high-pitched and nervous anywhere else, like the jingling of the charms on her bracelet.

Sometimes they did go shopping or to a movie, but sometimes they went across the highway, ducking fast across the busy road, to a drive-in restaurant where older kids hung out. The restaurant was shaped like a big bottle, though squatter than a real bottle, and on its cap was a revolving figure of a grinning boy who held a hamburger aloft. One night in midsummer they ran across, breathless with daring, and right away someone leaned out a car window and invited them over, but it was just a boy from high school they didn't like. It made them feel good to be able to ignore him. They went up through the maze of parked and cruising cars to the bright-lit, fly-infested restaurant, their faces pleased and expectant as if they were entering a sacred building that loomed out of the night to give them what haven and what blessing they yearned for.

They sat at the counter and crossed their legs at the ankles, their thin shoulders rigid with excitement, and listened to the music that made everything so good: the music was always in the background like music at a church service, it was something to depend upon.

A boy named Eddie came in to talk with them. He sat backward on his stool, turning himself jerkily around in semicircles and then stopping and turning again, and after a while he asked Connie if she would like something to eat. She said she did and so she tapped her friend's arm on her way out—her friend pulled her face up into a brave droll look—and Connie said she would meet her at eleven, across the way. "I just hate to leave her like that," Connie said earnestly, but the boy said that she wouldn't be alone for long. So they went out to his car and on the way Connie couldn't help but let her eyes wander over the windshields and faces all around her, her face gleaming with a joy that had nothing to do with Eddie or even this place; it might have been the music. She drew her shoulders up and sucked in her breath with the pure pleasure of being alive, and just at that moment she happened to glance at a face just a few feet from hers. It was a boy with shaggy black hair, in a convertible jalopy painted gold. He stared at her and then his lips widened into a grin. Connie slit her eyes at him and turned away, but she couldn't help glancing back and there he was still watching her. He wagged a finger and laughed and said, "Gonna get you, baby," and Connie turned away again without Eddie noticing anything.

She spent three hours with him, at the restaurant where they ate hamburgers and drank Cokes in wax cups that were always sweating, and then down an alley a mile or so away, and when he left her off at five to eleven only the movie house was still open at the plaza. Her girlfriend was there, talking with a boy. When Connie came up the two girls smiled at each other and Connie said, "How was the movie?" and the girl said, "You should know." They rode off with the girl's father, sleepy and pleased, and Connie couldn't help but look at the darkened shopping plaza with its big empty parking lot and its signs that were faded and ghostly now, and over at the drive-in restaurant where cars were still circling tirelessly. She couldn't hear the music at this distance.

Next morning June asked her how the movie was and Connie said, "So-so."

10 She and that girl and occasionally another girl went out several times a week that way, and the rest of the time Connie spent around the house—it was summer vacation—getting in her mother's way and thinking, dreaming, about the boys she met. But all the boys fell back and dissolved into a single face that was not even a face, but an idea, a feeling, mixed up with the urgent insistent pounding of the music and the humid night air of July. Connie's mother kept dragging her back to the daylight by finding things for her to do or saying, suddenly, "What's this about the Pettinger girl?"

And Connie would say nervously, "Oh, her. That dope." She always drew thick clear lines between herself and such girls, and her mother was simple and kindly enough to believe her. Her mother was so simple, Connie thought, that it was maybe cruel to fool her so much. Her mother went scuffling around the house in old bedroom slippers and complained over the telephone to one sister about the other, then the other called up and the two of them complained about the third one. If June's name was mentioned her mother's tone was approving, and if Connie's name was mentioned it was disapproving. This did not really mean she disliked Connie and actually Connie thought that her mother preferred her to June because she was prettier, but the two of them kept up a pretense of exasperation, a sense that they were tugging and struggling over something of little value to either of them. Sometimes, over coffee, they were almost friends, but something would come up—some vexation that was like a fly buzzing suddenly around their heads—and their faces went hard with contempt.

One Sunday Connie got up at eleven—none of them bothered with church—and washed her hair so that it could dry all day long, in the sun. Her parents and sister were going to a barbecue at an aunt's house and Connie said no, she wasn't interested, rolling her eyes to let her mother know just what she thought of it. "Stay home alone then," her mother said sharply. Connie sat out back in a lawn chair and watched them drive away, her father quiet and bald, hunched around so that he could back the car out, her mother with a look that was still angry and not at all softened through the windshield, and in the back seat poor old June all dressed up as if she didn't know what a barbecue was, with all the running yelling kids and the flies. Connie sat with her eyes closed in the sun, dreaming and dazed with the warmth about her as if this were a kind of love, the caresses of love, and her mind slipped over onto thoughts of the boy she had been with the night before and how nice he had been, how sweet it always was, not the way someone like June would suppose but sweet, gentle, the way it was in movies and promised in songs; and when she opened her eyes she hardly knew where she was, the back yard ran off into weeds and a fence line of trees and behind it the sky was perfectly blue and still. The asbestos "ranch house" that was now three years old startled her—it looked small. She shook her head as if to get awake.

It was too hot. She went inside the house and turned on the radio to drown out the quiet. She sat on the edge of her bed, barefoot, and listened for an hour and a half to a program called XYZ Sunday Jamboree, record after record of hard, fast, shrieking songs she sang along with, interspersed by exclamations from "Bobby King": "An' look here you girls at Napoleon's—Son and Charley want you to pay real close attention to this song coming up!"

And Connie paid close attention herself, bathed in a glow of slow-pulsed joy that seemed to rise mysteriously out of the music itself and lay languidly about the airless little room, breathed in and breathed out with each gentle rise and fall of her chest.

15 After a while she heard a car coming up the drive. She sat up at once, startled, because it couldn't be her father so soon. The gravel kept crunching all the way in from the road—the driveway was long—and Connie ran to the window. It was a car she didn't know. It was an open jalopy, painted a bright gold that caught the sunlight opaquely. Her heart began to pound and her fingers snatched at her hair, checking it, and she whispered "Christ, Christ," wondering how bad she looked. The car came to a stop at the side door and the horn sounded four short taps as if this were a signal Connie knew.

She went into the kitchen and approached the door slowly, then hung out the screen door, her bare toes curling down off the step. There were two boys in the car and now she recognized the driver: he had shaggy, shabby black hair that looked crazy as a wig and he was grinning at her.

"I ain't late, am I?" he said.

"Who the hell do you think you are?" Connie said.

"Toldja I'd be out, didn't I?"

20 "I don't even know who you are."

She spoke sullenly, careful to show no interest or pleasure, and he spoke in a fast bright monotone. Connie looked past him to the other boy, taking her time. He had fair brown hair, with a lock that fell onto his forehead. His sideburns gave him a fierce, embarrassed look, but so far he hadn't even bothered to glance at her.

Both boys wore sunglasses. The driver's glasses were metallic and mirrored everything in miniature.

"You wanta come for a ride?" he said.

Connie smirked and let her hair fall loose over one shoulder.

"Don'tcha like my car? New paint job," he said. "Hey."

"What?"

"You're cute."

She pretended to fidget, chasing flies away from the door.

"Don'tcha believe me, or what?" he said.

"Look, I don't even know who you are," Connie said in disgust.

"Hey, Ellie's got a radio, see. Mine's broke down." He lifted his friend's arm and showed her the little transistor the boy was holding, and now Connie began to hear the music. It was the same program that was playing inside the house.

"Bobby King?" she said.

"I listen to him all the time. I think he's great."

"He's kind of great." Connie said reluctantly.

"Listen, that guy's great. He knows where the action is."

Connie blushed a little, because the glasses made it impossible for her to see just what this boy was looking at. She couldn't decide if she liked him or if he was just a jerk, and so she dawdled in the doorway and wouldn't come down or go back inside. She said, "What's all that stuff painted on your car?"

"Can'tcha read it?" He opened the door very carefully, as if he was afraid it might fall off. He slid out just as carefully, planting his feet firmly on the ground, the tiny metallic world in his glasses slowing down like gelatine hardening and in the midst of it Connie's bright green blouse. "This here is my name, to begin with," he said. ARNOLD FRIEND was written in tarlike black letters on the side, with a drawing of a round grinning face that reminded Connie of a pumpkin, except it wore sunglasses. "I wanta introduce myself, I'm Arnold Friend and that's my real name and I'm gonna be your friend, honey, and inside the car's Ellie Oscar, he's kinda shy." Ellie brought his transistor radio up to his shoulder and balanced it there. "Now these numbers are a secret code, honey," Arnold Friend explained. He read off the numbers 33, 19, 17 and raised his eyebrows at her to see what she thought of that, but she didn't think much of it. The left rear fender had been smashed and around it was written, on the gleaming gold background: DONE BY CRAZY WOMAN DRIVER. Connie had to laugh at that. Arnold Friend was pleased at her laughter and looked up at her. "Around the other side's a lot more—you wanta come and see them?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Why should I?"

"Don'tcha wanta see what's on the car? Don'tcha wanta go for a ride?"

"I don't know."

"Why not?"

"I got things to do."

"Like what?"

"Things."

He laughed as if she had said something funny. He slapped his thighs. He was standing in a strange way, leaning back against the car as if he were balancing himself. He wasn't tall, only an inch or so taller than she would be if she came down to him. Connie liked the way he was dressed, which was the way all of them dressed: tight faded jeans stuffed into black, scuffed boots, a belt that pulled his waist in and showed how lean he was, and a white pullover shirt that was a little soiled and showed the hard small muscles of his arms and shoulders. He looked as if he probably did hard work, lifting and carrying things. Even his neck looked muscular. And his face was a familiar face, somehow: the jaw and chin and cheeks slightly darkened, because he hadn't shaved for a day or two, and the nose long and hawklike, sniffing as if she were a treat he was going to gobble up and it was all a joke.

"Connie, you ain't telling the truth. This is your day set aside for a ride with me and you know it," he said, still laughing. The way he straightened and recovered from his fit of laughing showed that it had been all fake.

"How do you know what my name is?" she said suspiciously.

"It's Connie."

50 "Maybe and maybe not."

"I know my Connie," he said, wagging his finger. Now she remembered him even better, back at the restaurant, and her cheeks warmed at the thought of how she sucked in her breath just at the moment she passed him—how she must have looked to him. And he had remembered her. "Ellie and I come out here especially for you," he said. "Ellie can sit in back. How about it?"

"Where?"

"Where what?"

"Where're we going?"

55 He looked at her. He took off the sunglasses and she saw how pale the skin around his eyes was, like holes that were not in shadow but instead in light. His eyes were like chips of broken glass that catch the light in an amiable way. He smiled. It was as if the idea of going for a ride somewhere, to some place, was a new idea to him.

"Just for a ride, Connie sweetheart."

"I never said my name was Connie," she said.

"But I know what it is. I know your name and all about you, lots of things," Arnold Friend said. He had not moved yet but stood still leaning back against the side of his jalopy. "I took a special interest in you, such a pretty girl, and found out all about you like I know your parents and sister are gone somewheres and I know where and how long they're going to be gone, and I know who you were with last night, and your best girlfriend's name is Betty. Right?"

He spoke in a simple lilting voice, exactly as if he were reciting the words to a song. His smile assured her that everything was fine. In the car Ellie turned up the volume on his radio and did not bother to look around at them.

60 "Ellie can sit in the back seat," Arnold Friend said. He indicated his friend with a casual jerk of his chin, as if Ellie did not count and she should not bother with him.

"How'd you find out all that stuff?" Connie said.

"Listen: Betty Schultz and Tony Fitch and Jimmy Pettinger and Nancy Pettinger," he said, in a chant. "Raymond Stanley and Bob Hutter—"

"Do you know all those kids?"

"I know everybody."

65 "Look, you're kidding. You're not from around here."

"Sure."

"But—how come we never saw you before?"

"Sure you saw me before," he said. He looked down at his boots, as if he were a little offended. "You just don't remember."

"I guess I'd remember you," Connie said.

70 "Yeah?" He looked up at this, beaming. He was pleased. He began to mark time with the music from Ellie's radio, tapping his fists lightly together. Connie looked away from his smile to the car, which was painted so bright it almost hurt her eyes to look at it. She looked at that name, ARNOLD FRIEND. And up at the front fender was an expression that was familiar—MAN THE FLYING SAUCERS. It was an expression kids had used the year before, but didn't use this year. She looked at it for a while as if the words meant something to her that she did not yet know.

"What're you thinking about? Huh?" Arnold Friend demanded. "Not worried about your hair blowing around in the car, are you?"

"No."

"Think I maybe can't drive good?"

"How do I know?"

75 "You're a hard girl to handle. How come?" he said. "Don't you know I'm your friend? Didn't you see me put my sign in the air when you walked by?"

"What sign?"

"My sign." And he drew an X in the air, leaning out toward her. They were maybe ten feet apart. After his hand fell back to his side the X was still in the air, almost visible. Connie let the screen door close and stood perfectly still inside it, listening to the music from her radio and the boy's blend together. She stared at Arnold Friend. He stood there so stiffly relaxed, pretending to be relaxed, with one hand idly on the door handle as if he were keeping himself up that way and had no intention of ever moving again. She recognized most things about him, the tight jeans that showed his thighs and buttocks and the greasy leather boots and the tight shirt, and even that slippery friendly smile of his, that sleepy dreamy smile that all the boys used to get across ideas they didn't want to put into words. She recognized all this and also the singsong way he talked, slightly mocking, kidding, but serious and a little melancholy, and she recognized the way he tapped one fist against the other in homage to the perpetual music behind him. But all these things did not come together.

She said suddenly, "Hey, how old are you?"

His smile faded. She could see then that he wasn't a kid, he was much older—thirty, maybe more. At this knowledge her heart began to pound faster.

80 "That's a crazy thing to ask. Can'tcha see I'm your own age?"

"Like hell you are."

"Or maybe a coupla years older, I'm eighteen."

"Eighteen?" she said doubtfully.

He grinned to reassure her and lines appeared at the corners of his mouth. His teeth were big and white. He grinned so broadly his eyes became slits and she saw how thick the lashes were, thick and black as if painted with a black tarlike material. Then he seemed to become embarrassed, abruptly, and looked over his shoulder at Ellie. "Him, he's crazy," he said. "Ain't he a riot, he's a nut, a real character." Ellie was still listening to the music. His sunglasses told nothing about what he was thinking. He wore a bright orange shirt unbuttoned halfway to show his chest, which was a pale, bluish chest and not muscular like Arnold Friend's. His shirt collar was turned up all around and the very tips of the collar pointed out past his chin as if they were protecting him. He was pressing the transistor radio up against his ear and sat there in a kind of daze, right in the sun.

85 "He's kinda strange," Connie said.

"Hey, she says you're kinda strange! Kinda strange!" Arnold Friend cried. He pounded on the car to get Ellie's attention. Ellie turned for the first time and Connie saw with shock that he wasn't a kid either—he had a fair, hairless face, cheeks reddened slightly as if the veins grew too close to the surface of his skin, the face of a forty-year-old baby. Connie felt a wave of dizziness rise in her at this sight and she stared at him as if waiting for something to change the shock of the moment, make it all right again. Ellie's lips kept shaping words, mumbling along, with the words blasting in his ear.

"Maybe you two better go away," Connie said faintly.

"What? How come?" Arnold Friend cried. "We come out here to take you for a ride. It's Sunday." He had the voice of the man on the radio now. It was the same voice, Connie thought. "Don'tcha know it's Sunday all day and honey, no matter who you were with last night today you're with Arnold Friend and don't you forget it!—Maybe you better step out here," he said, and this last was in a different voice. It was a little flatter, as if the heat was finally getting to him.

"No. I got things to do."

"Hey."

"You two better leave."

"We ain't leaving until you come with us."

"Like hell I am—"

"Connie, don't fool around with me. I mean, I mean, don't fool around," he said, shaking his head. He laughed incredulously. He placed his sunglasses on top of his head, carefully, as if he were indeed wearing a wig, and brought the stems down behind his ears. Connie stared at him, another wave of dizziness and fear rising in her so that for a moment he wasn't even in focus but was just a blur, standing there against his gold car, and she had the idea that he had driven up the driveway all right but had come from nowhere before that and belonged nowhere and that everything about him and even about the music that was so familiar to her was only half real.

"If my father comes and sees you—"

"He ain't coming. He's at a barbecue."

"How do you know that?"

"Aunt Tillie's. Right now they're—uh—they're drinking. Sitting around," he said vaguely, squinting as if he were staring all the way to town and over to Aunt Tillie's back yard. Then the vision seemed to get clear and he nodded energetically. "Yeah. Sitting around. There's your sister in a blue dress, huh? And high heels, the poor sad bitch—nothing like you, sweetheart! And your mother's helping some fat woman with the corn, they're cleaning the corn—husking the corn—"

"What fat woman?" Connie cried.

"How do I know what fat woman. I don't know every goddam fat woman in the world!" Arnold Friend laughed.

"Oh, that's Mrs. Hornby. . . . Who invited her?" Connie said. She felt a little light-headed. Her breath was coming quickly.

"She's too fat. I don't like them fat. I like them the way you are, honey," he said, smiling sleepily at her. They stared at each other for a while, through the screen door. He said softly, "Now what you're going to do is this: you're going to come out that door. You're going to sit up front with me and Ellie's going to sit in the back, the hell with Ellie, right? This isn't Ellie's date. You're my date. I'm your lover, honey."

"What? You're crazy—"

"Yes, I'm your lover. You don't know what that is but you will," he said. "I know that too. I know all about you. But look: it's real nice and you couldn't ask for nobody better than me, or more polite. I always keep my word. I'll tell you how it is, I'm always nice at first, the first time. I'll hold you so tight you won't think you have to try to get away or pretend anything because you'll know you can't. And I'll come inside you where it's all secret and you'll give in to me and you'll love me—"

105 "Shut up! You're crazy!" Connie said. She backed away from the door. She put her hands against her ears as if she'd heard something terrible, something not meant for her. "People don't talk like that, you're crazy," she muttered. Her heart was almost too big now for her chest and its pumping made sweat break out all over her. She looked out to see Arnold Friend pause and then take a step toward the porch lurching. He almost fell. But, like a clever drunken man, he managed to catch his balance. He wobbled in his high boots and grabbed hold of one of the porch posts.

"Honey?" he said. "You still listening?"

"Get the hell out of here!"

"Be nice, honey. Listen."

"I'm going to call the police—"

110 He wobbled again and out of the side of his mouth came a fast spat curse, an aside not meant for her to hear. But even this "Christ!" sounded forced. Then he began to smile again. She watched this smile come, awkward as if he were smiling from inside a mask. His whole face was a mask, she thought wildly, tanned down onto his throat but then running out as if he had plastered makeup on his face but had forgotten about his throat.

"Honey—? Listen, here's how it is. I always tell the truth and I promise you this: I ain't coming in that house after you."

"You better not! I'm going to call the police if you—if you don't—"

"Honey," he said, talking right through her voice, "honey, I'm not coming in there but you are coming out here. You know why?"

She was panting. The kitchen looked like a place she had never seen before, some room she had run inside but which wasn't good enough, wasn't going to help her. The kitchen window had never had a curtain, after three years, and there were dishes in the sink for her to do—probably—and if you ran your hand across the table you'd probably feel something sticky there.

115 "You listening, honey? Hey?"

"—going to call the police—"

"Soon as you touch the phone I don't need to keep my promise and can come inside. You won't want that."

She rushed forward and tried to lock the door. Her fingers were shaking. "But why lock it," Arnold Friend said gently, talking right into her face. "It's just a screen door. It's just nothing." One of his boots was at a strange angle, as if his foot wasn't in it. It pointed out to the left, bent at the ankle. "I mean, anybody can break through a screen door and glass and wood and iron or anything else if he needs to, anybody at all and specially Arnold Friend. If the place got lit up with a fire honey you'd come runnin' out into my arms, right into my arms an' safe at home—like you knew I was your lover and'd stopped fooling around. I don't mind a nice shy girl but I don't like no fooling around." Part of those words were spoken with a slight rhythmic lilt, and Connie somehow recognized them—the echo of a song from last year, about a girl rushing into her boyfriend's arms and coming home again—

Connie stood barefoot on the linoleum floor, staring at him. "What do you want?" she whispered.

120 "I want you," he said.

"What?"

"Seen you that night and thought, that's the one, yes sir. I never needed to look any more."

"But my father's coming back. He's coming to get me. I had to wash my hair first—" She spoke in a dry, rapid voice, hardly raising it for him to hear.

"No, your Daddy is not coming and yes, you had to wash your hair and you washed it for me. It's nice and shining and all for me, I thank you, sweetheart," he said, with a mock bow, but again he almost lost his balance. He had to bend and adjust his boots. Evidently his feet did not go all the way down; the boots must have been stuffed with something so that he would seem taller. Connie stared out at him and behind him Ellie in the car, who seemed to be looking off toward Connie's right into nothing. This Ellie said, pulling the words out of the air one after another as if he were just discovering them, "You want me to pull out the phone?"

125 "Shut your mouth and keep it shut," Arnold Friend said, his face red from bending over or maybe from embarrassment because Connie had seen his boots. "This ain't none of your business."

"What—what are you doing? What do you want?" Connie said. "If I call the police they'll get you, they'll arrest you—"

"Promise was not to come in unless you touch that phone, and I'll keep that promise," he said. He resumed his erect position and tried to force his shoulders back. He sounded like a hero in a movie, declaring something important. He spoke too loudly and it was as if he were speaking to someone behind Connie. "I ain't made plans for coming in that house where I don't belong but just for you to come out to me, the way you should. Don't you know who I am?"

"You're crazy," she whispered. She backed away from the door but did not want to go into another part of the house, as if this would give him permission to come through the door. "What do you . . . You're crazy, you . . ."

"Huh? What're you saying, honey?"

130 Her eyes darted everywhere in the kitchen. She could not remember what it was, this room.

"This is how it is, honey: you come out and we'll drive away, have a nice ride. But if you don't come out we're gonna wait till your people come home and then they're all going to get it."

"You want that telephone pulled out?" Ellie said. He held the radio away from his ear and grimaced, as if without the radio the air was too much for him.

"I toldja shut up, Ellie," Arnold Friend said, "you're deaf, get a hearing aid, right? Fix yourself up. This little girl's no trouble and's gonna be nice to me, so Ellie keep to yourself, this ain't your date—right? Don't hem in on me. Don't hog. Don't crush. Don't bird dog. Don't trail me," he said in a rapid meaningless voice, as if he were running through all the expressions he'd learned but was no longer sure which one of them was in style, then rushing on to new ones, making them up with his eyes closed, "Don't crawl under my fence, don't squeeze in my chipmunk hole, don't sniff my glue, suck my popsicle, keep your own greasy fingers on yourself!" He shaded his eyes and peered in at Connie, who was backed against the kitchen table. "Don't mind him honey he's just a creep. He's a dope. Right? I'm the boy for you and like I said you come out here nice like a lady and give me your hand, and nobody else gets hurt, I mean, your nice old bald-headed daddy and your mummy and your sister in her high heels. Because listen: why bring them in this?"

"Leave me alone," Connie whispered.

"Hey, you know that old woman down the road, the one with the chickens and stuff—you know her?"

"She's dead!"

"Dead? What? You know her?" Arnold Friend said.

"She's dead—"

"Don't you like her?"

"She's dead—she's—she isn't here any more—"

"But don't you like her, I mean, you got something against her? Some grudge or something?" Then his voice dipped as if he were conscious of a rudeness. He touched the sunglasses perched on top of his head as if to make sure they were still there. "Now you be a good girl."

"What are you going to do?"

"Just two things, or maybe three," Arnold Friend said. "But I promise it won't last long and you'll like me the way you get to like people you're close to. You will. It's all over for you here, so come on out. You don't want your people in any trouble, do you?"

She turned and bumped against a chair or something, hurting her leg, but she ran into the back room and picked up the telephone. Something roared in her ear, a tiny roaring, and she was so sick with fear that she could do nothing but listen to it—the telephone was clammy and very heavy and her fingers groped down to the dial but were too weak to touch it. She began to scream into the phone, into the roaring. She cried out, she cried for her mother, she felt her breath start jerking back and forth in her lungs as if it were something Arnold Friend were stabbing her with again and again with no tenderness. A noisy sorrowful wailing rose all about her and she was locked inside it the way she was locked inside the house.

After a while she could hear again. She was sitting on the floor with her wet back against the wall.

Arnold Friend was saying from the door, "That's a good girl. Put the phone back."

She kicked the phone away from her.

"No, honey. Pick it up. Put it back right."

She picked it up and put it back. The dial tone stopped.

"That's a good girl. Now come outside."

She was hollow with what had been fear, but what was now just an emptiness. All that screaming had blasted it out of her. She sat, one leg cramped under her, and deep inside her brain was something like a pinpoint of light that kept going and would not let her relax. She thought, I'm not going to see my mother again. She thought, I'm not going to sleep in my bed again. Her bright green blouse was all wet.

Arnold Friend said, in a gentle-loud voice that was like a stage voice, "The place where you came from ain't there any more, and where you had in mind to go is canceled out. This place you are now—inside your daddy's house—is nothing but a cardboard box I can knock down any time. You know that and always did know it. You hear me?"

She thought, I have got to think. I have to know what to do.

"We'll go out to a nice field, out in the country here where it smells so nice and it's sunny," Arnold Friend said. "I'll have my arms tight around you so you won't need to try to get away and I'll show you what love is like, what it does. The hell with this house! It looks solid all right," he said. He ran a fingernail down the screen and the noise did not make Connie shiver, as it would have the day before. "Now put your hand on your heart, honey. Feel that? That feels solid too but we know better, be nice to me, be sweet like you can because what else is there for a girl like you but to be sweet and pretty and give in?—and get away before her people come back?"

155 She felt her pounding heart. Her hand seemed to enclose it. She thought for the first time in her life that it was nothing that was hers, that belonged to her, but just a pounding, living thing inside this body that wasn't really hers either.

"You don't want them to get hurt," Arnold Friend went on. "Now get up, honey. Get up all by yourself."

She stood up.

"Now turn this way. That's right. Come over here to me—Ellie, put that away, didn't I tell you? You dope. You miserable creepy dope," Arnold Friend said. His words were not angry but only part of an incantation. The incantation was kindly. "Now come out through the kitchen to me honey, and let's see a smile, try it, you're a brave sweet little girl and now they're eating corn and hot dogs cooked to bursting over an outdoor fire, and they don't know one thing about you and never did and honey you're better than them because not a one of them would have done this for you."

Connie felt the linoleum under her feet; it was cool. She brushed her hair back out of her eyes. Arnold Friend let go of the post tentatively and opened his arms for her, his elbows pointing in toward each other and his wrists limp, to show that this was an embarrassed embrace and a little mocking, he didn't want to make her self-conscious.

160 She put out her hand against the screen. She watched herself push the door slowly open as if she were safe back somewhere in the other doorway, watching this body and this head of long hair moving out into the sunlight where Arnold Friend waited.

"My sweet little blue-eyed girl," he said, in a half-sung sigh that had nothing to do with her brown eyes but was taken up just the same by the vast sunlit reaches of the land behind him and on all sides of him, so much land that Connie had never seen before and did not recognize except to know that she was going to it.

[1966]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Characterize Connie. Do you think the early characterization of Connie prepares us for her later behavior?
2. Construct an argument in response to the question, "Is Arnold Friend clairvoyant—definitely, definitely not, maybe?"
3. Evaluate the view that Arnold Friend is both Satan and the incarnation of Connie's erotic desires.
4. What do you make of the fact that Oates dedicated the story to Bob Dylan? Is she perhaps contrasting Dylan's music with the escapist (or in some other way unwholesome) music of other popular singers?
5. If you have read Flannery O'Connor's "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" (page 498), compare and contrast Arnold Friend and the Misfit.

CHAPTER 9

Comparison and Synthesis

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Define comparison and describe the process for comparing literary texts
- Evaluate a student interpretation
- Define synthesis and describe the process for analyzing and connecting literary texts
- Analyze and evaluate four student interpretations

Comparison and Critical Thinking

We synthesize texts when we create connections between them. Comparison is an effective tool for generating synthesis. An advanced critical thinking skill, synthesis builds on analysis by developing relationships among texts in order to illuminate a larger idea, issue, or theme. Synthesis is the process of bringing together separate literary texts and their analyses, locating points of meaningful connection between them, and creating interpretations and arguments that rely on and deepen those connections. Synthesis enacts the idea that new, often better, ideas come from seeing how two texts can work together rather than from seeing each text in isolation.

When we compare, we examine things for their resemblances to, and differences from, other things. Strictly speaking, if we emphasize the differences rather than the similarities, we are contrasting rather than comparing, but we need not preserve this distinction: We can call both processes comparing.

Although your instructor may ask you to write a comparison of two works of literature, the subject of the essay remains the two literary works; comparison is simply an effective analytical technique for showing the qualities in the works. We've examined a student paper that compares Chopin's exploration of women who are unfulfilled by marriage in "The Story of an Hour" (page 65) and "The Storm" (page 87). This paper created a meaningful comparison by locating a topic that connected the stories while revealing the subtle differences between them. A comparison of works that are utterly unlike each other can hardly tell the reader or the writer anything. One of the first steps in a successful comparison is selection: You will want to locate two or more literary texts that can work together to generate meaningful ideas.

A helpful way to think about synthesis is that you are aligning or juxtaposing two texts, positioning them against each other so that their overlapping ideas and interests can be revealed and analyzed. As its name implies, a comparison paper compares two texts, finding similarities between the two, while also finding revealing differences or contrasts between the two. Rather than simply locating points of comparison, followed by points of contrast, think of yourself as taking two multifaceted pieces of art and locating meaningful points of connection. As the texts are brought together, new insights are generated into each individual text and into the larger concepts that they explore together.

Organizing a Comparison Essay

Something should be said about organizing a comparison essay, say between the settings in two stories, between two characters in a novel (or even between a character at the end of a novel and the same character at the beginning of that novel), or between the symbolism in two poems. Probably, a student's first thought after making some jottings is to discuss one half of the comparison and then the second half. Instructors and textbooks (though not this one) usually condemn such an organization, arguing that such an essay breaks into two parts and that the second part involves a good deal of repetition of the categories set up in the first part. Often they recommend that students organize their thoughts along these lines:

1. First similarity
   a. First work (or character, or characteristic)
   b. Second work
2. Second similarity
   a. First work
   b. Second work
3. First difference
   a. First work
   b. Second work
4. Second difference
   a. First work
   b. Second work

You continue in this way, for as many additional differences as seem relevant. If you wish to compare Adventures of Huckleberry Finn with The Catcher in the Rye, you might organize the material thus:

1. First similarity: the narrator and his quest
   a. Huck
   b. Holden
2. Second similarity: the corrupt world surrounding the narrator
   a. Society in Huck
   b. Society in Catcher
3. First difference: degree to which the narrator fulfills his quest and escapes from society
   a. Huck's plan to "light out" to the frontier
   b. Holden's breakdown

Here is another way to organize a comparison and contrast:

1. First point: the narrator and his quest
   a. Similarities between Huck and Holden
   b. Differences between Huck and Holden
2. Second point: the corrupt world
   a. Similarities between the worlds in Huck and Catcher
   b. Differences between the worlds in Huck and Catcher
3. Third point: degree of success
   a. Similarities between Huck and Holden
   b. Differences between Huck and Holden

These outlines provide strong models of organization for a comparison essay, but a comparison need not employ either of them. There is even the danger that an essay employing either may not come into focus until the writer stands back from the seven-layer cake that he or she has created and announces in the concluding paragraph that the odd layers taste better. In your preparatory thinking, you may want to make comparisons in pairs:

- good-natured humor: the clown in Othello, the clownish grave-digger in Hamlet
- social satire: the clown in Othello, the grave-digger in Hamlet
- relevance of each character to theme X
- length of role and centrality of each character to each play

Before writing the final version, you must come to some conclusions about what your comparisons add up to.

The final version should not duplicate your thought processes; rather, it should be organized so as to make your point—the thesis—clearly and effectively. After reflection, you may believe that

- although there are superficial similarities between the clown in Othello and the clownish grave-digger in Hamlet,
- there are essential differences in the aims of their social satire, leading you to make an argument about how theme X is developed differently by each character.

In the finished essay, you will not want to obscure your main argument by jumping back and forth from play to play, working through all of the similarities and differences you've located. It may be better to discuss the clown in Othello and then to point out that, although the grave-digger in Hamlet resembles him in A, B, and C, the grave-digger also has other functions (D, E, and F) and is of greater consequence to Hamlet than the clown is to Othello. Some repetition in the second half of the essay ("The grave-digger's puns come even faster than the clown's . . .") will bind the two halves into a meaningful whole, making clear the degree of similarity or difference. The point of the essay will not be to list pairs of similarities or differences but to illuminate a work or works by making thoughtful comparisons in support of a larger argument.

In a long essay, the writer cannot postpone until, for example, page thirty a discussion of the second half of the comparison. In an essay of fewer than ten pages, the writer can set forth one half of the comparison and then, in light of it, the second half. The essay will break into two unrelated parts if the second half makes no use of the first half or if it fails to modify the first half. The second half of the paper must look back to the first half and call attention to differences that the new material reveals. As a student, you need to learn how to write an essay with interwoven comparisons, but you ought to know also that a comparison should be written in a simple and clear way.

Finally, a reminder: The purpose of a comparison is to call attention to the unique features of something by holding it up against something similar but significantly different. You can compare Macbeth with Banquo (two men who hear a prophecy but who respond differently), or Macbeth with Lady Macbeth (a husband and wife, both eager to be monarchs but differing in their sense of the consequences), or Hamlet with Holden Caulfield (two people who see themselves as surrounded by a corrupt world), but you can hardly compare Holden with Macbeth or with Lady Macbeth—there simply aren't enough points of resemblance to make it worth your effort to call attention to the subtle differences.

When the differences are great and apparent, a comparison is a waste of effort; you will be arguing about something that is not really arguable. ("Blueberries are different from elephants. Blueberries do not have trunks. And elephants do not grow on bushes.") Indeed, a comparison between essentially and evidently unlike things can only obscure your thesis, for by making the comparison, you imply that significant similarities do exist, and readers can only wonder why they do not see them. The essays that do break into two halves are essays that make uninstructive comparisons: For example, the first half tells the reader about five qualities in Alice Walker, and the second half tells the reader about five different qualities in Toni Morrison.

Comparison and Close Reading

Let's practice comparison by reminding ourselves that it is a natural analytical process that we engage in every day as we try to make sense of the texts that surround us. Our task is to use writing to make this process of comparison more rigorous and more generative of new insights. Let's examine a photograph, a visual "text" that we can examine closely and analyze for the ideas it conveys. We can apply a process of close reading, inquiry, interpretation, and argumentation to this photograph, just as we would to a written text. At first, the photograph seems to be a straightforward image of two people, but when we look at it more closely, we see that it contains several strange elements. The photograph becomes more interesting—and more enjoyable—the more we look at it. It invites close reading and inquiry.

An examination of this photograph demonstrates that comparison can take place within one text. Let's start the process of comparison by examining the two figures in the photograph and then move outward from the photograph, comparing it to a literary work. Later in the chapter, we will explore how to synthesize multiple literary works. In the next chapter, we will examine how research enacts a process of synthesizing primary sources (the literary work) and secondary sources (the critical article).

At a first glance, this photograph appears to be merely an old-fashioned image capturing a cowboy and an Indian standing side by side. But, almost instantly, the setup or premise of the photograph raises questions: Why would a cowboy and an Indian be standing side by side? If they fit into the stories we tell about the American West, aren't they supposed to be sworn enemies? As we look more carefully at the photograph, it becomes even more interesting. Are the cowboy and the Indian shaking hands? Are they clasping hands on top of a gun? Also, why are they dressed in such fancy clothes? Are they trying to impress each other—or impress us? As our curiosity about the photograph grows, these initial impressions and questions start to lead to an understanding of the text. For example, although the cowboy and the Indian seem to be just standing together, a close examination reveals that they are carefully posed, with the feathers on the headdress carefully spread out and their feet carefully arranged. Perhaps they are staging some sort of agreement or reconciliation?

William Notman, Foes in '76, Friends in '85. Photograph. The Sioux chief Sitting Bull appeared for one season in William F. Cody's show, Buffalo Bill's Wild West. Souvenir cards with this picture were sold.

Some basic information about the photograph can help us to come to understand it more fully. Rather than answer all of our questions, however, this information triggers more questions, encouraging us to become even more curious about the photograph's meaning.

The photograph that we are focusing on here, of Sitting Bull and Buffalo Bill, was taken by a Canadian photographer, William Notman (1826–91). Buffalo Bill—William F. Cody—got his name from his activities as a supplier of buffalo meat for workers on the Kansas Pacific Railway, but his fame came chiefly from his exploits as an army scout and a fighter against the Sioux Indians, and later from Buffalo Bill's Wild West. Buffalo Bill's Wild West was a show (though he never used this word because he insisted that the exhibition re-created recent Western history) consisting of mock battles with Indians, an attack on a stagecoach, and feats of horsemanship and sharpshooting. Sitting Bull, a Sioux chief, had defeated General George Custer at the Battle of Little Bighorn ten years before this picture was taken, but he had fled to Canada soon after the battle. In 1879, he was granted amnesty and returned to the United States, and, in 1885, he appeared in Buffalo Bill's Wild West. The photograph, titled Foes in '76, Friends in '85, was used to publicize the show.

With this information in mind, let's look at the photograph even more closely and inquire even more deeply about its meaning.

Comparison and Asking Questions

The writer Howard Nemerov once said, "If you really want to see something, look at something else." He was talking about the power of comparison to illuminate. We compare X and Y, not for the sake of making lists of similarities and differences, but for the sake of seeing X (or Y) more clearly. This book offers many writings for you to read with pleasure, and one source of pleasure is understanding. Your understanding of one work may be heightened by thinking about it in comparison with another work.

Suppose we want to think about the photograph of Sitting Bull and Buffalo Bill in order to deepen our understanding of it and to share our understanding with others. To say that the photograph's dimensions are such and such or even to say that it shows two people is merely to describe it, not to think about it. But, if we look more closely and compare the two figures in the photograph, our mind is energized. Comparing greatly stimulates the mind; by comparing X with Y, we notice things that we might otherwise pass over. Comparison leads to questions that deepen our understanding of the text:

- What resemblances and what differences do we see in the clothes of the two figures?
- What about their facial expressions?
- How do their poses compare?
- How are the two figures interacting?
- Is the setting significant?

As we try to answer these and other questions that come to mind, we may find ourselves jotting down phrases and sentences along the following lines:

> Buffalo Bill is in fancy clothing (shiny boots, a mammoth buckle, a decorated jacket)
>
> BB is striking a pose—very theatrical, his right hand on his heart, his head tilted slightly back, his eyes looking off as though he is gazing into the future. He seems to be working hard to present a grand image of himself.
>
> Sitting Bull simply stands there, apparently looking downward. One feels that he is going along with what is expected of him—after all, he had joined the show—but he refuses to make a fool of himself.
>
> Sitting Bull lets BB have upper hand (literally—on gun)
>
> BB in effect surrounds SB (Bill's right shoulder is behind Sitting Bull and Bill's left leg is in front of him).

Comparison and Analyzing Evidence

If we continue to look closely, we will probably notice that the landscape is fake—not the great outdoors but a set, with a painted backdrop and probably a fake grass mat. If we see these things, we may formulate the thesis that Buffalo Bill is all show biz and that Sitting Bull retains his dignity. If, in our essay, we support these assertions by pointing to evidence—specific details from the visual text that provide justification for our interpretation—we are demonstrating critical thinking. Let's look at some sample student interpretations of this photograph that rely on evidence-based comparison.

Student Work: Comparison Arguments

Here is the final paragraph from an informal essay that a student, Patricia Flynn, wrote on this photograph for her composition course.

> Buffalo Bill is obviously the dominant figure in this photograph, but he is not the outstanding one. His efforts to appear great only serve to make him appear small. His attempt to outshine Sitting Bull strikes us as faintly ridiculous. We do not need nor want to know any more about Buffalo Bill's personality; it is spread before us in the picture. Sitting Bull's inwardness and dignity make him more interesting than Buffalo Bill, and make us wish to prove our intuition and to ascertain that this proud Sioux was a great chief.

We think this analysis is excellent, but we also can see a student emphasizing different elements of the photograph and coming to different conclusions. If we reacted positively to the energetic pose of Buffalo Bill, we might come to the conclusion that he was a positive force for change in addition to being a showman. We can create an argument that advances this conclusion, as long as we have convincing evidence to support our ideas.

Here is the final paragraph from an informal essay written by Luis Torres, a student in the same composition course:

> The photograph conveys the positive energy that surrounds Buffalo Bill. By looking upward and out of the photo, Buffalo Bill seems to be welcoming the future and encouraging us to look forward to that future with him. Because he leans into and touches Sitting Bull, his future seems to be one of cooperation and working together. Sitting Bull is a solid presence, filled with dignity. But, it is Buffalo Bill's energy that might create a new future of connection between the white Americans and Native Americans.

Which interpretation of the photograph seems best to you? Can you create an interpretation that comes up with a new opinion or one that combines these two opinions? What details from the photograph do you feel are the most important to emphasize, and how do they shape your interpretation?

Comparison and Arguing with Yourself

Having compared the two figures in the photograph, we can extend the idea of textual comparison and interpretation further to connect the photograph to a poem. Let's look now at a short poem by E. E. Cummings, which was probably written in 1917, the year Buffalo Bill died, but was not published until 1920.

Cummings did not give it a title, but he included it in a group of poems called "Portraits." (In line 6, "pigeons" are clay targets used in skeet shooting or in exhibitions of marksmanship.)

E. E. Cummings

For biographical information on e.e. cummings, see page 811.

Buffalo Bill 's

Buffalo Bill 's defunct who used to ride a water smooth-silver stallion
and break one two three four five pigeons just like that Jesus
he was a handsome man
                and what i want to know is how do you like your blue eyed boy
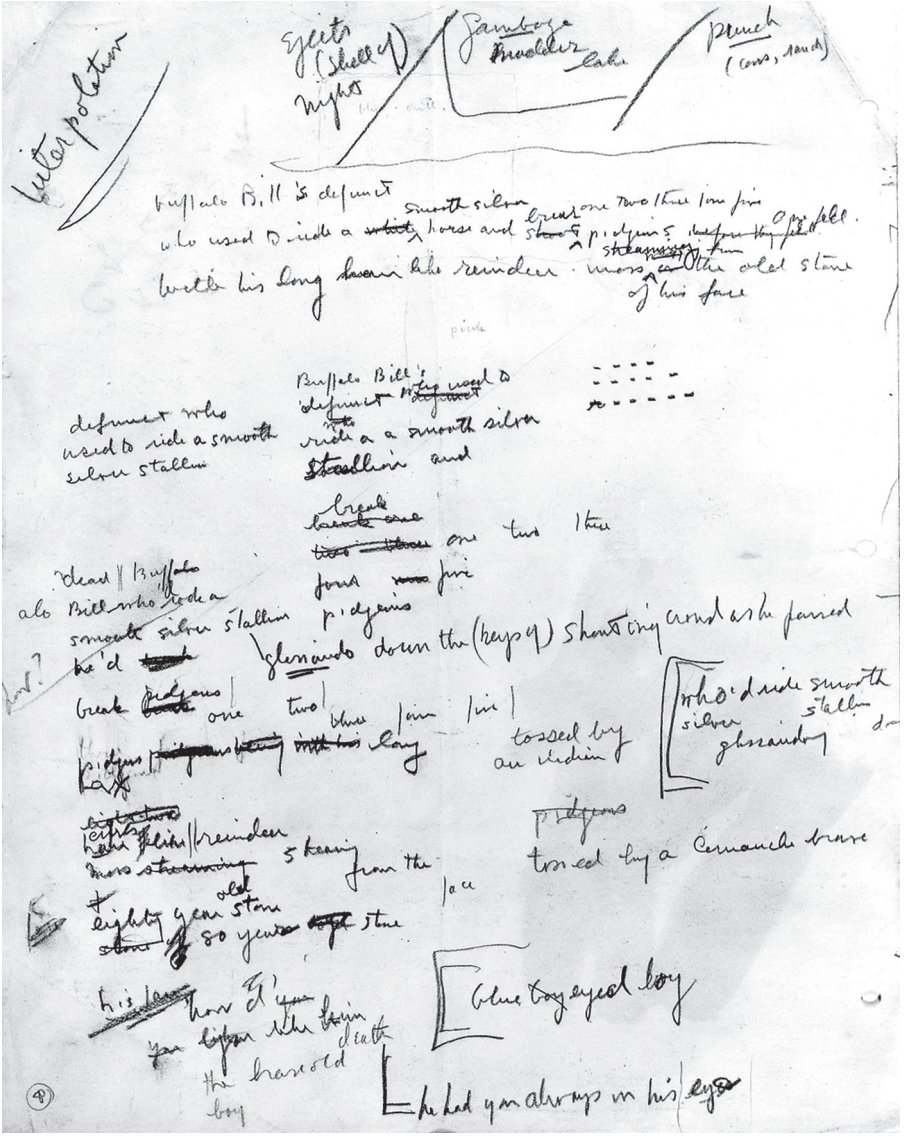
Mister Death



Read the poem, preferably aloud, at least two or three times and with as open a mind as possible. Don't assume that, because the photograph shows us a man who seems to be all show biz, this poem necessarily conveys the same attitude. After we generate an understanding of the poem, we can start to make comparisons to the photograph, noting similarities and differences.

Critical thinking requires that we keep asking questions as we formulate an interpretation. One way to generate questions that develop your ideas is to imagine arguing with yourself. How would you question your own assumptions, your use of evidence, or your original opinions? You will want to ask your own questions about the E. E. Cummings poem and arrive at your own responses, but for a start you may find it useful to consider the following inquiry questions and jot down tentative answers. We say "tentative" answers because, when you think about them, you will almost surely begin to question them and thus improve your responses. Notice how each question leads to more questions that can be used to deepen your thinking.

1. What is the speaker's attitude toward Buffalo Bill? (How do you know? What evidence can you point to?)
2. In line 6, why do you suppose Cummings ran the words together? Does this new word create a new image or sound in your mind?
3. Why do you think Cummings spaced the poem as he did? One student suggested that the lines form an arrowhead pointing to the right. Do you find merit in this suggestion? If not, what better explanation(s) can you offer?
4. What do you make of the address to "Mister Death"? Why "Mister Death" rather than "Mr. Death" or "Death"? If Mister Death could speak, what answer do you think he might give to the speaker's question?
5. What do you make of the use of "defunct" (as opposed to "dead") in line 2? Imagine creating the argument that "defunct" is a word that adds depth to the poem, making us think about how a person might no longer be functional or might have outlived his use. Now, imagine arguing with yourself and creating an opposing argument. Imagine arguing that "defunct" is a confusing word that starts the poem in an unclear fashion, making its description of Buffalo Bill difficult to understand. What word would you use in the second line to replace "defunct"?

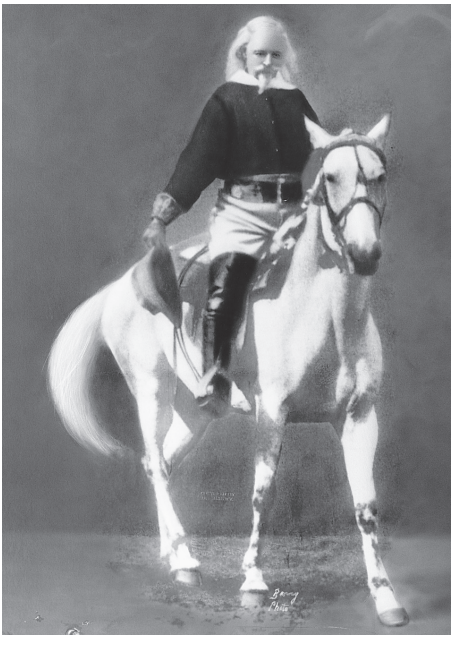
6. What do you make of "Jesus" in line 7? What is the effect of placing the word on a line by itself? Is Cummings being blasphemous? Is he inviting us to compare Buffalo Bill with Jesus? Support your response with evidence.

Manuscript of the draft of E. E. Cummings's poem (the final version appears on page 324).

Modern transcription of the draft reproduced on page 325.

7. After you've developed an understanding of the poem, return to the photograph. What is the image of Buffalo Bill created in the poem and how does that compare to the visual image of Buffalo Bill in the photograph? Do both texts present a "handsome" man? If Buffalo Bill is being presented as a skilled rifle shooter in the poem, is there a representation of that skill in the photograph? If, as the poem describes, Buffalo Bill rides a "watersmooth" stallion, is there a trace of that smooth and suave self-presentation in the photograph? Do the poem and the photograph encourage you to explore how and why Buffalo Bill is an alluring figure? Does he come across as attractive in both? Why or why not? Use your inquiry notes to continue to ask questions and develop answers that compare the poem and photograph.



8. Let's make another comparison. Compare the published poem with the manuscript draft. In the manuscript (see page 325); for a scholar's transcription of it, see page 326), you will notice that Cummings wrote, near the start, "with his long hair like reindeer moss streaming from the old stone of his face." These words do not appear in the final version. Do you think Cummings showed good judgment in deleting the line? Explain your answer.
9. Some readers say that Cummings is satirizing Buffalo Bill, and others say that he is satirizing death. Do you agree with either of these views? Why? (In a sentence or two, define satire—feel free to consult a dictionary—and perhaps give an example of it. By the way, it's possible to satirize the common human fear of death, but can death be satirized? How might that be done? And what would be the point?)

You may want to discuss some or all of these questions, as well as others that you generate for yourself, with classmates and with your instructor. It will be interesting to see whether differences of opinion can be resolved in discussion by pointing to evidence.

Finally, after you have thought about these questions, and any others that you may initiate, consider two opinions from published discussions of the poem:

1. Buffalo Bill, in the poem, functions as a destroyer, an agent of death.
2. The poem's image of Buffalo Bill on his "water smooth-silver stallion," riding to the center of the tent to accept the adulation of the crowd before his demonstration of crack marksmanship is acidly ironic.

Compare your own interpretations to these arguments. Do you agree with either statement, or with both? What evidence in the poem can you point to in order to support or rebut these assertions?

Buffalo Bill on a favorite horse.

✔CHECKLIST: Developing a Comparison

- ☐ Have you selected appropriate works for comparison? Does it make sense to compare these texts?
- ☐ Will your comparison lead to meaningful analysis and synthesis? What question will the comparison help to answer? What do you hope your reader will learn?
- ☐ Have you located a key bridge concept that you can use to compare the literary works?
- ☐ Does a close reading of the two works reveal unexpected connections between them? Can you create connections between the works on the level of theme? Can you create connections between the works on the level of form and structure?
- ☐ What evidence can you select from each work to strengthen your comparison? Can you locate specific words that appear in each work? Can you locate specific phrases that resonate across both works?
- ☐ As you develop your comparison, have you moved back and forth between the two texts? Did you interweave the texts, rather than allow each text's analysis to stand alone?
- ☐ As you developed your comparison, did you argue with yourself, considering alternative interpretations? Did you consider counterarguments?
- ☐ Does your comparison achieve synthesis, creating a relationship between the two works that allows a larger idea to be explored—and explored in a more sophisticated way than if it were addressed through only one work?

Synthesis through Close Reading: Analyzing a Revised Short Story

Let's continue to work on using synthesis to create relationships between texts, moving on to a comparison of two literary works. As we explore the activity of synthesizing texts, we will examine several students' note-taking techniques and explore how they develop new ideas through synthesis. These students' notes take innovative forms, demonstrating that synthesis is a creative process that generates exciting ideas.

Here, we start developing the skill of synthesis by selecting two texts defined by a clear relationship: One story is a revision of an earlier version. Consider these two versions of a very short story by Raymond Carver. In 1977, Carver published the first version, "Mine." In 1981, he published a revised version with a new title, "Popular Mechanics," and in 1986, he published the same revised version under yet another title, "Little Things." After the two stories, we present an innovative note-taking technique that uses a table to capture the close reading and interpretation process.

Read "Mine," and then read "Little Things." Then go back and reread both stories, marking differences and jotting down your own responses. What changes were made? Why do you think the changes were made? Do different ideas emerge in each story due to revision? What words were added or subtracted in the revision, and what ideas are emphasized, added, modified, or taken away in the revision? You may want to jot down your responses to the titles: Do you think the new title is better, or not? Why?

Raymond Carver

Raymond Carver (1938–1988) was born in Clatskanie, Oregon. In 1963, he graduated from Humboldt State College in northern California and then did further study at the University of Iowa.

As a young man, Carver wrote poetry while working at odd jobs; later he turned to fiction, though he continued to write poetry. Most of Carver's fiction narrates stories about bewildered and sometimes exhausted men and women.

Mine

During the day the sun had come out and the snow melted into dirty water. Streaks of water ran down from the little, shoulder-high window that faced the back yard. Cars slushed by on the street outside. It was getting dark, outside and inside.

He was in the bedroom pushing clothes into a suitcase when she came to the door.

I'm glad you're leaving. I'm glad you're leaving! she said. Do you hear?

He kept on putting his things into the suitcase and didn't look up.

Sonofabitch! I'm so glad you're leaving! She began to cry. You can't even look me in the face, can you? Then she noticed the baby's picture on the bed and picked it up.

He looked at her and she wiped her eyes and stared at him before turning and going back to the living room.

Bring that back.

Just get your things and get out, she said.

He did not answer. He fastened the suitcase, put on his coat, and looked at the bedroom before turning off the light. Then he went out to the living room. She stood in the doorway of the little kitchen, holding the baby.

I want the baby, he said.

Are you crazy?

No, but I want the baby. I'll get someone to come by for his things.

You can go to hell! You're not touching this baby.

The baby had begun to cry and she uncovered the blanket from around its head.

Oh, oh, she said, looking at the baby.

He moved towards her.

For God's sake! she said. She took a step back into the kitchen.

I want the baby.

Get out of here!

She turned and tried to hold the baby over in a corner behind the stove as he came up.

He reached across the stove and tightened his hands on the baby.

Let go of him, he said.

Get away, get away! she cried.

The baby was red-faced and screaming. In the scuffle they knocked down a little flower pot that hung behind the stove.

He crowded her into the wall then, trying to break her grip, holding onto the baby and pushing his weight against her arm.

Let go of him, he said.

Don't, she said, you're hurting him!

He didn't talk again. The kitchen window gave no light. In the near dark he worked on her fisted fingers with one hand and with the other hand he gripped the screaming baby up under an arm near the shoulder.

She felt her fingers being forced open and the baby going from her. No, she said, just as her hands came loose. She would have it, this baby whose chubby face gazed up at them from the picture on the table. She grabbed for the baby's other arm. She caught the baby around the wrist and leaned back.

He would not give. He felt the baby going out of his hands and he pulled back hard. He pulled back very hard. In this manner they decided the issue.

[1977]

Little Things

Early that day the weather turned and the snow was melting into dirty water. Streaks of it ran down from the little shoulder-high window that faced the backyard. Cars slushed by on the street outside, where it was getting dark. But it was getting dark on the inside too.

He was in the bedroom pushing clothes into a suitcase when she came to the door.

I'm glad you're leaving! I'm glad you're leaving! she said. Do you hear?

He kept on putting his things into the suitcase.

Son of a bitch! I'm so glad you're leaving! She began to cry. You can't even look me in the face, can you?

Then she noticed the baby's picture on the bed and picked it up.

He looked at her and she wiped her eyes and stared at him before turning and going back to the living room.

Bring that back, he said.

Just get your things and get out, she said.

He did not answer. He fastened the suitcase, put on his coat, looked around the bedroom before turning off the light. Then he went out to the living room.

She stood in the doorway of the little kitchen, holding the baby.

I want the baby, he said.

Are you crazy?

No, but I want the baby. I'll get someone to come by for his things.

You're not touching this baby, she said.

The baby had begun to cry and she uncovered the blanket from around his head.

Oh, oh, she said, looking at the baby.

He moved toward her.

For God's sake! she said. She took a step back into the kitchen.

I want the baby.

Get out of here!

She turned and tried to hold the baby over in a corner behind the stove.

But he came up. He reached across the stove and tightened his hands on the baby.

Let go of him, he said.

Get away, get away! she cried.

The baby was red-faced and screaming. In the scuffle they knocked down a flowerpot that hung behind the stove.

He crowded her into the wall then, trying to break her grip. He held on to the baby and pushed with all his weight.

Let go of him, he said.

Don't, she said. You're hurting the baby, she said.

I'm not hurting the baby, he said.

The kitchen window gave no light. In the near-dark he worked on her fisted fingers with one hand and with the other hand he gripped the screaming baby up under an arm near the shoulder.

She felt her fingers being forced open. She felt the baby going from her.

No! she screamed just as her hands came loose.

She would have it, this baby. She grabbed for the baby's other arm. She caught the baby around the wrist and leaned back.

35 But he would not let go. He felt the baby slipping out of his hands and he pulled back very hard.

In this manner, the issue was decided.

[1981]

Student Work: Innovative Listing

Let's examine how a student, Felix Tran, outlines the differences that he finds between the two stories. Felix uses a table format to list the changes that Carver made in the revision of the original story; he then adds a column to that table to capture his new ideas—his interpretation. In this way, his note taking encourages and captures both close reading and interpretation.

"Mine"	"Little Things"	My Interpretation
Line 1: melted	was melting	Revision: things are still under development, still in action
Line 3: Getting dark, outside and inside	But it was getting dark on the inside too	Revision: Emphasizes "inside"—makes you think more about that word
Line 4: and didn't look up	deleted	Revision: Makes sentence shorter? The reader has to figure out that he didn't look up.
Line 6: Then she noticed the baby's picture	New paragraph breaks	Revision: Makes writing more choppy? Captures stressful, broken relationship
Line 20: and he came up	Line 23: New paragraph break: but he came up	Revision: "But" emphasizes that he does things anyway. Makes writing choppy.
Line 28: He didn't talk again	Line 30: I'm not hurting the baby, he said.	Revision: Emphasizes idea of hurting baby. Do we believe the man? Is he protesting even though he knows he is hurting baby? Seems to make him even more argumentative and mean.
Line 28: This baby whose chubby face gazed up at them from the picture on the table.	Deleted	Revision: No image of happy child? Makes the revision even more depressing? I like the contrast set up between present and past in the first version.
Line 30: They decided the issue	The issue was decided	Revision: "They" connects the wife and husband. They = they are together. Revision deletes this idea, making them more separate. Revision makes it unclear who is to blame. (What happens—what is decided?)

After you annotate the two stories and think about your annotations, write a short essay arguing that, on balance, one version is superior to the other. You do not have to believe that every change was an improvement (or a worsening); in fact, you may want to argue that, in some ways, the earlier version is better and in some ways the later version is better. In any case, formulate a thesis sentence—a sentence that tells the reader the gist of your point—and then in 250–500 words support the thesis.

Synthesis through Building a Concept Bridge: Connecting Two Poems

By using synthesis, you often generate new ideas by comparing two literary works that are quite different. As you work to develop your skills of synthesis, remember that synthesis rests on the creation of relationships and that you need to select works that can generate meaningful connections. Then, as in any analytical writing, by means of synthesis, you will work to develop a thesis argument. In a comparison paper, the argument must find a meaningful point of connection between the two works and create an argument that highlights that connection. Comparison is a popular paper format because observation about what aspects two texts share and don't share, and why they are similar and different, can be used to create a strong argument.

As you prepare to write a comparison paper, reread your selected texts, and work to build bridges between them. Find literary concepts, structures, and devices that they have in common. At the same time, work to differentiate the two texts, showing how each contains unique elements. Make sure that your paper develops a larger understanding of each text through comparison: How does your thinking about a text become both clearer and more complex when you connect it to another text? How does your thinking about the concepts presented in each text become both clearer and more complex when you compare the texts?

Think of your writing as building a concept bridge between the two texts. For example, if two texts describe the same scenario of a pair of lovers on a beach, a juxtaposition may reveal how one creates a happy image by emphasizing the sunlight sparkling on the waves while the other creates an image of desperation by emphasizing the empty repetition of the waves. By bringing the two texts together, you can more clearly see how each is developing its ideas about love by using different images of the waves.

Let's turn to two poems that both feature the topic of tornadoes. This creates an obvious bridge between the two poems. Is there also a more conceptual bridge? After we read each poem, we can look at sample student notes, seeing the innovative responses inspired by these poems.

Thylias Moss

A poet, playwright, filmmaker, and sound artist, Thylias Moss has won a MacArthur Fellowship and Guggenheim Fellowship, recognizing her experimental work in creating new forms of art that combine writing, visual work, audio work, and technology. She explains the goals and processes of this interdisciplinary work on her Limited Fork Theory website. Moss was born in Ohio in 1954, attended Oberlin College and the University of New Hampshire, and works as a professor at the University of Michigan.

Tornados

Truth is, I envy them not because they dance; I out jitterbug them as I'm shuttled through and through legs strong as looms, weaving time. They do black more justice than I, frenzy of conductor of philharmonic and electricity, hair on end, result of the charge when horns and strings release the pent up Beethoven and Mozart. Ions played instead of notes. The movement is not wrath, not hormone swarm because I saw my first forming above the church a surrogate steeple. The morning of my first baptism and salvation already tangible, funnel for the spirit coming into me without losing a drop, my black guardian angel come to rescue me before all the words get out, I looked over Jordan and what did I see coming for?

to carry me home. Regardez it all comes back, even the first grade French, when the tornado stirs up the past, bewitched spoon lost in its own spin, like a roulette wheel that won't be steered like the world. They drove me underground, tornado watches and warnings, atomic bomb drills. Adult storms so I had to leave the room. Truth is the tornado is a perfect nappy curl, tightly wound, spinning wildly when I try to tamper with its nature, shunning

the hot comb and pressing oil even though if absolutely straight I'd have the longest hair in the world. Bouffant tornadic crown taking the royal path on a trip to town, stroll down Tornado Alley where it intersects Memory Lane. Smoky spirit-clouds, shadows searching for what cast them.

[1991]

Kwame Dawes

Born in 1962 in Ghana, Kwame Dawes grew up in Jamaica and is currently the Chancellor's Professor of English at the University of Nebraska. He also serves as the Glenna Luschie Editor-in-Chief of Prairie Schooner, an important literary magazine that features both a traditional book format and innovative online series. His publications include sixteen books of poetry, two novels, two collections of nonfiction writing, and several edited anthologies. His work is often inspired by the sights, sounds, and rhythms of Jamaica, and he has written an important study of the lyrics of the reggae musician Bob Marley.

Tornado Child

For Rosalie Richardson

I am a tornado child.
I come like a swirl of black and darken up your day;
I whip it all into my womb, lift you and your things, carry you to where you've never been, and maybe,

if I feel good, I might bring you back, all warm and scared, heart humming wild like a bird after early sudden flight.

I am a tornado child.
I tremble at the elements. When thunder rolls my womb trembles, remembering the tweak of contractions that tightened to a wail when my mother pushed me out into the black of a tornado night.

I am a tornado child,
you can tell us from far, by the crazy of our hair;
couldn't tame it if we tried. Even now I tie a bandanna to silence the din of anarchy in these coir-thick plaits.

I am a tornado child
born in the whirl of clouds; the center crumbled, then I came. My lovers know the blast of my chaotic giving;
they tremble at the whip of my supple thighs;
you cross me at your peril, I swallow light
when the warm of anger lashes me into a spin, the pine trees bend to me swept in my gyrations.

I am a tornado child.
When the spirit takes my head, I hurtle into the vacuum of white sheets billowing and paint a swirl of color, streaked with my many songs.

[2001]

Student Work: Innovative Journal Writing

Let's examine how a student, Esther St. Pierre, uses a personalized form of journal writing to build a concept bridge between the two poems. Esther creates a form of note taking that feels right for the critical thinking task before her: She creates synthesis by locating bridge concepts, noting key quotes, and then writing out her ideas about each concept. Notice that the emphasis is on the generation of ideas.

These poems connect tornadoes to black women. Race is central to both poems—right in the first stanza of each poem, we get the word "black." Then, each poem connects the idea of a tornado to a black woman's hair. The whole last stanza of "Tornados" is about hair. The poem's speaker describes the tornado as a "perfect nappy curl" and describes trying to tame her hair with a comb and oil. Her hair is a "bouffant tornadic crown"—at first I didn't get this image, but now I can see that her hair is like a tornado over her head, creating a crown. In "Tornado Child" the third stanza is all about hair. It explains "the crazy of our hair, / couldn't tame it if we tried." In the next line I think the hair is being put in a bandana because it is "anarchy." Again, the hair is out of control, like a tornado. I'd like to try to connect these two poems through these images of hair: the African-American woman's hair is wild, out of control—almost like it has a mind of its own.

POWER—STRENGTH

"Tornados"	"Tornado Child"
"frenzy"	"swirl of black"
"electricity"	"whip it"
"release /the pent up"	"scared,/heart humming"
"lost in its own spin"	"tremble . . . thunder"
"won't/be steered"	"din of anarchy"
"atomic bomb"	"whirl of cloud"
"spinning wildly"	"blast of my chaotic giving"
	"anger lashes me into a spin"

I think another key concept raised by both poems is the idea of power. The tornado is an incredibly powerful force of nature, able to cause fear and destruction. Both of the poems emphasize the tornado's power and especially that the power is out of control or almost out of control: "won't be steered" "anarchy." This is not a normal power, but a chaotic power full of energy. The use of words in each poem is great: frenzy, whip, whirl, release, spinning, wild, whirl—all of these capture the feel of the tornado. In addition, both poems use words that warn that the tornado might be on the verge of exploding: "atomic bomb," "blast of my chaotic giving." Threatens even more damage?

BAPTISM/BIRTH

"Tornados"	"Tornado Child"
"church . . . surrogate steeple"	"thunder rolls my womb"
"first baptism"	"contractions"
"salvation"	"mother pushed me out . . . tornado night"
"funnel for the spirit"	"born in the whirl of clouds"
"guardian angle"
"Jordan"
"tornado watches and warnings"

Both poems focus on a key event that involves tornadoes. "Tornados" describes a tornado that visits the speaker's church on the day of her first baptism. The tornado becomes the church's steeple. The poem's speaker was saying words at the baptism—but then she has to run underground to take shelter from the tornado. In "Tornado Child," the speaker describes being born, and it seems like the mother gave birth during a storm (or maybe the birth felt like a storm). The narrator keeps repeating "I am a tornado child" and says she is born in the "tornado night." In "Tornados," the poem connects the tornado to feelings of religion (like the idea of "funnel for the spirit"), but in "Tornado Child," the idea of birth is connected to sexuality (like the idea that "lovers know the blast of my chaotic giving"). Maybe the idea of baptism as rebirth can be connected to the idea of birth? In both poems, tornadoes seem to symbolize the female narrator, being connected to her sense of religion or sexuality (something deeper than her appearance/hair).

Now that you've read a student's attempt to create a concept bridge that connects the two poems, write a short essay that puts one or more of these connections into essay form. Can you create a thesis argument out of one of these concepts? Can you develop one of these concepts further? Can you find more evidence to support one of these concepts? Can you combine the concepts? You can, of course, develop your own concept bridge, locating evidence that supports an analytical response to the two poems. Write an essay of 250–500 words, remembering that the goal is synthesis—a connecting of the two texts to explore an important idea presented by both.

Synthesis Using Theme

As we've been exploring, with synthesis, you are developing relationships between texts, using those relationships to generate new insights into concepts that bridge the texts. Comparison offers a strategy for performing synthesis: It asks you to develop your ideas by locating similarities and differences among literary texts or parts of texts. Synthesis tests your critical thinking skills: How can you position texts alongside each other, using that relationship to reveal new ideas in each text?

When we turn to fiction, one of the first ways in which we might think about creating synthesis, then, is though theme. Theme is a central concept, idea, or issue explored by a story—a larger meaning or insight that the story reveals. A story will have one or more unifying or overarching concepts that it explores; theme is the presentation and development of those ideas. When we synthesize stories, we will often turn to their themes as a source of comparison.

Let's make the task of synthesis even more interesting by bringing together three pieces of microfiction. Let's see what themes emerge from these stories. As you read these very short stories by Sandra Cisneros, Maryanne O'Hara, and Jayne Anne Phillips, consider what themes might provide productive connections among all three.

Sandra Cisneros

Best known for The House on Mango Street (1984), a coming-of-age novel told through short chapters filled with poem-like lines, Sandra Cisneros has written poetry, novels, short stories, a children's book, and a picture book for adults. Born in Chicago in 1954, Cisneros received a BA in English from Loyola University of Chicago (1976) and an MFA in Creative Writing from the University of Iowa (1978). Raised in a family that repeatedly migrated between Mexico and the United States, she is an advocate for Latina writing and has created foundations that support socially conscious writers and writers connected to Texas. The importance of her writing has been recognized by a MacArthur Fellowship, National Endowment for the Arts awards, and the American Book Award from the Before Columbus Foundation.

Barbie-Q

Yours is the one with mean eyes and a ponytail. Striped swimsuit, stilettos, sunglasses, and gold hoop earrings. Mine is the one with bubble hair. Red swimsuit, stilettos, pearl earrings, and a wire stand. But that's all we can afford, besides one extra outfit apiece. Yours, "Red Flair," sophisticated A-line coatdress with a Jackie Kennedy pillbox hat, white gloves, handbag, and heels included. Mine, "solo in the Spotlight," evening elegance in black glitter strapless gown with a puffy skirt at the bottom like a mermaid tail, formal-length gloves, pink chiffon scarf, and mike included. From so much dressing and undressing, the black glitter wears off where her titties stick out. This and a dress invented from an old sock when we cut holes here and here and here, the cuff rolled over for the glamorous, fancy-free, off-the-shoulder look.

Every time the same story. Your Barbie is roommates with my Barbie, and my Barbie's boyfriend comes over and your Barbie steals him, okay? Kiss kiss kiss. Then the two Barbies fight. You dumbbell! He's mine. Oh no he's not, you stinky! Only Ken's invisible, right? Because we don't have money for a stupid-looking boy doll when we'd both rather ask for a new Barbie outfit next Christmas. We have to make do with your mean-eyed Barbie and my bubble head Barbie and our one outfit apiece not including the sock dress.

Until next Sunday when we are walking through the flea market on Maxwell Street and there! Lying on the street next to some tool bits, and platform shoes with the heels all squashed, and a fluorescent green wicker wastebasket, and aluminum foil, and hubcaps, and a pink shag rug, and windshield wiper blades, and dusty mason jars, and a coffee can full of rusty nails. There! Where? Two Mattel boxes. One with the "Career Gal" ensemble, snappy black-and-white business suit, three-quarter-length sleeve jacket with kick-pleated skirt, red sleeveless shell, gloves, pumps, and matching hat included. The other, "Sweet Dreams," dreamy pink-and-white plaid nightgown and matching robe, lace-trimmed slippers, hair-brush and hand mirror included. How much? Please, please, please, please, please, please, please, until they say okay.

On the outside you and me skipping and humming but inside we are doing loopity-loops and pirouetting. Until at the next vendor's stand, next to boxed pies, and bright orange toilet brushes, and rubber gloves, and wrench sets, and bouquets of feather flowers, and glass towel racks, and steel wool, and Alvin and the Chipmunks records, there! And there! And there! And there! and there! and there! and there! Bendable Legs Barbie with her new page-boy hairdo, Midge, Barbie's best friend. Ken, Barbie's boyfriend. Skipper, Barbie's little sister. Tutti and Todd, Barbie and Skipper's tiny twin sister and brother. Skipper's friends, Scooter and Ricky. Alan, Ken's buddy. And Francie, Barbie's MOD'ern cousin.

5 Everybody today selling toys, all of them damaged with water and smelling of smoke. Because a big toy warehouse on Halsted Street burned down yesterday—see there?—the smoke still rising and drifting across the Dan Ryan expressway. And now there is a big fire sale at Maxwell Street, today only. So what if we didn't get our new Bendable Legs Barbie and Midge and Ken and Skipper and Tutti and Todd and Scooter and Ricky and Alan and Francie in nice clean boxes and had to buy them on Maxwell Street, all water-soaked and sooty. So what if our Barbies smell like smoke when you hold them up to your nose even after you wash and wash and wash them. And if the prettiest doll, Barbie's MOD'ern cousin Francie with real eyelashes, eyelash brush included, has a left foot that's melted a little—so? If you dress her in her new "Prom Pinks" outfit, satin splendor with matching coat, gold belt, clutch, and hair bow included, so long as you don't lift her dress, right?—who's to know.

[1991]

Maryanne O'Hara

A novelist and short-story writer who lives in Massachusetts, Maryanne O'Hara earned an MFA from Emerson College and served as associate fiction editor for Boston's literary magazine, Ploughshares. She often takes her inspiration from local landscapes, and her novel Cascade (2012) fictionalizes the real events of the flooding of central Massachusetts towns to create the Quabbin Reservoir.

Diverging Paths and All That

In Dollar Saver, the aisles are empty, customers crowding Electronics watching Nixon resign on twenty TV sets. Dad dropped us off with three bucks to buy burgers but we've already spent it on fireballs and fudge.

While Nixon keeps the manager occupied, Billy demonstrates the "heads-up technique," the nonchalant gaze, his left hand filching Hershey bars and Bic pens while his right hand jingles pocket change. Billy grins, "I really save my dollars here."

Solo time. I head for Cosmetics, the wall of Peeper Sticks—blue and green and lavender eye crayons that've always cost dollars I don't have. My hand closes around Seafoam Green, hesitates, but what the hell, even the President's a crook, so I slip it up my sleeve. I try to sneak away natural as Billy, but my legs move too quick and stiff.

Billy meets me in Electronics, where Nixon's keeping his head up, not admitting a damn thing. Saying he'd be able to clear his name if he fought long enough, but he'll sacrifice his honor for the country. When he says he'll resign as of noon the next day, I check out all these adults who yelled, "Impeach the crook." Nobody cheers. The faces are solemn as gravestones. Billy's motioning, Come on on let's go, but I suddenly feel like I ate too much candy. I shake my sleeve, dropping the Peeper Stick onto a shelf, and follow Billy out the automatic doors. Dad's picking us up in two minutes, but Billy's headed someplace else.

[1996]

Jayne Anne Phillips

Born in 1952 in West Virginia, Jayne Anne Phillips earned a BA from West Virginia University and an MFA from the University of Iowa. She is currently a professor of English and the founding director of the Rutgers University–Newark MFA in Creative Writing Program. Her work wrestles with the American experiences of coming of age, maintaining family relationships, and struggling with the legacy of war, and includes the short story collection Fast Lanes (1984) and the novels Machine Dreams (1984) and Lark and Termite (2008).

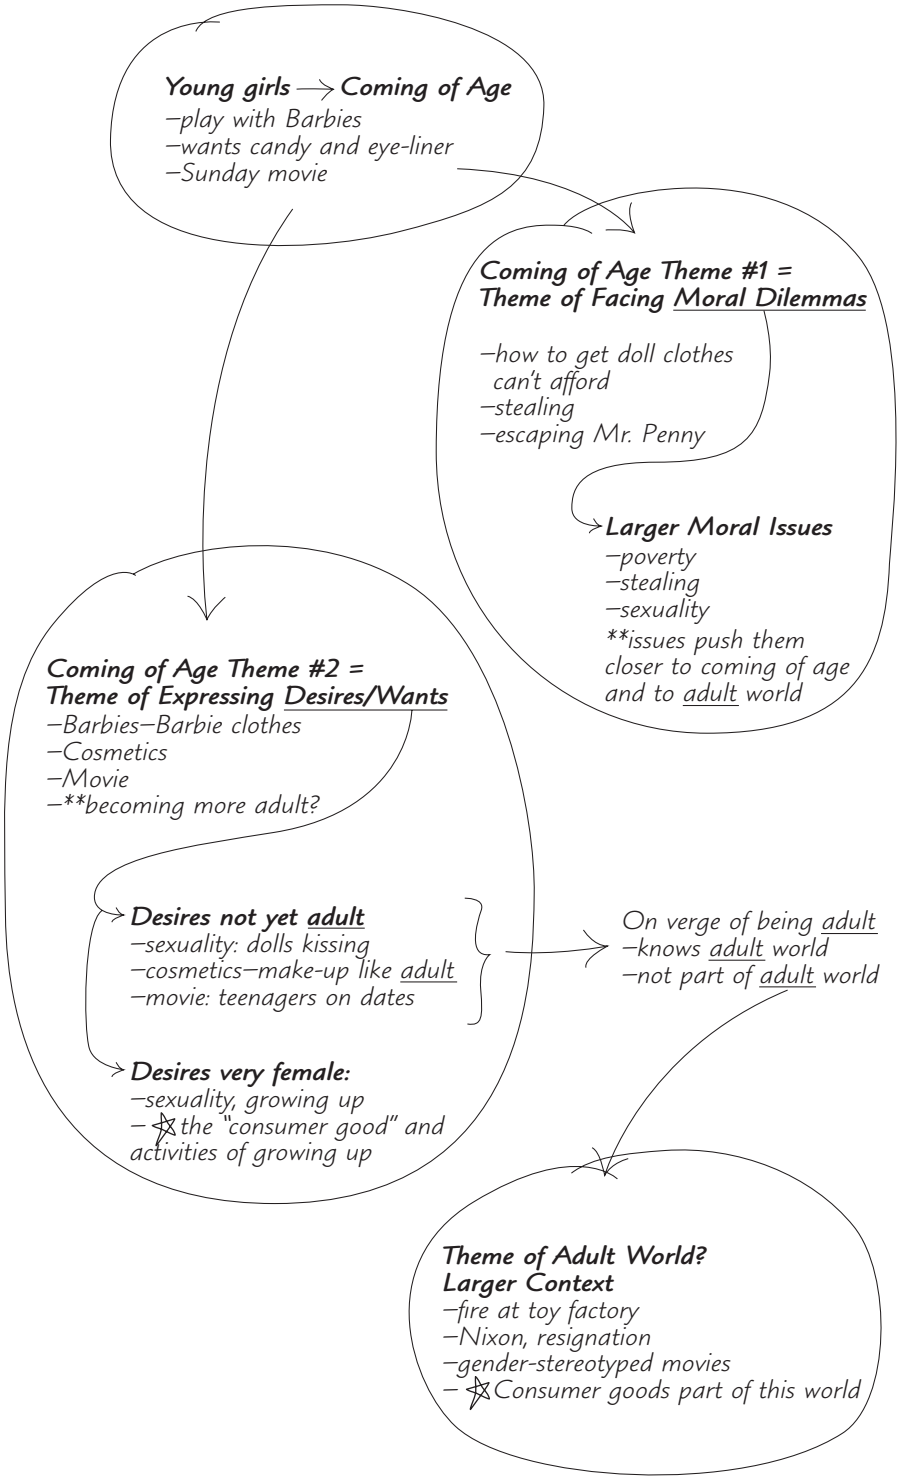
Sweethearts

We went to the movies every Friday and Sunday. On Friday nights the Colonial filled with an oily fragrance of teenagers while we hid in the back row of the balcony. An aura of light from the projection booth curved across our shoulders, round under cotton sweaters. Sacred grunts rose in back corners. The screen was far away and spilling color—big men sweating on horses and women with powdered breasts floating under satin. Near the end the film smelled hot and twisted as boys shuddered and girls sank down in their seats. We ran to the lobby before the lights came up to stand by the big ash can and watch them walk slowly downstairs. Mouths swollen and ripe, they drifted down like a sign of steam. The boys held their arms tense and shuffled from one foot to the other while the girls sniffed and combed their hair in the big mirror. Outside the neon lights on Main Street flashed stripes across the asphalt in the rain. They tossed their heads and shivered like ponies.

On Sunday afternoons the theater was deserted, a church that smelled of something frying. Mrs. Causton stood at the door to tear tickets with her fat buttered fingers. During the movie she stood watching the traffic light change in the empty street, pushing her glasses up over her nose and squeezing a damp kleenex. Mr. Penny was her skinny yellow father. He stood by the office door with his big push broom, smoking cigarettes and coughing.

Walking down the slanted floor to our seats we heard the swish of her thighs behind the candy counter and our shoes sliding on the worn carpet. The heavy velvet curtain moved its folds. We waited, and a cavernous dark pressed close around us, its breath pulling at our faces.



After the last blast of sound, it was Sunday afternoon, and Mr. Penny stood jingling his keys by the office door while we asked to use the phone. Before he turned the key he bent over and pulled us close with his bony arms. Stained finders kneading our chests, he wrapped us in old tobacco and called us his girls. I felt his wrinkled heart wheeze like a dog on a leash. Sweethearts, he whispered.

[1976]

Student Work: Innovative Mapping

As you read these three stories, you probably formulated ideas about how they might be connected. With three stories to compare, rather than just two, the relationships among ideas become more complex. How can you keep your ideas straight as you interweave and develop them?

Sample writing by a student offers an example of mapping ideas in a graphic, free-flowing fashion. Mapping allows connections between ideas to emerge through brainstorming and then allows those connections to be developed further. Mapping frees brainstorming from the linear thinking that an outline, list, or table supports. As you look at the mapping below, see if you think it generates interesting ideas that could lead to your writing a paper.

Young girls → Coming of Age
–play with Barbies
–wants candy and eye-liner
–Sunday movie
Coming of Age Theme #1 =
Theme of Facing Moral Dilemmas
–how to get doll clothes can't afford
–stealing
–escaping Mr. Penny
Larger Moral Issues
–poverty
–stealing
–sexuality
issues push them closer to coming of age and to adult world
Coming of Age Theme #2 =
Theme of Expressing Desires/Wants –Barbies–Barbie clothes
–Cosmetics
–Movie
–becoming more adult?
Desires not yet adult
–sexuality: dolls kissing
–cosmetics–make-up like adult
–movie: teenagers on dates
On verge of being adult
–knows adult world
–not part of adult world
Desires very female:
–sexuality, growing up
– ☆ the "consumer good" and activities of growing up
Theme of Adult World?
Larger Context
–fire at toy factory
–Nixon, resignation
–gender-stereotyped movies
– ☆ Consumer goods part of this world

Mapping creates a web of ideas across all three texts. This student's mapping seems to be leading toward a thesis that emphasizes the theme of young girls coming of age, focusing on young girls facing a moral dilemma or an issue that pushes them closer to the adult world. This theme becomes more specific if, following the mapping, it emphasizes how girlish desires become more adult desires or how girlish desires are expressed through consumer goods. Using this mapping as a starting point for further synthesis, see if you can continue to make notes in a mapping format. Then, write an informal essay of 250–500 words that explains the ideas discovered by the sample mapping provided here and your own mapping.

Synthesis Using Form

Having emphasized theme, let's now turn to form—the arrangement, shape, and structure of the text—as a source of comparison and synthesis-based thinking. Form emphasizes how ideas are expressed by literature, not just what the ideas are. All good literary analysis and literary synthesis will include a discussion of form.

Let's read two poems that take specific formal shapes and thus encourage the reader to analyze form in addition to theme. Shakespeare's "Sonnet 18: Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day?" takes the form of a sonnet, a fourteen-line poem that consists of three quatrains (a set of four rhymed lines) and a final couplet (a set of two rhymed lines), and uses iambic pentameter (a ten-syllable line, in which an unstressed syllable is followed by a stressed syllable). This sonnet rhyme scheme is noted as abab, cdcd, efef, gg. The sonnet structure organizes the flow of ideas though the poem and is thus important to recognize and analyze. Howard Moss's "Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day?" provides a modern translation of the poem into contemporary English. Although it reworks Shakespeare's lines, the poem does not follow the sonnet form. It contains only thirteen lines and modifies the rhyme scheme. We can ask why Moss's poem references Shakepeare's sonnet form but ultimately does not use it. For example, Moss's poem quite literally "falls short" of Shakespeare's sonnet, containing one less line.

After reading these two poems, we can examine a sample student essay that uses form to connect the poems.

William Shakespeare

William Shakespeare (1564–1616), born in Stratford-upon-Avon in England, is chiefly known as a dramatic poet, but he also wrote nondramatic poetry. In 1609, a volume of 154 of his sonnets was published, apparently without his permission. Probably he chose to keep his sonnets unpublished, not because he thought that they were of little value, but because it was more prestigious to be an amateur (unpublished) poet than a professional (published) poet. Although the sonnets were published in 1609, they were probably written in the mid-1590s, when there was a vogue for sonneteering. A contemporary writer in 1598 said that Shakespeare's "sugared Sonnets [circulate] among his private friends."

Sonnet 18: Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day?

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer's lease hath all too short a date;
Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimm'd;
And every fair from fair sometime declines,
By chance or nature's changing course untrimm'd;
But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st;
Nor shall death brag thou wander'st in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st:
So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

[1609]

Howard Moss

Howard Moss is best known for serving as the poetry editor at the New Yorker magazine for over thirty-five years, an influential position that allowed him to publish many of the most important poets of the twentieth century. His editorial work nurtured the careers of writers that included Theodore Roethke, Anne Sexton, and Sylvia Plath. His own poetry earned him acclaim, with his Selected Poems being awarded a 1972 National Book Award. Known for their wit and intelligence, his poems show an evolution toward darker themes and a more fluid style over the course of his career.

Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day?

Who says you're like one of the dog days?
You're nicer. And better.
Even in May, the weather can be gray,
And a summer sub-let doesn't last forever.
Sometimes the sun's too hot;
Sometimes it is not.
Who can stay young forever?
People break their necks or just drop dead!
But you? Never!
If there's just one condensed reader left
Who can figure out the abridged alphabet,
After you're dead and gone,
In this poem you'll live on.

[1976]

Student Comparison Essay: "Condensing Shakespeare: A Comic Re-writing of a Shakespeare Sonnet"

Kathryn Werner, a student taking a composition course, wrote the following synthesis paper. Her paper compares the two poems by exploring issues of form and theme. In fact, concerns about form, such as the activity of abridging a literary text, becomes the main theme of the paper. Let's explore this paper and how it addresses issues of form, including language, structure, rhyme, and writing style.

Kathryn Werner

Professor Jones

English 102

23 October 2016

Condensing Shakespeare: A Comic Re-writing of a Shakespeare Sonnet

Howard Moss's "Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day" is a comic re-writing of Shakespeare's "Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day." A comparison of Shakespeare's sonnet to Moss's updating of it reveals just how much Moss has removed from Shakespeare's poem while still retaining much of its meaning. The humor of Moss's poem comes from this activity of making the original much shorter and more concise. In addition, Moss has also substituted comic words for Shakespeare's lofty language, translating Shakespeare's language into common, direct, and even crude phrases. Moss's poem also copies Shakespeare's themes and simplifies them while adding to them. Shakespeare's poem is about love and Moss gives us a comic version of that theme of love. However, Moss's poem is also a comic analysis of writing, specifically the act of shortening—or "abridging" or "condensing" (to use his words)—a text (10–11). Moss's poem is less about love and more about the activity of editing. Moss forces us to think about the act of abridging literature, and to question what can and cannot be changed in a poem before it loses its connection to the original.

Moss's first ten lines follow Shakespeare's sonnet, offering a line-by-line rewriting of the poem in short, modern English. If we focus on that rewriting, the theme of love remains crucial. However, lines 10–11 are key and reveal that Moss is exploring a second theme in his poem. Lines 10–11 read: "If there's just one condensed reader left / Who can figure out the abridged alphabet," and the poem continues to explain that if there is just this one reader left, the beloved will live on in the poem. These lines completely rewrite Shakespeare's poem. They are some of the longest lines in the poem and contain the poem's most complex language, forcing the reader to slow down and contemplate their meaning. These lines focus on the idea of "condensing" and "abridging." They highlight what this poem is doing: condensing and abridging Shakespeare. These lines ask us to focus on those activities and think about how they work.

In addition, these lines emphasize the reader and hint at the idea that readers want condensed, shortened writing. Readers don't have the energy or knowledge needed to figure out the complex language of Shakespeare's sonnet. Today's readers, even more than when Moss was writing his poem in 1976, want condensed language. In today's world of texting and tweeting, who will find the time to read a complex poem like Shakespeare's? Moss seems to be playing around with this idea, asking us to think about the reader who will be able to figure out this poem. Will readers prefer the condensed version? Will there always be readers who will know that Moss's poem is not the original and re-writes a Shakespeare poem? Or, is that knowledge in danger of being lost?

With these ideas of annotation, condensing, and the reader's activity in mind, we must go back to read the rest of the poem. The poem achieves comedy by translating Shakespeare's evocative language into everyday slang. Shakespeare's imagery is also reduced to a series of common images of everyday life. Moss's poem seems to be making the point that simplifying poetry makes it more common and everyday.

Line-for-line, Moss follows and abridges Shakespeare's writing. Shakespeare's poem opens with the line "Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?" (1), which Moss re-writes as "Who says you're like one of the dog days?" (1). Moss's first line makes it clear that he is writing an over-the-top comic version of the original. The phrasing of "dog days" leaps off the page and emphasizes the idea of comparing a lover to the hottest days of summer. But, because the phrase also contains the word "dog," it hints at comparing the lover to a dog. Instead of creating the simile "my lover is like the summer," Moss creates the simile "my lover is like the summer" AND "my lover is like a dog"—an insulting idea! The first quatrain in Shakespeare's poem expands on this famous comparison between the beloved and a summer's day, proclaiming that the beloved is "more lovely and more temperate" (2). Moss translates this into the common phrasing "You're nicer. And better" (2). The downgrading of poetic language is exactly what makes Moss's poem humorous.

Shakespeare's second quatrain describes the failings of the natural world, failings which his lover does not have. When describing the sun, he writes that the "eye of heaven" can be "too hot" or can have its "gold complexion dimmed" (5–6). Moss condenses this into a straightforward line "Sometimes the sun's too hot;/Sometimes it is not" (5–6). The imagery of the "eye of heaven" and a "gold complexion" has been completely erased in favor of a straightforward statement. This condensed statement is true—of course, sometimes the sun is too hot and sometimes not—but it lacks beauty. When Shakespeare continues to explain that everyone's life must decline, Moss takes the idea of death and makes it comic, "People break their necks or just drop dead!" (8). Moss's poem removes beauty from a poem about a beautiful lover. Moss calls attention to the importance of poetic language by writing a poem that deletes it.

The third quatrain in each poem proclaims that the beloved will remain beautiful. Shakespeare writes, "thy eternal summer shall not fade" (9), while Moss exclaims, "But you? "Never!" (9). In Moss's abridgement, the line has become so short as to become almost meaningless. Not only is this line lacking poetic imagery, it also lacks a clear verb! The punctuation gives the line life, rather than the language. Each poem then explains that the beloved person will escape death by being written into the poem itself. The poem will preserve the beauty of the beloved, making it clear and accessible to future readers. While Shakespeare explains that his beloved "growest" in his "eternal lines" (12), Moss exclaims that he needs a "condensed reader" who can read the "abridged alphabet" of his poem (11). Moss has transformed "growing" into "condensing."

The form of Moss's sonnet calls attention to the act of condensing a text. While a typical Shakespearean sonnet has three quatrains totaling 12 lines, Moss's poem cuts the length of the sonnet short and gives the three quatrains only 11 lines. Immediately after he has stated that he needs a reader who can "figure out the abridged alphabet" (11). Moss makes an extreme abridgement to Shakespeare's sonnet: he cuts out an entire line. Moss calls attention to his "abridging" theme by acting out that theme in his sonnet's form.

Moss has not only abridged the sonnet, but has completely re-structured its form. Although he follows the "abab" rhyme scheme of the poem in the first couplet, throughout the rest of the sonnet he departs from that expected rhyme scheme. Perhaps he is making the point that if you abridge a sonnet enough, it stops being a sonnet. At what point does a poem stop being a poem?

The final couplet in Shakespeare's sonnet emphasizes that the beloved will live "So long as men can breathe or eyes can see," because his poem will "give life to thee" (13–14). Moss simplifies this idea into the lines "After you're dead and gone, In this poem you'll live on" (13). This captures the literal meaning of the poem, but it seems to miss what poetry is really about: capturing an image, creating a rich comparison, or evoking an emotion that will inspire future readers.

Moss calls attention to the act of abridging by condensing the sonnet's language, themes, and form. He questions that abridging by showing how much it can change a poem and how much it can even undermine the idea of poetry itself. In order for Moss's poem to be understood, he needs a reader who understands the original Shakespeare poem. The fun of Moss's poem is understanding the original and seeing how he has manipulated it. As a result, Moss really does need "one condensed reader" (10) who knows Shakespeare and knows how condensing works—he needs one reader who can "figure out" abridging in order for his poem to be understood. In this way, Moss's poem is about the reader and how the reader allows a poem to "live on." Moss's ideal reader would not be interested in just the beauty of a lover, but would be interested in thinking about what makes a sonnet a sonnet and what makes a sonnet, like Shakespeare's, live on throughout time. In this way, Moss offers a meaningful exploration of Shakespeare's ideas about the reader, and Moss makes them come alive in an unexpectedly fun and comic way.

[New page]

Works Cited

Moss, Howard. "Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day?" Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 342. Print.

Shakespeare, William. "Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day?" Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 342. Print.

✔CHECKLIST: Revising a Comparison

- ☐ Is the comparison meaningful? Does this synthesis of two or more texts lead to the development of interesting conceptual ideas?
- ☐ Is the point of the comparison—the reason for making it—clear? Is the point stated in a thesis sentence?
- ☐ Does the comparison cover all significant similarities and differences?
- ☐ Is the comparison readable; that is, is it clear and yet not tediously mechanical?
- ☐ Is the organization used—perhaps treating one text first and then the other, or perhaps shifting back and forth between texts—the best way to make the comparison?
- ☐ Does the comparison feature specific evidence? Do you break down the evidence into short quotations? Do you explain your analysis of the evidence and use it to synthesize the texts?
- ☐ If the comparison offers a value judgment, is that judgment fair? Does the comparison offer enough evidence to bring a reader into at least partial agreement?
- ☐ Has the comparison been edited for correctness, using correct sentence structure, word choice, and grammar?

Your Turn: Additional Poems and Stories for Comparison and Synthesis

Carpe Diem ("seize the day") Poems

Robert Herrick

Robert Herrick (1591–1674) was born in London, the son of a goldsmith. After taking a master's degree at Cambridge, he was ordained in the Church of England, and later he was sent to the country parish of Dean Prior in Devonshire, where he wrote most of his poetry. A loyal supporter of the king, he was expelled in 1647 from his parish by the Puritans, though in 1662 he was restored to Dean Prior.

To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
  Old Time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles today,
  Tomorrow will be dying.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun,
  The higher he's a-getting,
The sooner will his race be run,
  And nearer he's to setting.

That age is best which is the first,
  When youth and blood are warmer;

But being spent, the worse, and worst
Times still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time;
And while ye may, go marry;
For having lost but once your prime,
You may for ever tarry.

[1648]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Why did the poet write "rosebuds" rather than roses in the first line?
2. What sort of person seems to be speaking? Young or old? How do you know?
3. Doubtless this advice has something to commend it, but it is not the whole truth. Does the value of this poem depend on the soundness of its advice? Explain your answer.
4. Does the poem offer an argument? If so, how is the argument supported? Is it convincing? Explain your answer.

Christopher Marlowe

Christopher Marlowe (1564–93), English poet and playwright, was born in the same year as Shakespeare. An early death, in a tavern brawl, cut short what might have been a brilliant career.

Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" is a pastoral poem; it depicts shepherds and shepherdesses in an idyllic, timeless setting. This poem engendered many imitations and replies, three of which we reprint after Marlowe's poem.

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove,
That valleys, groves, hills, and fields,
Woods or steepy mountain yields.

There we will sit upon the rocks,
And see the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses
With a thousand fragrant posies,
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me and be my love.

The shepherds' swains shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me, and be my love.

[1599–1600]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

Read the poem two or three times, preferably aloud. Marlowe's poem is not to be taken seriously as a picture of the pastoral (shepherd) life, but if you have enjoyed the poem, exactly what have you enjoyed?

Sir Walter Raleigh

Walter Raleigh (1552–1618) is known chiefly as a soldier and a colonizer—he was the founder of the settlement in Virginia, and he introduced tobacco into Europe—but, in his own day, he was known also as a poet.

The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move,
To live with thee, and be thy love.

Time drives the flocks from field to fold,
When rivers rage, and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel° becometh dumb,
The rest complains of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields,
To wayward winter reckoning yields,
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle, and thy posies,
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten:
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
All these in me no means can move,
To come to thee, and be thy love.

But could youth last, and love still breed,
Had joys no date, nor age no need,
Then these delights my mind might move,
To live with thee and be thy love.

[c. 1600]

7 Philomel In Greek mythology, Philomela was a beautiful woman who was raped and later transformed into a chattering sparrow, but, in most Roman versions, she is transformed into the nightingale, noted for its beautiful song.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is the season in Marlowe's poem? What season(s) does Raleigh envision?
2. Some readers find puns in line 12, in "fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall." How do you paraphrase and interpret the line?
3. How would you describe the tone of the final stanza?
4. Now that you have read Raleigh's poem, reread Marlowe's poem. Do you now, in the context of Raleigh's poem, enjoy Marlowe's poem more than before, or less? Why? (You might think of it this way: Does Raleigh's refutation cause you to lose interest in Marlowe's poem?)

Andrew Marvell

Born in 1621 near Hull in England, Andrew Marvell attended Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduated in 1638. During the English Civil War (1642–1651), he was tutor to the daughter of Sir Thomas Fairfax in Yorkshire at Nun Appleton House, where most of his best-known poems were written. In 1657, he was appointed assistant to John Milton, the Latin Secretary for the Commonwealth. After the Restoration of the monarchy in 1659 until his death, Marvell represented Hull as a member of Parliament. Most of his poems were not published until after his death in 1678.

To His Coy Mistress

Had we but world enough, and time.
This coyness, lady, were no crime.
We would sit down, and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love's day.
Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
Should'st rubies find: I by the tide
Of Humber° would complain.° I would Love you ten years before the Flood,
And you should, if you please, refuse
Till the conversion of the Jews.°
My vegetable° love should grow
Vaster than empires, and more slow.
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze:
Two hundred to adore each breast:
But thirty thousand to the rest.
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart.
For, lady, you deserve this state,
Nor would I love at lower rate,
  But at my back I always hear
Time's winged chariot hurrying near;
And yonder all before us lie

7 Humber river in England; complain write love poems. 10 conversion of the Jews It was believed by Christians that the conversion of the Jews would occur just before the Last Judgment. 11 vegetable slowly growing.

Deserts of vast eternity.
Thy beauty shall no more be found,
Nor in thy marble vault shall sound
My echoing song; then worms shall try
That long preserved virginity,
And your quaint honor turn to dust,
And into ashes all my lust.
The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.
Now therefore, while the youthful hue
Sits on thy skin like morning dew,
And while thy willing soul transpires
At every pore with instant fires,
Now let us sport us while we may;
And now, like am'rous birds of prey,
Rather at once our time devour,
Than languish in his slow-chapt° power,
Let us roll all our strength, and all
Our sweetness, up into one ball;
And tear our pleasures with rough strife
Thorough° the iron gates of life.
Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still, yet we will make him run.

[1641]

40 slow-chapt slowly devouring. 44 Thorough through.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What does "coy" mean in the title, and "coyness" in line 2?
2. Do you think that the speaker's claims in lines 1–20 are so inflated that we detect behind them a playfully ironic tone? Explain. Why does the speaker say in line 8 that he would love "ten years before the Flood," rather than merely "since the Flood"?
3. What do you make of lines 21–24? Why is time behind the speaker, and eternity in front of him? Is this "eternity" the same as the period discussed in lines 1–20? Discuss the change in the speaker's tone after line 20.

John Donne

John Donne (1572–1631) was born into a Roman Catholic family in England, but in the 1590s he abandoned that faith. In 1615 he became an Anglican priest and soon was known as a great preacher. One hundred sixty of his sermons survive, including one with the famous line "No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less . . . and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee." From 1621 until his death Donne was dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. His love poems (often bawdy and cynical) are said to be his early work, and his "Holy Sonnets" (among the greatest religious poems written in English) his later work.

The Bait

Come live with me, and be my love,
And we will some new pleasures prove
Of golden sands, and crystal brooks,
With silken lines, and silver hooks.

There will the river whispering run
Warmed by thy eyes, more than the Sun.
And there th'enamored fish will stay,
Begging themselves they may betray.

When thou wilt swim in that live bath,
Each fish, which every channel hath,
Will amorously to thee swim,
Gladder to catch thee, than thou him.

If thou, to be so seen, beest loath,
By Sun, or Moon, thou darknest both,
And if my self have leave to see,
I need not their light, having thee.

Let others freeze with angling reeds,
And cut their legs, with shells and weeds,
Or treacherously poor fish beset,
With strangling snare, or windowy net:

Let coarse bold hands, from slimy nest
The bedded fish in banks out-wrest,
Or curious traitors, sleavesilk flies
Bewitch poor fishes' wandring eyes.

For thee, thou needst no such deceit,
For thou thy self art thine own bait;
That fish, that is not catched thereby,
Alas, is wiser far than I.

[1633]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In Donne's first stanza, which words especially indicate that we are (as in Marlowe's poem) in an idealized world?
2. Which words later in Donne's poem indicate what (for Donne) the real world of fishing is?
3. Paraphrase the last stanza, making it as clear as possible.

Poems about Blackberries

Galway Kinnell

Pulitzer Prize–winning poet Galway Kinnell (1927–2014) is known for his explorations of how personal philosophy and spirituality is rooted in the physical and social world. His poetry often examines nature, and many of his most famous poems, such as "The Bear," feature animals. His political poetry reflects his involvement in the civil rights movement and his protests against the Vietnam War. Born in Providence, Rhode Island, Kinnell served in U.S. Navy, earned a BA from Princeton University, and lived much of his adult life in Vermont.

Blackberry Eating

I love to go out in late September among the fat, overripe, icy, black blackberries to eat blackberries for breakfast, the stalks very prickly, a penalty
they earn for knowing the black art of blackberry-making; and as I stand among them lifting the stalks to my mouth, the ripest berries fall almost unbidden to my tongue, as words sometimes do, certain peculiar words like strengths and squinched, many-lettered, on-syllabled lumps,
which I squeeze, squinch open, and splurge well in the silent, startled, icy, black language of blackberry-eating in late September.

[1980]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Central to this poem is the comparison between blackberry eating and the inspiration of finding specific words when writing. How does the poem make this comparison? What specifically is being compared to blackberries? How is the physical body involved in both blackberry eating and locating words?
2. Examine the language used by the poem. Annotate the poem, noting how certain words are repeated. For example, how are the words "ripe," "icy," "squinch," and "black" repeated? How does the poem capture the taste of blackberries? How does it capture the action in writing?
3. The poem contains the interesting phrases "black art" and "blank language." What do these phrases mean within the context of the poem?
4. Before moving on to other poems about blackberries, write a short response to this poem. What is the emotional content of the poem? What are the thematic issues central to the poem? After your understanding of Kinnell's poem is in place, turn to other poems in this section and work toward making meaningful comparisons among them, using the questions that follow each poem.

Sylvia Plath

Sylvia Plath (1932–63) was born in Boston, the daughter of German immigrants. While still an undergraduate at Smith College, she published in Seventeen and Mademoiselle magazines, but her years at college, like her later years, were marked by manic-depressive periods. She details these difficulties in her semi-autobiographical novel, The Bell Jar (1963). After graduating from college, she went to England to study at Cambridge University, where she met the English poet Ted Hughes, whom she married in 1956. The marriage was unsuccessful, and they separated after having two children. She committed suicide at the age of thirty while living in London.

Blackberrying

Nobody in the lane, and nothing, nothing but blackberries,
Blackberries on either side, though on the right mainly,
A blackberry alley, going down in hooks, and a sea
Somewhere at the end of it, heaving. Blackberries
Big as the ball of my thumb, and dumb as eyes
Ebon in the hedges, fat
With blue-red juices. These they squander on my fingers.
I had not asked for such a blood sisterhood; they must love me.
They accommodate themselves to my milkbottle, flattening their sides.

Overhead go the choughs in black, cacophonous flocks—
Bits of burnt paper wheeling in a blown sky.
Theirs is the only voice, protesting, protesting.
I do not think the sea will appear at all.
The high, green meadows are glowing, as if lit from within.
I come to one bush of berries so ripe it is a bush of flies,
Hanging their bluegreen bellies and their wing panes in a Chinese screen.
The honey-feast of the berries has stunned them; they believe in heaven.
One more hook, and the berries and bushes end.

The only thing to come now is the sea.
From between two hills a sudden wind funnels at me,
Slapping its phantom laundry in my face.[21]
These hills are too green and sweet to have tasted salt.
I follow the sheep path between them. A last hook brings me
To the hills' northern face, and the face is orange rock
That looks out on nothing, nothing but a great space
Of white and pewter lights, and a din like silversmiths
Beating and beating at an intractable metal.

[1960]

21 Note: The third line of the third stanza has been corrected to read "Slapping its phantom laundry in my face" instead of "Grapping its phantom laundry in my face." [2/23/11].

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Plath's poem describes a walk along a lane filled with blackberries. Take notes on that walk, asking inquiry questions of each stanza. For example, how does the first stanza describe her interaction with the blackberries? What does she do with them? In the second stanza, what is up in the sky? What new sense does she introduce? In the third stanza, what is Plath's destination? What does she ultimately see, and how does she describe it? For each stanza, add to these inquiry questions and form answers for your questions.
2. What lines leap out at you that contain interesting words, phrases, images, or emotions? For example, consider the image of the wind "slapping its phantom laundry in my face." What lines catch your eye and ear? Why?
3. How would you characterize the speaker's motivations? Is the poem about the enjoyment of nature, or is it about the desire to reach a destination? What ideas or emotions motivate the speaker?
4. Compare this poem to Galway Kinnell's "Blackberry Eating." How does each poet describe picking blackberries? In each poem, do the blackberries seem excessive, such as being "overripe" in Kinnell's poem and a "honey-feast" in Plath's poem? How do blackberries connect the poems' speakers to nature? How do the blackberries connect to a larger quest or purpose on the part of the speaker?

Seamus Heaney

Seamus Heaney (1939–2013) was born in Belfast, Northern Ireland. He grew up on a farm and then went to Queens University in Belfast. Heaney lectured widely in Ireland, England, and the United States. He taught at Harvard (1985–2006) and was Regius Professor of Poetry at Oxford, a post that was held by Matthew Arnold and W. H. Auden. In addition to writing poetry, he wrote essays about poetry. In 1995, he was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature. "Digging," the first poem in his first book, reveals his concern with getting to the bottom of things.

Blackberry-Picking

Late August, given heavy rain and sun
For a full week, the blackberries would ripen.
At first, just one, a glossy purple clot
Among others, red, green, hard as a knot.
You ate that first one and its flesh was sweet
Like thickened wine: summer's blood was in it
Leaving stains upon the tongue and lust for Picking. Then red ones inked up and that hunger
Sent us out with milk cans, pea tins, jam-pots
Where briars scratched and wet grass bleached our boots.
Round hayfields, cornfields and potato-drills
We trekked and picked until the cans were full,
Until the tinkling bottom had been covered
With green ones, and on top big dark blobs burned
Like a plate of eyes. Our hands were peppered
With thorn pricks, our palms sticky as Bluebeard's.

We hoarded the fresh berries in the byre.
But when the bath was filled we found a fur,

A rat-grey fungus, glutting on our cache.
The juice was stinking too. Once off the bush
The fruit fermented, the sweet flesh would turn sour.
I always felt like crying. It wasn't fair
That all the lovely canfuls smelt of rot.
Each year I hoped they'd keep, knew they would not.

[1966]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In the first stanza, how does Heaney capture the physical pleasures of blackberry picking? How does Heaney's language compare to Kinnell's and his description of "fat, overripe, icy" berries that fall onto his tongue? How does Heaney's language compare to Plath's description of berries that are "fat/with blue-red juices" and are part of a "blood sisterhood"? What sensory images does each poet use? What colors does each poet use? Are there any words or images that create a concept bridge between two or more of these poems?
2. In the first stanza, how does Heaney explain the "lust for picking"? Annotate the poem, making sure to highlight the phrases that convey that lust. What triggers that lust? How is that lust expressed in the collecting of berries, such as the types of cans used or the places visited to collect the berries?
3. What happens in the second stanza? Where are the berries hidden? What happens to them? What is the "fur" that the speaker finds?
4. With the outcome described in the second stanza, is Heaney encouraging us to think about human motivations, hopes, dreams, or failures? Is Heaney trying to impart a larger lesson?
5. How does this poem's ending compare to the ending of Kinnell's, Plath's, and (as the next poem in the series) Komunyakka's poems? Write a short analytical essay that compares the ending of two (or more) of these poems, creating an argument about how each ending explores a conceptual issue represented by the blackberries rather than the blackberries themselves.

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA

Yusef Komunyakaa was born in 1947 in Bogalusa, Louisiana. After graduating from high school, he entered the army and served in Vietnam, where he was awarded the Bronze Star. On his return to the United States, he earned a BA at the University of Colorado and then an MA at Colorado State University and an MFA in creative writing at the University of California, Irvine. The author of several books of poetry, Komunyakaa teaches at New York University.

Blackberries

They left my hands like a printer's
Or thief's before a police blotter
& pulled me into early morning's
Terrestrial sweetness, so thick
The damp ground was consecrated
Where they fell among a garland of thorns.

Although I could smell old lime-covered
History, at ten I'd still hold out my hands
& berries fell into them. Eating from one & filling a half gallon with the other,
I ate the mythology & dreamt
Of pies & cobbler, almost

Needful as forgiveness. My bird dog Spot
Eyed blue jays & thrashers. The mud frogs
In rich blackness, hid from daylight.
An hour later, beside City Limits Road
I balanced a gleaming can in each hand,
Limboed between worlds, repeating one dollar.

The big blue car made me sweat.
Wintertime crawled out of the windows.
When I leaned closer I saw the boy
& girl my age, in the wide back seat
Smirking, & it was then I remembered my fingers
Burning with thorns among berries too ripe to touch.

[1992]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Like the poems by Kinnell, Plath, and Heaney, Komunyakaa's poem conveys the excitement of finding and eating berries. Annotate Komunyakaa's poem, circling and underlining key words and exploring how he uses language to describe the berries. How are his images similar to, or different from, the images used by the three other poets? What images can you use to create a concept bridge that connects these poems?
2. How does Komunyakaa describe the sweetness of the berries and the painful sting of their thorns? Why is something that is both sweet and painful a perfect object for exploring the speaker's maturation or coming of age? Do Kinnell, Plath, and Heaney also describe the undesirable thorns of the desirable berries? Compare and contrast each poem's exploration of the blackberries' thorns.
3. What does the speaker hope to do with his can of berries? Why is the speaker "repeating one dollar"? Why is the speaker "limboed between worlds"?
4. Read and reread the last stanza, and then write an explication of these final lines. Work your way through each line of the poem, explaining its meaning and noting how the poem's formal elements create that meaning. What event takes place? What ideas and emotions does this event trigger in the speaker? Why is this moment meaningful to the speaker?

Poems about America

Walt Whitman

Walt Whitman (1819–92) was born on Long Island, New York, the son of a farmer. The young Whitman taught school and worked as a carpenter, a printer, a newspaper editor, and, during the Civil War, as a volunteer nurse on the Union side. After the war, he supported himself by doing secretarial jobs. In Whitman's own day, his poetry was highly controversial because of its unusual form (formlessness, many people said) and its often erotic implications.

I Hear America Singing

I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear,
Those of mechanics, each one singing his as it should be blithe and strong,
The carpenter singing his as he measures his plank or beam,
The mason singing his as he makes ready for work, or leaves off work,
The boatman singing what belongs to him in his boat, the deckhand singing on the steamboat deck,
The shoemaker singing as he sits on his bench, the hatter singing as he stands,
The wood-cutter's song, the ploughboy's on his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown,
The delicious singing of the mother, or of the young wife at work, or of the girl sewing or washing,
Each singing what belongs to him or her and to none else,
The day what belongs to the day—at night the party of young fellows, robust, friendly,
Singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs.

[1860; rev. 1867]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is Whitman doing in this poem?
2. How are the workers to whom Whitman refers similar to one another? How are they different?
3. Does Whitman's poem speak to us today? Explain why it does or does not.
4. Please write your own version of Whitman's poem, with your own choice of representative workers.

Langston Hughes

Langston Hughes (1902–67) was born in Joplin, Missouri. He lived part of his youth in Mexico, spent a year at Columbia University, served as a merchant seaman, and worked in a Paris nightclub, where he showed some of his poems to Alain Locke, a strong advocate of African American literature. After returning to the United States, Hughes went on to publish poetry, fiction, plays, essays, and biographies.

I, Too [Sing America]

I, too, sing America.

I am the darker brother.
They send me to eat in the kitchen

When company comes,
But I laugh,
And eat well,
And grow strong.

Tomorrow,
I'll be at the table
When company comes.
Nobody'll dare
Say to me,
"Eat in the kitchen,"
Then.

Besides,
They'll see how beautiful I am
And be ashamed—

I, too, am America.

[1926]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. How is this poem an answer to, or continuation of, Walt Whitman's "I Hear America Singing." At first these poems appear to be very different. How can you synthesize them? How does the Hughes poem bring race into the Whitman poem? Can the poems be compared in terms of both form and content? How do the poems connect? How do they not connect?
2. The activity of eating in the kitchen or at a table provides the poem with its central images. What does it mean to "eat in the kitchen"? What does it mean to eat "at the table"?
3. After reading Whitman's "I Hear America Singing," return to Hughes's "I, Too, [Sing America]." Can you ask new inquiry questions of Hughes's poem after reading Whitman's poem? For example, why does Hughes's speaker state that he sings America but then does not describe himself singing? In contrast, Whitman's poem describes many acts of singing. Continue to ask questions that compare the two poems. What other new insights can a comparison of the two poems generate?
4. Compare the first and last lines of the poem. What crucial change has been made? How does this change shift the meaning of the line and of the entire poem?

Stories about Reading and Writing

Julio Cortázar

In 1951, novelist and short-story writer Julio Cortázar left his native Argentina because of his disillusionment with its political leadership and class structure. Although Cortázar traveled widely, he settled in Paris and died there in 1984. His fiction is known for its experimental style, abstract and surreal ideas, and playful questioning of human existence. His 1963 novel, Rayuela (Hopscotch), allows the reader to rearrange its parts, demonstrating Cortázar's interest in rethinking the meaning, structure, and purpose of storytelling. "The Continuity of Parks" plays with the trajectory of time and space, creating a sense of vertigo in the reader.

The Continuity of Parks

He had begun to read the novel a few days before. He had put it aside because of some urgent business, opened it again on his way back to the estate by train; he allowed himself a slowly growing interest in the plot, in the drawing of characters. That afternoon, after writing a letter to his agent and discussing with the manager of his estate a matter of joint ownership, he returned to the book in the tranquility of his study which looked out upon the park with its oaks. Sprawled in his favorite armchair, with his back to the door, which would otherwise have bothered him as an irritating possibility for intrusions, he let his left hand caress once and again the green velvet upholstery and set to reading the final chapters. Without effort his memory retained the names and images of the protagonists; the illusion took hold of him almost at once. He tasted the almost perverse pleasure of disengaging himself line by line from all that surrounded him, and feeling at the same time that his head was relaxing comfortably against the green velvet of the armchair with its high back, that the cigarettes were still within reach of his hand, that beyond the great windows the afternoon air danced under the oak trees in the park. Word by word, immersed in the sordid dilemma of the hero and heroine, letting himself go toward where the images came together and took on color and movement, he was witness to the final encounter in the mountain cabin. The woman arrived first, apprehensive; now the lover came in, his face cut by the backlash of a branch. Admirably she stanched the blood with her kisses, but he rebuffed her caresses, he had not come to repeat the ceremonies of a secret passion, protected by a world of dry leaves and furtive paths through the forest. The dagger warmed itself against his chest, and underneath pounded liberty, ready to spring. A lustful, yearning dialogue raced down the pages like a rivulet of snakes, and one felt it had all been decided from eternity. Even those caresses which writhed about the lover's body, as though wishing to keep him there, to dissuade him from it, sketched abominably the figure of that other body it was necessary to destroy. Nothing had been forgotten: alibis, unforeseen hazards, possible mistakes. From this hour on, each instant had its use minutely assigned. The cold-blooded, double re-examination of the details was barely interrupted for a hand to caress a cheek. It was beginning to get dark.

Without looking at each other now, rigidly fixed upon the task which awaited them, they separated at the cabin door. She was to follow the trail that led north. On the path leading in the opposite direction, he turned for a moment to watch her running with her hair let loose. He ran in turn, crouching among the trees and hedges until he could distinguish in the yellowish fog of dusk the avenue of trees leading up to the house. The dogs were not supposed to bark, and they did not bark. The estate manager would not be there at this hour, and he was not. He went up the three porch steps and entered. Through the blood galloping in his ears came the woman's words: first a blue parlor, then a gallery, then a carpeted stairway. At the top, two doors. No one in the first bedroom, no one in the second. The door of the salon, and then the knife in his hand, the light from the great windows, the high back of an armchair covered in green velvet, the head of the man in the chair reading a novel.

[1967]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Why does Cortázar not name his characters? What is the effect of not using names?
2. What is the man's situation? Reread the story closely, working to determine when you realize the man is reading. At what point does the story shift from the man's perspective to his reading? Are they ever separated?
3. What is the situation of the lovers? Are they in the man's novel, or are they real? Is the knife at the end part of the story, or is it real? Write an essay that makes an argument and defends your interpretation. Use quotations from the text to support your ideas.
4. How does this story fit the definition of "metafiction"? Write an essay that defines this term and then applies it to "The Continuity of Parks" and "Things You Should Know," the next story under consideration. In your opinion, which story provides the better example of metafiction?

A. M. Homes

An award-winning fiction writer, essayist, and television writer and producer, A. M. (Amy Michael) Homes is known for creating extreme characters and imagining extreme acts, such as murder and arson. She explores the pressures of the American dream—having the perfect family and possessions—in darkly comic novels such as May We Be Forgiven (2013) and Music for Torching (2000). Born in 1962, Homes was adopted at birth by a Maryland family and later reunited with her birth mother, an experience she details in her memoir The Mistress's Daughter (2007).

Things You Should Know

There are things I do not know. I was absent the day they passed out the information sheets. I was home in bed with a fever and an earache. I lay with the heating pad pressed to my head, burning my ear. I lay with the heating pad until my mother came in and said, "Don't keep it on high or you'll burn yourself." This was something I knew but chose to forget.

The information sheets had the words "Things You Should Know" typed across the top of the page. They were mimeographed pages, purple ink on white paper. The sheets were written by my fourth-grade teacher. They were written when she was young and thought about things. She thought of a language for these things and wrote them down in red Magic Marker.

By the time she was my teacher, she'd been teaching for a very long time but had never gotten past fourth grade. She had'nt done anything since her Things You Should Know sheets, which didn't really count, since she'd written them while she was still a student.

After my ear got better, the infection cured, the red burn mark faded into a sort of a Florida tan, I went back to school. Right away I knew I'd missed something important. "Ask the other students to fill you in on what happened while you were ill," the principal said when I handed her the note from my mother. But none of the others would talk to me. Immediately I knew this was because they'd gotten the information sheets and we no longer spoke the same language.

I tried asking the teacher, "Is there anything I missed while I was out?" She handed me a stack of maps to color in and some math problems. "You should put a little Vaseline on your ear," she said. "It'll keep it from peeling."

"Is there anything else?" I asked. She shook her head.

I couldn't just come out and say it. I could'nt say, You know, those information sheets, the ones you passed out the other day while I was home burning my ear. Do you have an extra copy? I could'nt ask because I'd already asked everyone. I asked so many people—my parents, their friends, random strangers—that in the end they sent me to a psychiatrist.

"What exactly do you think is written on this 'Things to Know' paper?" he asked me.

"'Things You Should Know,'" I said. 'It's not things to know not things you will learn, but things you already should know but maybe are a little dumb, so you don't."

"Yes," he said, nodding. "And what are those things?"

"You're asking me?" I shouted. "I don't know. You're the one who should know. You tell me. I never saw the list."

Time passed. I grew up. I grew older. I grew deaf in one ear. In the newspaper I read that the teacher had died. She was eighty-four. In time I began to notice there was less to know. All the same, I kept looking for the list. Once, in an old bookstore, I thought I found page four. It was old, faded, folded into quarters and stuffed into an early volume of Henry Miller's essays. The top part of the page had been torn off. It began with number six: "Do what you will because you will anyway" Number twenty-eight was: "If you begin and it is not the beginning, begin again." And so on. At the bottom of the page it said, "Chin San Fortune Company lines I through 32."

Years later, when I was even older, when those younger than me seemed to know less than I ever had, I wrote a story. And in a room full of people, full of people who knew the list and some who I was sure did not, I stood to read. "As a child, I burned my ear into a Florida tan."

"Stop," a man yelled, waving his hands at me.

"Why?"

"Don't you know?" he said. I shook my head. He was a man who knew the list, who probably had his own personal copy. He had based his life on it, on trying to explain it to others.

He spoke, he drew diagrams, splintering poles of chalk as he put pictures on a blackboard. He tried to tell of the things he knew. He tried to talk but did not have the language of the teacher.

I breathed deeply and thought of Chin San number twenty-eight. "If you begin and it is not the beginning, begin again."

"I will begin again," I announced. Because I had stated this and had not asked for a second chance, because I was standing and he was seated, because it was still early in the evening, the man who had stopped me nodded, all right.

"Things You Should Know," I said.

"Good title, good title," the man said. "Go on, go on."

"There is a list," I said, nearing the end. "It is a list you make yourself. And at the top of the page you write, 'Things You Should Know.'"

[1998]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. How is this a story about reading? Compare the character of the reader in "The Continuity of Parks" to the character of the reader in "Things You Should Know." Are there any similarities?
2. Explain the premise of this story. The story's speaker believes that a paper labeled "Things You Should Know" has been circulated by her fourth-grade teacher. Explain this paper. Why is it so important to the reader? What sort of fantasy does this story feed into? For example, do we all wish that we were given a set of life instructions? What is the author's stance in the story toward this type of wish?
3. What details in this story strike you as interesting or funny? Select a detail, and write inquiry questions about it. How can you open up a seemingly small detail to larger meanings? For example, what do you make of the speaker's burnt ear? What does the "Chin San Fortune Company" paper represent?
4. What does this story suggest about the human search for meaning? Reread the last subsection of the story, and examine the last sentences closely. What are the wise sayings that the speaker is able to use?
5. How does both "The Continuity of Parks" and "Things You Should Know" explore confusion between fantasy and reality? How does each short story comment on the power of fiction over our real lives?

Stories about Grandmothers

Lan Samantha Chang

Born in 1965 in Wisconsin to parents who emigrated from China, Lan Samantha Chang's fiction memorializes her Chinese ancestry. She earned a BA from Yale University, an MA from Harvard University, and an MFA from the University of Iowa. She currently works as the director of the prestigious Iowa Writers' Workshop. Her publications include two novels, Inheritance (2004) and All Is Forgotten, Nothing Is Lost (2010), and the collection Hunger: A Novella and Stories (1998). In addition to being awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship, Chang has been honored as a recipient of the PEN Beyond Margins Award (now known as the Open Book Award).

Water Names

Summertime at dusk we'd gather on the back porch, tired and sticky from another day of fierce encoded quarrels, nursing our mosquito bites and frail dignities, sisters in name only. At first we'd pinch and slap each other, fighting for the best—least ragged—folding chair. Then we'd argue over who would sit next to our grandmother. We were so close together on the tiny porch that we often pulled our own hair by mistake. Forbidden to bite, we planted silent toothmarks on each other's wrists. We ignored the bulk of house behind us, the yard, the fields, the darkening sky. We even forgot about our grandmother. Then suddenly we'd hear her old, dry voice, very close, almost on the backs of our necks.

"Xiushilala! Shame on you. Fighting like a bunch of chickens."

And Ingrid, the oldest, would freeze with her thumb and forefinger right on the back of Lily's arm. I would slide my hand away from the end of Ingrid's braid. Ashamed, we would shuffle our feet while Waipuo calmly found her chair.

On some nights she sat with us in silence, the tip of her cigarette glowing red like a distant stoplight. But on some nights she told us stories, "just to keep your Chinese," she said, and the red dot flickered and danced, making ghostly shapes as she moved her hands like a magician in the dark.

5 "In these prairie crickets I often hear the sound of rippling waters, of the Yangtze River," she said. "Granddaughters, you are descended on both sides from people of the water country, near the mouth of the great Chang Jiang, as it is called, where the river is so grand and broad that even on clear days you can scarcely see the other side.

"The Chang Jiang runs four thousand miles, originating in the Himalaya mountains where it crashes, flecked with gold dust, down steep cliffs so perilous and remote that few humans have ever seen them. In central China, the river squeezes through deep gorges, then widens in its last thousand miles to the sea. Our ancestors have lived near the mouth of the river, the ever-changing delta, near a city called Nanjing, for more than a thousand years."

"A thousand years," murmured Lily, who was only ten. When she was younger she had sometimes burst into nervous crying at the thought of so many years. Her small insistent fingers grabbed my fingers in the dark.

"Through your mother and I you are descended from a line of great men and women. We have survived countless floods and seasons of ill-fortune because we have the spirit of the river in us. Unlike mountains, we cannot be powdered down or broken apart. Instead, we run together, like raindrops. Our strength and spirit wear down mountains into sand. But even our people must respect the water."

She paused, and a bit of ash glowed briefly as it drifted to the floor.

10 "When I was young, my own grandmother once told me the story of Wen Zhiqing's daughter. Twelve hundred years ago the civilized parts of China still lay to the north, and the Yangtze valley lay unspoiled. In those days lived an ancestor named Wen Zhiqing, a resourceful man, and proud. He had been fishing for many years with trained cormorants, which you girls of course have never seen. Cormorants are sleek, black birds with long, bending necks which the fisherman fitted with metal rings so the fish they caught could not be swallowed. The birds would perch on the side of the old wooden boat and dive into the river." We had only known blue swimming pools, but we tried to imagine the sudden shock of cold and the plunge, deep into water.

"Now, Wen Zhiqing had a favorite daughter who was very beautiful and loved the river. She would beg to go out on the boat with him. This daughter was a restless one, never contented with their catch and often she insisted they stay out until it was almost dark. Even then, she was not satisfied. She had been spoiled by her father, kept protected from the river, so she could not see its danger. To this young woman, the river was familiar as the sky. It was a bright, broad road stretching out to curious lands. She did not fully understand the river's depth.

"One clear spring evening, as she watched the last bird dive off into the blackening waters, she said, 'If only this catch would bring back something more than another fish!'

"She leaned over the side of the boat and looked at the water. The stars and moon reflected hack at her. And it is said that the spirits living underneath the water looked up at her as well. And the spirit of a young man who had drowned in the river many years before saw her lovely face."

We had heard about the ghosts of the drowned, who wait forever in the water for a living person to pull down instead. A faint breeze moved through the mosquito screens and we shivered.

15 "The cormorant was gone for a very long time," Waipuo said, "so long that the fisherman grew puzzled. Then, suddenly, the bird emerged from the waters, almost invisible in the night. Wen Zhiqing grasped his catch, a very large fish, and guided the boat back to shore. And when Wen reached home, he gutted the fish, and discovered, in its stomach, a valuable pearl ring."

"From the man?" said Lily.

"Sshh, she'll tell you."

Waipuo ignored us. "His daughter was delighted that her wish had been fulfilled. What most excited her was the idea of an entire world like this, a world where such a beautiful ring would be only a bauble! For part of her had always longed to see faraway things and places. The river had put a spell on her heart. In the evenings she began to sit on the bank, looking at her own reflection in the water. Sometimes she said she saw a handsome young man looking back at her. And her yearning for him filled her heart with sorrow and fear, for she knew that she would soon leave her beloved family.

"'It's just the moon,' said Wen Zhiqing, but his daughter shook her head. 'There's a kingdom under the water,' she said. 'The prince is asking me to marry him. He sent the ring as an offering to you.' 'Nonsense,' said her father, and he forbade her to sit by the water again.

20 "For a year things went as usual, but the next spring there came a terrible flood that swept away almost everything. In the middle of a torrential rain, the family noticed that the daughter was missing. She had taken advantage of the confusion to hurry to the river and visit her beloved. The family searched for days but they never found her."

Her smoky, rattling voice came to a stop.

"What happened to her?" Lily said.

"It's okay, stupid," I told her. "She was so beautiful that she went to join the kingdom of her beloved. Right?"

"Who knows?" Waipuo said. "They say she was seduced by a water ghost. Or perhaps she lost her mind to desiring."

25 "What do you mean?" asked Ingrid.

"I'm going inside," Waipuo said, and got out of her chair with a creak. A moment later the light went on in her bedroom window. We knew she stood before the mirror, combing out her long, wavy silver-gray hair, and we imagined that in her youth she too had been beautiful.

We sat together without talking, breathing our dreams in the lingering smoke. We had gotten used to Waipuo's abruptness, her habit of creating a question and leaving without answering it, as if she were disappointed in the question itself. We tried to imagine Wen Zhiqing's daughter. What did she look like? How old was she? Why hadn't anyone remembered her name?

While we weren't watching, the stars had emerged. Their brilliant pinpoints mapped the heavens. They glittered over us, over Waipuo in her room, the house, and the small city we lived in, the great waves of grass that ran for miles around us, the ground beneath as dry and hard as bone.

[1998]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Compare this story to the "Jilting of Granny Weatherall" by Katherine Anne Porter that follows. Although these two stories are very different, each contains an elderly woman as its main character. Write an essay that compares these two characters, the stories they tell, and the effect that their stories have on the reader. What is the story that each grandmother tells, either aloud or in her head? How does each story explore big questions such as love and death? What is left unresolved in each story? How—and why—do you, the reader, have to guess at the meaning of each story?
2. What is the setting of "Water Names"? What is the setting of the grandmother's story? Are there any connections between the two settings?
3. How do the girls act toward their grandmother, Waipuo? Use annotations to trace the girls' actions and emotions. How do they act before the story is told? How do they act when the grandmother is telling the story? What do they do after the story is told?
4. Engage in a close reading of the description of the ring found in the fish and the beautiful daughter's interpretation of the ring. Why does the ring trigger a fantasy? What imaginative thinking does it encourage? What does it mean that "What excited her most was the idea of an entire world like this, a world where such a beautiful ring would be only a bauble"?
5. Write a response essay that explores what happened to the young girl. Did she drown? Did she run away? Could the story have a supernatural ending—could she have joined her beloved? Waipuo says that the young girl "was seduced by a water ghost" or "perhaps she lost her mind desiring." How do you interpret this ending?
6. Why does Waipuo not answer the question, "what do you mean?" at the end of the story? Imagine two different ways that Waipuo could answer this question. Write down these answers as if they were spoken by Waipuo.

Katherine Anne Porter

Katherine Anne Porter (1890–1980) had the curious habit of inventing details in her life, but it is true that she was born in a log cabin in Indian Creek, Texas, that she was originally named Callie Russell Porter, that her mother died when Callie was two years old, and that Callie was brought up by her maternal grandmother in Kyle, Texas. She was sent to convent schools, where, in her words, she received a "strangely useless and ornamental education." When she was sixteen years old, she left school, married (and soon divorced), and worked as a reporter, first in Texas and later in Denver and Chicago. She moved around a good deal, both within the United States and abroad; she lived for a while in Mexico, Belgium, Switzerland, France, and Germany.

Even as a child, she was interested in writing, but she did not publish her first story until she was thirty-three years old. She wrote essays and one novel (Ship of Fools), but she is best known for her stories. Porter's Collected Stories won the Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Award in 1965.

The Jilting of Granny Weatherall

She flicked her wrist neatly out of Doctor Harry's pudgy careful fingers and pulled the sheet up to her chin. The brat ought to be in knee breeches. Doctoring around the country with spectacles on his nose! "Get along now, take your schoolbooks and go. There's nothing wrong with me."

Doctor Harry spread a warm paw like a cushion on her forehead where the forked green vein danced and made her eyelids twitch. "Now, now, be a good girl, and we'll have you up in no time."

"That's no way to speak to a woman nearly eighty years old just because she's down. I'd have you respect your elders, young man."

"Well, Missy, excuse me." Doctor Harry patted her cheek. "But I've got to warn you, haven't I? You're a marvel, but you must be careful or you're going to be good and sorry."

"Don't tell me what I'm going to be. I'm on my feet now, morally speaking. It's Cornelia. I had to go to bed to get rid of her."

Her bones felt loose, and floated around in her skin, and Doctor Harry floated like a balloon around the foot of the bed. He floated and pulled down his waistcoat and swung his glasses on a cord. "Well, stay where you are, it certainly can't hurt you."

"Get along and doctor your sick," said Granny Weatherall. "Leave a well woman alone. I'll call for you when I want you. . . . Where were you forty years ago when I pulled through milk-leg and double pneumonia? You weren't even born. Don't let Cornelia lead you on," she shouted, because Doctor Harry appeared to float up to the ceiling and out. "I pay my own bills, and I don't throw my money away on nonsense!"

She meant to wave good-by, but it was too much trouble. Her eyes closed of themselves, it was like a dark curtain drawn around the bed. The pillow rose and floated under her, pleasant as a hammock in a light wind. She listened to the leaves rustling outside the window. No, somebody was swishing newspapers: no, Cornelia and Doctor Harry were whispering together. She leaped broad awake, thinking they whispered in her ear.

"She was never like this, never like this!" "Well, what can we expect?" "Yes, eighty years old. . . ."

Well, and what if she was? She still had ears. It was like Cornelia to whisper around doors. She always kept things secret in such a public way. She was always being tactful and kind. Cornelia was dutiful; that was the trouble with her. Dutiful and good: "So good and dutiful," said Granny, "that I'd like to spank her." She saw herself spanking Cornelia and making a fine job of it.

"What'd you say, Mother?"

Granny felt her face tying up in hard knots.

"Can't a body think, I'd like to know?"

"I thought you might want something."

"I do. I want a lot of things. First off, go away and don't whisper."

She lay and drowsed, hoping in her sleep that the children would keep out and let her rest a minute. It had been a long day. Not that she was tired. It was always pleasant to snatch a minute now and then. There was always so much to be done, let me see: tomorrow.

Tomorrow was far away and there was nothing to trouble about. Things were finished somehow when the time came; thank God there was always a little margin over for peace: then a person could spread out the plan of life and tuck in the edges orderly. It was good to have everything clean and folded away, with the hair brushes and tonic bottles sitting straight on the white embroidered linen: the day started without fuss and the pantry shelves laid out with rows of jelly glasses and brown jugs and white stone-china jars with blue whirligigs and words painted on them: coffee, tea, sugar, ginger, cinnamon, allspice: and the bronze clock with the lion on top nicely dusted off. The dust that lion could collect in twenty-four hours! The box in the attic with all those letters tied up, well, she'd have to go through that tomorrow. All those letters—George's letters and John's letters and her letters to them both—lying around for the children to find afterwards made her uneasy. Yes, that would be tomorrow's business. No use to let them know how silly she had been once.

While she was rummaging around she found death in her mind and it felt clammy and unfamiliar. She had spent so much time preparing for death there was no need for bringing it up again. Let it take care of itself now. When she was sixty she had felt very old, finished, and went around making farewell trips to see her children and grandchildren, with a secret in her mind: This is the very last of your mother, children! Then she made her will and came down with a long fever. That was all just a notion like a lot of other things, but it was lucky too, for she had once for all got over the idea of dying for a long time. Now she couldn't be worried. She hoped she had better sense now. Her father had lived to be one hundred and two years old and had drunk a noggin of strong hot toddy on his last birthday. He told the reporters it was his daily habit, and he owed his long life to that. He had made quite a scandal and was very pleased about it. She believed she'd just plague Cornelia a little.

"Cornelia! Cornelia!" No footsteps, but a sudden hand on her cheek. "Bless you, where have you been?"

20 "Here, Mother."

"Well, Cornelia, I want a noggin of hot toddy."

"Are you cold, darling?"

"I'm chilly, Cornelia. Lying in bed stops the circulation. I must have told you that a thousand times."

Well, she could just hear Cornelia telling her husband that Mother was getting a little childish and they'd have to humor her. The thing that most annoyed her was that Cornelia thought she was deaf, dumb, and blind. Little hasty glances and tiny gestures tossed around her and over her head saying, "Don't cross her, let her have her way, she's eighty years old," and she sitting there as if she lived in a thin glass cage. Sometimes Granny almost made up her mind to pack up and move back to her own house where nobody could remind her every minute that she was old. Wait, wait, Cornelia, till your own children whisper behind your back!

25 In her day she had kept a better house and had got more work done. She wasn't too old yet for Lydia to be driving eighty miles for advice when one of the children jumped the track, and Jimmy still dropped in and talked things over: "Now, Mammy, you've a good business head, I want to know what you think of this? . . . " Old. Cornelia couldn't change the furniture around without asking. Little things, little things! They had been so sweet when they were little. Granny wished the old days were back again with the children young and everything to be done over. It had been a hard pull, but not too much for her. When she thought of all the food she had cooked, and all the clothes she had cut and sewed, and all the gardens she had made—well, the children showed it. There they were, made out of her, and they couldn't get away from that. Sometimes she wanted to see John again and point to them and say, Well, I didn't do so badly, did I? But that would have to wait. That was for tomorrow. She used to think of him as a man, but now all the children were older than their father, and he would be a child beside her if she saw him now. It seemed strange and there was something wrong in the idea.

Why, he couldn't possibly recognize her. She had fenced in a hundred acres once, digging the post holes herself and clamping the wires with just a negro boy to help. That changed a woman. John would be looking for a young woman with the peaked Spanish comb in her hair and the painted fan. Digging post holes changed a woman. Riding country roads in the winter when women had their babies was another thing: sitting up nights with sick horses and sick negroes and sick children and hardly ever losing one. John, I hardly ever lost one of them! John would see that in a minute, that would be something he could understand, she wouldn't have to explain anything!

It made her feel like rolling up her sleeves and putting the whole place to rights again. No matter if Cornelia was determined to be everywhere at once, there were a great many things left undone on this place. She would start tomorrow and do them. It was good to be strong enough for everything, even if all you made melted and changed and slipped under your hands, so that by the time you finished you almost forgot what you were working for. What was it I set out to do? she asked herself intently, but she could not remember. A fog rose over the valley, she saw it marching across the creek swallowing the trees and moving up the hill like an army of ghosts. Soon it would be at the near edge of the orchard, and then it was time to go in and light the lamps. Come in, children, don't stay out in the night air.

Lighting the lamps had been beautiful. The children huddled up to her and breathed like little calves waiting at the bars in the twilight. Their eyes followed the match and watched the flame rise and settle in a blue curve, then they moved away from her. The lamp was lit, they didn't have to be scared and hang on to mother any more. Never, never, never more. God, for all my life I thank Thee. Without Thee, my God, I could never have done it. Hail, Mary, full of grace.

I want you to pick all the fruit this year and see that nothing is wasted. There's always someone who can use it. Don't let good things rot for want of using. You waste life when you waste good food. Don't let things get lost. It's bitter to lose things. Now, don't let me get to thinking, not when I am tired and taking a little nap before supper. . . .

The pillow rose about her shoulders and pressed against her heart and the memory was being squeezed out of it: oh, push down that pillow, somebody: it would smother her if she tried to hold it. Such a fresh breeze blowing and such a green day with no threats in it. But he had not come, just the same. What does a woman do when she has put on the white veil and set out the white cake for a man and he doesn't come? She tried to remember. No, I swear he never harmed me but in that. He never harmed me but in that . . . and what if he did? There was the day, the day, but a whirl of dark smoke rose and covered it, crept up and over into the bright field where everything was planted so carefully in orderly rows. That was hell, she knew hell when she saw it. For sixty years she had prayed against remembering him and against losing her soul in the deep pit of hell, and now the two things were mingled in one and the thought of him was a smoky cloud from hell that moved and crept in her head when she had just got rid of Doctor Harry and was trying to rest a minute. Wounded vanity, Ellen, said a sharp voice in the top of her mind. Don't let your wounded vanity get the upper hand of you. Plenty of girls get jilted. You were jilted, weren't you? Then stand up to it. Her eyelids wavered and let in streamers of blue-gray light like tissue paper over her eyes. She must get up and pull the shades down or she'd never sleep. She was in bed again and the shades were not down. How could that happen? Better turn over, hide from the light, sleeping in the light gave you nightmares. "Mother, how do you feel now?" and a stinging wetness on her forehead. But I don't like having my face washed in cold water!

Hapsy? George? Lydia? Jimmy? No, Cornelia, and her features were swollen and full of little puddles. "They're coming, darling, they'll all be here soon." Go wash your face, child, you look funny.

Instead of obeying, Cornelia knelt down and put her head on the pillow. She seemed to be talking but there was no sound. "Well, are you tongue-tied? Whose birthday is it? Are you going to give a party?"

Cornelia's mouth moved urgently in strange shapes. "Don't do that, you bother me, daughter."

"Oh, no, Mother. Oh, no. . . ."

Nonsense. It was strange about children. They disputed your every word. "No what, Cornelia?"

"Here's Doctor Harry."

"I won't see that boy again. He just left five minutes ago."

"That was this morning, Mother. It's night now. Here's the nurse."

"This is Doctor Harry, Mrs. Weatherall. I never saw you look so young and happy!"

"Ah, I'll never be young again—but I'd be happy if they'd let me lie in peace and get rested."

She thought she spoke up loudly, but no one answered. A warm weight on her forehead, a warm bracelet on her wrist, and a breeze went on whispering, trying to tell her something. A shuffle of leaves in the everlasting hand of God. He blew on them and they danced and rattled. "Mother, don't mind, we're going to give you a little hypodermic." "Look here, daughter, how do ants get in this bed? I saw sugar ants yesterday." Did you send for Hapsy too?

It was Hapsy she really wanted. She had to go a long way back through a great many rooms to find Hapsy standing with a baby on her arm. She seemed to herself to be Hapsy also, and the baby on Hapsy's arm was Hapsy and himself and herself, all at once, and there was no surprise in the meeting. Then Hapsy melted from within and turned flimsy as gray gauze and the baby was a gauzy shadow, and Hapsy came up close and said, "I thought you'd never come," and looked at her very searchingly and said, "You haven't changed a bit!" They leaned forward to kiss, when Cornelia began whispering from a long way off, "Oh, is there anything you want to tell me? Is there anything I can do for you?"

Yes, she had changed her mind after sixty years and she would like to see George. I want you to find George. Find him and be sure to tell him I forgot him. I want him to know I had my husband just the same and my children and my house like any other woman. A good house too and a good husband that I loved and fine children out of him. Better than I hoped for even. Tell him I was given back everything he took away and more. Oh, no, oh, God, no, there was something else besides the house and the man and the children. Oh, surely they were not all? What was it? Something not given back. . . . Her breath crowded down under her ribs and grew into a monstrous frightening shape with cutting edges; it bored up into her head, and the agony was unbelievable: Yes, John, get the doctor now, no more talk, my time has come.

When this one was born it should be the last. The last. It should have been born first, for it was the one she had truly wanted. Everything came in good time. Nothing left out, left over. She was strong, in three days she would be as well as ever. Better. A woman needed milk in her to have her full health.

"Mother, do you hear me?"

"I've been telling you—"

"Mother, Father Connolly's here."

"I went to Holy Communion only last week. Tell him I'm not so sinful as all that."

"Father just wants to speak to you."

He could speak as much as he pleased. It was like him to drop in and inquire about her soul as if it were a teething baby, and then stay on for a cup of tea and a round of cards and gossip. He always had a funny story of some sort, usually about an Irishman who made his little mistakes and confessed them, and the point lay in some absurd thing he would blurt out in the confessional showing his struggles between native piety and original sin. Granny felt easy about her soul. Cornelia, where are your manners? Give Father Connolly a chair. She had her secret comfortable understanding with a few favorite saints who cleared a straight road to God for her. All as surely signed and sealed as the papers for the new Forty Acres. Forever . . . heirs and assigns forever. Since the day the wedding cake was not cut, but thrown out and wasted. The whole bottom dropped out of the world, and there she was blind and sweating with nothing under her feet and the walls falling away. His hand had caught her under the breast, she had not fallen, there was the freshly polished floor with the green rug on it, just as before. He had cursed like a sailor's parrot and said, "I'll kill him for you." Don't lay a hand on him, for my sake leave something to God. "Now, Ellen, you must believe what I tell you. . . ."

50 So there was nothing, nothing to worry about any more, except sometimes in the night one of the children screamed in a nightmare, and they both hustled out shaking and hunting for the matches and calling, "There, wait a minute, here we are!" John, get the doctor now, Hapsy's time has come. But there was Hapsy standing by the bed in a white cap. "Cornelia, tell Hapsy to take off her cap. I can't see her plain."

Her eyes opened very wide and the room stood out like a picture she had seen somewhere. Dark colors with the shadows rising toward the ceiling in long angles. The tall black dresser gleamed with nothing on it but John's picture, enlarged from a little one, with John's eyes very black when they should have been blue. You never saw him, so how do you know how he looked? But the man insisted the copy was perfect, it was very rich and handsome. For a picture, yes, but it's not my husband. The table by the bed had a linen cover and a candle and a crucifix. The light was blue from Cornelia's silk lampshades. No sort of light at all, just frippery. You had to live forty years with kerosene lamps to appreciate honest electricity. She felt very strong and she saw Doctor Harry with a rosy nimbus around him.

"You look like a saint, Doctor Harry, and I vow that's as near as you'll ever come to it."

"She's saying something."

"I heard you, Cornelia. What's all this carrying on?"

55 "Father Connolly's saying—"

Cornelia's voice staggered and bumped like a cart in a bad road. It rounded corners and turned back again and arrived nowhere. Granny stepped up in the cart very lightly and reached for the reins, but a man sat beside her and she knew him by his hands, driving the cart. She did not look in his face, for she knew without seeing, but looked instead down the road where the trees leaned over and bowed to each other and a thousand birds were singing a Mass. She felt like singing too, but she put her hand in the bosom of her dress and pulled out a rosary, and Father Connolly murmured Latin in a very solemn voice and tickled her feet. My God, will you stop that nonsense? I'm a married woman. What if he did run away and leave me to face the priest by myself? I found another a whole world better. I wouldn't have exchanged my husband for anybody except St. Michael himself, and you may tell him that for me with a thank you in the bargain.

Light flashed on her closed eyelids, and a deep roaring shook her. Cornelia, is that lightning? I hear thunder. There's going to be a storm. Close all the windows. Call the children in. . . . "Mother, here we are, all of us." "Is that you, Hapsy?" "Oh, no, I'm Lydia. We drove as fast as we could." Their faces drifted above her, drifted away. The rosary fell out of her hands and Lydia put it back. Jimmy tried to help, their hands fumbled together, and Granny closed two fingers around Jimmy's thumb. Beads wouldn't do, it must be something alive. She was so amazed her thoughts ran round and round. So, my dear Lord, this is my death and I wasn't even thinking about it. My children have come to see me die. But I can't, it's not time. Oh, I always hated surprises. I wanted to give Cornelia the amethyst set—Cornelia, you're to have the amethyst set, but Hapsy's to wear it when she wants, and, Doctor Harry, do shut up. Nobody sent for you. Oh, my dear Lord, do wait a minute. I meant to do something about the Forty Acres, Jimmy doesn't need it and Lydia will later on, with that worthless husband of hers. I meant to finish the altar cloth and send six bottles of wine to Sister Borgia for her dyspepsia. I want to send six bottles of wine to Sister Borgia, Father Connolly, now don't let me forget.

Cornelia's voice made short turns and tilted over and crashed. "Oh, Mother, oh, Mother, oh, Mother. . . ."

"I'm not going, Cornelia. I'm taken by surprise. I can't go."

60 You'll see Hapsy again. What about her? "I thought you'd never come." Granny made a long journey outward, looking for Hapsy. What if I don't find her? What then? Her heart sank down and down, there was no bottom to death, she couldn't come to the end of it. The blue light from Cornelia's lampshade drew into a tiny point in the center of her brain, it flickered and winked like an eye, quietly it fluttered and dwindled. Granny lay curled down within herself, amazed and watchful, starting at the point of light that was herself; her body was now only a deeper mass of shadow in an endless darkness and this darkness would curl around the light and swallow it up. God, give a sign!

For the second time there was no sign. Again no bridegroom and the priest in the house. She could not remember any other sorrow because this grief wiped them all away. Oh, no, there's nothing more cruel than this—I'll never forgive it. She stretched herself with a deep breath and blew out the light.

[1929]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In a paragraph, characterize Granny Weatherall. In another paragraph evaluate her claim that the anguish of the jilting has been compensated for by her subsequent life. Be sure to offer evidence to support your assertions.
2. The final paragraph alludes to Christ's parable of the bridegroom (Matthew 25:1–13). With this allusion in mind, write a paragraph explaining the title of the story.
3. Compare this story to Lan Samantha Chang's "Water Names." Both stories feature grandmothers. How would you characterize each grandmother? What does each grandmother convey as a meaningful lesson? When is the grandmother silent? What remains unclear or unresolved in each story?

CHAPTER 10

Research: Writing with Sources

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Create a research plan and select a topic
- Locate both print and online sources, and evaluate those sources
- Draft your paper and take precautions to avoid plagiarism
- Evaluate a student research paper

Creating a Successful Research Plan

Reading and writing about literature should generate questions. Often, those questions will require research because you cannot answer them using your preexisting knowledge; you need to generate new knowledge in order to answer them. Consider these questions: "Why do Hawthorne's stories often feature Puritans?" "How have readers interpreted the snake in Hurston's 'Sweat'?" "Why was the sonnet a popular form during the British Renaissance?" All of these questions can be answered by turning to scholars who have developed research-based information and ideas. Doing research encourages us to move beyond our own understandings and opinions, helping us to expand our knowledge about literature. Through research, we can join in academic conversations by implementing a plan that will locate reputable sources, assess those sources, learn from and select the best ideas in those sources, and integrate those sources into our own writing.

Academic research cannot begin without a plan. If you start your research with no plan, you'll fall back on "googling around" the Internet, which guarantees unfocused searching, general results, and unoriginal thinking. An undefined Internet search can waste hours of your valuable time. In contrast, a focused search of academic sources can return excellent results in a short amount of time. In order to perform productive research, start with an academic research plan.

Enter Research with a Plan of Action

Create a research plan that immediately defines your work as academic research. Start your research process by defining your assignment requirements, timeline, academic goals, and academic resources.

- Create assignment-based research goals. Use your research paper assignment to help set the parameters of your research. Does the assignment tell you the number of sources needed, the types of resources to consult, the research questions to consider, or the research approach to use?

- Create a calendar of research tasks. Know your assignment deadlines, and create a research calendar that works "backwards" from your due dates. Build time into your calendar for multiple database searches, source evaluation and selection, and source note taking—all to be done before starting to draft your paper.
- Create a record-keeping system for your searches and sources. Your research will generate multiple forms of material: lists of keywords used, lists of search results, scanned copies of articles, hard copies of articles, and stacks of books. You'll need a system to keep track of your searches and their results. Create a hard copy or electronic file to organize your findings.
- Know your library's online resources, and select the best one for your topic. Become familiar with your library's web page. Explore its links to online databases and reference resources. Understand how different links connect you to different types of information. Survey each resource, and select the best one for your research topic.
- Select academic databases, and do multiple searches. Academic research often relies on electronic databases; these databases provide access to full-text sources, such as journal articles. Know which electronic databases provide access to literary sources, such as EBSCOhost's Academic Search Premier, JSTOR, and Project MUSE. Search more than one database, keeping track of your work. Within each database, perform multiple searches with multiple keywords, keeping track of your work.
- Know your library's on-site resources, and select the best one for your topic. Become familiar with your library. Use the online catalog to locate useful books held by the library, and then go to the library to find and borrow those books.
- Use the Internet sparingly and selectively. Because your paper will have to use and cite academic sources, most sources that you find on the Internet will not have the type of information that you need. Carefully evaluate any site before spending time reading its opinions.

What Resources Does Your Institution Offer?

Your school's library—both its physical and virtual forms—is an amazing resource. It is set up to facilitate the academic research that you have to do for your classes. Create a research plan that will take advantage of its on-site and online resources.

Although colleges and universities offer a wide range of electronic materials and databases, make sure to do what may seem old-fashioned but remains the best way to access academic material: Get off-line and visit the library! Although you may be accustomed to working online late at night, try to break that pattern and spend an afternoon at the library. An hour or two that you spend in the library can result in a backpack full of high-quality books.

One of the best resources that you have is the librarian, who can help you locate sources that are perfectly matched to your topic. Also learn how to use the interlibrary loan system, which will often deliver scanned articles directly to your e-mail account, in addition to delivering books to you at the library. Sign up for a library tutorial at your school, and take a look at the library's home page and online catalog options.

What Type of Research Do You Want to Do?

Research employs well-known ways of approaching the available sources, which will help you to create clear research questions. When you create your research questions, consider the different types of research available to you.

Cultural Research. This type of research focuses on the cultural and historical context of a literary work. In cultural research, you locate historical material and examine how it helps you to understand the literary work.

- Example: Connecting Langston Hughes's poetry to information about the Harlem Renaissance.

Biographical Research. Biographical research focuses on the literary author's life. In this type of research, you connect the literary text to events in the author's life or ideas that the author has offered about his or her work.

- Example: Using an interview with Lorraine Hansberry to interpret her drama A Raisin in the Sun.

Critical Research. Critical research emphasizes the critical debate surrounding a literary text. Academic critics offer differing interpretations of literature. In critical research, you locate articles published in academic journals, assess the arguments expressed in the articles, and connect those arguments to your own interpretation of the literary work.

- Example: Comparing different interpretations of what the quilt represents in Alice Walker's short story "Everyday Use."

Theoretical Application. Theoretical research takes a widely recognized theory (which might not have been created for literature) and applies it to a literary work. This type of research explores how the concepts developed by the theory help to explain a literary work.

- Example: Applying Freud's theory on dreams to Katherine Anne Porter's short story "The Jilting of Granny Weatherall."

Appendix A offers an in-depth overview of critical strategies that can be employed when you are engaged in academic research.

Selecting a Research Topic and Generating Research Questions

Use Close Reading as Your Starting Point

A good literary research paper starts with a thoughtful close reading. Close reading encourages you to develop your own sense of the literary work, allowing you to determine the work's meaning, to notice how the work is structured, and to decide what aspects of the work you find most intriguing and worth further exploration. Research connects this process of personal exploration to external sources. Start your research with a close reading that generates your own understanding of the literature. Then, use research to connect your close reading to other critics' readings.

Select Your Topic

Your paper's topic should arise from the ideas and questions that you formulate as you read and reread the literary text. You want your topic to be "yours," so start with your original analysis and develop it before turning to other people's ideas. However, as you select the topic for your research paper, remember that your goal is to develop ideas about the topic by turning to other writers' arguments rather than by just relying on your own individual ideas. Thus, a successful research topic is one that remains flexible and can be developed by adding ideas, theories, and explanations that other writers provide. A research topic is also one that can be assessed from many points of view, allowing you to agree or argue with critics who have written about the topic.

Skim Resources through Preliminary Research

Perform preliminary research to "test" your topic and see if it can be developed through research. As you perform this research, you will translate your topic into keywords that you can enter into academic databases and Internet search engines. A research paper thus requires you to define your paper's topic by means of keywords. The keyword search is a good exercise, as it forces you to create a very concise, focused version of your topic. Perform preliminary searches on more than one academic database; these quick searches will allow you to test your topic ideas. See how many and what type of results are returned by your search. Skim the articles returned by your searches. The success of these searches can help you to formulate your topic—you don't want to create a topic that can't be researched.

Narrow Your Topic, and Form a Working Thesis

Based on your preliminary research, you will revise your topic, narrowing and focusing your research to inform your thesis. A research paper's thesis remains the expression of the paper's central argument. To develop your thesis, you will also engage in synthesis; you must synthesize your arguments with those of critics, allowing their ideas to help develop your ideas. As a result, a research paper must feature ideas that can be developed by engaging with other writers' ideas. A strong thesis will highlight the concepts that it will connect to research resources. Your thesis will evolve as you form those connections by locating, reading, and analyzing new sources. It is often helpful to think of your thesis as a "working thesis": an argument that is "in progress" and that will be revised based on the new information and ideas that you discover through research. Because your working thesis will change and evolve, you will need to take good notes in order to trace your ideas and show how they were influenced by, and connected to, critic's ideas. Your thesis will take final form as you start to draft your research paper.

After you determine your research topic and create a working thesis, you are ready to start locating and evaluating sources. Your working thesis will change, depending on the materials you find. But, how do you even start to locate good sources and then engage with them in a way that connects them to your own ideas?

In the sample research notes below, Mike Ramos, a student taking a first-year composition course, is working on an assignment that requires a six- to eight-page paper that analyzes two Emily Dickinson poems. The assignment asks the writer to select a theme that the two poems share. Then, the student must compare and contrast the two poems, using criticism to help interpret the selected theme and to create a strong thesis argument. The assignment requires that the student locate at least four scholarly sources and use MLA citation style. Mike feels that he writes best on his computer, so he creates a research folder on his desktop and opens new files for each step in his research process. As he starts the research process, Mike creates a document that states his research goals and creates a research calendar. He then starts the process of determining his research paper's working thesis by engaging in the type of prewriting note taking shown in Chapters 3 and 4. Let's turn to the materials in Mike's digital research folder, noting that he approaches his research and writing by reminding himself of the assignment's goals and clarifying his research resources and calendar.

Student Work: Digital Research Folder Assignment and Research Plan Notes

Assignment Goals:

2 Emily Dickinson poems
- –connect poems through theme → determine thesis
- –analyze literary elements

4 academic sources on Dickinson
- –academic articles
- –academic books
- –cite them

Research Sources:

Library databases—check out for journal articles, figure out keywords
- EBSCOhost's Academic Search Premiere
- JSTOR
- Project MUSE
- MLA database

Library catalog—check for book
- Catalog search on Emily Dickinson

Research Calendar:

Assignment Start Date: April 2

Week #1	Pick poems and topic Locate articles Skim articles Firm up topic and create working thesis
Week #2	Read articles closely Select articles—take notes and highlight key quotes Finalize thesis and create outline
Week #3	Draft essay
Week #4	Revise essay Proofread essay

Paper due date: April 27

After Mike has generated a research plan, he creates a new document to sort through his ideas and select his Dickinson poems. He starts this brainstorming by returning to his primary sources and rereading his favorite Dickinson poems. This rereading leads to rough note taking, which allows Mike to formulate a paper topic and working thesis, which he knows will be revised as he engages in more research. Let's take a look a Mike's preliminary research notes.

Student Work: Digital Research Folder "Working Thesis" Notes

Dickinson Poems I could work with:

A Bird came down the walk
A narrow fellow in the grass (snake)
There's a certain Slant of light
A Drop fell on the Apple Tree
The name—of it—is "Autumn"-
The wind begun to rock the grass

Possible Topic: Nature

Animals → Likes animals? Too basic?
Nature → Storms
Weather → Light Energy
Land (houses) → Natural vs. man-made?
Seasons → Spring, autumn, winter
Change/cycle of seasons

Topic: Weather? Emotions with Weather?

Weather that changes
The wind begun to rock the grass
There's a certain Slant of light
The name—of it—is "Autumn"-

Natural world that changes

Topic could become Argument/Thesis:

Emily uses weather, seasons, natural world to capture emotions
~~Esp. emotions that are female?~~
~~Esp. emotions that have conflict?~~
Esp. emotions that change
The emotions are negative? Maybe weather/nature is a way to get out those upsetting emotions or unsure emotions?

Nature is ~~plants, animals~~, weather
What about seasons? Seasons that change? Cycle?
Unpredictable? Change is difficult? (note word "despair" in "Slant of light")

Puts emotions into imagery? Tone/mood?
Bold emotions? Violent? (note blood image in "Autumn" poem)

(continued)

Doesn't put emotions into people but into nature? Into images of nature?
No other people in the poem

No connection to people? But connection to nature, seasons

Working Thesis:

Dickinson uses imagery of changing nature—especially changing seasons and changing weather—to capture changing emotions. In two poems (There's a certain Slant of Light and The name—of it—is "Autumn"-) the emotions are violent in a way that is upsetting (despair) or bold. She can capture those emotions (mood) in nature/seasons/weather.

Generate Key Concepts as Keywords

After you have generated a working thesis that captures your understanding of a literary work, you are ready to consider critics' arguments and use them to help develop your interpretations. As part of your brainstorming process, generate a list of concepts that are central to your working thesis. Ultimately, this list of concepts will serve as keywords in your database, catalog, and Internet searches. As a first step in formulating his paper's argument, Mike selects the poems he would like to work with: Dickinson's "There's a certain Slant of Light" (page 857) and "The name—of it—is 'Autumn' (page 857). He is now ready to start formulating a thesis that connects these two works. If we reexamine Mike's working thesis notes, we can see that his ideas are starting to become conceptual and specific (such as "seasons that change in Dickinson's poetry" or "bold/violent emotions in Dickinson's poetry") rather than general or purely informational (such as "Emily Dickinson"). These concepts can serve as keywords in his library research. Mike opens a new document in his research folder and starts to list possible keywords. By using detailed keywords, Mike can make sure that his research remains focused and that he develops his working thesis. Mike's concept words should bring his research back to critics' arguments that can be clearly connected to his own ideas. He also lists synonyms for each concept word so that he is able to enter multiple terms as keywords in a database search. He aims for concept words that capture his ideas without being either overly general or too specific.

Create Inquiry Questions

Mike's assignment asks him to provide an argument that can be developed by exploring critics' interpretations of Dickinson; he knows that he is searching for critical interpretation rather than biographical or historical information. Mike starts to frame his topic through inquiry questions that emphasize interpretation. For example, rather than simply thinking, "I need to locate sources on Emily Dickinson," Mike starts his search by asking the analytical questions that he is interested in exploring for his thesis: "How have critics of Dickinson interpreted her nature imagery?" and "Do critics see Dickinson as inspired by nature or fearful of nature?" After he compiles a list of meaningful questions, he is confident that he can find critics' interpretations of that topic.

Student Work: Digital Research Folder "Research Keywords" and "Inquiry Questions" Notes

Working Thesis:

Dickinson uses imagery of changing nature—especially changing weather—to capture changing emotions. In two poems ("There's a certain Slant of Light" and "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-"), the emotions are violent in a way that is upsetting (despair) or vivid. She can capture those emotions (mood) in nature/seasons/weather.

Key Concepts—Keywords:

Weather
Nature—environment—landscape—natural world—outdoors
Seasons—times of year—winter, autumn
Emotions
(key: changing emotions—despair)
Imagery
Mood/tone
Emily Dickinson
Titles of poems

Inquiry Questions for Research:

How have critics interpreted Dickinson's nature imagery?
Do any critics discuss Dickinson's use of weather?
Do any critics discuss Dickinson's use of the seasons?
Do critics see Dickinson as changing her emotions? Or having extreme emotions?
Do critics see Dickinson as inspired by nature or fearful of nature?"
~~Where did Dickinson live? (Biographical—no)~~
~~What was her daily routine?~~
Did Dickinson ever interact with nature (might be OK)?
How do critics think Dickinson uses imagery?
Do critics debate the meaning of the two poems?
Do critics think Dickinson puts emotions into nature rather than shows people and their emotions?

Locating Materials through Productive Searches

If you've created a research plan, created a working thesis, and generated a list of research questions, you'll enter into the research process with a purpose! You can quickly start the process of selecting resources that will fit your topic and help to develop your ideas. Academic research relies on the resources provided by your library: electronic databases and on-site, hard-copy resources. Start your research by consulting these materials first. Then, move to the Internet, and evaluate the sources that can be located there.

Generate Meaningful Keywords

Electronic databases and catalogs rely on keyword search engines. In order to access the materials within the database, you must enter the meaningful keywords that will allow you to locate specific sources that contain those keywords. The quality of your search results is thus dependent on the quality of your keywords. How can you create meaningful keywords?

✔CHECKLIST: Creating Meaningful Keywords for a Successful Search

- ☐ Isolate your central ideas, and translate them into single words.
- ☐ Use concept-based words.
- ☐ Create a list of synonyms.
- ☐ Note information correctly, such as the author's name and the literary text's title.
- ☐ Use and, not, and or to narrow your search results.
  - These terms, known as Boolean operators, allow you to better direct your electronic searches.
  - Using and in a search for "Emily Dickinson and nature" will only return results that contain both keywords.
  - Using not in a search for "Emily Dickinson not plants" will return results that discuss Emily Dickinson but do not mention plants.
  - Finally, using or in a search for "Emily Dickinson or nature" will bring back results that include either term but not necessarily both.
- ☐ Use quotation marks to join key phrases.
  - By placing quotation marks around key phrases (for example, "Emily Dickinson"), you direct the search to only bring back results that include the entire phrase.

Using Academic Databases to Locate Materials

Your library subscribes to academic databases, such as the MLA database, JSTOR, and Project MUSE, which cite and reproduce sources that have appeared in peer-reviewed venues. A scholarly publication is referred to as a peer-reviewed source because it is written by a scholar and carefully reviewed by other scholars before it is published. Academic research requires work with these materials—sources that have been carefully written and reviewed by experts. Academic databases will better connect you to a wide variety of these peer-reviewed venues than an Internet search can.

Search the MLA Database

As noted, literary studies' most important database is the MLA or MLA International Bibliography of Books and Articles in the Modern Languages and Literatures, and most literary research starts with this database. The MLA, or Modern Language Association, is the professional organization that brings together professors of literature and language. It sets professional standards for elements of literary analysis, such as the citation style used in literary papers. In addition, it provides the most comprehensive and up-to-date bibliography in literary studies. The MLA database contains the most complete listing of journals and books published on literary topics, but it does not provide full-text scans of academic publications. However, most libraries now integrate their databases; as a result, an MLA citation can contain a library-provided link to a full-text scan of an article that is held in another database.

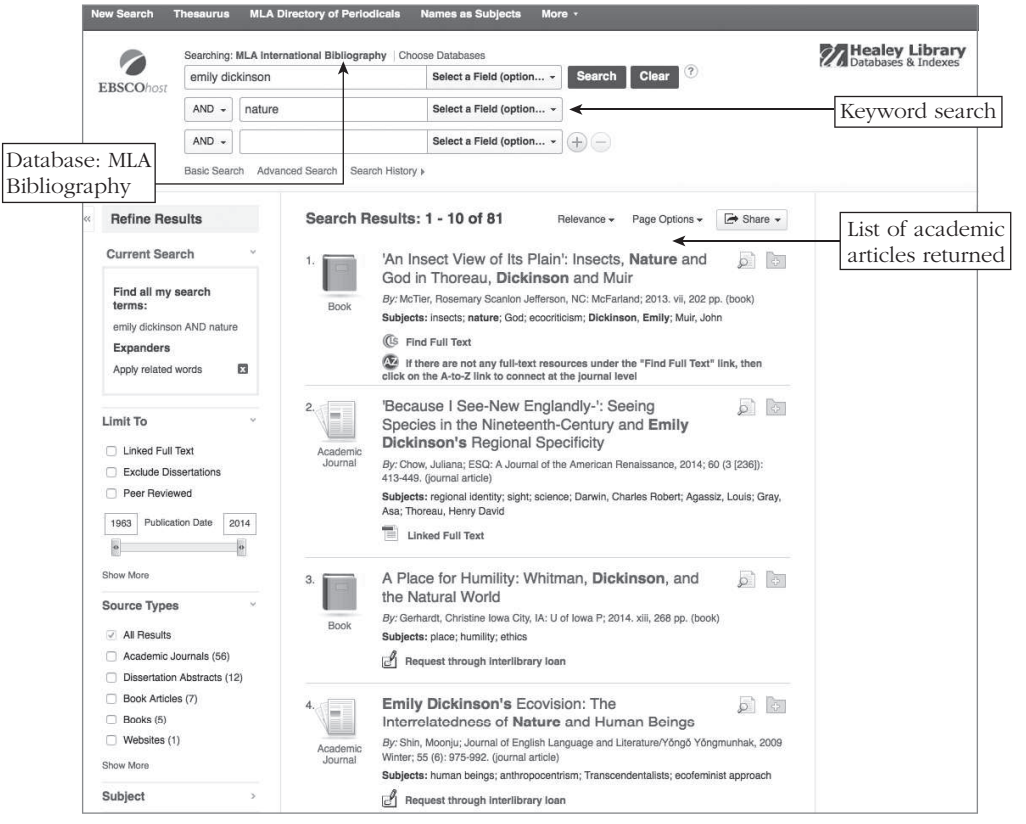
Search Full-Text Academic Databases

Databases that contain full-text journal articles include EBSCOhost's Academic Search Premier, JSTOR, and Project MUSE. These databases provide full-text scans of journal articles that have appeared in print. These scans typically take the form of PDFs that can be downloaded directly to your computer desktop. These academic databases use keyword searches and return lists of "results." Thus, they look and feel like the type of searching that you would do on the Internet. The benefit of doing your searching within an academic database (rather than on the Internet) is that you are assured of the integrity of the sources. None of the sources you locate in an academic database will have been created by an amateur writer (who might be writing out of passion rather than knowledge!); rather, academic databases collect published works by professional and academic writers.

Perform Advanced Keyword Searches



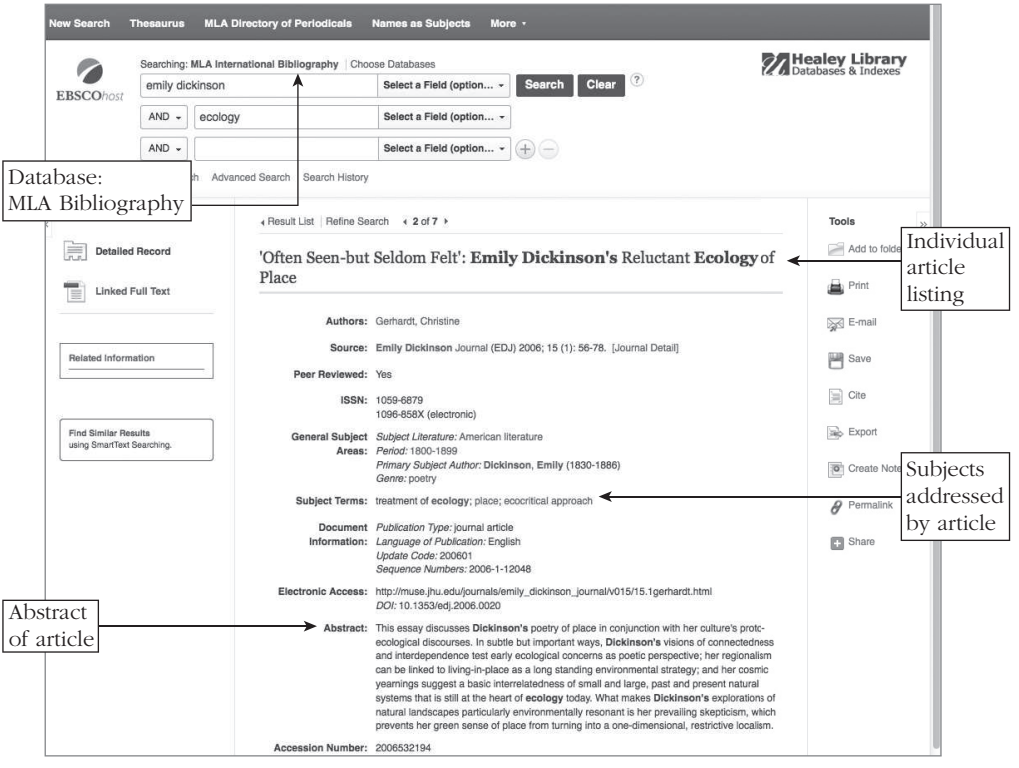
As you enter each database, you should start with an advanced keyword search, which will allow you to create a more focused search. The advanced keyword search page will allow you to select features such as the type of resource (article, review, or interview), the language of the article, and the year of publication. As a result, your search will be instantly more productive. For example, if your instructor asks you to find up-to-date articles, you can select to locate articles written in the last ten years and to deselect formats such as interviews.

Student Work: The Academic Database Search

Mike starts his research by looking for academic journal articles that he can locate electronically. He opens his library's website and reminds himself of the many electronic databases it owns. For his literary paper, he clicks on the "Browse by Subject" button and the subheading "Humanities." This leads him to databases that contain literary criticism, including the MLA database. When he clicks on a specific database's link, it opens to a home page that takes the form of a keyword search page. As he starts to enter keywords into the database's search engine, Mike's research begins in earnest.

Due to information that he has learned in library sessions held in his class, Mike knows to consult the MLA database for the most comprehensive search of literary sources. Because Mike's library connects the MLA citation database to other full-text databases, it proves to be a great starting place for literary research.

He starts his research with the keywords "Emily Dickinson and nature." Let's look at the different searches he performs and how he analyzes his results.



Evaluate the Results List, and Revise Your Search

A keyword search will return a list of results, typically citations of article titles. Mike analyzes his results according to several criteria: Did his search return articles that are "on topic"? Did his search return sources from appropriate journals? Did his search return a good number of results (not too many, not too few)? Mike continues to revise his keywords and invent new searches. He also tries searches that use two keywords: He uses and to create a more focused search that locates sources with both keywords; he uses or to create a broader search that will locate sources with either keyword.

Evaluate the Individual Titles

If a keyword search is successful, it will return a list of promising titles. Mike evaluates the list that his search returns, locating the sources that seem to be a good match for his paper's topic. He discards titles that are off-topic, are too confusing or filled with jargon, or are not of the right "type" (for example, a review of a poetry reading rather than an analysis of the poem itself). After he selects titles for closer analysis, Mike downloads each article into an electronic folder that he has created on his computer desktop to keep track of his research materials. He skims each article to determine if it connects to his working thesis before he reads it closely. Some journal articles open with an abstract that summarizes the article. Other journal articles will contain a clear title and headings that reveal its central argument. For most articles, he'll need to skim the first page or two to determine the article's thesis. As Mike skims, he evaluates how helpful the source will be for his topic and sorts his sources into folders that indicate this analysis (such as "most helpful," "OK," and "not helpful"). This type of sorting will help Mike limit the amount of reading that he needs to do as he moves toward writing his research paper.

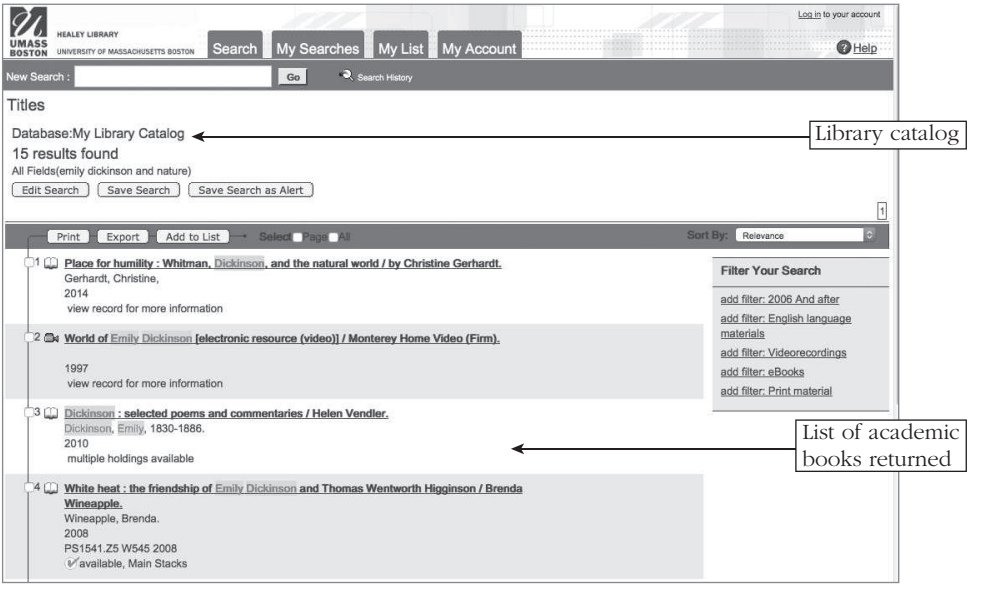
Using the Library Catalog to Locate Materials

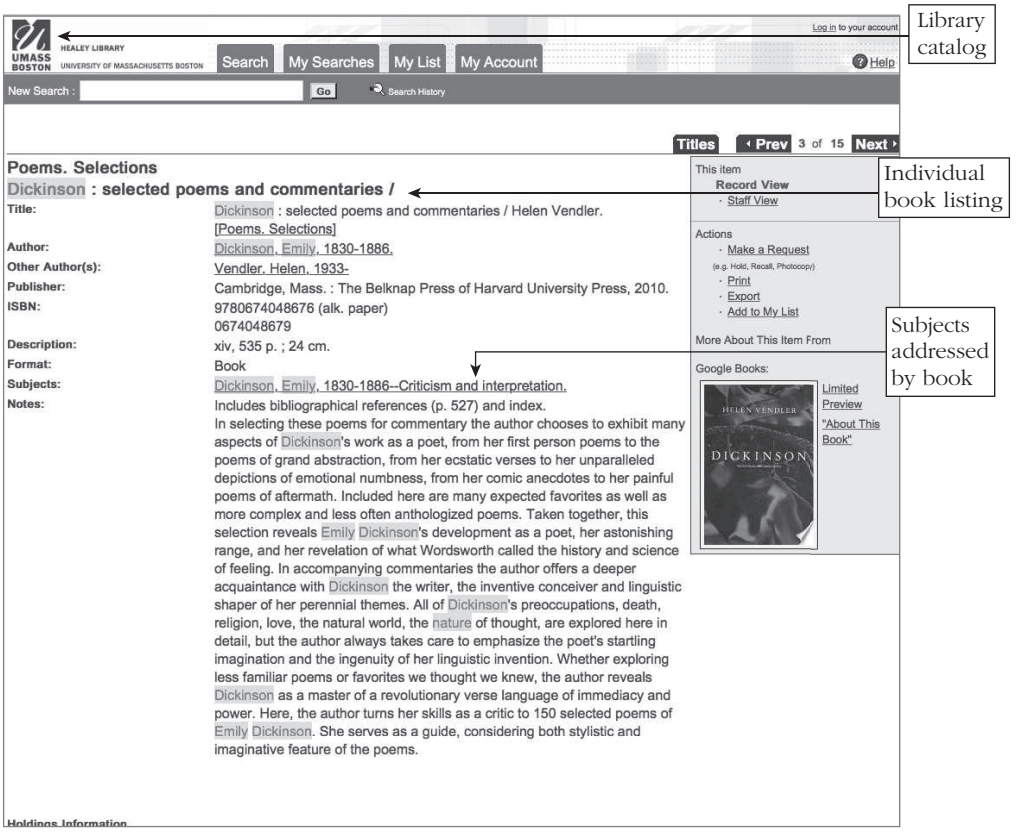


Your school's library maintains an accessible and easy-to-use electronic catalog of the sources that it owns and that you can use or borrow. The library's website will prominently display its catalog, often by having a search screen right on its home page. Like the Internet or the library's academic databases, the library catalog is accessed through a keyword search. Enter the keywords that you have developed for your database search into the library's electronic catalog, and see what results are returned. Your library catalog will also allow you to search by author, title, and subject, among other categories; enter your keywords in more that one category to create the most comprehensive search.

Locate Books and Additional Resources

Mike's library catalog will connect him to materials that are not available online. The most important of these sources will be academic books. The catalog uses a call letter/number system to direct Mike to the book's location in the library; university libraries typically use Library of Congress (LoC) cataloging (for example, literary sources in English are categorized under the LoC call numbers PN, PR and PS). When Mike locates a source on a library shelf, he skims that shelf for additional books. Books on similar subjects are shelved together, so a book on Emily Dickinson will be shelved next to others on that same topic. In addition to books, an academic library will hold materials such as film and music that might be useful for a literature paper. Libraries often have "special collections" of unique materials that can help shape an entire research project; these collections can include oral histories or manuscript letters.

Student Work: The Library Catalog Search



The library catalog lists all of the resources owned by the library and available for student use. Mike returns to his library's website, but, rather than clicking on the electronic database search page, he now clicks on the online catalog search page. He enters many of the keywords that he used in his electronic catalog search, creating a new search that will return library sources. Here, he searches the terms "Emily Dickinson and nature":

Use a Catalog Entry to Locate More Sources

As Mike searches the library catalog, he uses the same process of source evaluation and search revision that he used when he was searching for online resources. He works to focus his research process and improve his research results. As he engages in this process, he comes to see that the library's cataloging of its materials is, in itself, an excellent resource. A library catalog offers a comprehensive description of each item that it lists. Mike notices that the item description contains a list of subject words used to catalog the source. When Mike locates a good source, he clicks on its subject words to quickly find related materials.

Using the Internet to Perform Meaningful Research

You are probably very familiar and comfortable with searching the Internet for information. That comfort can lead you to perform searches that return excellent resources. However, that comfort can also lead you to treat online academic research as if it were the same as googling your favorite celebrity topics for entertainment or researching local restaurants for tonight's dinner. When you search the Internet for information for a research paper, continue to think of that searching as academic work that must return academic resources.

Student Work: The Internet Search

The Internet can be a valuable source of information, but its use in academic work requires an extra level of caution and diligence by the researcher. The Internet is open for anyone to contribute. Unlike print sources, which are vetted by experts, Internet sources may not be held to any quality standards. After typing "Emily Dickinson" into his search engine, Mike carefully evaluates each result for its academic reliability and it relevancy to his topic.

Locate Academic Sites on the Internet

Mike wants to keep his focus on locating academic resources: a few simple search tips can create an Internet search that returns academic rather than student-written or commercially generated material. Academic sites are usually maintained by a professor, a university library, or a research group; if a site is an academic site, it will always indicate its academic status. To find these academic sites, do the following:

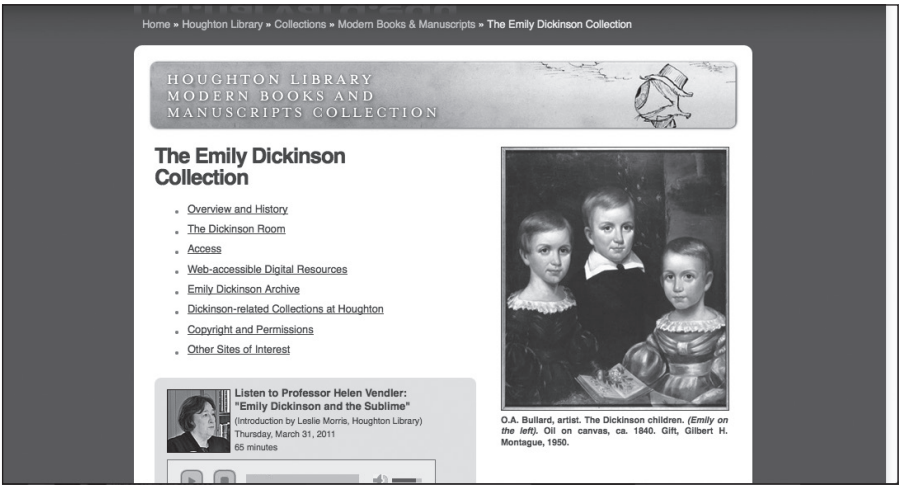
- Search for sites that are connected to a college or university. Limit your search to the ".edu" domain using the advanced search options, or type "site.edu" into your search engine's basic search field. Check each site to ensure that it is written by a scholar, not a student.
- Search for sites that have an "About Us" page that lists the people who have created the site. An academic site will list the scholars involved and will often explain their editorial policy—how they select materials for inclusion on the site.
- Search for academic sites by starting your search in Google Scholar. Google Scholar is a drop-down menu on Google's home page. It limits its search to books, and does not include websites created by academic researchers.

Locate Information-Rich Sites on the Internet

In addition to academic websites, many types of nonprofit organizations dedicated to intellectual inquiry maintain excellent websites. For example, a museum dedicated to a literary author will often contain excellent resources, including a biography, information on cultural and historical context, and links to additional resources. Similarly, the official website maintained by a living author will often contain clear biographical information and an up-to-date list of literary works.

Avoid Commercial Sites on the Internet

When Mike types "Emily Dickinson" into an Internet search engine, it returns lots of sites produced by commercial entities. These sites aim to make money from students; they often contain annoying pop-up advertisements and bold advertisements at the top, bottom, and sides of the page. Even more obviously, sites aim to make money by encouraging the user to pay for their content. For example, many sites will show a small section of an essay and ask the user to pay to see the rest of it. Sites ask the user to pay for student-written papers with the understanding that the user will submit that paper as if it were his or her own. This is plagiarism. Very wisely, Mike simply stays away from these sites.



Locate Well-known Literary Sites on the Internet

The Internet has several well-known, long-standing, noncommercial websites that specialize in literary information. These sites contain a wealth of information and often act as clearinghouses that contain links to reputable websites. Well-known literary sites include:

The Voice of the Shuttle: http://vos.ucsb.edu
The Poetry Foundation: http://www.poetryfoundation.org
Literary Resources on the Net: http://andromeda.rutgers.edu/~jlynch/Lit

Locate Primary Sources on the Internet

Although Mike doesn't plan to do extensive research on Dickinson's life, his Internet keywords lead him to Harvard University's website. Obviously, this is a reputable academic institution, and Mike is intrigued. Mike follows the links and finds his way to the Emily Dickinson Collection and, with a few more clicks, a rare document scanned by Harvard. He locates a full-image scan of a notebook owned by Emily Dickinson, filled with the plants and flowers that she collected and labeled. This resource shows that Dickinson had a deep interest in nature and offers insight into her connection to, and close observation of, the natural world. Although Mike won't make this resource central to his paper, he thinks he might be able to use it as part of his discussion of Dickinson's interest in nature.

The Internet contains academic websites that are dedicated to scanning original primary source documents related to literature. Many libraries are making parts of their collections accessible online through digital humanities initiatives. For example, you can now find scanned images of Shakespeare's First Folio and Walt Whitman's manuscripts online. These are rare materials that, only a few years ago, you could have seen only if you were a rare books scholar working in a rare books library. Search for these primary literary sources by adding the words manuscript, archive, full text, digital, or scan to your keyword search.

Evaluating Sources for Academic Quality

For sources found through Internet searches, as with print sources, you must evaluate what you have located and gauge how much or how little it will contribute to your literary analysis and argument. If you are using an Internet site as a source in an academic paper, you will want to make sure that the site maintains academic standards for presenting accurate, unbiased information. The information should be conveyed with the depth of understanding and analysis found in academic sources. In addition, the site should cite the sources of its information.

✔ CHECKLIST: Evaluating Web Sites for Quality

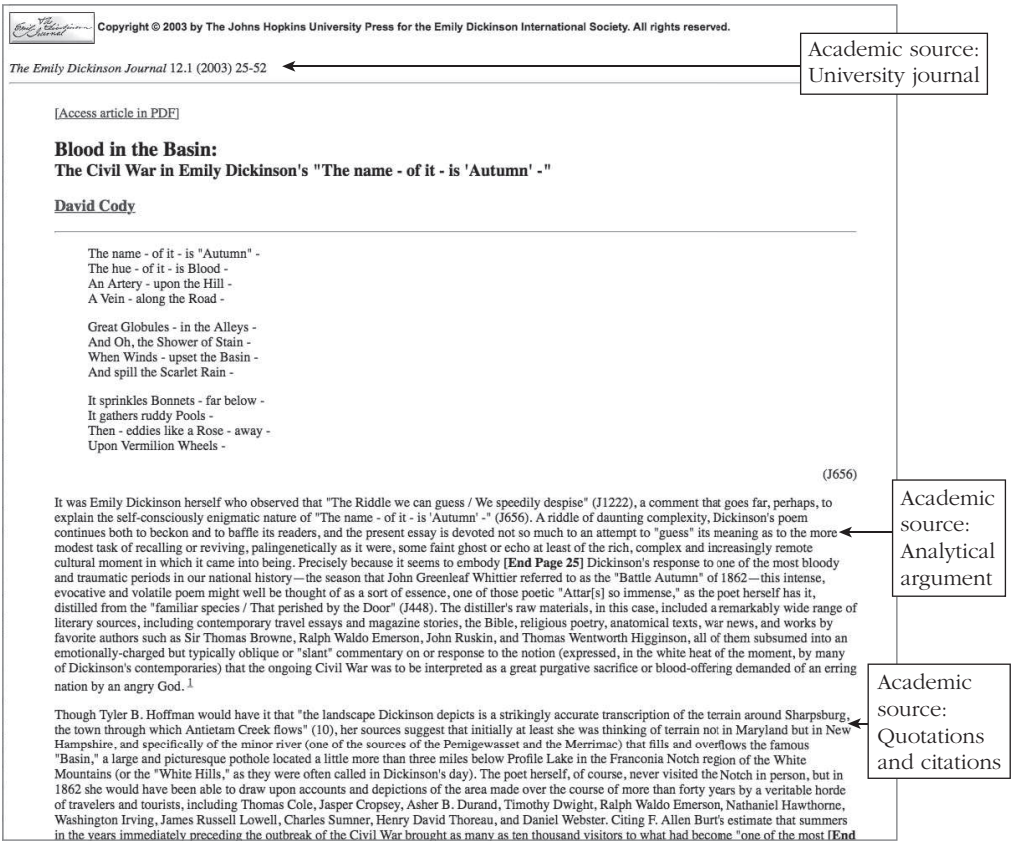
Focus the topic of your research as precisely as you can before you embark on an Internet search. Ask the following questions:

- ☐ Does this site or page look like it can help me in my assignment?
- ☐ Whose site or page is this? Is this a commercial, an academic, or a nonprofit site?
- ☐ Who is the intended audience?
- ☐ What is the point of view? Are there signs of a specific slant or bias?
- ☐ Is the site accurate? How good is the detail, depth, and quality of the material presented?



- ☐ Is the site well constructed and well organized?
- ☐ Is the text well written?
- ☐ Can the information be corroborated or supported by print sources? Does the site contain citations of its sources?
- ☐ When was the site or page made available? Has it been recently revised or updated?
- ☐ Can the person or institution, company, or agency responsible for this site or page receive e-mail comments, questions, and criticisms?

Student Work: Evaluating Sources for Academic Quality

Working with his school's electronic databases, Mike creates a list of keywords and enters them into three different databases: EBSCOhost's Academic Search Premiere, the MLA International Bibliography, and JSTOR. In each database, he clicks to the "Advanced Search" page, selecting qualities such as peer-reviewed sources. For each set of search results, Mike quickly skims the titles, evaluating them for their academic quality. He looks for articles that appear in noncommercial academic journals, are peer reviewed, and have been published recently. In his first search of Academic Search Complete, Mike uses the keywords "Emily Dickinson" and "Seasons." The third title returned sounds interesting, until he clicks on the title, views it, and sees that it is not an academic article. It is a short two-page article appearing in a popular writing magazine. He discards this source.

In a later search on Project MUSE, Mike uses the keywords "Emily Dickinson" and "Autumn." He finds articles that address the specific poem "The Name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" that his paper will analyze. One article catches his eye because its title references the Civil War. When he clicks on the scanned article, he is happy to see that it is clearly an academic source; he downloads the article and saves it into a file that he's labeled "Research-Articles-Dickinson."

Copyright © 2003 by The Johns Hopkins University Press for the Emily Dickinson International Society. All rights reserved.

The Emily Dickinson Journal 12.1 (2003) 25-52

Academic source: University journal

[Access article in PDF]

Blood in the Basin:
The Civil War in Emily Dickinson's "The name - of it - is 'Autumn' -"

David Cody

The name - of it - is "Autumn" -
The hue - of it - is Blood -
An Artery - upon the Hill -
A Vein - along the Road -

Great Globules - in the Alleys -
And Oh, the Shower of Stain -
When Winds - upset the Basin -
And spill the Scarlet Rain -

It sprinkles Bonnets - far below -
It gathers ruddy Pools -
Then - eddies like a Rose - away -
Upon Vermilion Wheels -

(J656)

It was Emily Dickinson herself who observed that "The Riddle we can guess / We speedily despise" (J1222), a comment that goes far, perhaps, to explain the self-consciously enigmatic nature of "The name - of it - is 'Autumn' -" (J656). A riddle of daunting complexity, Dickinson's poem continues both to beckon and to baffle its readers, and the present essay is devoted not so much to an attempt to "guess" its meaning as to the more modest task of recalling or reviving, palingenetically as it were, some faint ghost or echo at least of the rich, complex and increasingly remote cultural moment in which it came into being. Precisely because it seems to embody [End Page 25] Dickinson's response to one of the most bloody and traumatic periods in our national history—the season that John Greenleaf Whittier referred to as the "Battle Autumn" of 1862—this intense, evocative and volatile poem might well be thought of as a sort of essence, one of those poetic "Attar[s] so immense," as the poet herself has it, distilled from the "familiar species / That perished by the Door" (J448). The distiller's raw materials, in this case, included a remarkably wide range of literary sources, including contemporary travel essays and magazine stories, the Bible, religious poetry, anatomical texts, war news, and works by favorite authors such as Sir Thomas Browne, Ralph Waldo Emerson, John Ruskin, and Thomas Wentworth Higginson, all of them subsumed into an emotionally-charged but typically oblique or "slant" commentary on or response to the notion (expressed, in the white heat of the moment, by many of Dickinson's contemporaries) that the ongoing Civil War was to be interpreted as a great purgative sacrifice or blood-offering demanded of an erring nation by an angry God. [1]

Academic source: Analytical argument

Though Tyler B. Hoffman would have it that "the landscape Dickinson depicts is a strikingly accurate transcription of the terrain around Sharpsburg, the town through which Antietam Creek flows" (10), her sources suggest that initially at least she was thinking of terrain not in Maryland but in New Hampshire, and specifically of the minor river (one of the sources of the Pemigewasset and the Merrimac) that fills and overflows the famous "Basin," a large and picturesque pothole located a little more than three miles below Profile Lake in the Franconia Notch region of the White Mountains (or the "White Hills," as they were often called in Dickinson's day). The poet herself, of course, never visited the Notch in person, but in 1862 she would have been able to draw upon accounts and depictions of the area made over the course of more than forty years by a veritable horde of travelers and tourists, including Thomas Cole, Jasper Cropsey, Asher B. Durand, Timothy Dwight, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Washington Irving, James Russell Lowell, Charles Sumner, Henry David Thoreau, and Daniel Webster. Citing F. Allen Burt's estimate that summers in the years immediately preceding the outbreak of the Civil War brought as many as ten thousand visitors to what had become "one of the most [End

Academic source: Quotations and citations

Evaluating Sources for Topic "Fit"

As you skim the sources returned by your research, think about how they match your paper's topic and thesis. In some cases, the sources may support your working thesis, offering insights that will help to develop your thinking. In other cases, the sources may disagree with your ideas, giving you a source to "argue back" to or making you rethink and change your thesis. If you are finding no sources that fit your topic, you probably need to rework your keyword search terms or explore an alternate database. In some cases, you may wind up rethinking your research topic. You will want to have a "give and take" between your topic and sources, in which your topic evolves in response to the sources that you find and your sources are selected based on that evolving topic.

Analyze each source for its relevance to your topic—its "fit" with the ideas that you are developing for your paper. Start by skimming the source listing and then the source itself; as a next step, read the source carefully as you work it into your research paper. As you examine the materials that you have located, evaluate these aspects of the source.

✔CHECKLIST: Evaluating Sources for Topic "Fit"

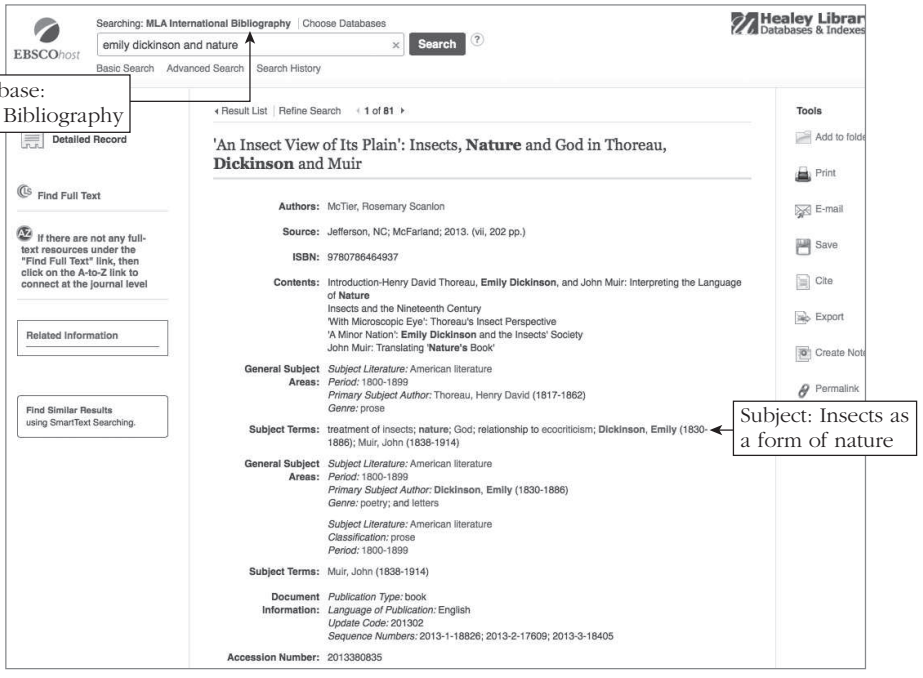
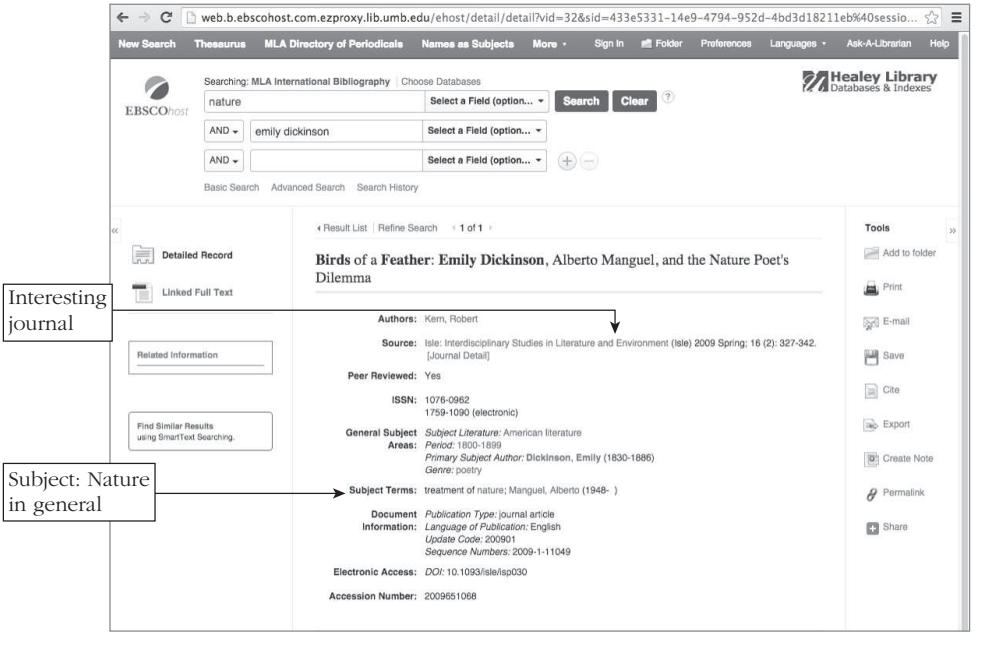
- ☐ What is the title? Does the article, essay, book, or chapter title address your topic? Does the title contain words or phrases that match your topic?
- ☐ What is the journal's name? If the source is an article, does the journal's name address your topic? Does the journal present itself as reporting research in an area relating to your topic?
- ☐ What subject terms are listed? All academic databases and catalogs use subject terms that are listed in the source's citation; explore these subject terms. Do the subject terms match your topic? Do the subject terms give you new ways of naming your topic?
- ☐ Does the source use your selected literary text and/or author? Does the source analyze the literary text and/or author that you are analyzing?
- ☐ Does the source have a promising abstract? Some academic sources provide an abstract—a one-paragraph overview of the source's central argument. Does the abstract reveal that the source connects to your topic?
- ☐ What is the opening argument? Skim the source's first few paragraphs. Does the source's opening thesis connect to your topic?
- ☐ What is the closing argument? Skim the source's last few paragraphs. Do the source's concluding arguments connect to your topic?



Student Work: Evaluating Sources for Topic "Fit"

After skimming his sources to make sure that they are reputable academic articles, Mike skims his sources a second time to see if they will help him to develop his paper's topic and working thesis. Rather than focusing on the first sources returned by a search, good researchers sift through a lot of material to locate the best material for the research paper. Mike becomes skilled at assessing his search results, using his research topic to decide which sources to read closely and which to discard.



Good keywords will help to locate sources that match your paper's topic. However, even the best keywords will return sources that are off-topic. Mike evaluates the results generated by each search. Before he reads the full-text scan of a journal article, Mike examines each article's title, subject terms, and abstract to help determine if that source will support his topic. If a source is not a good match for his paper's ideas, Mike discards it or keeps it in the database's search folder for future reference. If a source connects to his paper's ideas, he downloads it into his research folder and prints it out.

In one of his initial searches of the MLA database, Mike uses the keywords "Emily Dickinson" and "Nature" because these keywords seem to capture his paper's topic perfectly. These terms return a good number of hits. However, as Mike starts to look at the titles, some do not seem to connect to his paper's topic. For example, the first title returned seems to focus on Insects, not nature more generally. As he reads the first page of the article it becomes clear that this Book explores insects rather than the seasons or weather as aspects of nature.

Mike needs to dig deeper into his search results list. He continues to examine each source, getting to the article. This article seems to be off-topic because it compares Emily Dickinson's writing to that of another author, Alberto Manguel, who Mike has never heard of. However, remembering that he can use aspects or parts of an essay, Mike takes a second look at the listing. He notes that the essay's subject term is "nature" and that the essay is published in a journal devoted to "Literature and the Environment." Mike decides that this article is worth a second look and saves it into his "Research-Articles-Dickinson" folder.

Taking Notes on Secondary Sources

Once you have consulted databases, books, and bibliographies, and have a fair number of references, read to find evidence and interpretations of the evidence in support of your thesis. Most researchers find it convenient, when examining bibliographies and the library catalog, to write down each reference on a 3-by-5-inch index card—one title per card. You may wish to record these references on your computer instead. Either way, in your entries, record the following information:

- the author's full name (last name first);
- the exact title of the book or journal (and, if a journal, the date of publication);
- the title of the chapter (if applicable) or journal article, and the page numbers; and
- (if using a book) the library catalog number on the card (this will save time if you need to get the item for a second look).

Start reading or scanning the materials that you have collected. Some of these items will prove to be irrelevant or silly; others will be valuable and may even provide further references. Be sure to photocopy any material—especially material that can't be taken out of the library—that you may want to refer to later.

A Guide to Note Taking

Some students use note cards, but most now write their notes on a computer and then organize and rearrange this material by copying and pasting, moving the notes into a coherent order. (Be sure to keep all of your notes, even the irrelevant ones. When you write your paper, you may realize that a note you thought wasn't important might actually turn out to be quite valuable.)

Whichever method you prefer, keep in mind the following:

- For everything you consult or read in detail, always specify the source so that you know exactly from where you have taken a key point or a quotation.
- Write summaries, not paraphrases (See Chapter 6 for more on these terms).
- Quote sparingly. This is your paper—it will present your thesis, not the thesis, arguments, and analyses of someone else. Quote directly only those passages that are particularly effective, crucial, or memorable. In your finished paper, these quotations will provide authority and emphasis.
- Quote accurately. After copying a quotation, check what you have copied against the original, correct any misquotation, and then put a checkmark after your quotation to indicate that it is accurate. Verify the page number also, and then put a checkmark after the page number.

  Use an ellipsis (three spaced periods) to indicate the omission of any words within a sentence. If the omitted words are at the end of the quoted sentence, put a period where you end the sentence and then add three spaced periods to indicate the omission:

  If the . . . words were at the end of the quoted sentence, put a period where you end . . . .

  Use square brackets to indicate your additions to a quotation. Here is an example:

  "Here is an [uninteresting] example."

- Never copy a passage by changing an occasional word, under the impression that you are putting it into your own words. Notes of this sort may find their way into your paper, your reader will sense a style that is not your own, and suspicions of plagiarism may follow. (For a detailed discussion of plagiarism, see pages 403–04.)
- Comment on your notes as you work and also later as you reflect on what you have jotted down from the sources. Make a special mark—we recommend using double parentheses ((. . .)) or a different color to write, for example, "Jones seriously misreads the passage" or "Smith makes a good point but fails to see its implications." As you work, consider it your obligation to think about the material, evaluating it and using it as a stimulus for further thought.
- In the upper corner of each note card, write a brief key—for example, "Swordplay in Hamlet," so that later you can tell at a glance what is on the note card. If you are using a computer file, be sure to also label these files clearly and consistently.

Student Work: Annotation of Research Sources

Annotation is not just for the literary source! You can annotate the research source, using the same process of highlighting important passages and jotting down ideas in the margins. Rather than read his research resources on-screen, Mike prints them out and marks them up as he reads them. Although this may initially seem like a lot of work, it saves large amounts of time and effort when Mike starts to write, as he will only have to read his annotation and will not have to reread and rethink each source. As Mike annotates his source, he concentrates on locating the most crucial information: the thesis, subarguments, interesting ideas, interpretations of the literary source, and use of critics.

The critical thinking skills that you have developed by writing explications, analytical papers, and interpretation papers can be used to write a research paper, and the process of generating ideas through journal writing should be applied to the research paper. Now that Mike has read and annotated his articles that he thinks are critical to his research, he starts the process of deciding which ideas he wants to use from each source and of determining how those ideas will shape his working thesis. Let's examine how Mike transfers key ideas from his annotations into his research notes, capturing this critical thinking process. Notice how his research notes combine listing information and asking inquiry questions. He notes the ideas that he finds most interesting in the article, and then he records his reactions to those ideas, capturing his thinking about how he might use those ideas in his paper.

New Search Thesaurus MLA Directory of Periodicals Names as Subjects More Sign In Folder Preferences Languages Ask-A-Librarian

EBSCOhost

Back

Copyright © 2006 by The Johns Hopkins University Press. All rights reserved.

The Emily Dickinson Journal 15.1 (2006) 56-78

[Access article in PDF]

"Often seen - but seldom felt":
Emily Dickinson's Reluctant Ecology of Place

Christine Gerhardt

In recent years, the growing recognition of Emily Dickinson's involvement with the world around her has sparked fresh interest in the links between her poetry and nineteenth-century views of nature. Domhnall Mitchell and Judith Farr have shown that Dickinson's love of flowers was part of her time's wide-spread preoccupation with gardening and horticulture; similarly, as Elizabeth Petrino indicates, her remarkable floral and geographical imagery responded to the period's genuine interest in the "language of flowers"; and Rachel Stein has shown that her work undermined the prevalent notion of nature's subservience as a basis for women's secondary social status. Clearly, Dickinson's "letter to the World" was centrally about "The simple News that Nature told -" (Fr519), and her interest in nature and human-nature relationships intersected in many ways with the multifaceted, often contradictory views of her "Sweet - countrymen -."

The dawning of environmental discourses that reached across the U.S. in the mid-nineteenth century is of crucial importance to understanding Dickinson's poetry about the natural world, yet has so far gone unexplored in Dickinson criticism. Recent work in environmental history underscores the significance of the cultural paradigm shift that occurred when the majority of Americans moved, as Max Oelschlaeger puts it, "from viewing wild nature as merely a valuable resource (as a means to economic ends) and obstacle (wilderness must be conquered for civilization to advance) toward a conception of wilderness as an end in its own right and an endangered species in need of preservation" (4). Starting in the 1840s and '50s more and more people became interested in serious nature study, and recreational natural history brought a heightened awareness of natural systems [End Page 56] also and especially to white middle class women, as Nina Baym has shown; simultaneously, the natural history essay, combining personal narratives of nature appreciation with new scientific insights, became a widely read genre; and public debates about the need to protect vanishing wilderness areas prepared the ground for national parks later in the century. This essay argues that Dickinson's nature poetry intersects in subtle but crucial ways with these early environmental discourses. In writing about place, in particular, her poetry engages with a number of proto-ecological concerns of her day and also anticipates later positions about the possibilities and limitations of human interaction with the natural world—a stance that crystallizes in the peculiar reluctance with which she approaches "Nature in chivalry - / Nature in charity - / Nature in equity -" (Fr10).

Ecocriticism provides an ideally suited conceptual angle from which to examine the links between Dickinson's explorations of place and nineteenth-century environmental debates because the field has a defining interest in how literary constructions of nature are mediated by historically specific parameters, and also because the idea of place lies at the heart of most ecocritical concerns. Lawrence Buell, while warning that to be grounded in place does not guarantee an ecocentric orientation (The Environmental Imagination 253), argues that "neither the imagination of environmental endangerment nor [...] of environmental well-being can be properly understood without a closer look at how the imagination of place-connectedness itself works" (Writing for an Endangered World 56). Such passionate attention to place as an environmental category can add a fresh dimension to debates about Dickinson's slippery horizontal perspectives. While it has often been noted that she had a surprisingly keen eye for capturing local natural phenomena, others, most notably Robert Weisbuch, have long considered "scenelessness," a "lack of 'outer' situations," (18) to be Dickinson's central rhetorical strategy. Jane D. Eberwein's discussion of "Dickinson's Local, Global, and Cosmic Perspectives" concludes that, "for all her awareness of local and global environments, her truest perspective remained more vertical than horizontal, more attuned to speculations on immortality [...] than on Amherst, America, or the wider world opened by friendships and reading" (42). An ecocritical analysis underscores that Dickinson's poetry, for all its elusiveness and supreme mastery of metaphor, also perceives human-nonhuman relationships as specific to particular locations. More importantly, it shows

Connects idea of "nature" to environmental history

Thesis argument

Cites other critics

Student Work: Digital Research Folder Critical Thinking Notes

Christine Gerhardt article: "Often seen—but seldom felt: Emily Dickinson's Reluctant Ecology of Place" (The Emily Dickinson Journal)

This article connects Dickinson to environmental writing happening in 19th c (ecology).

This article argues that Dickinson has sense of place (New England) but also is reluctant to name places or make environment too specific—this shows that she is reluctant to show humans having power over environment.
—"Reluctant" is keyword in conclusion

Interesting idea: she wants to be connected to nature, but not too connected—not too controlling —kinda wants to have both (connection, no connection)

Interesting idea: idea of place
does or does not connect to my ideas? is season a "place"—not really?

p. 57: Thesis stated: Dickinson sees possibilities and limits of human interaction w/nature
This can support my idea that Dickinson interested in nature
Can this connect to idea of human emotions?
Can argue: Dickinson also sees possibilities and limits of human emotions

p. 57: Dickinson has sense of place. But essay also quotes critics that Dickinson has a "scenelessness" (Wisbuch). So, article is asking how can Dickinson be both???
—How is Dickinson both about place and not specific about place? Confusing!
Same with my poems: both about seasons but not too specific—more general seasons
Can I connect this to my thesis about weather? Maybe Dickinson uses weather/seasons in the same way: Dickinson is specific enough to feel the weather/seasons. But she also leaves the weather/seasons vague and general. In these poems, we get specific images of the weather. But, also the weather/seasons are not just about Dickinson. Not just Dickinson's feelings—but more general feelings?

pp. 58-60: analyzes Dickinson schooling—to show she knows about environment (geology)

p. 61: Dickinson is aware of environment, part of larger environmental awareness

pp. 62-64: Reading of poem "Four Trees": supports thesis –trees are general—example of placelessness idea that poem is interested in "the relationships among natural phenomenon" (p. 63) and "links" between parts of nature (p. 64)
maybe I can emphasize the idea of relationships in nature, among parts of nature?

p. 65: Dickinson's poetry shows an "engagement with local environments while acknowledging nature's difference and distance"
–same idea of having it both ways: being distant and close
Can I connect to my ideas about the seasons? The seasons are made to feel close—very emotional what they do to the narrator/reader. But they are also distant.
the seasons/weather is not super-specific—it's abstract??

p. 65: Interesting quote: "Awareness of her limited insights acknowledges a respectful distance between human and nature, which grants nature a dignified autonomy. Through this tentative take on familiar places, the natural environment assumes a presence that goes beyond its role as a 'commodity' for the expanding nation to, for that matter, the observing mind" (65).

Dickinson keeps "respectful distance"—this idea could be applied to the weather/seasons in the poem?

But what about when her emotions seem to get violent?

As you analyze academic sources, they should resonate with and start to shape your ideas. This is one of the primary reasons that the research paper is assigned: It teaches you to expand and strengthen your own thinking by creating meaningful relationships among ideas. As Mike reads his sources, he considers not only the ideas they contain but also how he wants to position those ideas in his paper. As Mike takes notes on his sources, he is determining how he can use those sources in his paper. He wants not only to understand the article but also to decide if he agrees or disagrees with the source. His note taking lays the foundation for his integrating the academic sources into his writing. Note taking allows Mike to engage in critical thinking about how he can use the sources to develop his ideas.

Drafting the Research Paper

The difficult job of writing about your findings remains, but if you have taken good notes and have put useful headings on each note, you are well on your way to drafting your paper.

- Read through your notes, and organize them into packets of related material. Remove all notes that you now see are irrelevant to your paper. (Put them in a "Rejects" file in case you want them later.) Go through the notes again and again, sorting and resorting, putting together what belongs together.
- You may find that you have to do a little additional research because you aren't quite clear about something, but, after you have done this additional research, you should be able to arrange your notes into a reasonable and consistent sequence. You now have a kind of first draft, or at least a tentative organization, for your paper.
- Beware of the compulsion to include every note in your essay; that is, beware of telling the reader, "A says. . . . ; B says. . . . ; C says. . . ."
- You must have a point—a thesis. Make sure that you state your thesis argument early and that you keep it evident to your readers. Use your sources to develop that argument, explaining how the critics help you to further your own ideas.
- Make sure that the organization is evident to the reader. By this point, with your notes arranged into what seems to be the correct sequence, everything should add up. In the process of drafting, you will make important changes in your focus, but a draft is not complete until you think it says not only what you want to say but also in what seems to you to be a reasonable order. Your final paper should be a finished piece of work, without the inconsistencies, detours, or dead ends of an early draft. Your readers should feel that they are moving toward a conclusion (by means of your thoughtful evaluation of the evidence) rather than merely reading an anthology of commentary.

- Preface all or almost all quotations with a lead-in, such as "X concisely states the common view" or "Z, without offering any proof, asserts that. . . ." Let the reader know where you are going and how the quotation fits into your argument.

Quotations and summaries should always be accompanied by your own analyses. By the end of the paper, your readers not only will have read a neatly typed paper (see pages 405–12.) and gained an idea of what previous writers have said but also will have been persuaded that, under your guidance, they have seen the evidence, heard the arguments summarized, and reached a sound conclusion.

A bibliography or list of works consulted (see pages 412–13.) is usually added at the end of a research paper so that readers may look further into the primary and secondary material if they wish. However, if you have done your job well, readers will be content to leave the subject where you have left it, grateful that you have set matters straight.

Focus on Primary Sources

Remember that your paper should highlight the primary literary sources, the materials that are your real subject, rather than secondary sources, the critical and historical discussion of primary materials. The paper should be, above all, your paper, in which you present a thesis that you have developed about the literary work or works that you have chosen to examine. By using secondary sources, you enrich your analysis, as you place yourself in the midst of the scholarly community interested in this author or authors, and you make your contribution to the ongoing conversation.

To help you succeed in balancing primary and secondary sources, when you review your draft, mark in red the quotations from, and references to, primary sources, and then in blue do the same marking for secondary sources. If, when you scan the pages of your paper-in-progress, you see a lot more blue marks than red marks, you should change the emphasis and the proportion to what they should be. Guard against the tendency to rely heavily on the secondary sources that you have compiled. The point of view that counts is your own.

Integrate Secondary Sources

A research paper asks you to use sources to develop your ideas: You connect your ideas to the source's ideas in order to "push" your own thinking forward. Let's explore how you integrate a source into your writing by using multiple critical thinking strategies.

Create a Relationship between Your Writing and the Source

As you reread your research notes, see yourself as creating a relationship between your ideas and another person's ideas. In order to create analytical relationships, consider your stance toward each of your sources. For example, in your opening analysis of a source, ask yourself if you are creating a relationship of agreement or disagreement. Do you agree or disagree with the source? Then ask yourself why you agree or disagree. How does that agreement or disagreement help you to think more deeply about your ideas and your working thesis? As you work with each source, think about how you can do the following:

- Agree with the source: Can you use the source to support your ideas?
- Disagree with the source: Can you argue "back" to the source?
- Apply the source: Can you "pick up" an idea from the source and apply it to a new text?
- Show how the source provides a close reading of a literary work: Can you examine how a critic reads the literary work, noting what elements the critic finds most interesting?
- Position the source as an authority: Can you explain how the critic offers crucial ideas and information?

Surround the Source with Your Writing

As Mike works with his selected articles, he wants to emphasize the bridges that he is building between his ideas and the sources' ideas. After locating specific passages that he wants to quote, he starts to draft paragraphs that integrate those quotations into his writing. He does not just drop a quote into a paragraph, but surrounds the quotation with his analysis and his writing. He has the goal of creating "quote sandwiches," which follows the pattern of "quotation set-up → quotation → quotation analysis." He makes sure to lead into and lead out of a quotation, explaining how the source connects to his ideas.

Agree with a Source in Order to Develop Your Ideas

Through his note taking, Mike discovers a critic whose argument he agrees with. He locates a quotation that states an idea that he agrees with and clearly connects to his thesis. He sets up the quotation by selecting parts of it to quote directly and then connects his agreement to the quotation. By leading into and out of the quotation, Mike is able to explain what ideas within the quotation he finds most useful and most worthy of emphasis.

Student Work: Source Integration
Agree with Source

Critics emphasize that Dickinson uses images of nature to express herself. In her analysis of "There's a certain Slant of Light," Paula Bennett explains, "The world becomes a partner in the poet's depression" (118). She continues to argue that the poem "is explicitly a projection of the poet's inner life, a massive transference to the landscape of her inner state of being" (Bennett 118). I agree with Bennett's idea that Dickinson projects her emotions onto the landscape.

Apply a Source in Order to Develop Your Ideas

Looking at the paragraph that he's just written, Mike realizes that he should not merely agree with the quotation but, instead, should use the quotation to develop or "further" his ideas. Rather than simply state his agreement with the critic, he can continue to analyze her ideas. He decides to explain how her ideas can be applied to the two poems that he has selected; her general ideas about nature can be applied to his more specific ideas about weather and the seasons. He "picks up" the critic's ideas and applies them to the new context of the two poems. This allows him both to further the critic's ideas and to develop his own ideas. He rewrites the last sentence of the paragraph and then continues it:

Student Work: Source Integration
Analyze and Apply Source

. . . Bennet makes the convincing argument that Dickinson projects her inner emotions onto the external landscape. Dickinson uses nature to show human emotions, and this can be seen in how she describes weather and the seasons. In "There's a certain Slant of Light," Dickinson reveals that winter afternoons "oppress" her "like the weight/Of cathedral tunes" (3-4). This passage clearly shows her use of the seasons to express the depression Bennett explains in her article. In "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'," the emotion is less depression and more of being upset or even thrilled by the violence of the seasons. Dickinson describes how the autumn wind has "upset the Basin" (7). The word "upset" can be used to describe her emotions, too.

Disagree with a Source in Order to Develop Your Ideas

Reviewing his sources and his note taking, Mike decides that he disagrees with one of the articles. He creates a paragraph that explains how his reading of the poems differs from the critic's interpretation, connecting his arguments to the critic's arguments. He aims to clarify how his ideas differ from the critic's and then to provide evidence of why his ideas are correct.

Student Work: Source Integration
Disagree with Source

Some critics emphasize that nature allows Dickinson to create a sense of distance in her poetry. For example, in her work on Dickinson's understanding of the environment, Christine Gerdhart emphasizes that Dickinson's writing creates "respectful distance between human and nature, which grants nature a dignified autonomy" (65). However, nature is not distant in "The name –of it—is 'Autumn'-" and "There's a certain Slant of Light." In these poems, the connection between humans and nature overwhelms any distance. Both poems use personification to make nature seem human. For example, in "There's a certain Slant of Light," nature seems cold and reserved, but it is given human qualities: the landscape "listens" and its shadows "hold their breath" (13-14). Nature is not distanced or "autonomous" from people, but acts like people. Nature remains close and connected to people.

Synthesize Critics' Ideas to Show Scholarly Debate

As Mike continues to work with the ideas in this paragraph, he sees an opportunity to compare these two critics' arguments. While Bennett emphasizes the landscape's connection to Dickinson's inner life, Gerhardt emphasizes Dickinson's distance from nature. Mike decides that he can try to show how the critics disagree and then integrate his own thinking into this argument. He creates a new transition paragraph that he can put between the paragraph analyzing Bennett and the paragraph analyzing Gerhardt.

Student Work: Source Integration
Synthesize Sources

Bennett emphasizes that nature becomes human-like, supporting the argument that Dickinson uses the seasons to represent human emotions. According to Bennett, Dickinson uses the landscape to reflect her mind. Therefore, Dickinson is close to nature and, in "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'- and "There's a certain Slant of Light," she connects her emotions to the seasons. However, other critics emphasize the distance between Dickinson and the landscape. Critic Christine Gerhardt argues that Dickinson's poetry shows an "engagement with local environments while acknowledging nature's difference and distance" (65). While Bennett might emphasize this idea of "engagement," Gerhardt emphasizes "difference and distance" (65).

In this paragraph, Mike achieves a complex form of synthesis, reviewing how two critics disagree and explaining his position with regard to that disagreement. As a next step in his writing process, he will revise these three paragraphs as he integrates them into his paper. As part of his revision, he will delete some repetition and make the flow of his ideas clear.

Avoiding Plagiarism

Honest scholarship requires that you acknowledge material that is not your own, not only when you quote directly from a work, but also when you use someone else's original idea (an idea that is not common knowledge). Not to acknowledge such borrowing is plagiarism. If in doubt, give credit.

You ought, however, to develop a sense of what is considered common knowledge. Definitions appearing in a dictionary and the date of first publication, for example, of The Scarlet Letter (1850) are considered to be common knowledge, so no credit is needed.

Suppose that, in the course of your research for a paper on Langston Hughes, you happen to come across Arnold Rampersad's statement, in an essay in Voices and Visions (edited by Helen Vendler), that > books alone could not save Hughes from loneliness, let alone give him the strength to be a writer. At least one other factor was essential in priming him for creative obsession. In the place in his heart, or psychology, vacated by his parents entered the black masses. (355)

This is an interesting idea, and, in the last sentence, the shift from heart to psychology is perhaps especially interesting. You certainly cannot say, with the implication that the idea and the words are your own, something like

> Hughes let enter into his heart, or his psychology—a place vacated by his parents—the black masses.

Here, you are simply lifting Rampersad's ideas and making only minor changes in the wording. But making even more changes in the wording would still be unacceptable, unless Rampersad is given credit. Here is a restatement that is an example of plagiarism, even though the words differ from Rampersad's:

> Hughes took into himself ordinary black people, thus filling the gap created by his mother and father.

In this version, the writer presents Rampersad's idea as if it were the writer's own and presents it less effectively than Rampersad does.

What can the writer do? Give Rampersad credit, perhaps along these lines:

> As Arnold Rampersad has said, "in the place in his heart, or his psychology" where his parents had once been, Hughes now substituted ordinary black people (355).

You can use another writer's ideas, and even some of the writer's very words, but you must give credit, and you must use quotation marks when you quote. You can

- give credit and quote directly;
- give credit and summarize the writer's point; or
- give credit and summarize the point but include—within quotation marks—some phrase that you think is especially interesting.

Synthesizing Sources and Ideas: The Research Paper

Student Research Essay: "Dickinson's Representation of Changing Seasons and Changing Emotions"

Mike now has a multilayered research folder on his computer desktop, filled with his research plan notes, working thesis notes, research keyword lists, inquiry questions, and critical thinking notes. He has downloaded and saved the most interesting and relevant critical articles to a folder that he has labeled "Research-Articles-Dickinson," and he has sorted through those articles further to find the best ones for his paper. Mike also has printed out hard copies of these articles, knowing that he has had to carefully read and annotate the essays to fully digest their ideas. Those annotations have led to Mike's drafting of evidence-filled paragraphs that develop his own analysis of Dickinson's poems.

Mike's careful reading and note taking has paid off, allowing him to draft his paper quickly and efficiently. With so many materials at his fingertips, Mike has been able to jump right into the writing process with no fear of writer's block. He has produced a paper that engages in synthesis on many levels: synthesizing two Dickinson poems, synthesizing the poetry with critical articles, synthesizing the arguments in the articles, and, most importantly, synthesizing his ideas about the Dickinson poems with those of the critics.

Mike Ramos
Professor Ashland
English 102
3 May 2016

"Dickinson's Representation of Changing Seasons and Changing Emotions"

Emily Dickinson's poetry contains complex imagery that conveys complex ideas. Dickinson's poetry describes nature, using images of the external environment to explore internal emotions. This paper examines Dickinson's use of nature imagery—especially images of the changing seasons—to capture changing emotions. In her poems "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" and "There's a certain Slant of light," Dickinson imagines intense emotions. She is able to explore bold, even violent and depressing emotions by putting them into nature, rather than presenting those emotions as human emotions. Critics such as Anna Priddy explain, "Dickinson is often characterized as a nature poet. Certainly the love of the natural world figures prominently in her work" (51). Wendy Martin also states that Dickinson has a "simple love of nature" (87). This love of nature can be seen in Dickinson's poetry featuring the seasons. However, these poems often have a complex representation of her love of nature, showing nature as full of power and conflict. In "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" and "There's a certain Slant of light," the changing seasons express emotions that are not always positive, but the seasons allow those emotions to be shown as natural and common.

Dickinson's relationship with nature is often presented as a positive source of inspiration for her poems. In The Cambridge Introduction to Emily Dickinson, Wendy Martin explains, "The heavenliness of nature was a constant subject for Dickinson's poems. Because she reverenced nature so intensely, Dickinson constantly felt the need to describe and praise nature's beauties" (93). She emphasizes Dickinson's "interest in nature's bounty," and makes it clear that nature affects Dickinson's emotions (Martin 87).

Dickinson "embraced the slower rhythms of nature and rural life that allowed her to enjoy the world's sensory and synaesthetic richness" (Martin 87). Nature imagery allows Dickinson to explore her emotions. And, sensory imagery gives nature vividness, so that the reader feels Dickinson's ideas about nature.

However, as Martin explains, these senses are not always positive: "Although the harmony that Dickinson feels with nature allows her transcendent moments of communion, her love was not blind to its darker rhythms" (95). Neeru Tanson and Anjana Trevedi also emphasize this possibility of a dark side to nature. They argue, "In the poems of Emily Dickinson, nature appears through two basic moods—as a child's garden of flowers, plants, and birds, and as a symbol of mysterious process of death" (147). While nature can be happy and positive, "Dickinson finds that nature is not so gay, innocent and frolicsome as she appears on the surface" (Tanson and Trevedi 147). Under that surface, nature can be "terribly destructive" (Tanson and Trevedi 147). This idea of a more destructive nature can be seen in "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" and "There's a certain Slant of light."

Both "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" and "There's a certain Slant of light" show nature as full of emotions that can become violent or upsetting. "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" describes autumn as an energetic force that disrupts nature in a violent way. Autumn is given the imagery of "Blood" that seems to spill over the landscape (2). "There's a certain Slant of light" focuses on winter, and describes more quiet, less action-packed emotions. However, nature is still powerful and can lead to depression and "Despair" (10). These poems can be read, at first, as describing the seasons of fall and winter and the changing weather they bring. But, on a second reading, the poems can be seen as describing changing human emotions. Both poems provide clear images of how emotions work when they overwhelm people.

"The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" presents vivid imagery of blood-red autumn leaves covering the ground. The first stanza describes autumn as if it were part of a larger body. That body can be seen as nature, the earth, or the environment. The season brings "Blood" that fills an "Artery" that is "upon the Hill" and a "Vein" that runs "along the Road" (3-5). This powerful image describes leaves filling the pathways up and down a hill, looking like arteries of pumping blood. Autumn is full of powerful change, giving those leaves movement. When those leaves are tossed by the wind and rain, Dickinson captures their movement in her second stanza:

> Great Globules—in the Alleys—
> And Oh, the Shower of Stain—
> When Wins—upset the Basin—
> And spill the Scarlet Rain— (5-8)

Dickinson uses violent imagery, in which autumn seems to be throwing globules of blood and knocking over basins of blood. Her repeated use of dashes captures this sense of movement and energy. The seasons force nature to change, constantly recreating it. The last stanza of the poem describes autumn as becoming calmer: it "sprinkles Bonnets," "gathers Pools," and "eddies like a Rose" (9-11). Autumn then leaves the landscape, moving away "upon Vermilion Wheels" (12). In its path, it has shaken the earth and left a path of blood-like leaves.

In "There's a certain Slant of light," Dickinson describes the season of winter and uses a more subdued set of images. She describes the light created by a winter afternoon as triggering a feeling that "oppresses, like the Heft/Of Cathedral Tunes—" (3-4). Winter causes a feeling of "Heavenly Hurt," but the feeler can "find no scar" (5-6). Thus, the winter afternoon causes strong emotions that are "internal" and difficult to trace (7). Dickinson continues to describe the "Despair" and "internal affliction" sent by the winter light—"sent us of the air" (10-12). The changing seasons obviously cause deep emotions and, as the seasons turn to winter, those emotions become depressing. Dickinson presented striking images to capture feeling of despair caused by winter. The despair is so striking that nature feels it. Nature stops, and "the Landscape listens—/Shadows—hold their breath—" (13-14). Dickinson makes the power of this depression clear by explaining that it connects the human to death. She ends the poem by saying that the landscape and its shadows are depressed by winter light that has "the look of Death" (16).

In her article in The Emily Dickinson Handbook, Judith Farr explains that Dickinson "prefers to describe nature in movement or change," and often shows nature sunsets or sunrises "in progress" and animals in "natural motion" (68). The use of imagery of the seasons allows Dickinson to create that feeling of movement or change. In both poems, the changing seasons are powerful because they create change. "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" shows the violent power of the rapidly changing seasons. The narrator persona seems to be in awe of nature and its ability to change the earth. The autumn winds are fast-moving and full of unexpected actions. In contrast, in "There's a certain Slant of light," Dickinson describes the season of winter and emphasizes that it causes slow changes that become increasingly depressing. The landscape is described as listening and full of "Shadows" that "hold their breath." This change is still powerful, but it is powerful because it is a slow, pressure-filled force. In "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-," the imagery is violent, but the persona seems to be thrilled by that violence. In "There's a certain Slant of light," the imagery is more about pressure, and the persona seems to be feeling depressed by the seasons.

In both poems, these changing seasons are connected to human emotions by describing nature as if it were a human body. In "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-," Autumn changes the earth into a huge human body. The red leaves become the blood pulsing through the body. In "There's a certain Slant of light," nature is described as if it is a person who can listen and hold her breath. The natural world is full of shadows that seem to be waiting for death. The changing seasons can thus be connected to the idea of a person and to the person's changing emotions.

Nature gives Dickinson a safe way to explore these complicated human emotions. Her interest in a feeling of violence or the desire to see blood spilling can be safely put into an image of nature. Her interest in exploring depression and waiting for death can be safely put into the winter landscape. Dickinson allows us to see these complicated emotions, but she reassures us that they are part of nature. Feeling complex, changing emotions is part of the natural world.

Dickinson's own life shows how she connected her complex emotions to nature. "Emily Dickinson: The Writing Years (1855–1865)" reveals that one of Dickinson's favorite hobbies was gardening. This Emily Dickinson Museum biography explains that, during the years that she was writing the most poetry, her father "added a conservatory to the Homestead, where Emily could raise climate-sensitive plants. Now she could engage in her beloved hobby of gardening year-round." At this same time, as the biography shows, Dickinson is writing poems about "pain, grief, joy, love, nature, and art." In addition, just like Dickinson made booklets of her poems, she made a booklet that collected plants. This Herbarium is available on the Harvard University website, and shows Dickinson's close work with nature. Dickinson worked with nature through her gardening, and it was obviously an important part of her life. As a result, she probably felt that nature connected to her emotional life and even let her feel deep emotions.

Critics explain that Dickinson uses images of nature to express her deepest emotions. In her analysis of "There's a certain Slant of light," Paula Bennett explains, "The world becomes a partner in the poet's depression" (118). She continues to argue that the poem "is explicitly a projection of the poet's inner life, a massive transference to the landscape of her inner state of being (Bennett, 118). Bennet makes the convincing argument that Dickinson projects her inner emotions onto the external landscape. Dickinson uses nature to show human emotions, and this can be seen in how she describes weather and the seasons. In "There's a certain Slant of light," Dickinson reveals that winter afternoons "oppress" her "like the weight/Of cathedral tunes" (3-4). This passage clearly shows her use of the seasons to express the depression Bennett explains in her article. In "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-," the emotion is less depression and more of being upset or even thrilled by the violence of the seasons. Dickinson describes how the autumn wind has "upset the Basin" (7). The word "upset" can be used to describe her emotions, too.

Bennett emphasizes that nature becomes human-like, supporting the argument that Dickinson uses the seasons to represent human emotions. According to Bennett, Dickinson uses the landscape to reflect her mind. Therefore, Dickinson is close to nature and, in "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" and "There's a certain Slant of light," she connects her emotions to the seasons. However, other critics emphasize the distance between Dickinson and the landscape. Critic Christine Gerhardt argues that Dickinson's poetry shows an "engagement with local environments while acknowledging nature's difference and distance" (65). While Bennett might emphasize this idea of "engagement," Gerhardt emphasizes "difference and distance" (65).

Gerdhart argues that Dickinson's writing creates "respectful distance between human and nature, which grants nature a dignified autonomy" (65). However, nature is not distant in "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" and "There's a certain Slant of light." In these poems, the connection between humans and nature overwhelms any distance. Both poems use personification to make nature seem human. For example, in "There's a certain Slant of light," nature seems cold and reserved, but it is given human qualities: the landscape "listens" and its shadows "hold their breath" (13-14). Nature is not distanced or "autonomous" from people, but acts like people. Nature remains close and connected to people. "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" goes even further in wanting to remove the "respectful distance between human and nature" that Gerdhart emphasizes (65). This poem seems to want to make the human and nature as close as possible. Nature is given all of the life of a human being, and becomes a human body.

In her article, "Poem 656: Terrains of Difference: Reading Shelley and Dickinson on Autumn," Joanne Feit Diehl explains that "Dickinson's text constitutes a re-examination of the relationship between nature and the human" (87). Emphasizing the reader, Diehl then explains how the poem impacts the reader, arguing, "Because the reader cannot distinguish between what lies within or beyond the self, the poem erodes both rhetorical and physical boundaries" (88). Diehl continues to argue that Dickinson re-maps the boundary between the self and environment, including the boundary between the internal imagination and external nature (89). The boundary between the human and nature is eroded—and Dickinson uses the imagery of changing seasons to do that.

Criticism shows how these poems' powerful images can be connected to even larger ideas about difficult human emotions. For example, in "Blood in the Basin: The Civil War in Emily Dickinson's 'The name—of it—is 'Autumn'," David Cody explains that the imagery in the poem can be seen as representing the bloody battles of the Civil War or the Bible's idea of death and salvation (38-39). In her chapter on "There's a certain Slant of light," Priddy explains that the poem explores "the difference between the interior and exterior world" and allows Dickinson to explore ideas about pain, death, and mourning (79-80).

Ramos 8

Dickinson uses nature to represent human emotions. As seen in both 'The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" and "There's a certain Slant of light," she uses images of the changing seasons to explore how human emotions change. 'The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-" depicts emotions as rapidly changing in a violent and thrilling way, while "There's a certain Slant of light" depicts emotions as slowly becoming more depressing. Critics show how Dickinson's nature imagery can use different strategies, including creating distance between humans and nature. In these poems, however, Dickinson erases the boundary between humans and nature. Dickinson relies on the seasons and their changing imagery to capture the force of changing emotions.

[New page]

Ramos 9

Works Cited

Bennett, Paula. Emily Dickinson: Woman Poet. Iowa City: U of Iowa P, 1990. Print.

Cody, Davis. "Blood in the Basin: The Civil War in Emily Dickinson's 'The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-." Emily Dickinson Journal 12.1 (2003): 25–52. Project MUSE. Web. 4 Apr. 2016.

Dickinson, Emily. Herbarium, circa 1839–1846 (manuscript collection of pressed plants). Houghton Library. Harvard University, n.d. Web. 9 Apr. 2016.

—. "The name—of it—is 'Autumn'-." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 857. Print.

—. "There's a certain Slant of Light." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 857. Print.

Ramos 10

Diehl, Joanne Feit. "Poem 656: Terrains of Difference: Reading Shelley and Dickinson on Autumn." Women's Studies 16.1 (1989): 87–90. Academic Search Premier. Web. 5 Apr. 2016.

"Emily Dickinson: The Writing Years (1855–1865)." Emily Dickinson Museum: The Homestead and the Evergreens. Trustees of Amherst College, 2011. Web. 1 Apr. 2016.

Farr, Judith. "Dickinson and the Visual Arts." The Emily Dickinson Handbook. Ed. Gudrun Grabher, Roland Hagenbuchle, and Cristanne Miller. Amherst, MA: The U of Massachusetts P, 2005. 61–92. Print.

Gerhardt, Christine. "'Often seen—but seldom felt': Emily Dickinson's Reluctant Ecology of Place." Emily Dickinson Journal 15.1 (2006): 56–78. Project MUSE. Web. 19 Apr. 2016.

Martin, Wendy. The Cambridge Introduction to Emily Dickinson. Cambridge: Cambridge UP, 2007. Print.

Priddy, Anna. Bloom's How to Write about Emily Dickinson. New York: Infobase Publications, 2008. Print.

Tandon, Neeru, and Anjana Trevedi. Thematic Patterns of Emily Dickinson's Poetry. New Delhi: Atlantic Publishers, 2008. Print.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is the thesis of the essay? Where does it appear? Is it clearly stated? Is the thesis developed in the sentences that immediately follow it?
2. In paragraphs 2 and 3, Mike uses critics to help define and explain Dickinson's use of nature. How does he synthesize these critics? List each critic and the key idea that each critic presents that Mike uses in his paper. How does this use of criticism help to present Mike's ideas in his paper as valid?
3. In paragraph 7, Mikes uses the critic Farr to introduce the concept of change. How does he apply Farr's ideas to the two poems? In paragraph 14, Mike uses the critic Dehl to continue to develop his paper's analysis of Dickinson's presentation of nature. How does he use Dehl's ideas to continue to complicate the concept of nature?
4. How does Mike synthesize the critics Bennett and Gerdhart in paragraphs 11–13? Does he position these two critics as agreeing or disagreeing?

5. Examine Mike's close reading of the two Dickinson poems. Does he provide an interpretation of the poems that becomes his thesis concept and subconcepts? Does Mike's analysis of these poems shine through the critics' ideas?
6. How does Mike integrate his research findings on Dickinson's gardening and her "Herbarium" into the paper? Is this part of the paper successful?
7. Examine the formatting of the paper, the paper's parenthetical citations, and the works-cited page. Using Appendix B as a guide, apply its tips and rules to Mike's paper. Does Mike follow these guidelines correctly?

CHAPTER 11

Reading and Writing about Essays

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Identify types of essays and their elements
- Identify an essay's topic and thesis
- Analyze essays
- Write a successful paper about an essay, using a writing process that moves from first annotations to final draft

The word essay entered the English language in 1597, when Francis Bacon called a small book of ten short prose pieces Essays. Bacon borrowed the word from Michel de Montaigne, a French writer who in 1580 had published some short prose pieces under the title Essais—that is, "testings," or "attempts," from the French verb essayer, "to try." Montaigne's title indicated that his graceful and personal jottings—the fruit of pleasant study and meditation—were not fully thought-out treatises but, rather, sketches that could be amplified and amended.

If you keep a journal or write a blog, you are working in Montaigne's tradition. You jot down your thoughts, perhaps your responses to a work of literature, a current event, or a social trend, partly to find out exactly what you think and how you feel. Montaigne said, in the preface to his book, "I am myself the subject of my book," and in all probability you are the real subject of your journal or blog. Your entries—your responses to other writers, events, opinions, and ideas, and your reflections on those responses—require you to examine yourself.

Types of Essays

If you have already taken a course in composition (or even if you haven't), you are probably familiar with the chief kinds of essays. Essays are usually classified—roughly, of course—along the following lines: meditation (or speculation or reflection), argument (or persuasion), exposition (or information), narration, and description.

Of these kinds of essays, the meditative essay (or speculative essay or reflective essay) is the closest to what Montaigne wrote. In a meditative essay, the writer is chiefly concerned with exploring an idea or a feeling. The organization usually seems casual—not a careful and evident structure, but a free flow of thought—what the Japanese (who wrote with brush and ink) called "following the brush." The essayist is thinking, but he or she is not especially concerned with arguing a case, or even with being logical. We think along with the essayist, chiefly because we find the writer's tentative thoughts engaging. The writer may, in the long run, be pressing a point or advancing an argument, but the emphasis is on the free play of mind, not on an orderly and logical analysis.

In the argumentative essay (or persuasive essay), the organization probably is apparent, and it is reasonable: The essay may announce a problem, define terms, or present and refute solutions that the writer considers to be inadequate, and then, by way of a knockdown ending, offer what the writer believes to be the correct solution. Most academic writing takes the form of an argumentative essay and follows a logical structure that presents a thesis or a central claim, subpoints that explain ideas developing that claim, and evidence that works to prove or support that claim.

The expository essay (or informative essay), in which the writer is concerned with giving information (for instance, on how to annotate a text, how to read a poem, or how to use a computer), ordinarily has an equally clear organization. A clear organization is necessary in such an essay because the reader is reading, not in order to come into contact with an interesting mind that may keep doubling back on its thinking (as in a meditative essay), and not in order to come to a decision about some controversial issue (as in an argumentative essay), but in order to gain information.

The narrative essay and the descriptive essay are usually meditative essays. A narrative essay may recount some happening—often a bit of autobiography—partly to allow the writer and the reader to meditate on it. Similarly, a description, let's say of a spider spinning a web or of children playing in the street, usually turns out to be offered, not so much as information—thus, it is unlike the account of how to annotate a text—but as something for the writer and reader to enjoy in itself, and perhaps to think further about.

Most essays are not pure specimens of a single type. An informative essay, let's say on how to make the most out of a trip to New York City, may begin with a paragraph that seeks to persuade you to start your trip with a visit to the Metropolitan Museum of Art rather than the Statue of Liberty. Or, it may begin with a brief narrative, an anecdote of a visitor who loved the Metropolitan Museum of Art, again in order to persuade you to visit this site. Similarly, an argument—and probably most of the essays that you write in English courses will be arguments concerning the meaning or structure of a literary work—may include some exposition, such as a brief summary, to remind the reader of aspects of the work that you will be arguing about.

Elements of Essays

The Essayist's Persona

Many of the essays that give readers the most pleasure are, like entries in a journal, reflective. An essay of this kind sets forth the writer's attitudes or states of mind—the writer's persona—and the reader's interest in the essay is almost entirely in the way the writer sees things. It's not so much what the writer sees and says as how the writer says what he or she sees. Even in essays that are narrative—essays that recount events, such as a bit of biography—our interest is more in the essayists' responses to the events than in the events themselves. When we read an essay, we might respond, "So that's how it feels to be you" and "Tell me more about the way you see things." The bit of history is less important than the memorable presence of the writer.

Voice

When you read an essay in this chapter or in a later chapter, try to imagine the person who wrote it, the kind of person who seems to be speaking it. Then, slowly reread the essay, noticing how the writer conveyed this personality or persona, or voice (even while he or she was writing about a topic). The writer's persona may be revealed in part by common or uncommon words, by short or long sentences, by literal or figurative language, or by familiar or erudite examples.

Let's take a simple, familiar example of words that establish a persona. Lincoln begins the Gettysburg Address with "Four score and seven years ago. . . ." He might have said "Eighty-seven years ago," but the language would have lacked the biblical echo, and the persona would then have been that of an ordinary person rather than that of a man who has about him something of the tone of an Old Testament prophet. This religious tone of "four score and seven years ago" was entirely fitting because

- President Lincoln was speaking at the dedication of a cemetery for "these hallowed dead," and
- he was urging the members of his audience to give all of their energies to ensure that the dead men had not died in vain.

By such devices as the choice of words, the length of sentences, and the sorts of evidence offered, an author can sound to the reader solemn, agitated, witty, genial, or severe. If you are familiar with the famous I Have a Dream speech by Martin Luther King Jr., you may recall that he begins the piece (originally it was a speech, delivered at the Lincoln Memorial on the one-hundredth anniversary of Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation) with these words: "Five score years ago. . . ." King is deliberately echoing Lincoln's words, partly in tribute to Lincoln, but also to help establish himself as the spiritual descendant of Lincoln and, further back, of the founders of the Judeo-Christian tradition.

Tone

Only by reading closely can we hear in the mind's ear the writer's tone—friendly, bitter, indignant, or ironic (characterized by wry understatement or overstatement). Perhaps you have heard the line from Owen Wister's novel The Virginian (1902): "When you call me that, smile!" Words spoken with a smile mean something different from the same words forced through clenched teeth. But, while speakers can communicate—or guide the responses of their audience—by body language, gestures, facial expressions, and changes in tone of voice, writers have only words on paper.

As a writer, you are learning control of tone when you learn to take pains in your choice of words, in the way you arrange sentences, and even in the punctuation marks that you may find yourself changing in your final draft. These skills will pay off doubly if you apply them to your reading by putting yourself in the place of the writer whose work you are reading.

As a reader, you must make an effort to "hear" the writer's tone as part of the meaning that the words communicate. Skimming is not adequate for that task.

Thinking carefully about the works in this book means, first of all, reading them carefully, listening for the sound of the speaking voice so that you can respond to the persona that the author presents.

Consider the following paragraph from the middle of "Black Men and Public Space," a short essay by Brent Staples. Staples is speaking of growing up in a tough neighborhood. Of course, the paragraph is only a short example; the tone depends, finally, on the entire essay, which will follow.

> As a boy, I saw countless tough guys locked away; I have since buried several, too. They were babies, really—a teenage cousin, a brother of twenty-two, a childhood friend in his mid-twenties—all gone down in episodes of bravado played out in the streets. I came to doubt the virtues of intimidation early on. I chose, perhaps unconsciously, to remain a shadow—timid, but a survivor.

Judging only from these few lines, what do we know about Staples? Perhaps you will agree that we can probably say something along these lines:

- He is relatively quiet and gentle. We sense this, not simply because he tells us that he was "timid," but because (at least, in this passage) he does not raise his voice either in denunciation of white society for creating a system that produces black violence or in denunciation of those blacks during his youth who engaged in violence.
- He is perceptive; he sees that the "tough guys," despite the fact that some were in their twenties, were babies; their bravado was infantile and destructive.
- He speaks with authority; he is giving a firsthand report.
- He doesn't claim to be especially shrewd; he modestly says that he may have "unconsciously" adopted the behavior that enabled him to survive.
- In saying that he is a "survivor," he displays a bit of wry humor. The usual image of a survivor is a guy in a Banana Republic outfit gripping a knife, someone who has survived a dog-eat-dog world by being tougher than the others. But Staples says almost comically that he is a "survivor" who is "timid."

If your responses to the paragraph are somewhat different, list them and try to explain them in a few sentences.

Topic and Thesis

Although we have emphasized the importance of the essayist's personality, essayists also make a point. They have selected a topic, the subject or issue that they want to address. They have a thesis or an argument, and an argument implies taking a specific viewpoint about that topic. In reading an essay, then, try to identify the topic. The topic of "Do-It-Yourself Brain Surgery" cannot really be about brain surgery; it must be about do-it-yourself books, and the attitude will probably be one of amused contempt for such books. Even an essay that is largely narrative, like Brent Staples's recounting a personal experience or a bit of history, will probably have an attitude toward the event that is being narrated. It is that attitude—the interpretation of the event rather than the event itself—that may be the real topic of the essay.

It's time to look at Staples's essay. At the end of this chapter, you will find a writer's portfolio that presents a student's note taking on the essay and her summary paper on the essay.

Brent Staples

Brent Staples, born in 1951 in Chester, Pennsylvania, received a BA degree from Widener University in Chester, Pennsylvania, and a PhD from the University of Chicago. After working as a journalist in Chicago, he joined the New York Times in 1985, and he is now on the newspaper's editorial board, where he writes on politics and culture. His essay was first published in Ms. magazine in 1986 and was reprinted in a slightly revised form—the form we give here—in Harper's in 1987.

Black Men and Public Space

My first victim was a woman—white, well dressed, probably in her late twenties. I came upon her late one evening on a deserted street in Hyde Park, a relatively affluent neighborhood in an otherwise mean, impoverished section of Chicago. As I swung onto the avenue behind her, there seemed to be a discreet, uninflammatory distance between us. Not so. She cast back a worried glance. To her, the youngish black man—a broad six feet two inches with a beard and billowing hair, both hands shoved into the pockets of a bulky military jacket—seemed menacingly close. After a few more quick glimpses, she picked up her pace and was soon running in earnest. Within seconds, she disappeared into a cross street.

That was more than a decade ago. I was twenty-two years old, a graduate student newly arrived at the University of Chicago. It was in the echo of that terrified woman's footfalls that I first began to know the unwieldy inheritance I'd come into—the ability to alter public space in ugly ways. It was clear that she thought herself the quarry of a mugger, a rapist, or worse. Suffering a bout of insomnia, however, I was stalking sleep, not defenseless wayfarers. As a softy who is scarcely able to take a knife to a raw chicken—let alone hold one to a person's throat—I was surprised, embarrassed, and dismayed all at once. Her flight made me feel like an accomplice in tyranny. It also made it clear that I was indistinguishable from the muggers who occasionally seeped into the area from the surrounding ghetto. That first encounter, and those that followed, signified that a vast, unnerving gulf lay between nighttime pedestrians—particularly women—and me. And I soon gathered that being perceived as dangerous is a hazard in itself. I only needed to turn a corner into a dicey situation, or crowd some frightened, armed person in a foyer somewhere, or make an errant move after being pulled over by a policeman. Where fear and weapons meet—and they often do in urban America—there is always the possibility of death.

In that first year, my first away from my hometown, I was to become thoroughly familiar with the language of fear. At dark, shadowy intersections, I could cross in front of a car stopped at a traffic light and elicit the thunk, thunk, thunk, thunk of the driver—black, white, male, or female—hammering down the door locks. On less traveled streets after dark, I grew accustomed to but never comfortable with people crossing to the other side of the street rather than pass me. Then there were the standard unpleasantries with policemen, doormen, bouncers, cabdrivers, and others whose business it is to screen out troublesome individuals before there is any nastiness.

I moved to New York nearly two years ago and I have remained an avid night walker. In central Manhattan, the near-constant crowd cover minimizes tense one-on-one street encounters. Elsewhere—in SoHo, for example, where sidewalks are narrow and tightly spaced buildings shut out the sky—things can get very taut indeed.

5 After dark, on the warrenlike streets of Brooklyn where I live, I often see women who fear the worst from me. They seem to have set their faces on neutral, and with their purse straps strung across their chests bandolier-style, they forge ahead as though bracing themselves against being tackled. I understand, of course, that the danger they perceive is not a hallucination. Women are particularly vulnerable to street violence, and young black males are drastically overrepresented among the perpetrators of that violence. Yet these truths are no solace against the kind of alienation that comes of being ever the suspect, a fearsome entity with whom pedestrians avoid making eye contact.

It is not altogether clear to me how I reached the ripe old age of twenty-two without being conscious of the lethality nighttime pedestrians attributed to me. Perhaps it was because in Chester, Pennsylvania, the small, angry industrial town where I came of age in the 1960s, I was scarcely noticeable against a backdrop of gang warfare, street knifings, and murders. I grew up one of the good boys, had perhaps a half-dozen fistfights. In retrospect, my shyness of combat has clear sources.

As a boy, I saw countless tough guys locked away; I have since buried several, too. They were babies, really—a teenage cousin, a brother of twenty-two, a childhood friend in his mid-twenties—all gone down in episodes of bravado played out in the streets. I came to doubt the virtues of intimidation early on. I chose, perhaps unconsciously, to remain a shadow—timid, but a survivor.

The fearsomeness mistakenly attributed to me in public places often has a perilous flavor. The most frightening of these confusions occurred in the late 1970s and early 1980s, when I worked as a journalist in Chicago. One day, rushing into the office of a magazine I was writing for with a deadline story in hand, I was mistaken for a burglar. The office manager called security and, with an ad hoc posse, pursued me through the labyrinthine halls, nearly to my editor's door. I had no way of proving who I was. I could only move briskly toward the company of someone who knew me.

Another time I was on assignment for a local paper and killing time before an interview. I entered a jewelry store on the city's affluent Near North Side. The proprietor excused herself and returned with an enormous red Doberman pinscher straining at the end of a leash. She stood, the dog extended toward me, silent to my questions, her eyes bulging nearly out of her head. I took a cursory look around, nodded, and bade her good night.

10 Relatively speaking, however, I never fared as badly as another black male journalist. He went to nearby Waukegan, Illinois, a couple of summers ago to work on a story about a murderer who was born there. Mistaking the reporter for the killer, police officers hauled him from his car at gunpoint and but for his press credentials would probably have tried to book him. Such episodes are not uncommon. Black men trade tales like this all the time.

Over the years, I learned to smother the rage I felt at so often being taken for a criminal. Not to do so would surely have led to madness. I now take precautions to make myself less threatening. I move about with care, particularly late in the evening. I give a wide berth to nervous people on subway platforms during the wee hours, particularly when I have exchanged business clothes for jeans. If I happen to be entering a building behind some people who appear skittish, I may walk by, letting them clear the lobby before I return, so as not to seem to be following them. I have been calm and extremely congenial on those rare occasions when I've been pulled over by the police.

And on late-evening constitutionals I employ what has proved to be an excellent tension-reducing measure: I whistle melodies from Beethoven and Vivaldi and the more popular classical composers. Even steely New Yorkers hunching toward nighttime destinations seem to relax, and occasionally they even join in the tune. Virtually everybody seems to sense that a mugger wouldn't be warbling bright, sunny selections from Vivaldi's Four Seasons. It is my equivalent of the cowbell that hikers wear when they know they are in bear country.

[1987]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In a paragraph or two, set forth what you take to be Staples's purpose in "Black Men and Public Space." Do you think he was writing chiefly to clarify ideas for himself—for instance, to explore how he came to discover the "alienation that comes of being ever the suspect"? Or was he writing to assist blacks? Or to assist whites? Or something else? (You may conclude that none of these suggestions are relevant.)
2. The success of a narrative as a piece of writing often depends on the reader's willingness to identify with the narrator. From an examination of "Black Men and Public Space," what explanations can you give for your willingness (or unwillingness) to identify yourself with Staples? (Probably you will want to say something about his persona as you sense it from the essay.) In a five-hundred-word essay explaining your position, very briefly summarize Staples's essay and state his thesis.
3. Have you ever unintentionally altered public space? You may recall an experience in which, as a child, your mere presence caused adults to alter their behavior—for instance, to stop quarreling.

   After a session of brainstorming in which you produce some possible topics, you'll want to try to settle on one. After you have chosen a topic and produced a first draft, if you are not satisfied with your first paragraph—if you feel that it is not likely to grab and hold the reader's attention—you may want to imitate the strategy that Staples adopted for his first paragraph.
4. If you have ever been in the position of one of Staples's "victims," that is, if you have ever shown fear or suspicion of someone who, it turned out, meant you no harm (or if you can imagine being in that position), write an essay from the "victim's" point of view. Explain what happened, what you did and thought. Did you think at the time about the feelings of the person you avoided or fled from? Has reading Staples's essay prompted further reflections on your experience? (Suggested length: 750 words.)

✔ CHECKLIST: Getting Ideas for Writing about Essays

Persona and Tone

- ☐ What sort of persona does the writer create? Authoritative? Tentative? Wise-guy? Something else?
- ☐ How does the writer create this persona? (Does the writer use colloquial language, formal language, or technical language? Short sentences or long ones? Personal anecdotes? Quotations from authorities?)
- ☐ What is the tone of the essay? Is it, for example, solemn, or playful? Is the tone consistent? If not, how do the shifts affect your understanding of the writer's point or your identification of the writer's persona? Who is the audience?

Kind of Essay

- ☐ What kind of essay is it? Is it chiefly a presentation of facts (an exposition, a report, a history)? A meditation? Or is it chiefly an argument? If it is an argument, what persuasive devices does the writer use? Logic? Appeals to the emotion? (Probably the essay draws on several kinds of writing, but which kind is it primarily? How are the other kinds related to the main kind?) What is the overall purpose of the essay?

(continued)

- ☐ What does the essay seem to add up to? If the essay is chiefly meditative or speculative, how much emphasis is placed on the persona? That is, if the essay is a sort of thinking-out-loud, is your interest chiefly in the announced or ostensible topic or in the writer's mood and personality? If the essay is chiefly a presentation of facts, does it also have a larger implication? If it narrates a happening (history), does the reader draw an inference—find a meaning—in the happening? If the essay is chiefly an argument, what is the thesis? How is the thesis supported? (Is it supported, for example, by induction, deduction, analogy, or emotional appeal?) Do you accept the assumptions (explicit and implicit)?

Structure

- ☐ Is the title appropriate? Propose a better title, if possible.
- ☐ Did the opening paragraph interest you? Why, or why not? Did the essay continue more or less as expected, or did it turn out to be different from what you anticipated?
- ☐ Prepare an outline of the essay. What effect does the writer seem to be aiming at by using this structure?

Value

- ☐ What is especially good (or bad) about the essay? Is it logically persuasive? Or entertaining? Or does it introduce an engaging persona? Or (if it is a narrative) does it tell a story effectively, using (where appropriate) description, dialogue, and commentary, and somehow make you feel that this story is worth reporting?
- ☐ Does the writer seem to hold values that you share? Or cannot share? Explain.
- ☐ Do you think that most readers will share your response, or do you think that, for some reason—for example, your age or cultural background—your responses are unusual? Explain.

Student Writing Portfolio

SUMMARY PAPER

Writing a Summary Paper

A summary is a condensation or abridgment; it briefly gives the reader the gist of a longer work. It boils down the longer work, resembling the longer work, for example, as a bouillon cube resembles a bowl of soup. A summary of Staples's "Black Men and Public Space" will reduce the essay, perhaps to a paragraph or two or even to a sentence. It will not call attention to Staples's various strategies, and it will not evaluate his views or his skill as a writer; it will merely present the gist of what he says. We discuss summary in detail in Chapter 6.

If, then, you are asked to write an analysis of something that you have read, you should not hand in a summary. On the other hand, a very brief summary may appropriately appear within an analytical essay. Usually, the reader will need some information, and the writer of the essay will briefly summarize that information. For example, a student, Anna Torres, who wrote about Staples's essay, is summarizing when she writes

> Staples says that he is aware that his presence frightens many whites, especially women.

Anna is summarizing because she is reporting, without comment, what Staples said. On the other hand, she is analyzing when she writes

> By saying at the outset, "My first victim was a woman—white, well dressed, probably in her late twenties," Staples immediately catches the reader's attention and sets up expectations that will be undermined in the next paragraph.

In this sentence, Anna is not reporting what Staples said but is explaining how he achieved an effect.

Anna might take her analysis even further by trying to engage in an argument with Staples or apply Staples's ideas to anther situation. For example, she might question how white people have been culturally trained to fear black men or extend Staples's ideas to current examples of black men being unfairly feared. However, these forms of critical thinking—argumentation and application—move beyond the goals and limits of summary.

A summary is information-based: It focuses on conveying the information in a text accurately and concisely. A successful summary demonstrates the reader's understanding of a text and Anna's ability to pass that understanding on to her own readers. Since a summary must condense the source's information, you must think carefully about what ideas you are selecting to explain in your summary. Always summarize the text's most important ideas, and leave out the less important details that are being used to illustrate those ideas. In addition to selecting information carefully, make sure that you are conveying information accurately. As accuracy is one of the central goals of summary, make sure to reread your source and your summary side by side, double-checking the correctness of your information.

In Chapter 6, we discussed principles that govern summaries (see the list on pages 419–20). Here is a summary of our comments on "summary":

> A summary is a condensation or abridgment. Its chief characteristics are that (1) it is rarely more than one-fourth as long as the original; (2) its brevity is usually achieved by leaving out most of the concrete details of the original; (3) it is accurate; (4) it may rearrange the organization of the original, especially if a rearrangement will make things clearer; (5) it is normally in the present tense.

Let's look at the assignment given to Anna, and then explore how she approached that assignment to create a successful summary.

Assignment

One-paragraph Summary:

- This paper asks you to write a concise one-paragraph summary of Brent Staples's essay, "Black Men and Public Space."
- Read "Black Men and Public Space" carefully, noting the most important information that it contains. Reread the essay, determining what information will be essential to convey in your summary. Select the information that you wish to convey carefully.
- Write a one-paragraph summary. Condense the key information in "Black Men and Public Space" into one paragraph. Note that you are capturing the main ideas of a thirteen-paragraph essay in a one-paragraph statement.
- Check your summary for accuracy.

Annotation: Reading for Information

As we explored in Chapters 3 and 4, annotating a text is the best way to increase your comprehension and appreciation of it. Annotation is the practice of reading with a pen in hand, marking up the text as you read it. Active annotation uses a wide variety of marks on the text—underlines, circles, arrows—and a wide variety of marginal notes on the side of the text—repetition of key words, questions, and notes about meaning. Annotation can be focused on the task of summary, noting the key information contained in the text and marking it up in a way that makes that information easy to retrieve.

Annotation marks help to ensure your understanding of the text. If you are reading a difficult, complex, and dense text, you might engage in reading and rereading, repeatedly marking up the text simply to make sure that you understand it. In addition, annotation typically leads to analysis; as a reader, you often can't help but start to question a text's ideas or isolate concepts for development as you read. As you write a summary paper, simply make sure to concentrate on the annotation marks that capture your understanding of the text rather than your analysis of it.

As Anna annotates Brent Staples's "Black Men and Public Space," she uses her marks to gather important information. She underlines sentences that she feels are critical to understanding the text. She also repeats key bits of information in her marginal notes. Some of this information will make its way into her summary, but not all. She must be selective, so she has added stars next to the most important information.

Student Work: Annotation
"Information Gathering" Marginal Notes

My first victim was a woman—white, well dressed, probably in her late twenties. I came upon her late one evening on a deserted street in Hyde Park, a relatively affluent neighborhood in an otherwise mean, impoverished section of Chicago. As I swung onto the avenue behind her, there seemed to be a discreet, uninflammatory distance between us. Not so. She cast back a worried glance. To her, the youngish black man—a broad six feet two inches with a beard and billowing hair, both hands shoved into the pockets of a bulky military jacket—seemed menacingly close. After a few more quick glimpses, she picked up her pace and was soon running in earnest. Within seconds, she disappeared into a cross street.	victim: white female writer: black male she runs
That was more than a decade ago. I was twenty-two years old, a graduate student newly arrived at the University of Chicago. It was in the echo of that terrified woman's footfalls that I first began to know the unwieldy inheritance I'd come into—the ability to alter public space in ugly ways. It was clear that she thought herself the quarry of a mugger, a rapist, or worse. Suffering a bout of insomnia, however, I was stalking sleep, not defenseless wayfarers. As a softy who is scarcely able to take a knife to a raw chicken—let alone hold one to a person's throat—I was surprised, embarrassed, and dismayed all at once. Her flight made me feel like an accomplice in tyranny. It also made it clear that I was indistinguishable from the muggers who occasionally seeped into the area from the surrounding ghetto.	he = age 22 grad student change public space; fear (mugger, rapist) "softy" he = tyranny?? unclear he = mugger—why? race*

Note Taking: Using Inquiry Notes to Summarize Information

Inquiry: Paragraph-by-Paragraph Notes

If the essay doesn't include its own summary, we suggest that, after rereading each paragraph, you write a sentence summarizing the gist of the paragraph. (A very long or poorly unified paragraph may require two sentences, but make every effort to boil the paragraph down to a dozen or so words.) A paragraph that consists merely of a transitional sentence or two ("We will now turn to another example") you will lump with the next paragraph. Similarly, a series of very short paragraphs—for instance, three examples, each briefly stated, and all illustrating the same point—you will probably cover with a single sentence. But if a paragraph runs to half a page or more of print, it's probably worth having its own sentence of summary. In fact, your author may summarize the paragraph in its opening sentence or in its final sentence.

Anna decides to use this paragraph-by-paragraph approach to starting her summary writing assignment. Here is Anna's paragraph-by-paragraph summary of Staples's "Black Men and Public Space." The numbers refer to Staples's paragraphs.

Student Work: Listing Paragraph-by-Paragraph Summary Notes

Para #	Summary
1	"First victim" was a white woman in Chicago, who hurried away.
2	Age 22, he realized—to his surprise and embarrassment—that he (a "youngish black man") could be perceived by strangers as a mugger because he is large and black, and young. And, since his presence created fear, he was in a dangerous situation.
3-5	At intersections he heard drivers of cars lock their doors, and elsewhere he sensed hostility of bouncers and others. In NY, lots of tension on narrow sidewalks. Women are esp. afraid of him; he knows why, but that's "no solace."
6	He's not sure why it took him 22 years to see that others fear him, but prob. because in his hometown of Chester, Pa., there was lots of adolescent violence, though he stayed clear of it.
7	As a boy, he saw young toughs killed, and he kept clear, "timid, but a survivor."
8-10	Though he is gentle, he looks fearsome. Once, working as a journalist, he was mistaken for a burglar. Another time, in a jewelry store, the clerk brought out a guard dog. Another black journalist was covering a crime, but the police thought the journalist was the killer. Many blacks have had such experiences or have been treated worse.
11	He has learned to smother his rage—and he keeps away from nervous people.
12	Walking late at night, he whistles familiar classical music, trying to cool things down and reassure others that he is not a mugger.

When you have written your sentence summarizing the last paragraph, you may have done enough if the summary is intended simply for your own private use—for example, to help you review material for an examination. However, if you are going to use it as the basis of a summary within an essay that you are writing, you probably won't want to include a summary that is longer than three or four sentences, so now your job will be to reduce and combine the sentences that you have jotted down. Indeed, you may even want to reduce the summary to a single sentence.

Crafting a Thesis and Creating a Concise Summary

Drafting: Crafting a Strong Thesis

Summarizing each stage of an essay forces a reader to be attentive and can assist the reader in formulating a thesis statement, a sentence that (in the reader's opinion) sets forth the writer's central point. If an essay is essentially an argument—for example, an argument for or against capital punishment—it will probably include one or more sentences that directly assert the thesis. "Black Men and Public Space" is chiefly a narrative essay and is much less evidently an argument, but it does have a point, and some of its sentences come pretty close to summarizing that point. Here are three of those sentences:

> And I soon gathered that being perceived as dangerous is a hazard in itself. (2)
>
> The fearsomeness mistakenly attributed to me in public places often has a perilous flavor. (8)
>
> I now take precautions to make myself less threatening. (11)

We asked our students to formulate their own thesis sentence for Staples's essay. One student came up with the following sentence after first drafting a couple of tentative versions and then rereading the essay in order to modify them:

> In "Black Men and Public Space," Staples recognizes that because many whites fear a young black man and therefore may do violence to him, he may do well to try to cool the situation by making himself unthreatening.

Notice, again, that a thesis sentence states the point of the work. Don't confuse a thesis sentence with a summary of a narrative, such as "Staples at the age of twenty-two came to realize that his presence was threatening to whites, and he has since taken measures to make himself less threatening." This sentence, though true, doesn't clearly get at the point of the essay, the larger generalization that can be drawn from Staples's example.

Look again at the student's formulation of a thesis sentence (not the narrative summary sentence that we have just given). If you don't think that it fairly represents Staples's point, you may want to come up with a sentence that seems more precise to you.

Whether you use the thesis sentence that we have quoted or one that you formulate for yourself, you can still disagree strongly with what you take to be Staples's point. Your version of Staples's thesis should accurately reflect your understanding of Staples's point, but you need not agree with that point. For example, you may think that Staples is hypersensitive and thus question some of his conclusions.

A thesis sentence—whether the words are your own or the author's—is thus a capsule summary of the argument (not of the narrative) of the work. If you are writing an essay about an essay, you'll probably want to offer a sentence that reminds your reader of the point of the work that you are discussing or gives the reader the basis of an unfamiliar work. Here is another example of a summarizing thesis statement:

> In "Black Men and Public Space," Brent Staples uses his own experiences to show that black males, however harmless, are in a perilous situation because whites, especially white women, perceive them as threatening.

Let's look at how Anna drafts and redrafts a thesis statement for her summary paper. She wants to create a clear statement that summarizes the most important, overarching point of the essay, and she works through several revisions to hone that statement.

Student Work: Drafting
Crafting a Strong Thesis through Revision

Rough Draft:

Brent Staples is aware that many people see him as dangerous and see him as a threat. This causes him to be in danger himself, as he might get attacked, arrested, or worse. As a result, he recommends that black men try to be nonthreatening and cool everything down, such as in the example of whistling classical music.

key concept: seen as dangerous too much explanation unnecessary detail

↓

First Revision:

Brent Staples is aware that many people see him as dangerous, which causes him to realize that he could be in danger himself, and which further causes him to recommend that black men try to adopt nonthreatening behavior and cool everything down.

unneeded detail deleted tries to get all ideas in one sentence = confusing

↓

Second Revision:

Brent Staples, in "Black Man and Public Space," tells how his awareness that many white people regarded him as dangerous caused him to realize that he was in danger. His recommendation is to reduce anxiety by adopting nonthreatening behavior and cooling everything down.

clarifies idea of danger uses 2 sentences to keep ideas clear

2nd sentence has repetitive ideas

↓

Final Draft:

Brent Staples, in "Black Men and Public Space," tells how his awareness that many white people regarded him as dangerous caused him to realize that he was in danger. His implicitly recommended solution is to try to reduce this anxiety by adopting nonthreatening behavior.

keeps clear first sentence adds the idea of "implicit" clarifies second sentence by deleting repetition

Drafting: Creating a Concise Summary

Sometimes a fuller summary statement may be useful. For instance, if you are writing about a complex essay that makes six points, you may help your reader if you briefly restate all six points. All six points can never be clearly explained in a sentence or two. The length of your summary will depend on your purpose and the needs of your audience.

The following principles may help you to write your summary:

1. After having written sentences that summarize each paragraph or group of paragraphs, formulate the essay's thesis sentence. Formulating the thesis sentence in writing will help you to stay with what you take to be the writer's main point.
2. Write a first draft by turning your summaries of the paragraphs into fewer and better sentences.
3. Write a lead-in sentence that opens your summary essay. The lead in sentence can incorporate the thesis sentence. Alternatively, it can be a more general statement that names the topic of the text being summarized, preparing the reader for the thesis statement.
4. After writing a lead-in sentence and your thesis statement, organize and revise your summary paragraphs. Read and re-read the draft of your summary as a whole. Revise the draft, eliminating needless repetition, providing transitions, and adding whatever you think may be needed to clarify the work for someone who is unfamiliar with it. Your summary will typically follow the order of ideas in the text being summarized. However, you may rearrange the points if you think the rearrangement will clarify matters.
5. Check the accuracy of your writing. Compare your summary to the original text, making sure that you have both overarching ideas and supporting details correct.
6. Edit your draft for errors in grammar, punctuation, and spelling. Read it aloud to test it once more for readability. Sometimes only by reading aloud do writers detect needless repetition or confusing phrases.

Student Summary Paragraph: Summary Paragraph on Staples (Preliminary Draft)

Anna follows these steps to create a draft of her one-paragraph summary. She rewrites her paragraph-by-paragraph summary notes and adds her thesis statement to the opening of that writing. Because she has broken down the writing process into steps that include lots of note taking and prewriting, she can quickly and efficiently create a rough draft of her summary paragraph.

Anna Torres
English 101
Professor Wynne
25 January 2016

Summary Paragraph on Staples—First Draft

Brent Staples, in "Black Men and Public Space," tells how his awareness that many white people regarded him as dangerous caused him to realize that he was in danger. His implicitly recommended solution is to try to reduce this anxiety by adopting nonthreatening behavior. Staples first frightened a white woman in Chicago. When she hurried away from him, he realized—to his surprise and embarrassment—that because he was large and black and young he seemed to her to be a mugger. And since his presence created fear, he was in a dangerous situation. Other experiences, such as hearing drivers lock their cars when they were waiting at an intersection, have made him aware of the hostility of others. Women are especially afraid of him, and although he knows why, this knowledge does not comfort him. Oddly, it took him twenty-two years to see that others fear him. Perhaps it took this long because he grew up in a violent neighborhood, though he kept clear, making sure to survive. Because he is black and large, whites regard him as fearsome and treat him accordingly (once a clerk in a jewelry store brought out a guard dog), but other blacks have been treated worse. He has learned to smother his rage, and in order to cool things down he tries to reassure nervous people by keeping away from them and (when he is walking late at night) by whistling classical music.

Revision: Using a Revision Strategy

Chapter 8 emphasizes the importance of revision as part of the writing process. Even for a short writing assignment, such as this assignment that asks for only one paragraph, you should allow some time for revision. Rereading and revising your work is an essential step in creating a successful piece of writing.

Chapter 8 provides this revision checklist, which can be applied to Anna's summary paragraph.

✔REVISION CHECKLIST

Strengthen Your Thesis

☐ Add focus and depth to your central argument.

Develop Your Ideas

☐ Revisit your best responses to literary form and content, adding more thinking to those responses.

Integrate and Explain Your Evidence

☐ Select and analyze rich, interesting quotations to provide evidence for your ideas.

Improve the Organization

☐ Structure your ideas to follow a clear sequence.

Clarify Your Style and Edit for Correctness

☐ Use a consistent, professional style to explain your ideas, correcting sentence structure, word usage, and grammar.

Revision: Revising to Integrate Evidence

Anna has already engaged in revision as part of her drafting process. As seen, she reworked her thesis statement several times. Her paragraph-by-paragraph notes have allowed her to capture the essential ideas of Staples's essay and then to redraft those ideas as she wrote her summary. Anna has not, however, thought about how best to integrate evidence into her writing. Although her writing includes lots of details, it does not include any quotations. A summary should not include lengthy quotations, but it can include short key word or phrase quotations. Short quotations can capture the key ideas of the essay in a concise and effective way. Short quotations can also add liveliness to your writing style.

Student Summary Paragraph: "Exploring Racial Fear: A Summary of Brent Staples' 'Black Men and Public Spaces'" (Final Draft)

After reading her summary and looking back at her notes, Anna adds a few carefully chosen quotations to her draft. Her additions are in bold below. With these final touches in place, Anna's summary paragraph is complete.

Anna Torres
English 101
Professor Wynne
25 January 2016

Exploring Racial Fear: A Summary of Brent Staples' 'Black Men and Public Space'

Brent Staples, in "Black Men and Public Space," tells how his awareness that many white people regarded him as dangerous caused him to realize that he was in danger. His implicitly recommended solution is to try to reduce this anxiety by adopting nonthreatening behavior. Staples's "first victim" was a white woman in Chicago. When she hurried away from him, he realized—to his surprise and embarrassment—that because he was "a youngish black man" he seemed to her to be a mugger. And since his presence created fear, he was in a dangerous situation. Other experiences, such as hearing drivers lock their cars when they were waiting at an intersection, have made him aware of the hostility of others. Women are especially afraid of him, and although he knows why, this knowledge is "no solace." Oddly, it took him twenty-two years to see that others fear him. Perhaps it took this long because he grew up in a violent neighborhood, though he kept clear, "timid, but a survivor." Because he is black and large, whites regard him as fearsome and treat him accordingly (once a clerk in a jewelry store brought out a guard dog), but other blacks have been treated worse. He has learned to smother his rage, and uses "tension-reducing measures," such as when he tries to reassure nervous people by keeping away from them and by whistling classical music.

Your Turn: Additional Essays for Analysis

Langston Hughes

Langston Hughes (1902–67) was born in Joplin, Missouri. He lived part of his youth in Mexico, spent a year at Columbia University, served as a merchant seaman, and worked in a Paris nightclub, where he showed some of his poems to Alain Locke, a strong advocate of African American literature. After returning to the United States, Hughes went on to publish poetry, fiction, plays, essays, and biographies.

Salvation

I was saved from sin when I was going on thirteen. But not really saved. It happened like this. There was a big revival at my Auntie Reed's church. Every night for weeks there had been much preaching, singing, praying, and shouting, and some very hardened sinners had been brought to Christ, and the membership of the church had grown by leaps and bounds. Then just before the revival ended, they held a special meeting for children, "to bring the young lambs to the fold." My aunt spoke of it for days ahead. That night I was escorted to the front row and placed on the mourners' bench with all the other young sinners, who had not yet been brought to Jesus.

My aunt told me that when you were saved you saw a light, and something happened to you inside! And Jesus came into your life! And God was with you from then on! She said you could see and hear and feel Jesus in your soul. I believed her. I had heard a great many old people say the same thing and it seemed to me they ought to know. So I sat there calmly in the hot, crowded church, waiting for Jesus to come to me.

The preacher preached a wonderful rhythmical sermon, all moans and shouts and lonely cries and dire pictures of hell, and then he sang a song about the ninety and nine safe in the fold, but one little lamb was left out in the cold. Then he said: "Won't you come? Won't you come to Jesus? Young lambs, won't you come?" And he held out his arms to all us young sinners there on the mourners' bench. And the little girls cried. And some of them jumped up and went to Jesus right away. But most of us just sat there.

A great many old people came and knelt around us and prayed, old women with jet-black faces and braided hair, old men with work-gnarled hands. And the church sang a song about the lower lights are burning, some poor sinners to be saved. And the whole building rocked with prayer and song.

5 Still I kept waiting to see Jesus.

Finally all the young people had gone to the altar and were saved, but one boy and me. He was a rounder's son named Westley. Westley and I were surrounded by sisters and deacons praying. It was very hot in the church, and getting late now. Finally Westley said to me in a whisper: "God damn! I'm tired o' sitting here. Let's get up and be saved." So he got up and was saved.

Then I was left all alone on the mourners' bench. My aunt came and knelt at my knees and cried, while prayers and songs swirled all around me in the little church. The whole congregation prayed for me alone, in a mighty wail of moans and voices. And I kept waiting serenely for Jesus, waiting, waiting—but he didn't come. I wanted to see him, but nothing happened to me. Nothing! I wanted something to happen to me, but nothing happened.

I heard the songs and the minister saying: "Why don't you come? My dear child, why don't you come to Jesus? Jesus is waiting for you. He wants you. Why don't you come? Sister Reed, what is this child's name?"

"Langston," my aunt sobbed.

10 "Langston, why don't you come? Why don't you come and be saved? Oh, Lamb of God! Why don't you come?"

Now it was really getting late. I began to be ashamed of myself, holding everything up so long. I began to wonder what God thought about Westley, who certainly hadn't seen Jesus either, but who was now sitting proudly on the platform, swinging his knickerbockered legs and grinning down at me, surrounded by deacons and old women on their knees praying. God had not struck Westley dead for taking his name in vain or for lying in the temple. So I decided that maybe to save further trouble, I'd better lie, too, and say that Jesus had come, and get up and be saved.

So I got up.

Suddenly the whole room broke into a sea of shouting, as they saw me rise. Waves of rejoicing swept the place. Women leaped in the air. My aunt threw her arms around me. The minister took me by the hand and led me to the platform.

When things quieted down, in a hushed silence, punctuated by a few ecstatic "Amens," all the new young lambs were blessed in the name of God. Then joyous singing filled the room.

15 That night, for the last time in my life but one—for I was a big boy twelve years old—I cried. I cried, in bed alone, and couldn't stop. I buried my head under the quilts, but my aunt heard me. She woke up and told my uncle I was crying because the Holy Ghost had come into my life, and because I had seen Jesus. But I was really crying because I couldn't bear to tell her that I had lied, that I had deceived everybody in the church, and I hadn't seen Jesus, and that now I didn't believe there was a Jesus any more, since he didn't come to help me.

[1940]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Do you find "Salvation" amusing, or serious, or both? Explain your answer.
2. How would you characterize the style or voice of the first three sentences: childlike, sophisticated, or what? How would you characterize the final sentence? How can you explain the change in style or tone?
3. Why does Hughes bother to tell us, in paragraph 11, that Westley was "swinging his knickerbockered legs and grinning"? Do you think that Westley, too, may have cried that night? Give your reasons.
4. Is the episode told from the point of view of someone "going on thirteen" or from the point of view of a mature man? Cite evidence to support your position.
5. One of the golden rules of narrative writing is "Show, don't tell." In about five hundred words, report an experience that you had—for instance, a death in the family, a severe (perhaps unjust) punishment, or the first day in a new school—that produced strong feelings. Like Hughes, you may want to draw on an experience in which you were subjected to group pressure. Do not explicitly state your feelings; rather, let the reader understand them chiefly through concretely detailed actions. But, like Hughes, you might state your thesis or basic position in your first paragraph and then indicate when and where the experience took place.

LAURA VANDERKAM

Laura Vanderkam wrote this essay a few months after graduating from Princeton University. At the time that it was published in July 2001, she was working as a Collegiate Network intern with the editorial board of USA Today. She is a member of USA Today's board of contributors, and her work has appeared in Scientific American, Wired, and other publications.

Hookups Starve the Soul

The scene: my college dorm's basement bathroom on a Sunday morning early in my freshman year. As hungover girls crowded around the sinks, I caught a friend's eye in the mirror. What happened when she left last night's party with a boy neither of us had ever seen before?

"Oh," she said with a knowing look, "we hooked up."

No, not planes refueling in midair. Hookups are when a guy and girl get together for a physical encounter and don't expect anything else. They've all but replaced dating at most colleges, according to a study being released today by the Institute on American Values, a non-partisan family issues think tank. Only half of the women interviewed had been on six or more dates during college; a third had been on no more than two.

As a new college graduate, I can attest to this. I've had as many dates in my first 2 months in the real world as I had during my whole college career.

5 Lest you think college students are all libertines, hooking up doesn't mean having sex, although it can. The term includes all of the bases, and the ambiguity is intentional. Modest types can imply that less happened than did, and braggarts can hint at hitting a home run. Hookups are defined by alcohol, physical attraction and a lack of expectations in the morning.

While the study found that only 40% of the women interviewed admitted to hooking up, the practice pervades college culture. Dates and, for the most part, love affairs, are passé. Why bother asking someone to dinner when you can meet at a party, down a few drinks and go home together?

I hear the traditionalists clucking. Sex without commitment. Sounds like a male plot, right? But women are going along.

Some blame the sexual revolution. Some blame co-ed dorms and alcohol abuse. I blame something else. Hookups are part of a larger cultural picture. Today's college kids are the first generation to have had their entire childhoods scheduled. To them, dating is simply not a productive use of time.

Author David Brooks used the phrase "Organization Kid" in April's Atlantic Monthly to describe what he discovered at my alma mater, Princeton. After a lifetime of shuffling from soccer practice to scout meetings and piano lessons, today's college kids no longer want to spend hours debating the nature of good and evil, he noted. Once obsessed with getting into increasingly selective colleges—and now obsessed with getting great grades and even greater jobs—they no longer have hours to spend wooing a lover.

10 "I was amazed to learn how little dating goes on," Brooks wrote in the magazine. "Students go out in groups, and there is certainly a fair bit of partying on campus, but as one told me, 'People don't have time or energy to put into real relationships.'"

But 20-year-olds still have hormones, so they hook up instead. They stumble home together late Saturday night, roll around in bed, then pass out. The next morning, it's as if nothing happened.

Hookups do satisfy biology, but the emotional detachment doesn't satisfy the soul. And that's the real problem—not the promiscuity, but the lack of meaning.

People who don't bother with love affairs cut themselves off from life's headier emotions. What about Scarlett O'Hara's passion, or Juliet's? What about the mad jealousy of Dostoevsky's Dmitry Karamazov or even the illicit pleasures of Lady Chatterley and her lover? No great art will be inspired by the muse of Milwaukee's Best or a tryst that both parties are trying to forget.

In the same way, the Organization Kid's lack of soul-searching doesn't bode well for future poets and philosophers. Dostoevsky's Ivan wouldn't have had time to dream up the Grand Inquisitor if he spent his youth being carted from one sport to another and his early 20s obsessed with the perfect lab report.

15 Parents want the best for their kids—but some also want the perfect kid. Somewhere along the way to achieving these perfect children through structured activities, overachieving parents stunt the growth of their children's souls. Too much supervision creates kids who'd rather hook up than fall in love, who'd rather get the right answers on tests than ask the larger questions.

It's too late to bring back the dormitory mothers, curfews and traditional morals that forced courtships in the past. But the Organization Kid culture can be changed. If parents stop rigidly scheduling their children's lives, and if they no longer teach that life is only a series of concrete goals to be met and then exceeded, then there will be more real lovers and truth-seekers in the future—and fewer hookups.

[2001]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Vanderkam's opening words—"The scene"—are unusual because they sound like the opening of a play. What other rhetorical devices does Vanderkam use in order to make her essay interesting?
2. In a sentence or two, state Vanderkam's thesis. (Please do not confuse a statement of the thesis—the point, the argument—with a summary of the essay.) Do you agree with her thesis? In whole, in part, or not at all? Whether you agree or disagree with Vanderkam's thesis, write your own five-hundred-word essay on hookups—or on a related topic, such as college dating.

Steven Doloff

Steven Doloff, a professor of English and humanities at Pratt Institute, has published essays on contemporary culture, education, and travel in numerous publications, including the New York Times, the Boston Globe, and the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The Opposite Sex

For just one day, imagine yourself a boy (wow!). A girl (ugh).

Having seen Dustin Hoffman's female impersonation in the movie "Tootsie," I decided to give myself some reading over the Christmas recess by assigning in-class essays to my English composition students on how each would spend a day as a member of his or her respective opposite sex. From four classes I received approximately 100 essays. The sample, perhaps like the movie, proved both entertaining and annoying in its predictability.

The female students, as a group, took to the subject immediately and with obvious gusto, while the male students tended to wait a while (in several cases half the period), in something of a daze, before starting. The activities hypothetically engaged in by the women, whose ages averaged about 20, generally reflected two areas: envy of men's physical and social privileges, and curiosity regarding men's true feelings concerning women.

In their essays, women jauntily went places alone, and sometimes stayed out all night. They threw their clothes on the floor and left dishes in the sink. They hung out on the street and sweated happily in a variety of sports from football to weightlifting.

More than a third of them went out to cruise for dates. Appointing themselves in brand names of men's clothing and dousing themselves in men's cologne I have never heard of (I was instructed to read Gentleman's Quarterly magazine), they deliberately and aggressively accosted women, many women, on the street, in discos, in supermarkets. Others sought out the proverbial locker room for the kinds of bull sessions they hoped would reveal the real nitty-gritty masculine mind at work (on the subject of women).

5 At least two female students in each class spent chunks of their essays under the sheets with imaginary girlfriends, wives or strangers, finding out with a kind of scientific zeal what sex is like as a man.

Some, but not all of the women ended their essays with a formal, almost obligatory sounding statement of preference to be a female, and of gratitude in returning to their correct gender after a day as Mr. Hyde.

The male students, after their initial paralysis wore off, did not write as much as the females. They seemed envious of very little that was female, and curious about nothing. Three or four spent their day as women frantically seeking medical help to turn back into men more quickly. Those who accepted the assignment more seriously, if unenthusiastically, either stayed home and apathetically checked off a list of domestic chores or, more evasively, went off to work in an office and engaged in totally asexual business office routines.

A small percentage of the men ventured into the more feminine pursuits of putting on makeup and going to the beauty parlor. They agreed looking good was important.

If they stayed home as housewives, when their hypothetical husbands returned from work they ate dinner, watched some television and then went right to sleep. If they were businesswomen, they came directly home after work, ate some dinner, watched TV and went right to sleep. A handful actually went out on dates, had dinner in the most expensive restaurants they could cajole their escorts into taking them to, and then, after being taken home, very politely slammed the doors in their escorts' faces and went right to sleep. Not one male student let anybody lay a finger on him/her.

10 Finally, the sense of heartfelt relief at the end of the male students' essays, underscored by the much-repeated fervent anticipation of masculinity returning with the dawn, seemed equivalent to that of jumping up after having been forced to sit on a lit stove.

Granted, my flimsy statistical sample is nothing to go to the Ford Foundation with for research money. But on the other hand, do I really need to prove that young people even now are still burdened with sexist stereotypes and sexist self-images not nearly as vestigial as we would like to think? (One male student rhetorically crumpled up his paper after 10 minutes and growled, "You can't make me write this!") What does that imply about the rest of us? What would you do as a member of the opposite sex for a day? This last question is your essay assignment.

[1983]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. In paragraphs 2–4, Doloff summarizes the essays that the women wrote, and, in paragraphs 7–10, the essays that the men wrote. Do you think that you would have written something fairly close to the essays that he attributes to the persons of your sex? Explain your answer.

2. Do you think Doloff's assignment is a good one? Please argue why or why not.
3. Write an essay that fulfills Doloff's assignment and that honestly represents your thoughts, but that does not largely fit the pattern that Doloff finds.

Gretel Ehrlich

Gretel Ehrlich, born in 1946, was educated at Bennington College, the UCLA Film School, and the New School for Social Research. She has written fiction and poetry, especially about open spaces (she has lived in Wyoming, Colorado, and Greenland), and has received numerous awards. The following selection comes from The Solace of Open Spaces (1985).

About Men

When I'm in New York but feeling lonely for Wyoming I look for the Marlboro ads in the subway. What I'm aching to see is horseflesh, the glint of a spur, a line of distant mountains, brimming creeks, and a reminder of the ranchers and cowboys I've ridden with for the last eight years. But the men I see in those posters with their stern, humorless looks remind me of no one I know here. In our hellbent earnestness to romanticize the cowboy we've ironically disesteemed his true character. If he's "strong and silent" it's because there's probably no one to talk to. If he "rides away into the sunset" it's because he's been on horseback since four in the morning moving cattle and he's trying, fifteen hours later, to get home to his family. If he's "a rugged individualist" he's also part of a team: ranch work is teamwork and even the glorified open-range cowboys of the 1880s rode up and down the Chisholm Trail in the company of twenty or thirty other riders. Instead of the macho, trigger-happy man our culture has perversely wanted him to be, the cowboy is more apt to be convivial, quirky, and softhearted. To be "tough" on a ranch has nothing to do with conquests and displays of power. More often than not, circumstances—like the colt he's riding or an unexpected blizzard—are overpowering him. It's not toughness but "toughing it out" that counts. In other words, this macho, cultural artifact the cowboy has become is simply a man who possesses resilience, patience, and an instinct for survival. "Cowboys are just like a pile of rocks—everything happens to them. They get climbed on, kicked, rained and snowed on, scuffed up by wind. Their job is 'just to take it,'" one old-timer told me.

A cowboy is someone who loves his work. Since the hours are long—ten to fifteen hours a day—and the pay is $30 he has to. What's required of him is an odd mixture of physical vigor and maternalism. His part of the beef-raising industry is to birth and nurture calves and take care of their mothers. For the most part his work is done on horseback and in a lifetime he sees and comes to know more animals than people. The iconic myth surrounding him is built on American notions of heroism: the index of a man's value as measured in physical courage. Such ideas have perverted manliness into a self-absorbed race for cheap thrills. In a rancher's world, courage has less to do with facing danger than with acting spontaneously—usually on behalf of an animal or another rider. If a cow is stuck in a boghole he throws a loop around her neck, takes his dally (a half hitch around the saddle horn), and pulls her out with horsepower. If a calf is born sick, he may take her home, warm her in front of the kitchen fire, and massage her legs until dawn. One friend, whose favorite horse was trying to swim a lake with hobbles on, dove under water and cut her legs loose with a knife, then swam her to shore, his arm around her neck lifeguard-style, and saved her from drowning. Because these incidents are usually linked to someone or something outside himself, the westerner's courage is selfless, a form of compassion.

The physical punishment that goes with cowboying is greatly underplayed. Once fear is dispensed with, the threshold of pain rises to meet the demands of the job. When Jane Fonda asked Robert Redford (in the film Electric Horseman) if he was sick as he struggled to his feet one morning, he replied, "No, just bent." For once the movies had it right. The cowboys I was sitting with laughed in agreement. Cowboys are rarely complainers; they show their stoicism laughing at themselves.

If a rancher or cowboy has been thought of as a "man's man"—laconic, hard-drinking, inscrutable—there's almost no place in which the balancing act between male and female, manliness and femininity, can be more natural. If he's gruff, handsome, and physically fit on the outside, he's androgynous at the core. Ranchers are midwives, hunters, nurturers, providers, and conservationists all at once. What we've interpreted as toughness—weathered skin, calloused hands, a squint in the eye and a growl in the voice—only masks the tenderness inside. "Now don't go telling me these lambs are cute," one rancher warned me the first day I walked into the football-field-sized lambing sheds. The next thing I knew he was holding a black lamb. "Ain't this little rat good-lookin'?"

5 So many of the men who came to the West were Southerners—men looking for work and a new life after the Civil War—that chivalrousness and strict codes of honor were soon thought of as western traits. There were very few women in Wyoming during territorial days, so when they did arrive (some as mail-order brides from places like Philadelphia) there was a standoffishness between the sexes and a formality that persists now. Ranchers still tip their hats and say, "Howdy, ma'am" instead of shaking hands with me.

Even young cowboys are often evasive with women. It's not that they're Jekyll and Hyde creatures—gentle with animals and rough on women—but rather, that they don't know how to bring their tenderness into the house and lack the vocabulary to express the complexity of what they feel. Dancing wildly all night becomes a metaphor for the explosive emotions pent up inside, and when these are, on occasion, released, they're so battery-charged and potent that one caress of the face or one "I love you" will peal for a long while.

The geographical vastness and the social isolation here make emotional evolution seem impossible. Those contradictions of the heart between respectability, logic, and convention on the one hand, and impulse, passion, and intuition on the other, played out wordlessly against the paradisiacal beauty of the West, give cowboys a wide-eyed but drawn look. Their lips pucker up, not with kisses but with immutability. They may want to break out, staying up all night with a lover just to talk, but they don't know how and can't imagine what the consequences will be. Those rare occasions when they do bare themselves result in confusion. "I feel as if I'd sprained my heart," one friend told me a month after such a meeting.

My friend Ted Hoagland[1] wrote, "No one is as fragile as a woman but no one is as fragile as a man." For all the women here who use "fragileness" to avoid work or as a sexual ploy, there are men who try to hide theirs, all the while clinging to an adolescent dependency on women to cook their meals, wash their clothes, and keep the ranch house warm in winter. But there is true vulnerability in evidence here. Because these men work with animals, not machines or numbers, because they live outside in landscapes of torrential beauty, because they are confined to a place and a routine embellished with awesome variables, because calves die in the arms that pulled others into life, because they go to the mountains as if on a pilgrimage to find out what makes a herd of elk tick, their strength is also a softness, their toughness, a rare delicacy.

[1] Ted Hoagland Edward Hoagland (1932–), American essayist and novelist.

[1985]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Early on, Ehrlich says: "In our hellbent earnestness to romanticize the cowboy we've ironically disesteemed his true character." What is she saying in this sentence? Do you find the sentence clear or confusing? Please explain your answer.
2. Later, Ehrlich says that cowboys are not like "Jekyll and Hyde." Identify and explain this reference. Where did you go to find this information?
3. In a paragraph of three or four sentences, summarize the main point that Ehrlich is making. Do you find it hard or easy to write this summary? What does your response suggest to you about Ehrlich's essay as a piece of writing?
4. Would you describe this essay as an argument? Or is it something different? After you read the essay, did your understanding of the topic change? In what way?

CHAPTER 12

Reading and Writing about Stories

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Define fiction
- Identify and analyze the elements of fiction
- Analyze stories
- Write a successful paper about a story, using a writing process that moves from first annotation to final draft

Stories True and False

The word story comes from history; the stories that historians, biographers, and journalists narrate are supposed to be true accounts of what happened. The stories of novelists and short-story writers, however, are admittedly untrue; they are "fiction," things made up, imagined, manufactured. As readers, we come to a supposedly true story with expectations that are different from those we bring to fiction.

Consider the difference between reading a narrative in a newspaper and reading one in a book of short stories. If, while reading a newspaper, we come across a story of, say, a subway accident, we read it for the information about an actual, relatively unusual event. Was anyone hurt? What sort of people are they? Do they live in our neighborhood? Whose fault was the accident? When we read a book of fiction, however, we do not expect to encounter literal truths; we read novels and short stories, not for facts, but for pleasure and for some insight or for a sense of what an aspect of life means to the writer. Consider the following short story by Grace Paley.

GRACE PALEY

Born in New York City, Grace Paley (1922–2007) attended Hunter College and New York University but left without getting a degree. While raising two children, she wrote poetry and then, in the 1950s, turned to writing fiction. Her publications include Collected Stories (1994).

Paley's chief subject was the life of little people struggling in the big city. Of life she said, "How daily life is lived is a mystery to me. You write about what's mysterious to you. What is it like? Why do people do this?" Of the short story she said, "It can be just telling a little tale, or writing a complicated philosophical story. It can be a song, almost."

Samuel

Some boys are very tough. They're afraid of nothing. They are the ones who climb a wall and take a bow at the top. Not only are they brave on the roof, but they make a lot of noise in the darkest part of the cellar where even the super hates to go. They also jiggle and hop on the platform between the locked doors of the subway cars.

Four boys are jiggling on the swaying platform. Their names are Alfred, Calvin, Samuel, and Tom. The men and the women in the cars on either side watch them. They don't like them to jiggle or jump but don't want to interfere. Of course some of the men in the cars were once brave boys like these. One of them had ridden the tail of a speeding truck from New York to Rockaway Beach without getting off, without his sore fingers losing hold. Nothing happened to him then or later. He had made a compact with other boys who preferred to watch: Starting at Eighth Avenue and Fifteenth Street, he would get to some specified place, maybe Twenty-third and the river, by hopping the tops of the moving trucks. This was hard to do when one truck turned a corner in the wrong direction and the nearest truck was a couple of feet too high. He made three or four starts before succeeding. He had gotten his idea from a film at school called The Romance of Logging. He had finished high school, married a good friend, was in a responsible job and going to night school.

These two men and others looked at the four boys jumping and jiggling on the platform and thought, It must be fun to ride that way, especially now the weather is nice and we're out of the tunnel and way high over the Bronx. Then they thought, These kids do seem to be acting sort of stupid. They are little. Then they thought of some of the brave things they had done when they were boys and jiggling didn't seem so risky.

The ladies in the car became very angry when they looked at the four boys. Most of them brought their brows together and hoped the boys could see their extreme disapproval. One of the ladies wanted to get up and say, Be careful you dumb kids, get off that platform or I'll call a cop. But three of the boys were Negroes and the fourth was something else she couldn't tell for sure. She was afraid they'd be fresh and laugh at her and embarrass her. She wasn't afraid they'd hit her, but she was afraid of embarrassment. Another lady thought, Their mothers never know where they are. It wasn't true in this particular case. Their mothers all knew that they had gone to see the missile exhibit on Fourteenth Street.

5 Out on the platform, whenever the train accelerated, the boys would raise their hands and point them up to the sky to act like rockets going off, then they rat-tat-tatted the shatterproof glass pane like machine guns, although no machine guns had been exhibited.

For some reason known only to the motorman, the train began a sudden slowdown. The lady who was afraid of embarrassment saw the boys jerk forward and backward and grab the swinging guard chains. She had her own boy at home. She stood up with determination and went to the door. She slid it open and said, "You boys will be hurt. You'll be killed. I'm going to call the conductor if you don't just go into the next car and sit down and be quiet."

Two of the boys said, "Yes'm," and acted as though they were about to go. Two of them blinked their eyes a couple of times and pressed their lips together. The train resumed its speed. The door slid shut, parting the lady and the boys. She leaned against the side door because she had to get off at the next stop.

The boys opened their eyes wide at each other and laughed. The lady blushed. The boys looked at her and laughed harder. They began to pound each other's back. Samuel laughed the hardest and pounded Alfred's back until Alfred coughed and the tears came. Alfred held tight to the chain hook. Samuel pounded him even harder when he saw the tears. He said, "Why you bawling? You a baby, huh?" and laughed. One of the men whose boyhood had been more watchful than brave became angry. He stood up straight and looked at the boys for a couple of seconds. Then he walked in a citizenly way to the end of the car, where he pulled the emergency cord. Almost at once, with a terrible hiss, the pressure of air abandoned the brakes and the wheels were caught and held.

People standing in the most secure places fell forward, then backward. Samuel had let go of his hold on the chain so he could pound Tom as well as Alfred. All the passengers in the cars whipped back and forth, but he pitched only forward and fell head first to be crushed and killed between the cars.

10 The train had stopped hard, halfway into the station, and the conductor called at once for the trainmen who knew about this kind of death and how to take the body from the wheels and brakes. There was silence except for passengers from other cars who asked, What happened! What happened! The ladies waited around wondering if he might be an only child. The men recalled other afternoons with very bad endings. The little boys stayed close to each other, leaning and touching shoulders and arms and legs.

When the policeman knocked at the door and told her about it, Samuel's mother began to scream. She screamed all day and moaned all night, though the doctors tried to quiet her with pills.

Oh, oh, she hopelessly cried. She did not know how she could ever find another boy like that one. However, she was a young woman and she became pregnant. Then for a few months she was hopeful. The child born to her was a boy. They brought him to be seen and nursed. She smiled. But immediately she saw that this baby wasn't Samuel. She and her husband together have had other children, but never again will a boy exactly like Samuel be known.

[1968]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Paley wrote the story "Samuel," but an unspecified person tells it. Describe the voice of this narrator in the first paragraph. Is the voice neutral and objective, or do you hear in it an attitude, a point of view? If you do hear an attitude, what words or phrases in the story indicate it?
2. What do you know about the setting—the locale—of "Samuel"? What can you infer about the neighborhood?
3. In the fourth paragraph, we are told that "three of the boys were Negroes and the fourth was something else." Is race important in this story? Is Samuel "Negro" or "something else"? Does it matter? Respond to these questions in a short argumentative essay.
4. Exactly why did a man walk "in a citizenly way to the end of the car, where he pulled the emergency cord"? Do you think the author blames him? What evidence can you offer to support your view? Do you blame him? Or do you blame the boys? Or anyone? Explain your answer.
5. The story is called "Samuel," and it is, surely, about him. But what happens after Samuel dies? (You might want to list the events.) What else is the story about?

(You might want to comment on why you believe the items in your list are important.)

6. Can you generalize about what the men think of the jigglers and about what the women think? Is Paley saying something about the sexes? About the attitudes of onlookers in a big city?

Elements of Fiction

You might think about the ways in which "Samuel" differs from a newspaper story of an accident in a subway. (You might even want to write a newspaper version of the accident.) In some ways, Paley's story resembles an account that might appear in a newspaper. Journalists write to give information about

- who,
- what,
- when,
- where, and
- why,

and Paley does provide this material. Thus, the characters (Samuel and others) are the journalist's Who; the plot (the boys were jiggling on the platform, and when a man pulled the emergency cord, one of them was killed) is the What; the setting (the subway, presumably in modern times) is the When and the Where; and the motivation (the irritation of the man who pulls the emergency cord) is the Why.

To write about fiction, you need to think about these elements of fiction, asking yourself questions about each, both separately and how they work together. Much of the rest of this chapter will be devoted to examining such words as character and plot, but before you read those pages, consider the questions we've posed about "Samuel" and respond to them. Your responses will teach you a good deal about what fiction is and the ways in which it works.

Character

In some stories, such as adventure stories, the emphasis is on physical action—wanderings and strange encounters. In Paley's story, "Samuel," however, although there is a violent death in the subway, the emphasis is on other things: for instance, the contrast between some of the adults, the contrast between uptight adults and energetic children, and the impact of the death on Samuel's mother.

The novelist E. M. Forster, in a short critical study, Aspects of the Novel (1927), introduced a distinction between flat characters and round characters. A flat character is relatively simple and usually has only one trait: loving wife (or jealous wife), tyrannical husband (or meek husband), braggart, pedant, hypocrite, or whatever. Thus, in "Samuel," we are told about a man "whose boyhood had been more watchful than brave." This man walks "in a citizenly way" to the end of the subway car, where he pulls the emergency cord. He is, so to speak, the conventional solid citizen. He is flat, or uncomplicated, and that is probably part of what the author is getting at. A round character, on the other hand, embodies several or even many traits that cohere to form a complex personality. In a story as short as "Samuel," we can hardly expect to find fully rounded characters, but we can say that, at least by comparison with the "citizenly" man, the man who had once been a wild kid, had gone to night school, and now holds a "responsible job" is relatively round. Paley's story asserts rather than shows the development of the character, but much fiction does show such a development.

Whereas a flat character is usually static (at the end of the story, the character is pretty much what he or she was at the start), a round character is likely to be dynamic, changing considerably as the story progresses.

A frequent assignment in writing courses is to set forth a character sketch describing some person in a story or a novel. In preparing such a sketch, take these points into consideration:

- what the character says (but consider that what he or she says need not be taken at face value; the character may be hypocritical, or self-deceived, or biased—you will have to detect this from the context),
- what the character does,
- what other characters say about the character, and
- what others do. (A character who serves as a contrast to another character is called a foil.)

A character sketch can be complex and demanding, but usually you will want to do more than write a character sketch. You will probably discuss the character's function, or trace the development of his or her personality, or contrast the character with another character. (One of the most difficult topics, the narrator's personality, is discussed later in this chapter under the heading "Narrative Point of View.") When you are writing on one of these topics, you will probably want to keep in mind the four suggestions for getting at a character, but you will also want to go further, relating your findings to matters that we will discuss later.

Most discussions of fiction are concerned with happenings and with why they happen. Why does Samuel die? Because (to put it too simply) his youthful high spirits clash with the values of a "citizenly" adult. Paley never explicitly says anything like this, but a reader of the story tries to make sense of the details by filling in the gaps.

Things happen, in most good fiction, partly because the people have certain personalities or character traits (moral, intellectual, and emotional qualities) and, given their natures, because they respond plausibly to other personalities. What their names are and what they look like may help you to understand them, but probably the best guide to characters is what they do and what they say. As we get to know more about their drives and goals—and especially about the choices they make—we enjoy seeing the writer complete the portraits, finally presenting us with a coherent and credible picture of people in action.

In this view, plot and character are inseparable. Plot is not simply a series of happenings, but happenings that come out of character, that reveal character, and that influence character. The novelist Henry James put it thus in his essay "The Art of Fiction" (1884): "What is character but the determination of incident? What is incident but the illustration of character?" James goes on to say: "It is an incident for a woman to stand up with her hand resting on a table and look out at you in a certain way."

Plot

Plot is the artful arrangement of a story's events for meaningful effect. A plot is not simply a well-organized explanation of an idea or a detailed description of an object; in a plot, something happens and seems to happen for a reason. When we hear or tell a story, we know it is a story because its narration follows a structure that makes use of patterns. And, typically, when we think of a story's structure, we think of the events that are being patterned, sequenced, or ordered. Events are purposefully arranged, and that organization gives the events meaning and encourages the reader's interpretation.

In order to try to explain how a plot makes meaning, critics have distinguished between story and plot. Story can be defined as the narration of all the details of what happened, in chronological order, leaving nothing out. Plot, in contrast, is the purposeful ordering of the story's events, in which many techniques can be used to tell that same story but shape it into an artful structure that emphasizes elements, highlights ideas, and encourages reactions. In essence, story is the raw material that plot organizes and makes into art. When you analyze plot, you will most likely focus on events, exploring how and why they happen by exploring sequencing and ordering. You might trace how events create a pattern, questioning how that arrangement creates expectations that are then fulfilled or broken. Plot often relies on causality, or the ordering of events into cause-and-effect relationships. In a famous formulation, E. M. Forster explains that the sentence "The king died and then the queen" is a story, whereas "The king died and then the queen died of grief" is a plot. The crucial difference between the two sentences is causation: In the second sentence, it is clear that the queen's death was caused by grief. In this "plotted" sentence, the queen died because the king died, not simply after the king died; we understand that the king's death led to her death because we are given a clear cause. All plots have a sense of causality, in which events do not simply follow each other but, rather, connect and lead to each other.

Foreshadowing

Although some stories depend heavily on a plot with a surprise ending, other stories prepare the reader to some degree for the outcome. The foreshadowing that would eliminate surprise, or greatly reduce it, and destroy a story that has nothing else to offer is a powerful tool in the hands of a writer of serious fiction. In "Samuel," the reader perhaps senses even in the first paragraph that these "tough" boys who "jiggle and hop on the platform" may be vulnerable and may come to an unfortunate end. When a woman says, "You'll be killed," the reader doesn't yet know if she is right, but a seed has been planted.

Even in such a story as William Faulkner's "A Rose for Emily" (page 415), in which we are surprised to learn near the end of the story that Miss Emily has maintained a strange relationship with her lover, from the outset we expect something strange; that is, we are not surprised by the surprise, only by its precise nature. The first sentence of the story tells us that, after Miss Emily's funeral (the narrator begins at the end), the townspeople cross her threshold "out of curiosity to see the inside of her house, which no one save an old manservant . . . had seen in at least ten years." As the story progresses, we see Miss Emily prohibiting people from entering her house, we hear that, after a certain point, no one ever sees Homer Barron again, that "the front door remained closed," and (a few paragraphs before the end of the story) that the townspeople "knew that there was one room in that region above the stairs which no one had seen in forty years." The paragraph preceding the revelation that "the man himself lay in the bed" is devoted to a description of Homer's dust-covered clothing and toilet articles. In short, however much we are unprepared for the precise revelation, we are prepared for something strange happening in the house; and, given Miss Emily's purchase of poison and Homer's disappearance, we have some idea of what will be revealed.

The full meaning of a passage will not become apparent until you have read the entire story. In a sense, a story has at least three lives:

- when we read the story sentence by sentence, trying to turn the sequence of sentences into a consistent whole;
- when we have finished reading the story and we think back on it as a whole, even if we think no more than "That was a waste of time"; and
- when we reread a story, knowing even as we read the first line how it will turn out at the end.

Setting and Atmosphere

Foreshadowing normally makes use of setting. The setting or environment is not mere geography, not mere locale: It provides an atmosphere, an air that the characters breathe, a world in which they move. Narrowly speaking, the setting is the physical surroundings—the furniture, the architecture, the landscape, and the climate—and these elements are often highly appropriate to the characters who are associated with them. Thus, in Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights (1847), the passionate Earnshaw family is associated with Wuthering Heights, the storm-exposed moorland, whereas the mild Linton family is associated with Thrushcross Grange in the sheltered valley below.

Broadly speaking, setting includes not only the physical surroundings but also a point (or several points) in time. The background against which we see the characters and the events may be specified as morning or evening, spring or fall. In a good story, this temporal setting will probably be highly relevant; it will probably be part of the story's meaning, perhaps providing an ironic contrast to, or exerting an influence on, the characters.

Symbolism

When we read, we may feel that certain characters and certain things in the story stand for more than themselves or hint at larger meanings; that is, we feel that they are symbolic. But we must be careful. How does a reader know that this or that figure or place serves as a symbol and introduces symbolism into the story? In Ernest Hemingway's "Cat in the Rain" (page 200), is the cat symbolic? Is the innkeeper? Is the rain? Reasonable people may differ in their answers. Further, in Kate Chopin's "The Story of an Hour" (page 65), is the railroad accident a symbol? Is Josephine a symbol? Is the season (springtime) a symbol? Again, reasonable people may differ in their responses.

Let's assume, however, that if writers use symbols, they want readers to perceive—at least faintly—that certain characters, places, seasons, or happenings have rich implications and stand for something more than what they are on the surface. How do writers help us to perceive these things? They do so by emphasizing them—for instance, by describing them at some length, by introducing them at times when they might not seem strictly necessary, or by calling attention to them repeatedly.

Consider Chopin's treatment of the season in which "The Story of an Hour" takes place. The story has to take place at some time, but Chopin does not simply say, "On a spring day," or an autumn day, and let things go at that. Rather, she tells us about the sky, the trees, the rain, the twittering sparrows—and all of this in an extremely short story in which we might think there is no time for talk about the setting. After all, none of this material is strictly necessary to a story about a woman who hears that her husband was killed in an accident, who grieves, then recovers, and then dies when he suddenly reappears.

Why, then, does Chopin give such emphasis to the season? Because, we think, she is using the season symbolically. In this story, the spring is not just a bit of detail added for realism. It is rich with suggestions of renewal, of the new life that Louise achieves for a moment. But, here, we urge caution: We think that the spring in this story is symbolic, but this is not to say that whenever spring appears in a story, it stands for renewal, any more than whenever winter appears in a story it always symbolizes death. Nor does it mean that since spring recurs, Louise will be reborn. In short, in this story, Chopin uses the season to convey specific implications.

Is the railroad accident in "The Story of an Hour" also a symbol? Our answer is no, although we don't expect all readers to agree with us. We think that the railroad accident in "The Story of an Hour" is just a railroad accident. It's our sense that Chopin is not using this event to say something about modern travel or about industrialism. The steam-propelled railroad train could be used, symbolically, to say something about industrialism displacing an agrarian economy, but does Chopin give the train any such suggestion? We don't think so. Had she wished to do so, she would probably have talked about the enormous power of the train, the shriek of its whistle, the smoke pouring out of the smokestack, the intense fire burning in the engine, its indifference as it charged through the countryside, and so forth. Had she done so, the story would have been a different story. Or she might have made the train a symbol of fate overriding human desires. But, again, in our opinion, Chopin does not endow the train with such suggestions. She gives virtually no emphasis to the train, and so we believe it has virtually no significance for the reader.

What of Chopin's "Ripe Figs" (page 25)? Maman-Nainaine tells Babette that when the figs are ripe, Babette can visit her cousins. Maman-Nainaine may merely be setting an arbitrary date, but, as we read the story, we probably feel—because of the emphasis on the ripening of the figs, which occurs in the spring or early summer—that the ripening of the figs in some way suggests the maturing of Babette. If we do get such ideas, we will, in effect, be saying that the story is not simply an anecdote about an old woman whose behavior is odd. True, the narrator of the story, after telling us of Maman-Nainaine's promise, adds, "Not that the ripening of figs had the least thing to do with it, but that is the way Maman-Nainaine was." The narrator sees nothing special—merely Maman-Nainaine's eccentricity—in the connection between the ripening of the figs and Babette's visit to her cousins. Readers, however, may see more than the narrator sees or says. They may see in Babette a young girl maturing; they may see in Maman-Nainaine an older woman who, by almost collaborating with nature, helps Babette to mature.

Here, as we talk about symbolism, we are getting into the theme of the story. An apparently inconsequential and even puzzling action, such as is set forth in "Ripe Figs," may cast a long shadow. As Robert Frost once said,

> There is no story written that has any value at all, however straightforward it looks and free from doubleness, double entendre, that you'd value at all if it didn't have intimations of something more than itself.

The stranger and more mysterious the story is, the more likely we are to suspect some intended significance, but even realistic stories such as Chopin's "The Storm" and "The Story of an Hour" may be rich in suggestions. This is not to say, however, that the suggestions (rather than the details of the surface) are what count. A reader does not discard the richly detailed, highly specific narrative (Mrs. Mallard learns that her husband is dead and reacts in such and such a way) in favor of some supposedly universal message or theme that it implies. We do not throw away the specific narrative—the memorable characters or the interesting things that happen in the story—and move on to some "higher truth." Robert Frost went on to say, "The anecdote, the parable, the surface meaning has got to be good and got to be sufficient in itself."

Narrative Point of View

A writer must choose a point of view (or sometimes, several points of view) from which he or she will narrate the story. The choice will contribute to the total effect of the story.

Narrative points of view can be divided into two sorts: participant (or first-person narrative) and nonparticipant (or third-person narrative). That is, the narrator may or may not be a character who participates in the story. Each of these two types of narratives can be subdivided:

I. Participant (first-person narrative)
   A. Narrator as a major character
   B. Narrator as a minor character
II. Nonparticipant (third-person narrative)
   A. Omniscient
   B. Selective omniscient
   C. Objective

Participant Points of View Toni Bambara's "The Lesson" (page 654) begins:

> Back in the days when everyone was old and stupid or young and foolish and me and Sugar were the only ones just right, this lady moved on our block with nappy hair and proper speech and no makeup.

In this story, the narrator is a major character. Bambara is the author, but the narrator—the person who tells us the story—is a young girl who speaks of "me and Sugar," and the story is chiefly about the narrator. We can say, then, that Bambara uses a first-person (or participant) point of view. She has invented a young girl who tells us about the impact that a woman in the neighborhood had on her: "[Sugar] can run if she want to and even run faster. But ain't nobody gonna beat me at nuthin." The narrator is a major character. She, and not Bambara, tells the story.

Sometimes a first-person narrator tells a story that focuses on someone other than the narrator; he or she is a minor character, a peripheral witness, for example, to a story about Sally Jones, and we get the story of Sally filtered through, say, the eyes of her friend or brother or cat.

The first-person narrator, whether a major or a minor character, is a particular character who sees things in a particular way. The reader should not assume that the speaker is necessarily a reliable source. Some, in fact, are notably unreliable narrators—for instance, young children, mentally impaired adults, and psychopaths. A story told by an unreliable narrator, such as a man consumed with vengeful thoughts, depends largely on the reader's perception of the gap between what the narrator says and what the facts presumably are.

Nonparticipant Points of View In a nonparticipant (third-person) point of view, the teller of the tale does not introduce himself or herself as a character. If the point of view is omniscient, the narrator relates what he or she wants to relate about the thoughts as well as the deeds of all the characters. The omniscient narrator can enter the mind of any character; the first-person narrator can only say, "I was angry" or "Jack seemed angry," but the omniscient narrator can say, "Jack was inwardly angry but gave no sign; Jill continued chatting, but she sensed his anger." Thus, in Paley's "Samuel," the narrator tells us that Samuel's mother was "hopeful," but when the new baby was born, "immediately she saw that this baby wasn't Samuel."

Furthermore, a distinction can be made between neutral omniscience (the narrator recounts deeds and thoughts but does not judge) and editorial omniscience (the narrator not only recounts but also judges). An editorially omniscient narrator knows what goes on in the minds of all the characters and might comment approvingly or disapprovingly: "He closed the book, having finished the story, but, poor fellow, he had missed the meaning."

Because a short story can scarcely hope to develop a picture of several minds effectively, the writer may prefer to limit omniscience to the minds of a few characters or even to that of only one of the characters; that is, the writer may use selective omniscience as the point of view. Selective omniscience provides a focus, especially if it is limited to a single character. When thus limited, the writer sees one character from both outside and inside, but sees the other characters only from the outside and from the impact they have on the mind of this selected character. When selective omniscience attempts to record mental activity ranging from consciousness to the unconscious, from clear perceptions to confused longings, it is sometimes labeled the stream-of-consciousness point of view.

Finally, sometimes a third-person narrator does not enter even a single mind but records only what crosses an apparently dispassionate eye and ear. This is an objective point of view (sometimes called the camera point of view or fly-on-the-wall point of view). The absence of editorializing and of dissection of the mind often produces the effect of a play; we see and hear the characters in action. For example, "A Rose for Emily" (page 451) opens with dialogue between Miss Emily and town officials trying to collect taxes from her. The dialogue makes this section of the story look like a play:

> We are the city authorities, Miss Emily. Didn't you get a notice from the sheriff, signed by him?"
>
> "I received a paper, yes," Miss Emily said. "Perhaps he considers himself the sheriff. . . . I have no taxes in Jefferson."
>
> "But there is nothing on the books to show that, you see. We must go by the—"
>
> "See Colonel Sartoris. I have no taxes in Jefferson."
>
> "But, Miss Emily—"
>
> "See Colonel Sartoris."

Style and Point of View

A story told by a first-person narrator will have a distinctive style—let's say, the voice of an adolescent boy, or an elderly widow, or a madman. The voice of a third-person narrator—especially the voice of a supposedly objective narrator—will be much less distinctive, but if, especially on rereading, you listen carefully, you will probably hear a distinctive tone. (Look, for instance, at the first paragraph of Grace Paley's "Samuel.") Put it this way: Even a supposedly objective point of view is not purely objective, since it represents the writer's choice of a style, a way of reporting material with an apparently dispassionate voice.

After reading a story, you may want to think about what the story might be like if told from a different point of view. You may find it instructive, for instance, to rewrite "Samuel" from the "citizenly" man's point of view, or "Ripe Figs" from Babette's point of view.

Theme

We distinguish between story (or plot) and theme in fiction. Story is concerned with "How does it turn out? What happens?" But theme is concerned with "What is it about?" "What does it add up to?" "What motif holds the happenings together?" "What does it make of life, and what wisdom does it offer?" In a good work of fiction, the details add up—in Flannery O'Connor's words, they are "controlled by some overall purpose."

Suppose we think for a moment about the theme of Paley's "Samuel." Do we sense an "overall purpose" that holds the story together? Different readers will inevitably come up with different readings, that is, with different views of what the story is about. Here is one student's version:

> Whites cannot understand the feelings of blacks.

This statement gets at an important element in the story—the conflict between the sober-minded adults and the jiggling boys—but it assumes that all of the adults are white, an inference that cannot be supported by pointing to evidence in the story. Further, we cannot be certain that Samuel is black. And, finally, even if Samuel and his mother are black, surely white readers do understand his youthful enthusiasm and his mother's inconsolable grief.

Here is a second version:

> One should not interfere with the actions of others.

Does the story really offer such specific advice? This version of the theme seems to us to reduce the story to a too-simple code of action, a heartless rule of behavior, a rule that seems at odds with the writer's awareness of the mother's enduring grief.

Here is a third version:

> Middle-class adults, acting from what seem to them to be the best of motives, may cause irreparable harm and grief.

This last statement seems to us to be one that can be fully supported by checking it against the story, but other equally valid statements can probably be made. How would you put it?

Let's look at Faulkner's story. At the end of this chapter, you will find a writer's portfolio that presents a student's note taking on the essay and writing of an analytical paper on the story.

William Faulkner

William Faulkner (1897–1962) was brought up in Oxford, Mississippi. His great-grandfather had been a Civil War hero, and his father was treasurer of the University of Mississippi in Oxford. The family was no longer rich, but it was still respected. In 1918, he enrolled in the Royal Canadian Air Force, though he never saw overseas service. After the war, he returned to Mississippi and went to the university for two years. He then moved to New Orleans, where he became friendly with Sherwood Anderson, who was already an established writer. In New Orleans, Faulkner worked for the Times-Picayune; still later, even after he had established himself as a major novelist with The Sound and the Fury (1929), he had to work in Hollywood in order to make ends meet. In 1950, he was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature.

A Rose for Emily

I

When Miss Emily Grierson died, our whole town went to her funeral: the men through a sort of respectful affection for a fallen monument, the women mostly out of curiosity to see the inside of her house, which no one save an old Negro manservant—a combined gardener and cook—had seen in at least ten years.

It was a big, squarish, frame house that had once been white, decorated with cupolas and spires and scrolled balconies in the heavily lightsome style of the seventies, set on what had once been our most select street. But garages and cotton gins had encroached and obliterated even the august names of that neighborhood; only Miss Emily's house was left, lifting its stubborn and coquettish decay above the cotton wagons and the gasoline pumps—an eyesore among eyesores. And now Miss Emily had gone to join the representatives of those august names where they lay in the cedar-bemused cemetery among the ranked and anonymous graves of Union and Confederate soldiers who fell at the battle of Jefferson.

Alive, Miss Emily had been a tradition, a duty, and a care; a sort of hereditary obligation upon the town, dating from that day in 1894 when Colonel Sartoris, the mayor—he who fathered the edict that no Negro woman should appear on the streets without an apron—remitted her taxes, the dispensation dating from the death of her father on into perpetuity. Not that Miss Emily would have accepted charity. Colonel Sartoris invented an involved tale to the effect that Miss Emily's father had loaned money to the town, which the town, as a matter of business, preferred this way of repaying. Only a man of Colonel Sartoris' generation and thought could have invented it, and only a woman could have believed it.

When the next generation, with its more modern ideas, became mayors and aldermen, this arrangement created some little dissatisfaction. On the first of the year they mailed her a tax notice. February came, and there was no reply. They wrote her a formal letter, asking her to call at the sheriff's office at her convenience. A week later the mayor wrote her himself, offering to call or to send his car for her, and received in reply a note on paper of an archaic shape, in a thin, flowing calligraphy in faded ink, to the effect that she no longer went out at all. The tax notice was also enclosed, without comment.

5 They called a special meeting of the Board of Aldermen. A deputation waited upon her, knocked at the door through which no visitor had passed since she ceased giving china-painting lessons eight or ten years earlier. They were admitted by the old Negro into a dim hall from which a stairway mounted into still more shadow. It smelled of dust and disuse—a close, dank smell. The Negro led them into the parlor. It was furnished in heavy, leather-covered furniture. When the Negro opened the blinds of one window, they could see that the leather was cracked; and when they sat down, a faint dust rose sluggishly about their thighs, spinning with slow motes in the single sun-ray. On a tarnished gilt easel before the fireplace stood a crayon portrait of Miss Emily's father.

They rose when she entered—a small, fat woman in black, with a thin gold chain descending to her waist and vanishing into her belt, leaning on an ebony cane with a tarnished gold head. Her skeleton was small and spare; perhaps that was why what would have been merely plumpness in another was obesity in her. She looked bloated, like a body long submerged in motionless water, and of that pallid hue. Her eyes, lost in the fatty ridges of her face, looked like two small pieces of coal pressed into a lump of dough as they moved from one face to another while the visitors stated their errand.

She did not ask them to sit. She just stood in the door and listened quietly until the spokesman came to a stumbling halt. Then they could hear the invisible watch ticking at the end of the gold chain.

Her voice was dry and cold. "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Colonel Sartoris explained it to me. Perhaps one of you can gain access to the city records and satisfy yourselves."

"But we have. We are the city authorities, Miss Emily. Didn't you get a notice from the sheriff, signed by him?"

10 "I received a paper, yes," Miss Emily said. "Perhaps he considers himself the sheriff. . . . I have no taxes in Jefferson."

"But there is nothing on the books to show that, you see. We must go by the—"

"See Colonel Sartoris. I have no taxes in Jefferson."

"But, Miss Emily—"

"See Colonel Sartoris." (Colonel Sartoris had been dead almost ten years.) "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Tobe!" The Negro appeared. "Show these gentlemen out.

II

15 So she vanquished them, horse and foot, just as she had vanquished their fathers thirty years before about the smell. That was two years after her father's death and a short time after her sweetheart—the one we believed would marry her—had deserted her. After her father's death she went out very little; after her sweetheart went away, people hardly saw her at all. A few of the ladies had the temerity to call, but were not received, and the only sign of life about the place was the Negro man—a young man then—going in and out with a market basket.

"Just as if a man—any man—could keep a kitchen properly," the ladies said; so they were not surprised when the smell developed. It was another link between the gross, teeming world and the high and mighty Griersons.

A neighbor, a woman, complained to the mayor, Judge Stevens, eighty years old.

"But what will you have me do about it, madam?" he said.

"Why, send her word to stop it," the woman said. "Isn't there a law?"

20 "I'm sure that won't be necessary," Judge Stevens said. "It's probably just a snake or a rat that nigger of hers killed in the yard. I'll speak to him about it."

The next day he received two more complaints, one from a man who came in diffident deprecation. "We really must do something about it, Judge. I'd be the last one in the world to bother Miss Emily, but we've got to do something." That night the Board of Aldermen met—three graybeards and one younger man, a member of the rising generation.

"It's simple enough," he said. "Send her word to have her place cleaned up. Give her a certain time to do it in, and if she don't . . ."

"Dammit, sir," Judge Stevens said, "will you accuse a lady to her face of smelling bad?"

So the next night, after midnight, four men crossed Miss Emily's lawn and slunk about the house like burglars, sniffing along the base of the brickwork and at the cellar openings while one of them performed a regular sowing motion with his hand out of a sack slung from his shoulder. They broke open the cellar door and sprinkled lime there, and in all the outbuildings. As they recrossed the lawn, a window that had been dark was lighted and Miss Emily sat in it, the light behind her, and her upright torso motionless as that of an idol. They crept quietly across the lawn and into the shadow of the locusts that lined the street. After a week or two the smell went away.

25 That was when people had begun to feel really sorry for her. People in our town, remembering how old lady Wyatt, her great-aunt, had gone completely crazy at last, believed that the Griersons held themselves a little too high for what they really were. None of the young men were quite good enough for Miss Emily and such. We had long thought of them as a tableau, Miss Emily a slender figure in white in the background, her father a spraddled silhouette in the foreground, his back to her and clutching a horsewhip, the two of them framed by the back-flung front door. So when she got to be thirty and was still single, we were not pleased exactly, but vindicated; even with insanity in the family she wouldn't have turned down all of her chances if they had really materialized.

When her father died, it got about that the house was all that was left to her; and in a way, people were glad. At last they could pity Miss Emily. Being left alone, and a pauper, she had become humanized. Now she too would know the old thrill and the old despair of a penny more or less.

The day after his death all the ladies prepared to call at the house and offer condolence and aid, as is our custom. Miss Emily met them at the door, dressed as usual and with no trace of grief on her face. She told them that her father was not dead. She did that for three days, with the ministers calling on her, and the doctors, trying to persuade her to let them dispose of the body. Just as they were about to resort to law and force, she broke down, and they buried her father quickly.

We did not say she was crazy then. We believed she had to do that. We remembered all the young men her father had driven away, and we knew that with nothing left, she would have to cling to that which had robbed her, as people will.

III

She was sick for a long time. When we saw her again, her hair was cut short, making her look like a girl, with a vague resemblance to those angels in colored church windows—sort of tragic and serene.

30 The town had just let the contracts for paving the sidewalks, and in the summer after her father's death they began the work. The construction company came with niggers and mules and machinery, and a foreman named Homer Barron, a Yankee—a big, dark, ready man, with a big voice and eyes lighter than his face. The little boys would follow in groups to hear him cuss the niggers, and the niggers singing in time to the rise and fall of picks. Pretty soon he knew everybody in town. Whenever you heard a lot of laughing anywhere about the square, Homer Barron would be in the center of the group. Presently we began to see him and Miss Emily on Sunday afternoons driving in the yellow-wheeled buggy and the matched team of bays from the livery stable.

At first we were glad that Miss Emily would have an interest, because the ladies all said, "Of course a Grierson would not think seriously of a Northerner, a day laborer." But there were still others, older people, who said that even grief could not cause a real lady to forget noblesse oblige—without calling it noblesse oblige. They just said, "Poor Emily. Her kinfolks should come to her." She had some kin in Alabama; but years ago her father had fallen out with them over the estate of old lady Wyatt, the crazy woman, and there was no communication between the two families. They had not even been represented at the funeral.

And as soon as the old people said, "Poor Emily," the whispering began. "Do you suppose it's really so?" they said to one another. "Of course it is. What else could . . ." This behind their hands; rustling of craned silk and satin behind jalousies closed upon the sun of Sunday afternoon as the thin, swift clop-clop-clop of the matched team passed: "Poor Emily."

She carried her head high enough—even when we believed that she was fallen. It was as if she demanded more than ever the recognition of her dignity as the last Grierson; as if it had wanted that touch of earthiness to reaffirm her imperviousness. Like when she bought the rat poison, the arsenic. That was over a year after they had begun to say "Poor Emily," and while the two female cousins were visiting her.

"I want some poison," she said to the druggist. She was over thirty then, still a slight woman, though thinner than usual, with cold, haughty black eyes in a face the flesh of which was strained across the temples and about the eye-sockets as you imagine a lighthouse-keeper's face ought to look. "I want some poison," she said.

35 "Yes, Miss Emily. What kind? For rats and such? I'd recom—"

"I want the best you have. I don't care what kind."

The druggist named several. "They'll kill anything up to an elephant. But what you want is—"

"Arsenic," Miss Emily said. "Is that a good one?"

"Is . . . arsenic? Yes, ma'am. But what you want—"

40 "I want arsenic."

The druggist looked down at her. She looked back at him, erect, her face like a strained flag. "Why, of course," the druggist said. "If that's what you want. But the law requires you to tell what you are going to use it for."

Miss Emily just stared at him, her head tilted back in order to look him eye to eye, until he looked away and went and got the arsenic and wrapped it up. The Negro delivery boy brought her the package; the druggist didn't come back. When she opened the package at home there was written on the box, under the skull and bones: "For rats."

IV

So the next day we all said, "She will kill herself"; and we said it would be the best thing. When she had first begun to be seen with Homer Barron, we had said, "She will marry him." Then we said, "She will persuade him yet," because Homer himself had remarked—he liked men, and it was known that he drank with the younger men in the Elks' Club—that he was not a marrying man. Later we said, "Poor Emily" behind the jalousies as they passed on Sunday afternoon in the glittering buggy, Miss Emily with her head high and Homer Barron with his hat cocked and a cigar in his teeth, reins and whip in a yellow glove.

Then some of the ladies began to say that it was a disgrace to the town and a bad example to the young people. The men did not want to interfere, but at last the ladies forced the Baptist minister—Miss Emily's people were Episcopal—to call upon her. He would never divulge what happened during that interview, but he refused to go back again. The next Sunday they again drove about the streets, and the following day the minister's wife wrote to Miss Emily's relations in Alabama.

45 So she had blood-kin under her roof again and we sat back to watch developments. At first nothing happened. Then we were sure that they were to be married. We learned that Miss Emily had been to the jeweler's and ordered a man's toilet set in silver, with the letters H. B. on each piece. Two days later we learned that she had bought a complete outfit of men's clothing, including a nightshirt, and we said, "They are married." We were really glad. We were glad because the two female cousins were even more Grierson than Miss Emily had ever been.

So we were not surprised when Homer Barron—the streets had been finished some time since—was gone. We were a little disappointed that there was not a public blowing-off, but we believed that he had gone on to prepare for Miss Emily's coming, or to give her a chance to get rid of the cousins. (By that time it was a cabal, and we were all Miss Emily's allies to help circumvent the cousins.) Sure enough, after another week they departed. And, as we had expected all along, within three days Homer Barron was back in town. A neighbor saw the Negro man admit him at the kitchen door at dusk one evening.

And that was the last we saw of Homer Barron. And of Miss Emily for some time. The Negro man went in and out with the market basket, but the front door remained closed. Now and then we would see her at a window for a moment, as the men did that night when they sprinkled the lime, but for almost six months she did not appear on the streets. Then we knew that this was to be expected too; as if that quality of her father which had thwarted her woman's life so many times had been too virulent and too furious to die.

When we next saw Miss Emily, she had grown fat and her hair was turning gray. During the next few years it grew grayer and grayer until it attained an even pepper-and-salt iron gray, when it ceased turning. Up to the day of her death at seventy-four it was still that vigorous iron-gray, like the hair of an active man.

From that time on her front door remained closed, save for a period of six or seven years, when she was about forty, during which she gave lessons in china-painting. She fitted up a studio in one of the downstairs rooms, where the daughters and grand-daughters of Colonel Sartoris' contemporaries were sent to her with the same regularity and in the same spirit that they were sent to church on Sundays with a twenty-five cent piece for the collection plate. Meanwhile her taxes had been remitted.

50 Then the newer generation became the backbone and the spirit of the town, and the painting pupils grew up and fell away and did not send their children to her with boxes of color and tedious brushes and pictures cut from the ladies' magazines. The front door closed upon the last one and remained closed for good. When the town got free postal delivery, Miss Emily alone refused to let them fasten the metal numbers above her door and attach a mailbox to it. She would not listen to them.

Daily, monthly, yearly we watched the Negro grow grayer and more stooped, going in and out with the market basket. Each December we sent her a tax notice, which would be returned by the post office a week later, unclaimed. Now and then we would see her in one of the downstairs windows—she had evidently shut up the top floor of the house—like the carven torso of an idol in a niche, looking or not looking at us, we could never tell which. Thus she passed from generation to generation—dear, inescapable, impervious, tranquil, and perverse.

And so she died. Fell ill in the house filled with dust and shadows, with only a doddering Negro man to wait on her. We did not even know she was sick; we had long since given up trying to get any information from the Negro. He talked to no one, probably not even to her, for his voice had grown harsh and rusty, as if from disuse.

She died in one of the downstairs rooms, in a heavy walnut bed with a curtain, her gray head propped on a pillow yellow and moldy with age and lack of sunlight.

V

The Negro met the first of the ladies at the front door and let them in, with their hushed, sibilant voices and their quick, curious glances, and then he disappeared. He walked right through the house and out the back and was not seen again.

55 The two female cousins came at once. They held the funeral on the second day, with the town coming to look at Miss Emily beneath a mass of bought flowers, with the crayon face of her father musing profoundly above the bier and the ladies sibilant and macabre; and the very old men—some in their brushed Confederate uniforms—on the porch and the lawn, talking of Miss Emily as if she had been a contemporary of theirs, believing that they had danced with her and courted her perhaps, confusing time with its mathematical progression, as the old do, to whom all the past is not a diminishing road but, instead, a huge meadow which no winter ever quite touches, divided from the now by the narrow bottle-neck of the most recent decade of years.

Already we knew that there was one room in that region above stairs which no one had seen in forty years, and which would have to be forced. They waited until Miss Emily was decently in the ground before they opened it.

The violence of breaking down the door seemed to fill this room with pervading dust. A thin, acrid pall as of the tomb seemed to lie everywhere upon this room decked and furnished as for a bridal: upon the valance curtains of faded rose color, upon the rose-shaded lights, upon the dressing table, upon the delicate array of crystal and the man's toilet things backed with tarnished silver, silver so tarnished that the monogram was obscured. Among them lay a collar and tie, as if they had just been removed, which, lifted, left upon the surface a pale crescent in the dust. Upon a chair hung the suit, carefully folded; beneath it the two mute shoes and the discarded socks.

The man himself lay in the bed.

For a long while we just stood there, looking down at the profound and fleshless grin. The body had apparently once lain in the attitude of an embrace, but now the long sleep that outlasts love, that conquers even the grimace of love, had cuckolded him. What was left of him, rotted beneath what was left of the nightshirt, had become inextricable from the bed in which he lay; and upon him and upon the pillow beside him lay that even coating of the patient and biding dust.

60 Then we noticed that in the second pillow was the indentation of a head. One of us lifted something from it, and leaning forward, that faint and invisible dust dry and acrid in the nostrils, we saw a long strand of iron-gray hair.

[1930]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Why does the narrator begin with what is almost the end of the story—the death of Miss Emily—rather than save this information for later? What devices does Faulkner use to hold the reader's interest throughout?
2. In a paragraph, offer a conjecture about Miss Emily's attitudes toward Homer Barron after he was last seen alive.
3. In a paragraph or two, characterize Miss Emily, calling attention not only to her eccentricities or even craziness but also to what you believe to be her moral values. Do the illustrations affect your response to her and to the story?
4. In paragraph 44, we are told that the Baptist minister "would never divulge what happened" during the interview with Miss Emily. Why do you suppose Faulkner does not narrate or describe the interview? Let's assume that, in his first draft of the story, he did give a paragraph of narration or a short dramatic scene. Write such an episode.
5. Suppose that Homer Barron's remains had been discovered before Miss Emily died and that she was arrested and charged with murder. You are the prosecutor, and you are running for a statewide political office. In five hundred words, set forth your argument that, despite the fact that she is a public monument, she should be convicted. Or, suppose that you are the defense attorney, also running for office. In five hundred words, set forth your defense.
6. Assume that Miss Emily kept a journal—perhaps even from her days as a young girl. Write entries for the journal, giving her thoughts about some of the episodes reported in Faulkner's story.
7. Does "A Rose for Emily" make you want to read more stories by Faulkner? Be as specific as you can in explaining your response.

Following are questions that may help to stimulate ideas about stories. Not every question will be relevant to every story; however, if, after reading a story and thinking about it, you then run your eye over these questions, you will find questions that help you to think further about the story and to get ideas.

As we have said before, it's best to do your thinking with a pen or pencil in hand. If some of the following questions seem to you to be especially relevant to the story you will be writing about, jot down your initial responses, interrupting your writing only to glance again at the story when you feel the need to check the evidence.

✔ CHECKLIST: Getting Ideas for Writing about Stories

Character

- ☐ Which character chiefly engages your interest? Why?
- ☐ What purposes do minor characters serve? Do you find some who by their similarities and differences help to define each other or help to define the major character? How else is a particular character defined—by his or her words, actions (including thoughts and emotions), dress, setting, narrative point of view? Do certain characters act differently in the same, or in a similar, situation?

(continued)

- ☐ How does the author reveal character? By explicit authorial (editorial) comment—for instance, by revelation through dialogue? Through depicted action? Through the actions of other characters? How are the author's methods especially suited to the whole of the story?
- ☐ Is the behavior plausible—that is, are the characters well motivated?
- ☐ If a character changes, why and how does he or she change? (You may want to jot down each event that influences a change.) Or did you change your attitude toward a character, not because the character changed, but because you came to know the character better?
- ☐ Are the characters round or flat? Are they complex or highly typical (for instance, one-dimensional representatives of a social class or age)? Are you chiefly interested in a character's psychology, or does the character strike you as standing for something, such as honesty or the arrogance of power?
- ☐ How has the author caused you to sympathize with certain characters? How does your response—your sympathy or lack of sympathy—contribute to your judgment of the conflict?

Plot

- ☐ Does the plot grow out of the characters, or does it depend on chance or coincidence? Did something at first strike you as irrelevant that later you perceived as relevant? Do some parts continue to strike you as irrelevant?
- ☐ How are the story's events sequenced and patterned? Do cause-and-effect relationships order the story's events, creating its plot?
- ☐ Does surprise play an important role, or does foreshadowing? If surprise is very important, can the story be read a second time with any interest? If so, what gives it this further interest?
- ☐ What conflicts does the story include? Conflicts of one character against another? Of one character against the setting, or against society? Conflicts within a single character?
- ☐ Are certain episodes narrated out of chronological order? If so, were you puzzled? Annoyed? On reflection, does the arrangement of episodes seem effective? Why, or why not? Are certain situations repeated? If so, what do you make out of the repetitions?

Setting

- ☐ Do you have a strong sense of the time and place of the story? Is the story very much about, say, New England Puritanism, or race relations in the South in the late nineteenth century, or midwestern urban versus small-town life? If time and place are important, how and at what points in the story has the author conveyed this sense? If you do not strongly feel the setting, do you think the author should have made it more evident?
- ☐ What is the relationship of the setting to the plot and the characters? (For instance, do houses or rooms, or their furnishings, say something about their residents?) Would anything be lost if the descriptions of the setting were deleted from the story or if the setting were changed?

Symbolism

- ☐ Do certain characters seem to stand for something in addition to themselves? Does the setting—whether a house, a farm, a landscape, a town, or a period—have an extra dimension?

- ☐ If you do believe that the story has symbolic elements, do you think they are adequately integrated within the story, or do they strike you as being too obviously "stuck in"?

Point of View

- ☐ Who tells the story? How much does the narrator know? Does the narrator strike you as reliable? What effect is gained by using this narrator?
- ☐ How does the point of view help shape the theme? After all, the basic story of "Little Red Riding Hood"—what happens—remains unchanged whether told from the wolf's point of view or the girl's, but if we hear the story from the wolf's point of view, we may feel that the story is about terrifying yet pathetic compulsive behavior; if we hear the story from the girl's point of view, we may feel that the story is about terrified innocence.
- ☐ It is sometimes said that the best writers are subversive, forcing readers to see something they do not want to see—something that is true but that violates their comfortable conventional ideas. Does this story oppose comfortable conventional views?
- ☐ Does the narrator's language help you to construct a picture of the narrator's character, class, attitude, strengths, and limitations? (Jot down some evidence, such as colloquial or formal expressions, ironic comments, and figures of speech.) How far can you trust the narrator? Why?

Style

- ☐ How has the point of view shaped or determined the style?
- ☐ How would you characterize the style? Simple? Understated? Figurative? Or what, and why?
- ☐ Do you think that the style is consistent? If it isn't—for instance, if there are shifts from simple sentences to highly complex ones—what do you make of the shifts?

Theme

- ☐ Is the title informative? What does it mean or suggest? Did its meaning seem to change after you read the story? Does the title help you to formulate a theme? If you had written the story, what title would you have given it?
- ☐ Do certain passages—dialogue or description—seem to you to point especially toward the theme? Do you find certain repetitions of words or pairs of incidents that are highly suggestive and helpful in directing your thoughts toward stating a theme? Flannery O'Connor, in Mystery and Manners (1969), says, "In good fiction, certain of the details will tend to accumulate meaning from the action of the story itself, and when that happens, they become symbolic in the way they work." Does this story work that way?
- ☐ Is the meaning of the story embodied in the whole story, or does it seem stuck, for example, in certain passages of editorializing?
- ☐ Suppose someone asked you to state the point—the theme—of the story. Could you? And if you could, would you say that the theme of the story reinforces values you hold, or does it challenge them to some degree? Or is the concept of a theme irrelevant to the story?

Student Writing Portfolio

ANALYTICAL PAPER

Writing an Analytical Paper

Writing about fiction allows you to develop a deeper understanding of why you enjoy storytelling while also encouraging you to develop your analytical skills. If you engage in literary analysis, you cannot help but become a more sophisticated critical thinker. Writing about a story asks you to be an interpretive thinker who can investigate a text, evaluate its ideas, and explain your perspective. Writing about a story also asks you to be a flexible thinker who can work with the text on the level of details and the level of big ideas, and move back and forth between those two levels. This type of writing encourages you to be a conceptual thinker, able to engage with a story's major issues, themes, and concerns. Finally, writing about a story asks you to be an argumentative thinker who is able to make claims about a text and support those claims with evidence.

John Martinez has been given an assignment to write a five-page analytical paper focusing on William Faulkner's "A Rose for Emily." The assignment asks John to write a paper that analyzes the murder revealed at the end of the story. In order to complete this paper, John must move from his initial reading of the story, captured in his annotations, to his inquiry strategies, such as note taking, to his paper drafting and revision, and then to the completion of his final draft. John's reading and writing materials are reprinted here, allowing us to see how his thinking evolves as he completes this assignment. Let's start by looking at the assignment.

Assignment

Five-page Analytical Paper:

- This paper asks you to investigate the ending of "A Rose for Emily" and how it encourages you to revisit and rethink the story. After you realize a poisoning has taken place, how does that make you rethink the characters and events of the story? For example, knowing what you do about the poisoning, how would you analyze Miss Emily and her actions, Homer and his courtship, the townspeople and their beliefs, or the Grierson family and their attitudes?
- Select one focused aspect of the story for continued investigation and analysis. Create an argument that explains your new thinking about the story.
- Make sure to analyze both form and content.
- Write a five-page analytical paper that uses a formal structure of a thesis, subpoints, and evidence.
- Include an outline with your draft.

Annotation: Reading for Form and Content

As we have stressed throughout this book, the easiest and most effective way to start your analysis of a text is to annotate the text. Annotation is the process of writing your responses directly on the text as you read it. Literary annotation should focus on both the content and the form of the text. Content is the information conveyed by the story, whereas form is the way that information is conveyed. Annotating for content focuses on the ideas of the story, whereas annotating for form focuses on the literary elements being used to tell the story.

Knowing that he has to write a paper on "A Rose of Emily" that analyzes both form and content, John wants to use a more organized form of annotation. This annotating strategy highlights the contribution of both form and content to the story's meaning. As seen in John's notes below, in this type of annotation, the emphasis on form and content has become clearly structured, with notes concerning form written on the left and notes concerning content written on the right. As in any form of annotation, John marks up areas in the text that contain important, complex, or interesting ideas; areas that encourage thinking and rethinking; areas that trigger questions; and areas that encourage strong opinions and interpretations. He writes most of these notes on the right-hand side of the text. But, after making these more conceptual notes, he double-checks the text's form and jots down a few notes about form on the left-hand side of the text.

Student Work: Annotation
"Form and Content" Marginal Notes

Form		Content
narrator—we: 1st person plural	Already we knew that there was one room in that region above stairs which no one had seen in forty years, and which would have to be forced. They waited until Emily was decently in the ground before they opened it.	closed, secret room = secrets long, detailed description	The violence of breaking down the door seemed to fill this room with pervading dust. A thin acrid pall as of the tomb seemed to lie everywhere upon this room decked and furnished as if for a bridal: upon the valance curtains of faded rose color, upon the rose-shaded lights, upon the dressing table, upon the delicate array of crystal and the man's toilet things backed with tarnished silver, silver so tarnished that the monogram was obscured. Among them lay collar and tie, as if they had just been removed, which, lifted, left upon the surface a pale crescent in the dust. Upon a chair hung the suit, carefully folded; beneath it the two mute shoes and the discarded socks.	room = tomb details of items on table = aged, time dust imagery = symbol short, clear sentence	The man himself lay in the bed.	DEAD MAN?!

	For a long while we just stood there, looking down at the profound and fleshless grin.
love in middle of para = slow realization	The body had apparently once lain in the attitude of an embrace, but now the long sleep that outlasts love, that conquers even the grimace of love, had cuckolded him. What was left	theme of love dust imagery repeated	of him, rotten beneath what was left of the nightshirt, had become inextricable from the bed in which he lay; and upon him and upon the pillow beside him lay that even coating of the patient and biding dust.	rotted body
	Then we noticed that in the second pillow shock saved for end: closure and surprise	was the indentation of a head. One of us lifted something from it, and leaning forward, that faint and invisible dust dry and acrid in the nostrils, we saw a long strand of iron-gray hair.	indent! Was Emily sleeping w/body?!!

Every successful reading starts with a close observation of the text and a way to keep track of those observations and use them to brainstorm new ideas about the text. Annotation allows you to record your ideas during and after your reading, generating materials that will help you build toward a written analysis of a text.

As John annotates the text, he engages in several activities. He records specific information from the text, making sure that his interpretive foundation is correct. This type of prewriting ensures that he is working from the "inside out," that is, working from inside the text out toward larger ideas, rather than bringing preformed ideas into the text. John also actively searches for "jumping-off points" in order to move away from plot summary, using prewriting to emphasize moments in the text that call out for interpretation. This allows John to find areas that are rich for conceptual investigation. He also traces interesting patterns, noting patterns in literary elements and tracing how those patterns' meaning evolves. John's annotations add up to a method of tracking concepts, interpretations, and questions so that he does not "lose" a good idea that could lead to further thinking and writing. His annotations have already started the type of brainstorming and question-asking inquiry work that additional note taking will develop.

Note Taking: Using Inquiry Notes to Generate Ideas

Inquiry: Double- (or Triple-) Entry Notes

A productive way of taking notes is to follow the page-by-page development of a story and create a "double-entry" or "triple-entry" notebook that allows you to keep track of the page-by-page information that you find and the thoughts that you have as you read. Knowing that he will need to organize his evidence and ideas for his paper, John Martinez uses that form of note taking here. He uses the first column to keep track of the page number and a key detail or quote. He uses the second column to note his ideas and interpretations. He uses the third column as a space for brainstorming, revisiting his original notes and adding more interpretative ideas, questions, and observations.

Student Work: Inquiry Notes
Double- (or Triple-) Entry Notes

Page #, Quotation or Information	Interpretations/ Questions	Interpretation Revisited
p. 449: Emily dies, is described as "monument," "tradition"	Why is she described in these terms? Does she represent a dying tradition, a dying way of life?
p. 449: House is described as "eyesore"	House is decayed, just like Emily has decayed	House's decay represents many types of decay: Is this decay of love, of life?
p. 449: History of Emily's taxes: "next generation" with "modern ideas" wants her taxes	This new generation, with its "modern ideas" seems to be being critiqued. This generation lacks old-fashioned sense of honor	But, is old generation to blame for Emily's isolation—and the murder?

Inquiry: Listing Notes

As seen in Chapter 4, listing is a common form of prewriting. John likes to record important details about the story in a well-organized list as he reads the story. By creating a blank list with well-defined categories and then filling in that list as he reads, John organizes his notes and ideas through the reading process. John uses listing to record details that he'll want to refer to later but might forget, such as complete character names, places, or dates. He uses literary elements to create his categories, allowing him to start to see how those elements come together to form the literary work. He then engages in brainstorming, using his list to trigger open-ended thinking about the meaning of the information that he's noted.

Student Work: Listing
Key Information Overview

Characters

Miss Emily Grierson (dies age 74)
Her father (dead)
Colonel Sartoris (mayor who forgives taxes)
Judge Stevens (mayor at time of smell)
Tobe (Emily's African-American servant)
Homer Barron (construction company foreman, courts Emily)
Two female cousins (come to stay during affair b/w Emily and Homer)
Unnamed narrator and unnamed people in town: gossiping, judging

Place/Setting

The Grierson house: decayed and dusty
Southern town

Time

1894 (date taxes forgiven, near father's death)
two years after father's death: the smell thirty years after the smell: gets rid of men coming for taxes

Plot Events

Part I. Miss Emily dead in first sentence
Taxes remitted, but the Board of Alderman wants to reclaim taxes: turned away
Part II. The smell
Miss Emily doesn't go out after father's death
The smell starts; neighbors complain
Men secretly break open cellar door and put lime around Miss Emily's house
Window lighted: Miss Emily sees them
When father died, Miss Emily acted as if father wasn't dead

. . .

Questions

Why do the townspeople allow Miss Emily to intimidate them repeatedly?
Does the town respect Miss Emily's family and her past—or does it just fear her?

Inquiry: Journal Writing

Journal writing encourages an unstructured, brainstorming type of writing, but, because it is the first stage in writing a draft, it can be intimidating. If you are having trouble getting started with journal writing, turn to the literary text and let it inspire your writing. Consider starting with a specific quotation that has caught your attention because it is expressing a complex idea, a problem that needs to be thought through, or a dramatically important conflict, epiphany, or resolution. John decides to "dig deep" into a specific passage as a way of starting his brainstorming process. He records his intellectual reactions to the passage, explaining the key concepts that the passage seems to be exploring. John's brainstorming journal writing becomes "messy" as he works and reworks his ideas, but that type of reworking signals a deepening of ideas that will become part of the foundation of his paper's draft.

Student Work: Journal Writing
Key Quotation Brainstorming

Interesting quotations:

–The Judge exclaims, "Will you accuse a lady to her face of smelling bad?" (451). Why won't they confront her?
–The men "slunk about the house like burglars" (451). Why do they slink to her house? Why do they become like burglars?
–Miss Emily is watching them from the window.

–Gossip about courtship: "it was a disgrace to the town and a bad example to the young people" (453). Was Emily aware of the gossip?

The townspeople seem to know that Emily is up to no good—that she has something going on in the house. They knew the smell was connected to something bad, but are afraid to actually ask Miss Emily about it. The townspeople do not want to confront Miss Emily with the embarrassing fact of the smell. Rather than confront her, the Board of Alderman of four men go to her house and spread lime around the base of her house, hoping to stop the smell. The men do not have enough courage to face Miss Emily. They even seem to act like criminals rather than confront Miss Emily—rather than discover that she is a criminal, they act like criminals and slink around. What I found interesting about this scene is that Miss Emily was aware of it.

The townspeople think her courtship is a "disgrace." It seems like they are too quick to judge. There is a weird dynamic of them judging Miss Emily, but then not being able to actually confront her. But, they do have a Baptist minister go and talk to her—but he "refused to go back again" (453). It seems like they want to intervene in Miss Emily's life, but stop before they can actually figure out exactly what's going on.

Does the town push for them to get married, and then actually cause them to split up—and thus cause Miss Emily to poison Homer? Do they push her towards being a murderer? Do they ruin her happiness and her courtship—and thus push her towards her hideous crime?

End of story

Seems like whole town comes into house—why?
House is decaying, like a crypt
Shock of the dead body
Dead body set up to be married—connects to earlier gossip about courtship
Town likes to gossip about Emily

Drafting: Creating an Argument and Explaining Your Interpretation

John transforms his prewriting into a rough draft. As with every rough draft, his writing contains both strengths and weaknesses. A notable strength of John's paper is that it opens with a clear thesis argument; he argues that the townspeople bear some responsibility for Homer's murder. A sign of a good argument is that another person can disagree and argue back to it; you can answer John's paper by saying, "No! Miss Emily is clearly solely responsible for the murder." A paper that takes a stand and argues for its interpretation will be a lively paper.

In addition to having a central argument, John's paper has created a series of subpoints that support that argument—the paper is doing the hard work of proving its argument. In places, the subpoints are not completely clear; however, for a first draft, this paper is doing a good job of breaking its ideas down and creating an organized body. As you read John's paper, you'll notice that it uses a traditional, but often overly formulaic, structure: the five-paragraph essay. The paper has used the five-paragraph format to create three subpoints that are treated equally; each subpoint is set up to prove the thesis that the townspeople helped to "set the stage" for the murder. However, the draft notes that the final subpoint is not quite the same as the first two and this difference disrupts the flow of the paper's ideas. The paper's first two subpoints discuss the townspeople's actions that occur before the murder, and thus might lead to the murder. The third sub-point discusses the smell that happens after the murder, not an action that sets up the murder. This third subpoint does not seem to support the thesis argument that the townspeople bear some responsibility for the murder; this subpoint's connection to the rest of the paper becomes unclear. As a result, in his final draft, John may be able to create a better structure for his paper.

Student Analytical Essay: "Homer's Murder in 'A Rose for Emily'" (Preliminary Draft)

Let's examine John's preliminary draft, noting how it fulfills many of our expectations for a strong analytical paper. John creates a clear and compelling argument, and presents it in his thesis statement. His paper continues to develop and push his ideas, aiming for increasingly sophisticated interpretations of the story. He supports these interpretations with numerous short quotations from the story. And, as noted, he organizes his main ideas into clear subpoints; however, this organization might best be rethought as he develops his ideas. What are the elements of good writing that you expect to see in John's paper?

Martinez 1

John Martinez

English 200: Intro to Lit

Professor Murphy

February 20, 2016

Homer's Murder in 'A Rose for Emily'

At the end of William Faulker's "A Rose for Emily," it becomes clear that a murder has taken place. Miss Emily Grierson, the central character, has murdered her suitor, Homer Barron. It becomes clear that she murdered him using poison, placed his body in a bedroom, and then visited, embraced, and even slept with the body. The ending is a shock and leaves you focused on Miss Emily, thinking about her as the main character and how she is now seen as a criminal. Suddenly, she is no longer a sad character, avoided by the town, but she can now be seen as a criminal. This focus on Miss Emily makes her be seen as a criminal and makes her seem to be the only person to blame for Homer's death. However, the townspeople share responsibility for Homer's death. The narrator, who explains the townspeople's reactions to Emily, makes it sound like she is crazy. But, he also reveals that the townspeople have done things that make them responsible for Homer's death. First, the townspeople judged Miss Emily's relationship with Homer, saying it was disgraceful. They intervened by talking about the affair and calling her relatives in to stay with her. Second, the townspeople let her buy the poison. This poison was obviously used to kill Homer. Third, they did not investigate the smell. In fact, they went to Emily's house and covered up the smell. As a result of trying to stop her affair and then not investigating the poison or the smell, the townspeople helped to set the stage for Homer's murder.

writer creates thesis statement—makes an argument writer uses clear organization to break down ideas into subpoints

Let's look at the first reason that the townspeople are semi-responsible for Homer's death. The townspeople couldn't help but gossip about Emily dating Homer, especially as Emily is upper-class and Homer is working class and from the North: "Of course a Grierson would not think seriously of a Northerner, a day laborer" (452). Miss Emily seemed to really be enjoying her time with Homer, as they drove around town in a "glittering buggy" (453). The townspeople start to "say that it was a disgrace to the town and a bad example to the young people" (453). They had the Baptist minister go and talk to her. I think something horrible must have happened because he "refused to go back again" (453). Then, they decide to take action, and write her relatives to have them come to visit. Two female cousins come and stay with Miss Emily. The relatives seem to move things forward towards a marriage, because Miss Emily buys a "man's toilet set in silver" and a "complete outfit of men's clothing, including a nightshirt" writer creates clear subpoints by giving each a strong focusing idea successful integration of quotations into paper

(453). But, then the relationship seems to be over because the marriage never happens.

The second reason the townspeople are responsible for Homer's death is that they don't question why Miss Emily might be buying poison. When Miss Emily goes to the drugstore, she buys some poison. However, she does not explain the reason for buying poison. In this scene, a crucial piece of missing information is not followed up on: the druggist asks Miss Emily what she wants the poison for, and she refuses to answer, even though she is required by law to explain the use of the poison. The druggist gives in to her stare, gives her the poison, and writes "For rats" on the poison (452). If the druggist had refused to allow her to buy the poison, the entire murder plot might have been avoided. I think the druggist should have at least questioned Miss Emily—if the druggist had questioned the use of the poison more thoroughly, Miss Emily would have known her murder plot would be uncovered. If the druggist was stronger, he would not have allowed Miss Emily to purchase what becomes a murder weapon—he could have intimidated Miss Emily into giving up her murder plans.

writer develops interpretation by explaining own unique insights

The final reason that the townspeople are responsible for Homer's death is that they do not investigate the smell at Miss Emily's house. (This not checking on the smell does not make them responsible for Homer's death—he is already dead. The smell comes after the death. So, what does this reveal?) The townspeople do not want to confront Miss Emily with the embarrassing fact of the smell. The Judge exclaims, "Will you accuse a lady to her face of smelling bad?" (451). Rather than confront her, the Board of Alderman of four men go to her house and spread lime around the base of her house, hoping to stop the smell. The men "slunk about the house like burglars" (451). The men decide that they themselves should act like criminals rather than confront Miss Emily—rather than discover that she is a criminal, they act like criminals. What I found interesting about this scene writer uses drafting to note issues in thinking—writer can "solve" these issues in later drafts is that Miss Emily was aware of it. When the men left the house, she was sitting in a lighted window, watching them.

The townspeople had a couple of different opportunities to turn Miss Emily away from her criminal act of murder. In the first place, they could have supported Miss Emily's courtship with Homer. Even if the courtship broke expectations or was inappropriate, it was far less criminal than murder! The townspeople should have let Miss Emily enjoy the relationship. A real opportunity to stop the murder occurred when Miss Emily purchased the poison. If the druggist had stood up to her and questioned her motives more closely, she might have given up on the idea of poison—and the entire idea of murder. After the murder occurred, the townspeople could have come to a greater understanding of what had happened in the Grierson house. They could have questioned Emily and forced themselves into the home to investigate. Instead, they participated in the "cover up" of the murder, covering up the smell and letting the whole town pretend nothing had ever happened. Although Miss Emily is clearly Homer's murderer, she might not have taken on that role if the townspeople had been more supportive of her and more questioning of her. The townspeople, although not directly acting like murderers, bear some indirect responsibility for Homer's murder. The townspeople set the stage for Homer's murder. Miss Emily is not the lonely, all-alone murderer that we thing she is; I think she has a "partner in crime" in the townspeople.

writer's interpretations are strong, direct—creates a lively paper writer restates his thesis in the conclusion

[New page]

Work Cited

Faulkner, William. "A Rose for Emily," Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 451–56. Print.

Revision: Using a Revision Strategy

Revision is essential to the drafting of a paper. Allow enough time and devote enough energy to revising your paper because revision allows you to "re-see" your writing as a critic and to improve your writing for its ultimate audience. A rough draft allows you to capture ideas in an essay form, but that draft must be improved through the revision of the ideas, evidence, and organization. Before we explore John's revision process, let's review the revision checklist in Chapter 8.

✔REVISION CHECKLIST

Strengthen Your Thesis

☐ Add focus and depth to your central argument.

Develop Your Ideas

☐ Revisit your best responses to literary form and content, adding more thinking to those responses.

Integrate and Explain Your Evidence

☐ Select and analyze interesting quotations to provide evidence for your ideas.

Improve the Organization

☐ Structure your ideas to follow a clear sequence.

Clarify Your Style and Edit for Correctness

☐ Use a consistent, professional style to explain your ideas, correcting sentence structure, word usage, and grammar.

Revision: Revising to Strengthen the Thesis

The most crucial element of an analytical paper is its thesis argument. A paper's most important idea should be captured in a thesis statement that presents a focused argument about the text under consideration and previews the sophisticated thinking that the paper will develop. Although it is typically a short sentence or two, the thesis argument serves as an "umbrella" for the entire paper; all of the paper's ideas and development can fit "under" that "umbrella." A thesis must thus be interesting and complex enough to sustain the development of ideas that will take place throughout the entire paper.

Let's look at the first paragraph in John's draft of his paper. As indicated in the paper's title, John makes the argument that, as the paper states, "the townspeople share responsibility for Homer's death." This is a good working thesis because it is not restating an obvious idea; for example, a statement such as "Emily is a jilted lover" is not a good thesis because it is obvious and information-based, and it does not set up an interpretation-based argument. John's draft is off to a good start because it has a straightforward, but not obvious, argument. However, the thesis paragraph weakens after the thesis statement, since it does not clearly address a question that follows from the thesis: How are the townspeople responsible for the death? What do the townspeople do to share in Homer's death? The thesis paragraph contains the vague statement that the townspeople have "done things" that make them responsible. This is an idea that needs some work! Let's see how this idea can be developed through the revision process.

Student Work: Revision
Revising to Strengthen the Thesis

Rough Draft:

This focus on Miss Emily makes her be seen as a criminal and makes her seem to be the main person to blame for Homer's death. However, the townspeople share responsibility for Homer's death. The narrator, who explains the townspeople's reactions to Emily, makes it sound like she is crazy. But, he also reveals that the townspeople have done things that make them responsible for Homer's death.

concise thesis, explain further clarify?

↓

First Revision:

The narrator's focus on Miss Emily makes her into a criminal who is responsible for Homer's death. However, the townspeople share responsibility for Homer's death. Although the narrator emphasizes Miss Emily's elite attitude and her insane actions, he also reveals that the townspeople have encouraged Miss Emily's attitude and actions.

better phrasing
keep concise thesis, explain further better phrasing
clarify?

↓

Second Revision:

The narrator's focus on Miss Emily positions her as a criminal who is solely responsible for Homer's death. Although she kills Homer out of loneliness and isolation, Emily is not completely isolated in this murder. The townspeople share responsibility for Homer's death. The narrator emphasizes Miss Emily's withdrawal from society and unstable actions, but he also reveals that the townspeople encouraged that withdrawal and pushed her towards instability, which resulted in murder.

better phrasing, explanation concise thesis kept

thesis explained

Revision: Revising to Develop Ideas

A paper's draft will often contain ideas that need more work. Revision is crucial because it allows you to put your work aside, gain some distance from it, and return to it with fresh eyes. When you reread one of your paper's drafts, you can often locate ideas that are unclear, incorrect, or poorly explained; you might not have sensed that your ideas were weak when you were in the middle of inventing them, but, on a rereading, you can see their weaknesses and start to correct them.

Let's look at the long parenthetical comment in the body's third subpoint. John's own drafting indicates that the subpoint isn't quite right: The covering up of the smell doesn't show that the townspeople set the stage for Homer's death, since it happens after his death. The claim that the covering up of the smell contributes to Homer's death needs to be reworked. Rather than ignore the inconsistency between this claim and the previous two subpoints, John decides to explore his "chain of ideas" more thoroughly. As a result of thinking about the covering up of the smell, he revisits all three subpoints and engages in a deeper analysis of the townspeople. After further brainstorming, John realizes that the townspeople either directly intervene in Emily's life or refuse to confront Emily, and he decides that this dynamic of "intervening/giving in" is an interesting way of organizing the paper. He starts to outline his paper to emphasize this new idea.

Student Work: Revision
Revising to Develop Ideas

Rough Draft Outline:
Thesis paragraph: Emily committed murder; the town has some responsibility

Body:
Subpoint #1: Rumors and intervening in courtship with Homer
Subpoint #2: Allowing her to buy poison
Subpoint #3: Covering up the smell

Conclusion: Miss Emily committed murder, but the town set the stage for the murder

↓

Revised Outline:
Thesis paragraph: Emily committed murder; the town has some responsibility

Body:
A. First Type of Action: The townspeople gossip and intervene in her courtship
   Subpoint #1: Rumors and intervening in courtship with Homer adds two new categories re: townspeople's reactions to Emily

B. Second Type of Action: The townspeople let her make her own rules, give in too easily to her, and don't confront her
   Subpoint #2: Allowing her to buy poison
   Subpoint #3: Covering up the smell

Conclusion: Miss Emily committed murder, but the town set the stage for the murder by intervening in her courtship and then giving in to her when she created her own rules

Revision: Revising to Improve Organization

As you develop new ideas, your paper's organization might need to change to capture those new ideas. Although you might be hesitant to make significant changes that reorganize your entire paper, remember that revision is about improving the ideas in your paper, not just tinkering with editing of words. In order to move a paper forward, you might need to make significant changes, but those changes will result in a better paper (and a better grade!).

As John works on the revision process, the outline for his draft paper has already changed to accommodate a new two-point emphasis on the townspeople's interactions with Miss Emily. In order to explain the "intervening/giving in" dynamic, the paper needs to emphasize those two ideas, causing it to break out of the five-paragraph essay (and its "three body paragraphs") formula. The draft is shaping up to have two main sections, with several subpoints under each section. As John revises his paper, he adds new subpoints that take additional evidence—key scenes from the story—into account. Crucially, the structure of John's paper reflects the new structure of his ideas.

Student Work: Revision
Revising to Improve Organization

Rough Draft Outline:

Thesis paragraph: Emily committed murder, but the town has some responsibility

Body:
Subpoint #1: Rumors and intervening in the courtship with Homer
Subpoint #2: Allowing her to buy poison
Subpoint #3: Covering up the smell

Conclusion: Emily committed murder, but the town set the stage for murder

↓

Revised Outline:

Thesis paragraph: Emily committed murder, but the town has some responsibility

Body:
A. First Type of Action: The townspeople gossip and scold/judge her
   Subpoint #1: Rumors about Homer

B. Second Type of Action: The townspeople let her make her own rules, give in to her
   Subpoint #2: Taxes ← Locating this subpoint here follows the order of the story but makes it seem like she avoided taxes before murder.
   Subpoint #3: Poison
   Subpoint #4: Smell

Conclusion: Miss Emily committed murder, but the town set the stage for the murder by intervening in her courtship and then giving in to her when she created her own rules

↓

The writer uses revision to create an organization that captures his best ideas. Here, two new subsections are used.

Final Revised Outline:
Thesis paragraph

Body:
A. First Type of Action: The townspeople gossip and scold/ judge her
Subpoint #1: Rumors about Homer

B. Second Type of Action: The townspeople let her make her own rules, give in to her
Subpoint #2: Poison
Subpoint #3: Smell
Subpoint #4: Taxes

The writer uses revisions to position his new ideas correctly—he follows his ideas and not just the order of the story.

Relocating this subpoint here follows the chronological order of events, not the order in which story is told. Makes it clear that Miss Emily avoids taxes later in life, after the murder. The town allows her to create her own reality.

Conclusion: Miss Emily committed murder, but the town set the stage for the murder by intervening in her courtship and then giving in to her when she created her own rules

Student Analytical Essay: "The Townspeople's Responsibility for Homer's Murder in 'A Rose for Emily'" (Final Draft)

Now that we've explored three strategies for revising this paper, let's see how John has revised his entire draft. Compare this final draft to the first draft on page 466. Notice how John has strengthened several aspects of his writing. He has

- clarified and deepened the thesis argument;
- developed the series of connected claims;
- created an organizational structure that captures idea development;
- used evidence to support ideas; and
- improved phrasing, style, and grammar.

John has engaged in a true revision of his paper—he has not used the revision process to merely correct typos on his first draft. As a paper is revised, its ideas should evolve and feed back into the brainstorming process; new subpoints should appear, and new evidence should be added. A comparison to the earlier draft reveals how John has used the revision process to strengthen both his writing and his thinking.

Student Work: Outlining
Outlining to Reorganize Ideas

Thesis paragraph:

Emily committed murder
The town has some responsibility because they encouraged her instability writer uses outline to state thesis strongly, succinctly

Body:

A. First Type of Action: The townspeople gossip and scold/ judge her

Subpoint #1: Rumors/scolding about Homer

—The town tries to tell her that her running around with Homer is a disgrace

—Baptist minister goes to see her —Minister's wife makes relatives come to see her writer organizes paper's body by creating clear sub-points

B. Second Type of Action: The townspeople let her make her own rules, give in too easily to her, and don't confront her

Subpoint #2: Poison

—The druggist let her buy poison

—The druggist gave in quickly after questioning her writer develops paper by adding layers of ideas to thesis

Subpoint #3: The Smell

—The Board of Alderman wouldn't confront her

—They secretly spread lime over her house to cover up the smell writer locates interesting evidence to support his ideas

Subpoint #4: Taxes

—The town let her avoid paying taxes, creating a story that she doesn't owe them

—This was a remaking of the rules, proving that rules don't apply to her

—This also allowed Miss Emily to continue to create own reality outline allows the writer to balance subsections—each contains ideas and evidence

Conclusion: The townspeople's way of interacting with Miss Emily is conflicted: they intervene and give in to her. This encourages Miss Emily's instability and her crime.

John Martinez

English 200: Introduction to Literature

Professor Murphy

March 4, 2016

The Townspeople's Responsibility for Homer's Murder in "A Rose for Emily"

At the end of William Faulker's "A Rose for Emily," it becomes clear that a murder has taken place. Miss Emily Grierson, the central character, has poisoned her suitor, Homer Barron, placed his body in a bedroom, and visited, embraced, and even slept with the body. The shocking ending creates a new perception of the story's main character. Suddenly, Miss Emily strong opening—immediately starts a discussion about a specific aspect of the story is no longer a sad, lonely character, avoided by the town, but is a murderer. The narrator's focus on Miss Emily positions her as a criminal who is solely responsible for Homer's death. Although she kills Homer out of loneliness and isolation, Emily is not completely isolated in this murder. The townspeople share responsibility for Homer's death. The narrator emphasizes Miss Emily's withdrawal from society and unstable actions, but he also reveals that the townspeople encouraged that withdrawal and pushed her towards instability, which resulted in the murder.

thesis is stated in a clear, succinct sentence writer explains his paper organization, previews his ideas

The townspeople interact with Miss Emily in two seemingly opposite ways. First, they are overly judgmental about her relationship with Homer and involve themselves in that relationship. They try to make her conform to their expectations about proper courtship. Second, and in contrast to this intervening, the townspeople avoid confrontation with her and let her create her own rules and create her own reality. This giving in to Miss Emily can be seen in a series of key acts. Crucially, the druggist let her buy the poison that was used to kill Homer. In addition, the Board of Alderman did not confront her about the smell, but went to Emily's house and covered up the smell. Finally, many years later, the town does not force Emily to pay her taxes. As a result of trying to stop her affair and then giving in to her, the townspeople helped to create Miss Emily's instability.

writer stays "on track" by following his outline and restating the main focus of paper section A

The townspeople's involvement in Emily's courtship is the most direct way that they contribute to Homer's murder. The townspeople couldn't help but gossip about Emily dating Homer, especially as Emily is upper-class and Homer is working class and from the North. The townspeople gossip, "Of course a Grierson would not think seriously of a Northerner, a day laborer" (452). Miss Emily seemed to be in love with Homer, driving around town in a "glittering buggy" (453). The townspeople, however, label her "Poor Emily" because Homer is "not a marrying man" and Emily does not seem to have convinced him to marry her (452).

In these gossiping scenes, the townspeople function as a "group character" in which individuals are connected into one larger group. The narrator typically refers to the townspeople as "we" (451–53). Although this character can be divided into individuals, the townspeople are most often portrayed as acting together, as when they gossip about Miss Emily. Sometimes, the group is defined more specifically, such as when "the ladies began to say that it was a disgrace to the town and a bad example to the young people. The men did not want to interfere" (453). Individuals within the group are briefly mentioned. For example, a "Baptist minister" goes and talks to her, and his wife writes her relatives to have them come to visit. Although these seem to be individual actions, the whole town is presented as participating in them; for example, the narrator explains, "So, she had blood-kin under her roof again and we sat back to watch developments" after the relatives arrived (453). Throughout the story, this "we" seems to be a large force that tries to shape Miss Emily. This "we" brings in the relatives who, in turn, make Miss Emily define her relationship with Homer and push her towards murder.

a strong literature paper analyzes literary form writer uses close reading to analyze specific words

Although the townspeople seem to be involved in Miss Emily's life, a second dynamic takes place when they have to confront her directly: they seem afraid of her and give into her. This is seen in several scenes, including when Miss Emily buys poison. In this scene, a crucial piece of missing information is not followed up on. The druggist asks Miss Emily what she wants the poison for, and she refuses to answer; even though she is required by law to explain the use of the poison, she does not give that information. When the druggist explains the law, "Miss Emily just stared at him, her head tilted back in order to look him eye for eye, until he looked away and went and got the arsenic and wrapped it up" (452). The druggist is intimidated by her stare and, the reader learns, writes "For rats" on the poison and covers for Miss Emily (452). If the druggist had refused to allow her to buy the writer restates the central argument of paper section B writer follows his outline and develops subpoint #2 writer develops his ideas by making strong arguments poison, the entire murder plot might have been avoided. He could have questioned the use of the poison more thoroughly, and Miss Emily would have known her murder plot would be uncovered. If the druggist was a stronger character, he would not have allowed Miss Emily to purchase what becomes a murder weapon.

The townspeople's willingness to not question Miss Emily is also shown after Homer's death. The townspeople do not investigate the smell at Miss Emily's house, which the reader later learns is caused by Homer's decaying body. The townspeople do not want to confront Miss Emily with the embarrassing fact of the smell, and the Judge exclaims, "Will you accuse a lady to her face of smelling bad?" (451). Rather than question her, the Board of Alderman of four men go to her house and spread lime around the base of her house, hoping to stop the smell. The men "slunk about the house like burglars" (451). The men decide that they should act like "burglars" rather than confront Miss Emily; rather than discover that she is a criminal, the men act like criminals. Interestingly, Miss Emily was aware of the men coming to her house, and watched them from a lighted window. However, the men remained unable to ask her about the smell, but allowed her to live above the law.

writer follows his planned organization and develops subpoint #3

writer analyzes interesting moments in the story

A final example of how the townspeople create a larger patterns of not confronting Miss Emily appears in the opening of "A Rose for Emily." The story opens with a scene that seems boring in comparison to the murder: the narrator explains why Miss Emily is allowed to avoid paying taxes. This scene also explains that the townspeople see Miss Emily as "a tradition, a duty, and a care; a sort of hereditary obligation upon the town" (449). This scene shows that the town is connected to Miss Emily and that she is not as isolated as she seems. In addition, it shows how the town tries to "care" for her, but actually allows her to break town rules and live in her own reality.

writer follows his planned organization and develops subpoint #4

writer offers evidence and an interpretation of that evidence

Martinez 5

The scene describes Miss Emily returning her tax notice, "without comment," followed by the Board of Alderman's visit to her house (449). Miss Emily's house is described as being "dim" and in "shadow," smelling of "dust and disuse—a close dank smell," and being filled with "cracked" leather furniture (450). This smell foreshadows the earlier smell that results from the murder of Homer—the smell that an earlier group of Aldermen try to cover up. When the Alderman visitors sit down, "a faint dust rose sluggishly about their thighs, spinning with slow motes" (450). The dusty scene foreshadows the discovery of Homer's body in the dusty, decayed room at the end of the story. The men explain that she owes taxes, but she responds by repeating three times, "I have no taxes in Jefferson" and telling them three times to go see a dead "Colonel Sartoris" (450). The men give in to her demands and do not force her to pay taxes. As the narrator explains, "she vanquished them, horse and foot" (450). By letting her not pay her taxes, these men allow Miss Emily to create her own reality—a reality in which she follows her own rules and ignores if people are alive or dead.

writer breaks down the quotes and integrates them into his writing writer pushes his thinking to create inventive interpretations

The townspeople are a "group character" that has some responsibility for Homer's murder because of the way they interact with Miss Emily. As a first dynamic of interaction, they intervene in Miss Emily's courtship, gossiping and asking her relatives to come stay with her. Even if the courtship broke expectations or was inappropriate, it was far less criminal that murder. The townspeople should have let Miss Emily enjoy her relationship with Homer. As a second dynamic, the town did not stand up to Miss Emily when it should have. The town had an opportunity to turn Miss Emily away from her criminal act of murder. If the druggist had stood up to her and questioned her motives more closely, she might have given up on the idea of the poisoning. After the murder occurred, the townspeople could have come to a greater understanding of what had happened in the Grierson writer creates unique phrasing to capture his ideas writer reviews his arguments as needed

Martinez 6

house. They could have questioned Emily and forced themselves into the home to investigate. Instead, they participated in the cover up of the murder, covering up the smell and letting the town pretend nothing had happened. Finally, the Board of Alderman's later reaction to her taxes shows that the town was willing to let Miss Emily create her own world and create her own rules. This tax issue reveals how the town was afraid to confront her directly.

writer continues to phrase his ideas in an argumentative fashion

Although Miss Emily is clearly Homer's murderer, she might not have taken on that role if the townspeople had been both more supportive of her and more questioning of her. The townspeople, although not directly acting like murderers, bear some responsibility for Homer's murder. Miss Emily is not the lonely, all-alone murderer that she seems to be; she has a partner in crime in the townspeople.

paper ends with a strong argument.

[New page]

Martinez 7

Work Cited

Faulkner, William. "A Rose for Emily," Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 451–56. Print.

Your Turn: Additional Stories for Analysis

Katherine Mansfield

Katherine Mansfield (1888–1923) was born in New Zealand. She published a book of stories in 1911, and in 1912 met and began living with the writer John Middleton Murry. In 1918, after divorcing, she married Murry. She died of tuberculosis in 1923 a few months after her thirty-fourth birthday.

Miss Brill

Although it was so brilliantly fine—the blue sky powdered with gold and great spots of light like white wine splashed over the Jardins Publiques[1]—Miss Brill was glad that she had decided on her fur. The air was motionless, but when you opened your mouth there was just a faint chill, like a chill from a glass of iced water before you sip, and now and again a leaf came drifting—from nowhere, from the sky. Miss Brill put up her hand and touched her fur. Dear little thing! It was nice to feel it again. She had taken it out of its box that afternoon, shaken out the moth-powder, given it a good brush, and rubbed the life back into the dim little eyes. "What has been happening to me?" said the sad little eyes. Oh, how sweet it was to see them snap at her again from the red eiderdown! . . . But the nose, which was of some black composition, wasn't at all firm. It must have had a knock, somehow. Never mind—a little dab of black sealing- wax when the time came—when it was absolutely necessary. . . . Little rogue! Yes, she really felt like that about it. Little rogue biting its tail just by her left ear. She could have taken it off and laid it on her lap and stroked it. She felt a tingling in her hands and arms, but that came from walking, she supposed. And when she breathed, something light and sad—no, not sad, exactly—something gentle seemed to move in her bosom.

There were a number of people out this afternoon, far more than last Sunday. And the band sounded louder and gayer. That was because the Season had begun. For although the band played all year round on Sundays, out of season it was never the same. It was like some one playing with only the family to listen; it didn't care how it played if there weren't any strangers present. Wasn't the conductor wearing a new coat, too? She was sure it was new. He scraped with his foot and flapped his arms like a rooster about to crow, and the bandsmen sitting in the green rotunda blew out their cheeks and glared at the music. Now there came a little "flutey" bit—very pretty!—a little chain of bright drops. She was sure it would be repeated. It was; she lifted her head and smiled.

Only two people shared her "special" seat: a fine old man in a velvet coat, his hands clasped over a huge carved walking-stick, and a big old woman, sitting upright, with a roll of knitting on her embroidered apron. They did not speak. This was disappointing, for Miss Brill always looked forward to the conversation. She had become really quite expert, she thought, at listening as though she didn't listen, at sitting in other people's lives just for a minute while they talked round her.

She glanced, sideways, at the old couple. Perhaps they would go soon. Last Sunday, too, hadn't been as interesting as usual. An Englishman and his wife, he wearing a dreadful Panama hat and she button boots. And she'd gone on the whole time about how she ought to wear spectacles; she knew she needed them; but that it was no good getting any; they'd be sure to break and they'd never keep on. And he'd been so patient. He'd suggested everything—gold rims, the kind that curved round your ears, little pads inside the bridge. No, nothing would please her. "They'll always be sliding down my nose!" Miss Brill had wanted to shake her.

5 The old people sat on the bench, still as statues. Never mind, there was always the crowd to watch. To and fro, in front of the flower-beds and the band rotunda, the couples and groups paraded, stopped to talk, to greet, to buy a handful of flowers from the old beggar who had his tray fixed to the railings. Little children ran among them, swooping and laughing; little boys with big white silk bows under their chins, little girls, little French dolls, dressed up in velvet and lace. And some-times a tiny staggerer came suddenly rocking into the open from under the trees, stopped, stared, as suddenly sat down "flop," until its small high-stepping mother, like a young hen, rushed scolding to its rescue. Other people sat on the benches and green chairs, but they were nearly always the same, Sunday after Sunday, and—Miss Brill had often noticed—there was something funny about nearly all of them. They were odd, silent, nearly all old, and from the way they stared they looked as though they'd just come from dark little rooms or even—even cupboards!

[1]Jardins Publiques Public Gardens (French).

Behind the rotunda the slender trees with yellow leaves down drooping, and through them just a line of sea, and beyond the blue sky with gold-veined clouds.

Tum-tum-tum tiddle-um! tiddle-um! tum tiddley-um tum ta! blew the band.

Two young girls in red came by and two young soldiers in blue met them, and they laughed and paired and went off arm-in-arm. Two peasant women with funny straw hats passed, gravely, leading beautiful smoke-colored donkeys. A cold, pale nun hurried by. A beautiful woman came along and dropped her bunch of violets, and a little boy ran after to hand them to her, and she took them and threw them away as if they'd been poisoned. Dear me! Miss Brill didn't know whether to admire that or not! And now an ermine toque[2] and a gentleman in grey met just in front of her. He was tall, stiff, dignified, and she was wearing the ermine toque she'd bought when her hair was yellow. Now everything, her hair, her face, even her eyes, was the same color as the shabby ermine, and her hand, in its cleaned glove, lifted to dab her lips, was a tiny yellowish paw. Oh, she was so pleased to see him—delighted! She rather thought they were going to meet that afternoon. She described where she'd been—everywhere, here, there, along by the sea. The day was so charming—didn't he agree? And wouldn't he, perhaps? . . . But he shook his head, lighted a cigarette, slowly breathed a great deep puff into her face, and, even while she was still talking and laughing, flicked the match away and walked on. The ermine toque was alone; she smiled more brightly than ever. But even the band seemed to know what she was feeling and played more softly, played tenderly, and the drum beat, "The Brute! The Brute!" over and over. What would she do? What was going to happen now? But as Miss Brill wondered, the ermine toque turned, raised her hand as though she'd seen some one else, much nicer, just over there, and pattered away. And the band changed again and played more quickly, more gaily than ever, and the old couple on Miss Brill's seat got up and marched away, and such a funny old man with long whiskers hobbled along in time to the music and was nearly knocked over by four girls walking abreast.

Oh, how fascinating it was! How she enjoyed it! How she loved sitting here, watching it all! It was like a play. It was exactly like a play. Who could believe the sky at the back wasn't painted? But it wasn't till a little brown dog trotted on solemn and then slowly trotted off, like a little "theatre" dog, a little dog that had been drugged, that Miss Brill discovered what it was that made it so exciting. They were all on the stage. They weren't only the audience, not only looking on; they were acting. Even she had a part and came every Sunday. No doubt somebody would have noticed if she hadn't been there; she was part of the performance after all. How strange she'd never thought of it like that before! And yet it explained why she made such a point of starting from home at just the same time each week—so as not to be late for the performance—and it also explained why she had quite a queer, shy feeling at telling her English pupils how she spent her Sunday afternoons. No wonder! Miss Brill nearly laughed out loud. She was on the stage. She thought of the old invalid gentleman to whom she read the newspaper four afternoons a week while he slept in the garden. She had got quite used to the frail head on the cotton pillow, the hollowed eyes, the open mouth and the high pinched nose. If he'd been dead she mightn't have noticed for weeks; she wouldn't have minded. But suddenly he knew he was having the paper read to him by an actress! "An actress!" The old head lifted; two points of light quivered in the old eyes. "An actress—are ye?" And Miss Brill smoothed the newspaper as though it were the manuscript of her part and said gently: "Yes, I have been an actress for a long time."

[2]toque a brimless, close-fitting woman's hat.

10 The band had been having a rest. Now they started again. And what they played was warm, sunny, yet there was just a faint chill—a something, what was it?—not sadness—no, not sadness—a something that made you want to sing. The tune lifted, lifted, the light shone; and it seemed to Miss Brill that in another moment all of them, all the whole company, would begin singing. The young ones, the laughing ones who were moving together, they would begin, and the men's voices, very resolute and brave, would join them. And then she too, she too, and the others on the benches—they would come in with a kind of accompaniment—something low, that scarcely rose or fell, something so beautiful—moving. . . . And Miss Brill's eyes filled with tears and she looked smiling at all the other members of the company. Yes, we understand, we understand, she thought—though what they understood she didn't know.

Just at that moment a boy and a girl came and sat down where the old couple had been. They were beautifully dressed; they were in love. The hero and heroine, of course, just arrived from his father's yacht. And still soundlessly singing, still with that trembling smile, Miss Brill prepared to listen.

"No, not now," said the girl. "Not here, I can't."

"But why? Because of that stupid old thing at the end there?" asked the boy.

"Why does she come here at all—who wants her? Why doesn't she keep her silly old mug at home?"

"It's her fu-fur which is so funny," giggled the girl. "It's exactly like a fried whiting."[3]

15 "Ah, be off with you!" said the boy in an angry whisper. Then: "Tell me, my petite chère[4]—"

"No, not here," said the girl. "Not yet."

On her way home she usually bought a slice of honey-cake at the baker's. It was her Sunday treat. Sometimes there was an almond in her slice, sometimes not. It made a great difference. If there was an almond it was like carrying home a tiny present—a surprise—something that might very well not have been there. She hurried on the almond Sundays and struck the match for the kettle in quite a dashing way.

But today she passed the baker's by, climbed the stairs, went into the little dark room—her room like a cupboard—and sat down on the red eiderdown. She sat there for a long time. The box that the fur came out of was on the bed. She un- clasped the necklet quickly; quickly, without looking, laid it inside. But when she put the lid on she thought she heard something crying.

[1920]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Why do you think Mansfield did not give Miss Brill a first name?
2. What would be lost (or gained?) if the first paragraph were omitted?
3. Suppose someone said that the story is about a woman who is justly punished for her pride. What might be your response?

[3]whiting a kind of fish. [4]petite chère darling.

Tim O'Brien

Tim O'Brien, born in 1947 in Austin, Minnesota, was drafted into the army in 1968 and served as an infantryman in Vietnam. Drawing on this experience, he wrote a memoir, If I Die in a Combat Zone (1973), in which he explained that he did not support the Vietnam War, considered dodging the draft, but, lacking the courage to do so, he served, largely out of fear and embarrassment. A later book, a novel called Going After Cacciato, won the National Book Award in 1979. "The Things They Carried," first published in 1986, was republished in 1990 as one of a series of interlocking stories in a book titled The Things They Carried.

The Things They Carried

First Lieutenant Jimmy Cross carried letters from a girl named Martha, a junior at Mount Sebastian College in New Jersey. They were not love letters, but Lieutenant Cross was hoping, so he kept them folded in plastic at the bottom of his rucksack. In the late afternoon, after a day's march, he would dig his foxhole, wash his hands under a canteen, unwrap the letters, hold them with the tips of his fingers, and spend the last hour of light pretending. He would imagine romantic camping trips into the White Mountains in New Hampshire. He would sometimes taste the envelope flaps, knowing her tongue had been there. More than anything, he wanted Martha to love him as he loved her, but the letters were mostly chatty, elusive on the matter of love. She was a virgin, he was almost sure. She was an English major at Mount Sebastian, and she wrote beautifully about her professors and roommates and midterm exams, about her respect for Chaucer and her great affection for Virginia Woolf. She often quoted lines of poetry; she never mentioned the war, except to say, Jimmy, take care of yourself. The letters weighed ten ounces. They were signed "Love, Martha," but Lieutenant Cross understood that Love was only a way of signing and did not mean what he sometimes pretended it meant. At dusk, he would carefully return the letters to his rucksack. Slowly, a bit distracted, he would get up and move among his men, checking the perimeter, then at full dark he would return to his hole and watch the night and wonder if Martha was a virgin.

The things they carried were largely determined by necessity. Among the necessities or near-necessities were P-38 can openers, pocket knives, heat tabs, wrist watches, dog tags, mosquito repellent, chewing gum, candy, cigarettes, salt tablets, packets of Kool-Aid, lighters, matches, sewing kits, Military Payment Certificates, C rations, and two or three canteens of water. Together, these items weighed between fifteen and twenty pounds, depending upon a man's habits or rate of metabolism. Henry Dobbins, who was a big man, carried extra rations; he was especially fond of canned peaches in heavy syrup over pound cake. Dave Jensen, who practiced field hygiene, carried a toothbrush, dental floss, and several hotel-size bars of soap he'd stolen on R&R[1] in Sydney, Australia. Ted Lavender, who was scared, carried tranquilizers until he was shot in the head outside the village of Than Khe in mid-April. By necessity, and because it was SOP,[2] they all carried steel helmets that weighed five pounds including the liner and camouflage cover. They carried the standard fatigue jackets and trousers. Very few carried underwear. On their feet they carried jungle boots—2.1 pounds—and Dave Jensen carried three pairs of socks and a can of Dr. Scholl's foot powder as a precaution against trench foot. Until he was shot, Ted Lavender carried six or seven ounces of premium dope, which for him was a necessity. Mitchell Sanders, the RTO,[3] carried condoms. Norman Bowker carried a diary. Rat Kiley carried comic books. Kiowa, a devout Baptist, carried an illustrated New Testament that had been presented to him by his father, who taught Sunday school in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. As a hedge against bad times, however, Kiowa also carried his grandmother's distrust of the white man, his grandfather's old hunting hatchet. Necessity dictated. Because the land was mined and booby-trapped, it was SOP for each man to carry a steel-centered, nylon-covered flak jacket, which weighed 6.7 pounds, but which on hot days seemed much heavier. Because you could die so quickly, each man carried at least one large compress bandage, usually in the helmet band for easy access. Because the nights were cold, and because the monsoons were wet, each carried a green plastic poncho that could be used as a raincoat or groundsheet or makeshift tent. With its quilted liner, the poncho weighed almost two pounds, but it was worth every ounce. In April, for instance, when Ted Lavender was shot, they used his poncho to wrap him up, then to carry him across the paddy, then to lift him into the chopper that took him away.

[1]R&R rest and rehabilitation leave.
[2]SOP standard operating procedure.

They were called legs or grunts.

To carry something was to "hump" it, as when Lieutenant Jimmy Cross humped his love for Martha up the hills and through the swamps. In its intransitive form, "to hump" meant "to walk," or "to march," but it implied burdens far beyond the intransitive.

5 Almost everyone humped photographs. In his wallet, Lieutenant Cross carried two photographs of Martha. The first was a Kodachrome snapshot signed "Love," though he knew better. She stood against a brick wall. Her eyes were gray and neutral, her lips slightly open as she stared straight-on at the camera. At night, sometimes, Lieutenant Cross wondered who had taken the picture, because he knew she had boyfriends, because he loved her so much, and because he could see the shadow of the picture taker spreading out against the brick wall. The second photograph had been clipped from the 1968 Mount Sebastian yearbook. It was an action shot—women's volleyball—and Martha was bent horizontal to the floor, reaching, the palms of her hands in sharp focus, the tongue taut, the expression frank and competitive. There was no visible sweat. She wore white gym shorts. Her legs, he thought, were almost certainly the legs of a virgin, dry and without hair, the left knee cocked and carrying her entire weight, which was just over one hundred pounds. Lieutenant Cross remembered touching that left knee. A dark theater, he remembered, and the movie was Bonnie and Clyde, and Martha wore a tweed skirt, and during the final scene, when he touched her knee, she turned and looked at him in a sad, sober way that made him pull his hand back, but he would always remember the feel of the tweed skirt and the knee beneath it and the sound of the gunfire that killed Bonnie and Clyde, how embarrassing it was, how slow and oppressive. He remembered kissing her goodnight at the dorm door. Right then, he thought, he should've done something brave. He should've carried her up the stairs to her room and tied her to the bed and touched that left knee all night long. He should've risked it. Whenever he looked at the photographs, he thought of new things he should've done.

What they carried was partly a function of rank, partly of field specialty.

[3]RTO radio and telephone operator.

As a first lieutenant and platoon leader, Jimmy Cross carried a compass, maps, code books, binoculars, and a .45-caliber pistol that weighed 2.9 pounds fully loaded. He carried a strobe light and the responsibility for the lives of his men.

As an RTO, Mitchell Sanders carried the PRC-25 radio, a killer, twenty-six pounds with its battery.

As a medic, Rat Kiley carried a canvas satchel filled with morphine and plasma and malaria tablets and surgical tape and comic books and all the things a medic must carry, including M&Ms[4] for especially bad wounds, for a total weight of nearly twenty pounds.

10 As a big man, therefore a machine gunner, Henry Dobbins carried the M-60, which weighed twenty-three pounds unloaded, but which was almost always loaded. In addition, Dobbins carried between ten and fifteen pounds of ammunition draped in belts across his chest and shoulders.

As PFCs or Spec 4s, most of them were common grunts and carried the standard M-16 gas operated assault rifle. The weapon weighed 7.5 pounds unloaded, 8.2 pounds with its full twenty-round magazine. Depending on numerous factors, such as topography and psychology, the riflemen carried anywhere from twelve to twenty magazines, usually in cloth bandoliers, adding on another 8.4 pounds at minimum, fourteen pounds at maximum. When it was available, they also carried M-16 maintenance gear—rods and steel brushes and swabs and tubes of LSA oil—all of which weighed about a pound. Among the grunts, some carried the M-79 grenade launcher, 5.9 pounds unloaded, a reasonably light weapon except for the ammunition, which was heavy. A single round weighed ten ounces. The typical load was twenty-five rounds. But Ted Lavender, who was scared, carried thirty-four rounds when he was shot and killed outside Than Khe, and he went down under an exceptional burden, more than twenty pounds of ammunition, plus the flak jacket and helmet and rations and water and toilet paper and tranquilizers and all the rest, plus the unweighed fear. He was dead weight. There was no twitching or flopping. Kiowa, who saw it happen, said it was like watching a rock fall, or a big sandbag or something—just boom, then down—not like the movies where the dead guy rolls around and does fancy spins and goes ass over teakettle—not like that, Kiowa said, the poor bastard just flat-fuck fell. Boom. Down. Nothing else. It was a bright morning in mid-April. Lieutenant Cross felt the pain. He blamed himself. They stripped off Lavender's canteens and ammo, all the heavy things, and Rat Kiley said the obvious, the guy's dead, and Mitchell Sanders used his radio to report one U.S. KIA[5] and to request a chopper. Then they wrapped Lavender in his poncho. They carried him out to a dry paddy, established security, and sat smoking the dead man's dope until the chopper came. Lieutenant Cross kept to himself. He pictured Martha's smooth young face, thinking he loved her more than anything, more than his men, and now Ted Lavender was dead because he loved her so much and could not stop thinking about her. When the dust-off arrived, they carried Lavender aboard. Afterward they burned Than Khe. They marched until dusk, then dug their holes, and that night Kiowa kept explaining how you had to be there, how fast it was, how the poor guy just dropped like so much concrete. Boom-down, he said. Like cement.

In addition to the three standard weapons—the M-60, M-16, and M-79—they carried whatever presented itself, or whatever seemed appropriate as a means of killing or staying alive. They carried catch-as-catch-can. At various times, in various situations, they carried M-14s and CAR-15s and Swedish Ks and grease guns and captured AK-47s and Chi-Coms and RPGs and Simonov carbines and black-market Uzis and .38-caliber Smith & Wesson handguns and 66 mm LAWs and shotguns and silencers and blackjacks and bayonets and C-4 plastic explosives. Lee Strunk carried a slingshot; a weapon of last resort, he called it. Mitchell Sanders carried brass knuckles. Kiowa carried his grandfather's feathered hatchet. Every third or fourth man carried a Claymore antipersonnel mine—3.5 pounds with its firing device. They all carried fragmentation grenades—fourteen ounces each. They all carried at least one M-18 colored smoke grenade—twenty-four ounces. Some carried CS or tear-gas grenades. Some carried white-phosphorus grenades. They carried all they could bear, and then some, including a silent awe for the terrible power of the things they carried.

[4]M&M joking term for medical supplies.
[5]KIA killed in action.

In the first week of April, before Lavender died, Lieutenant Jimmy Cross received a good-luck charm from Martha. It was a simple pebble, an ounce at most. Smooth to the touch, it was a milky-white color with flecks of orange and violet, oval-shaped, like a miniature egg. In the accompanying letter, Martha wrote that she had found the pebble on the Jersey shoreline, precisely where the land touched the water at high tide, where things came together but also separated. It was this separate-but-together quality, she wrote, that had inspired her to pick up the pebble and to carry it in her breast pocket for several days, where it seemed weightless, and then to send it through the mail, by air, as a token of her truest feelings for him. Lieutenant Cross found this romantic. But he wondered what her truest feelings were, exactly, and what she meant by separate-but-together. He wondered how the tides and waves had come into play on that afternoon along the Jersey shoreline when Martha saw the pebble and bent down to rescue it from geology. He imagined bare feet. Martha was a poet, with the poet's sensibilities, and her feet would be brown and bare, the toenails unpainted, the eyes chilly and somber like the ocean in March, and though it was painful, he wondered who had been with her that afternoon. He imagined a pair of shadows moving along the strip of sand where things came together but also separated. It was phantom jealousy, he knew, but he couldn't help himself. He loved her so much. On the march, through the hot days of early April, he carried the pebble in his mouth, turning it with his tongue, tasting sea salts and moisture. His mind wandered. He had difficulty keeping his attention on the war. On occasion he would yell at his men to spread out the column, to keep their eyes open, but then he would slip away into daydreams, just pretending, walking barefoot along the Jersey shore, with Martha, carrying nothing. He would feel himself rising. Sun and waves and gentle winds, all love and lightness.

What they carried varied by mission.

15 When a mission took them to the mountains, they carried mosquito netting, machetes, canvas tarps, and extra bugjuice.

If a mission seemed especially hazardous, or if it involved a place they knew to be bad, they carried everything they could. In certain heavily mined AOs,[6] where the land was dense with Toe Poppers and Bouncing Betties, they took turns humping a twenty-eight-pound mine detector. With its headphones and big sensing plate, the equipment was a stress on the lower back and shoulders, awkward to handle, often useless because of the shrapnel in the earth, but they carried it anyway, partly for safety, partly for the illusion of safety.

On ambush, or other night missions, they carried peculiar little odds and ends. Kiowa always took along his New Testament and a pair of moccasins for silence.

[6]AOs areas of operation.

Dave Jensen carried night-sight vitamins high in carotin. Lee Strunk carried his slingshot; ammo, he claimed, would never be a problem. Rat Kiley carried brandy and M&Ms. Until he was shot, Ted Lavender carried the starlight scope, which weighed 6.3 pounds with its aluminum carrying case. Henry Dobbins carried his girlfriend's panty hose wrapped around his neck as a comforter. They all carried ghosts. When dark came, they would move out single file across the meadows and paddies to their ambush coordinates, where they would quietly set up the Claymores and lie down and spend the night waiting.

Other missions were more complicated and required special equipment. In mid-April, it was their mission to search out and destroy the elaborate tunnel complexes in the Than Khe area south of Chu Lai. To blow the tunnels, they carried one-pound blocks of pentrite high explosives, four blocks to a man, sixty-eight pounds in all. They carried wiring, detonators, and battery-powered clackers. Dave Jensen carried earplugs. Most often, before blowing the tunnels, they were ordered by higher command to search them, which was considered bad news, but by and large they just shrugged and carried out orders. Because he was a big man, Henry Dobbins was excused from tunnel duty. The others would draw numbers. Before Lavender died there were seventeen men in the platoon, and whoever drew the number seventeen would strip off his gear and crawl in headfirst with a flashlight and Lieutenant Cross's .45-caliber pistol. The rest of them would fan out as security. They would sit down or kneel, not facing the hole, listening to the ground beneath them, imagining cobwebs and ghosts, whatever was down there—the tunnel walls squeezing in—how the flashlight seemed impossibly heavy in the hand and how it was tunnel vision in the very strictest sense, compression in all ways, even time, and how you had to wiggle in—ass and elbows—a swallowed-up feeling—and how you found yourself worrying about odd things—will your flashlight go dead? Do rats carry rabies? If you screamed, how far would the sound carry? Would your buddies hear it? Would they have the courage to drag you out? In some respects, though not many, the waiting was worse than the tunnel itself. Imagination was a killer.

On April 16, when Lee Strunk drew the number seventeen, he laughed and muttered something and went down quickly. The morning was hot and very still. Not good, Kiowa said. He looked at the tunnel opening, then out across a dry paddy toward the village of Than Khe. Nothing moved. No clouds or birds or people. As they waited, the men smoked and drank Kool-Aid, not talking much, feeling sympathy for Lee Strunk but also feeling the luck of the draw. You win some, you lose some, said Mitchell Sanders, and sometimes you settle for a rain check. It was a tired line and no one laughed.

20 Henry Dobbins ate a tropical chocolate bar. Ted Lavender popped a tranquilizer and went off to pee.

After five minutes, Lieutenant Jimmy Cross moved to the tunnel, leaned down, and examined the darkness. Trouble, he thought—a cave-in maybe. And then suddenly, without willing it, he was thinking about Martha. The stresses and fractures, the quick collapse, the two of them buried alive under all that weight. Dense, crushing love. Kneeling, watching the hole, he tried to concentrate on Lee Strunk and the war, all the dangers, but his love was too much for him, he felt paralyzed, he wanted to sleep inside her lungs and breathe her blood and be smothered. He wanted her to be a virgin and not a virgin, all at once. He wanted to know her. Intimate secrets—why poetry? Why so sad? Why that grayness in her eyes? Why so alone? Not lonely, just alone—riding her bike across campus or sitting off by herself in the cafeteria. Even dancing, she danced alone—and it was the aloneness that filled him with love. He remembered telling her that one evening. How she nodded and looked away.

And how, later, when he kissed her, she received the kiss without returning it, her eyes wide open, not afraid, not a virgin's eyes, just flat and uninvolved.

Lieutenant Cross gazed at the tunnel. But he was not there. He was buried with Martha under the white sand at the Jersey shore. They were pressed together, and the pebble in his mouth was her tongue. He was smiling. Vaguely, he was aware of how quiet the day was, the sullen paddies, yet he could not bring himself to worry about matters of security. He was beyond that. He was just a kid at war, in love. He was twenty-two years old. He couldn't help it.

A few minutes later Lee Strunk crawled out of the tunnel. He came up grinning, filthy but alive. Lieutenant Cross nodded and closed his eyes while the others clapped Strunk on the back and made jokes about rising from the dead.

Worms, Rat Kiley said. Right out of the grave. Fuckin' zombie.

25 The men laughed. They all felt great relief.

Spook City, said Mitchell Sanders.

Lee Strunk made a funny ghost sound, a kind of moaning, yet very happy, and right then, when Strunk made that high happy moaning sound, when he went Ah-hooooo, right then Ted Lavender was shot in the head on his way back from peeing. He lay with his mouth open. The teeth were broken. There was a swollen black bruise under his left eye. The cheekbone was gone. Oh shit, Rat Kiley said, the guy's dead. The guy's dead, he kept saying, which seemed profound—the guy's dead. I mean really.

The things they carried were determined to some extent by superstition. Lieutenant Cross carried his good-luck pebble. Dave Jensen carried a rabbit's foot. Norman Bowker, otherwise a very gentle person, carried a thumb that had been presented to him as a gift by Mitchell Sanders. The thumb was dark brown, rubbery to the touch, and weighed four ounces at most. It had been cut from a VC corpse, a boy of fifteen or sixteen. They'd found him at the bottom of an irrigation ditch, badly burned, flies in his mouth and eyes. They boy wore black shorts and sandals. At the time of his death he had been carrying a pouch of rice, a rifle, and three magazines of ammunition.

You want my opinion, Mitchell Sanders said, there's a definite moral here.

30 He put his hand on the dead boy's wrist. He was quiet for a time, as if counting a pulse, then he patted the stomach, almost affectionately, and used Kiowa's hunting hatchet to remove the thumb.

Henry Dobbins asked what the moral was.

Moral?

You know. Moral.

Sanders wrapped the thumb in toilet paper and handed it across to Norman Bowker. There was no blood. Smiling, he kicked the boy's head, watched the flies scatter, and said, It's like with that old TV show—Paladin. Have gun, will travel.

35 Henry Dobbins thought about it.

Yeah, well, he finally said. I don't see no moral.

There it is, man.

Fuck off.

They carried USO stationery and pencils and pens. They carried Sterno, safety pins, trip flares, signal flares, spools of wire, razor blades, chewing tobacco, liberated joss sticks and statuettes of the smiling Buddha, candles, grease pencils, The Stars and Stripes, fingernail clippers, Psy Ops leaflets, bush hats, bolos, and much more. Twice a week, when the resupply choppers came in, they carried hot chow in green Mermite cans and large canvas bags filled with iced beer and soda pop. They carried plastic water containers, each with a two gallon capacity. Mitchell

Sanders carried a set of starched tiger fatigues for special occasions. Henry Dobbins carried Black Flag insecticide. Dave Jensen carried empty sandbags that could be filled at night for added protection. Lee Strunk carried tanning lotion. Some things they carried in common. Taking turns, they carried the big PRC-77 scrambler radio, which weighed thirty pounds with its battery. They shared the weight of memory. They took up what others could no longer bear. Often, they carried each other, the wounded or weak. They carried infections. They carried chess sets, basketballs, Vietnamese-English dictionaries, insignia of rank, Bronze Stars and Purple Hearts, plastic cards imprinted with the Code of Conduct. They carried diseases, among them malaria and dysentery. They carried lice and ringworm and leeches and paddy algae and various rots and molds. They carried the land itself—Vietnam, the place, the soil—a powdery orange-red dust that covered their boots and fatigues and faces. They carried the sky. The whole atmosphere, they carried it, the humidity, the monsoons, the stink of fungus and decay, all of it, they carried gravity. They moved like mules. By daylight they took sniper fire, at night they were mortared, but it was not battle, it was just the endless march, village to village, without purpose, nothing won or lost. They marched for the sake of the march. They plodded along slowly, dumbly, leaning forward against the heat, unthinking, all blood and bone, simple grunts, soldiering with their legs, toiling up the hills and down into the paddies and across the rivers and up again and down, just humping, one step and then the next and then another, but no volition, no will, because it was automatic, it was anatomy, and the war was entirely a matter of posture and carriage, the hump was everything, a kind of inertia, a kind of emptiness, a dullness of desire and intellect and conscience and hope and human sensibility. Their principles were in their feet. Their calculations were biological. They had no sense of strategy or mission. They searched the villages without knowing what to look for, nor caring, kicking over jars of rice, frisking children and old men, blowing tunnels, sometimes setting fires and sometimes not, then forming up and moving on to the next village, then other villages, where it would always be the same. They carried their own lives. The pressures were enormous. In the heat of early afternoon, they would remove their helmets and flak jackets, walking bare, which was dangerous but which helped ease the strain. They would often discard things along the route of march. Purely for comfort, they would throw away rations, blow their Claymores and grenades, no matter, because by nightfall the resupply choppers would arrive with more of the same, then a day or two later still more, fresh watermelons and crates of ammunition and sunglasses and woolen sweaters—the resources were stunning—sparklers for the Fourth of July, colored eggs for Easter. It was the great American war chest—the fruits of sciences, the smokestacks, the canneries, the arsenals at Hartford, the Minnesota forests, the machine shops, the vast fields of corn and wheat—they carried like freight trains; they carried it on their backs and shoulders—and for all the ambiguities of Vietnam, all the mysteries and unknowns, there was at least the single abiding certainty that they would never be at a loss for things to carry.

40 After the chopper took Lavender away, Lieutenant Jimmy Cross led his men into the village of Than Khe. They burned everything. They shot chickens and dogs, they trashed the village well, they called in artillery and watched the wreckage, then they marched for several hours through the hot afternoon, and then at dusk, while Kiowa explained how Lavender died, Lieutenant Cross found himself trembling.

He tried not to cry. With his entrenching tool, which weighed five pounds, he began digging a hole in the earth.

He felt shame. He hated himself. He had loved Martha more than his men, and as a consequence Lavender was now dead, and this was something he would have to carry like a stone in his stomach for the rest of the war.

All he could do was dig. He used his entrenching tool like an ax, slashing, feeling both love and hate, and then later, when it was full dark, he sat at the bottom of his foxhole and wept. It went on for a long while. In part, he was grieving for Ted Lavender, but mostly it was for Martha, and for himself, because she belonged to another world, which was not quite real, and because she was a junior at Mount Sebastian College in New Jersey, a poet and a virgin and uninvolved, and because he realized she did not love him and never would.

Like cement, Kiowa whispered in the dark. I swear to God—boom-down. Not a word.

45 I've heard this, said Norman Bowker.

A pisser, you know? Still zipping himself up. Zapped while zipping.

All right, fine. That's enough.

Yeah, but you had to see it, the guy just—

I heard, man. Cement. So why not shut the fuck up?

50 Kiowa shook his head sadly and glanced over at the hole where Lieutenant Jimmy Cross sat watching the night. The air was thick and wet. A warm, dense fog had settled over the paddies and there was the stillness that precedes rain.

After a time Kiowa sighed.

One thing for sure, he said. The lieutenant's in some deep hurt. I mean that crying jag—the way he was carrying on—it wasn't fake or anything, it was real heavy-duty hurt. The man cares.

Sure, Norman Bowker said.

Say what you want, the man does care.

55 We all got problems.

Not Lavender.

No, I guess not, Bowker said. Do me a favor, though.

Shut up?

That's a smart Indian. Shut up.

60 Shrugging, Kiowa pulled off his boots. He wanted to say more, just to lighten up his sleep, but instead he opened his New Testament and arranged it beneath his head as a pillow. The fog made things seem hollow and unattached. He tried not to think about Ted Lavender, but then he was thinking how fast it was, no drama, down and dead, and how it was hard to feel anything except surprise. It seemed unchristian. He wished he could find some great sadness, or even anger, but the emotion wasn't there and he couldn't make it happen. Mostly he felt pleased to be alive. He liked the smell of the New Testament under his cheek, the leather and ink and paper and glue, whatever the chemicals were. He liked hearing the sounds of night. Even his fatigue, it felt fine, the stiff muscles and the prickly awareness of his own body, a floating feeling. He enjoyed not being dead. Lying there, Kiowa admired Lieutenant Jimmy Cross's capacity for grief. He wanted to share the man's pain, he wanted to care as Jimmy Cross cared. And yet when he closed his eyes, all he could think was Boom-down, and all he could feel was the pleasure of having his boots off and the fog curling in around him and damp soil and the Bible smells and the plush comfort of night.

After a moment Norman Bowker sat up in the dark.

What the hell, he said. You want to talk, talk. Tell it to me.

Forget it.

No, man, go on. One thing I hate, it's a silent Indian.

65 For the most part they carried themselves with poise, a kind of dignity. Now and then, however, there were times of panic, when they squealed or wanted to squeal but couldn't, when they twitched and made moaning sounds and covered their heads and said Dear Jesus and flopped around on the earth and fired their weapons blindly and cringed and sobbed and begged for the noise to stop and went wild and made stupid promises to themselves and to God and to their mothers and fathers, hoping not to die. In different ways, it happened to all of them. Afterward, when the firing ended, they would blink and peek up. They would touch their bodies, feeling shame, then quickly hiding it. They would force themselves to stand. As if in slow motion, frame by frame, the world would take on the old logic—absolute silence, then the wind, then sunlight, then voices. It was the burden of being alive. Awkwardly, the men would reassemble themselves, first in private, then in groups, becoming soldiers again. They would repair the leaks in their eyes. They would check for casualties, call in dust-offs, light cigarettes, try to smile, clear their throats and spit and begin cleaning their weapons. After a time someone would shake his head and say, No lie, I almost shit my pants, and someone else would laugh, which meant it was bad, yes, but the guy had obviously not shit his pants, it wasn't that bad, and in any case nobody would ever do such a thing and then go ahead and talk about it. They would squint into the dense, oppressive sunlight. For a few moments, perhaps, they would fall silent, lighting a joint and tracking its passage from man to man, inhaling, holding in the humiliation. Scary stuff, one of them might say. But then someone else would grin or flick his eyebrows and say, Roger-dodger, almost cut me a new asshole, almost.

There were numerous such poses. Some carried themselves with a sort of wistful resignation, others with pride or still soldierly discipline or good humor or macho zeal. They were afraid of dying but they were even more afraid to show it.

They found jokes to tell.

They used a hard vocabulary to contain the terrible softness. Greased, they'd say. Offed, lit up, zapped while zipping. It wasn't cruelty, just stage presence. They were actors and the war came at them in 3-D. When someone died, it wasn't quite dying, because in a curious way it seemed scripted, and because they had their lines mostly memorized, irony mixed with tragedy, and because they called it by other names, as if to encyst and destroy the reality of death itself. They kicked corpses. They cut off thumbs. They talked grunt lingo. They told stories about Ted Lavender's supply of tranquilizers, how the poor guy didn't feel a thing, how incredibly tranquil he was.

There's a moral here, said Mitchell Sanders.

70 They were waiting for Lavender's chopper, smoking the dead man's dope.

The moral's pretty obvious, Sanders said, and winked. Stay away from drugs. No joke, they'll ruin your day every time.

Cute, said Henry Dobbins.

Mind-blower, get it? Talk about wiggy—nothing left, just blood and brains.

They made themselves laugh.

75 There it is, they'd say, over and over, as if the repetition itself were an act of poise, a balance between crazy and almost crazy, knowing without going. There it is, which meant be cool, let it ride, because oh yeah, man, you can't change what can't be changed, there it is, there it absolutely and positively and fucking well is.

They were tough.

They carried all the emotional baggage of men who might die. Grief, terror, love, longing—these were intangibles, but the intangibles had their own mass and specific gravity, they had tangible weight. They carried shameful memories. They carried the common secret of cowardice barely restrained, the instinct to run or freeze or hide, and in many respects this was the heaviest burden of all, for it could never be put down, it required perfect balance and perfect posture. They carried their reputations. They carried the soldier's greatest fear, which was the fear of blushing. Men killed, and died, because they were embarrassed not to. It was what had brought them to the war in the first place, nothing positive, no dreams of glory or honor, just to avoid the blush of dishonor. They died so as not to die of embarrassment. They crawled into tunnels and walked point and advanced under fire. Each morning, despite the unknowns, they made their legs move. They endured. They kept humping. They did not submit to the obvious alternative, which was simply to close the eyes and fall. So easy, really. Go limp and tumble to the ground and let the muscles unwind and not speak and not budge until your buddies picked you up and lifted you into the chopper that would roar and dip its nose and carry you off to the world. A mere matter of falling, yet no one ever fell. It was not courage, exactly; the object was not valor. Rather, they were too frightened to be cowards.

By and large they carried these things inside, maintaining the masks of composure. They sneered at sick call. They spoke bitterly about guys who had found release by shooting off their own toes or fingers. Pussies, they'd say. Candyasses. It was fierce, mocking talk, with only a trace of envy or awe, but even so, the image played itself out behind their eyes.

They imagined the muzzle against flesh. They imagined the quick, sweet pain, then the evacuation to Japan, then a hospital with warm beds and cute geisha nurses.

80 They dreamed of freedom birds.

At night, on guard, staring into the dark, they were carried away by jumbo jets. They felt the rush of takeoff. Gone! they yelled. And then velocity, wings and engines, a smiling stewardess—but it was more than a plane, it was a real bird, a big sleek silver bird with feathers and talons and high screeching. They were flying. The weights fell off, there was nothing to bear. They laughed and held on tight, feeling the cold slap of wind and altitude, soaring, thinking It's over, I'm gone!—they were naked, they were light and free—it was all lightness, bright and fast and buoyant, light as light, a helium buzz in the brain, a giddy bubbling in the lungs as they were taken up over the clouds and the war, beyond duty, beyond gravity and mortification and global entanglements—Sin loi![7] They yelled, I'm sorry, motherfuckers, but I'm out of it, I'm goofed, I'm on a space cruise, I'm gone!—and it was a restful, disencumbered sensation, just riding the light waves, sailing that big silver freedom bird over the mountains and oceans, over America, over the farms and great sleeping cities and cemeteries and highways and the Golden Arches of McDonald's. It was flight, a kind of fleeing, a kind of falling, falling higher and higher, spinning off the edge of the earth and beyond the sun and through the vast, silent vacuum where there were no burdens and where everything weighed exactly nothing. Gone! they screamed, I'm sorry but I'm gone! And so at night, not quite dreaming, they gave themselves over to lightness, they were carried, they were purely borne.

On the morning after Ted Lavender died, First Lieutenant Jimmy Cross crouched at the bottom of his foxhole and burned Martha's letters. Then he burned the two photographs. There was a steady rain falling, which made it difficult, but he used heat tabs and Sterno to build a small fire, screening it with his body, holding the photographs over the tight blue flame with the tips of his fingers.

[7] Sin loi sorry.

He realized it was only a gesture. Stupid, he thought. Sentimental, too, but mostly just stupid.

Lavender was dead. You couldn't burn the blame.

Besides, the letters were in his head. And even now, without photographs, Lieutenant Cross could see Martha playing volleyball in her white gym shorts and yellow T-shirt. He could see her moving in the rain.

When the fire died out, Lieutenant Cross pulled his poncho over his shoulders and ate breakfast from a can.

There was no great mystery, he decided.

In those burned letters Martha had never mentioned the war, except to say, Jimmy, take care of yourself. She wasn't involved. She signed the letters "Love," but it wasn't love, and all the fine lines and technicalities did not matter.

The morning came up wet and blurry. Everything seemed part of everything else, the fog and Martha and the deepening rain.

It was a war, after all.

Half smiling, Lieutenant Jimmy Cross took out his maps. He shook his head hard, as if to clear it, then bent forward and began planning the day's march. In ten minutes, or maybe twenty, he would rouse the men and they would pack up and head west, where the maps showed the country to be green and inviting. They would do what they had always done. The rain might add some weight, but otherwise it would be one more day layered upon all the other days.

He was realistic about it. There was the new hardness in his stomach.

No more fantasies, he told himself.

Henceforth, when he thought about Martha, it would be only to think that she belonged elsewhere. He would shut down the daydreams. This was not Mount Sebastian, it was another world, where there were no pretty poems or midterm exams, a place where men died because of carelessness and gross stupidity. Kiowa was right. Boom-down, and you were dead, never partly dead.

Briefly, in the rain, Lieutenant Cross saw Martha's gray eyes gazing back at him.

He understood.

It was very sad, he thought. The things men carried inside. The things men did or felt they had to do.

He almost nodded at her, but didn't.

Instead he went back to his maps. He was now determined to perform his duties firmly and without negligence. It wouldn't help Lavender, he knew that, but from this point on he would comport himself as a soldier. He would dispose of his good-luck pebble. Swallow it, maybe, or use Lee Strunk's slingshot, or just drop it along the trail. On the march he would impose strict field discipline. He would be careful to send out flank security, to prevent straggling or bunching up, to keep his troops moving at the proper pace and at the proper interval. He would insist on clean weapons. He would confiscate the remainder of Lavender's dope. Later in the day, perhaps, he would call the men together and speak to them plainly. He would accept the blame for what had happened to Ted Lavender. He would be a man about it. He would look them in the eyes, keeping his chin level, and he would issue the new SOPs in a calm, impersonal tone of voice, an officer's voice, leaving no room for argument or discussion. Commencing immediately, he'd tell them, they would no longer abandon equipment along the route of march. They would police up their acts. They would get their shit together, and keep it together, and maintain it neatly and in good working order.

He would not tolerate laxity. He would show strength, distancing himself.

100 Among the men there would be grumbling, of course, and maybe worse, because their days would seem longer and their loads heavier, but Lieutenant Cross reminded himself that his obligation was not to be loved but to lead. He would dispense with love; it was not now a factor. And if anyone quarreled or complained, he would simply tighten his lips and arrange his shoulders in the correct command posture. He might give a curt little nod. Or he might not. He might just shrug and say Carry on, then they would saddle up and form into a column and move out toward the villages west of Than Khe.

[1986]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. What is the point of the insistent repetition of the words "the things they carried"? What sorts of things does Lieutenant Cross carry?
2. We are told that "Kiowa admired Lieutenant Jimmy Cross's capacity for grief" (paragraph 60). But we are also told that, although Kiowa "wanted to share the man's pain," he could think only of "Boom-down" and of "the pleasure of having his boots off and the fog curling in around him and damp soil and the Bible smells and the plush comfort of night." What might account for the different responses of the two men?
3. Near the end of the story (paragraph 82), Lieutenant Cross "burned the two photographs." Why does he do this?

Gabriel García Márquez

Gabriel García Márquez (1928–2014) was born in Aracataca, a small village in Colombia. After being educated in Bogotá, where he studied journalism and law, he worked as a journalist in Latin America, Europe, and the United States. He began writing fiction when he was in Paris, and when he was twenty-seven years old, he published his first novel, La hojarasca *(*Leaf Storm, 1955). During most of the 1960s, he lived in Mexico, where he wrote film scripts and the novel that made him famous: Cien años de soledad (1967, translated in 1970 as A Hundred Years of Solitude*). In 1982, García Márquez was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature.*

A Very Old Man with Enormous Wings: A Tale for Children

Translated by Gregory Rabassa

On the third day of rain they had killed so many crabs inside the house that Pelayo had to cross his drenched courtyard and throw them into the sea, because the newborn child had a temperature all night and they thought it was due to the stench. The world had been sad since Tuesday. Sea and sky were a single ash-gray thing and the sands of the beach, which on March nights glimmered like powdered light, had become a stew of mud and rotten shellfish. The light was so weak at noon that when Pelayo was coming back to the house after throwing away the crabs, it was hard for him to see what it was that was moving and groaning in the rear of the courtyard. He had to go very close to see that it was an old man, a very old man, lying face down in the mud, who, in spite of his tremendous efforts, couldn't get up, impeded by his enormous wings.

Frightened by that nightmare, Pelayo ran to get Elisenda, his wife, who was putting compresses on the sick child, and he took her to the rear of the courtyard. They both looked at the fallen body with mute stupor. He was dressed like a rag-picker. There were only a few faded hairs left on his bald skull and very few teeth in his mouth, and his pitiful condition of a drenched great-grandfather had taken away any sense of grandeur he might have had. His huge buzzard wings, dirty and half-plucked, were forever entangled in the mud. They looked at him so long and so closely that Pelayo and Elisenda very soon overcame their surprise and in the end found him familiar. Then they dared speak to him, and he answered in an incomprehensible dialect with a strong sailor's voice. That was how they skipped over the inconvenience of the wings and quite intelligently concluded that he was a lonely castaway from some foreign ship wrecked by the storm. And yet, they called in a neighbor woman who knew everything about life and death to see him, and all she needed was one look to show them their mistake.

"He's an angel," she told them. "He must have been coming for the child, but the poor fellow is so old that the rain knocked him down."

On the following day everyone knew that a flesh-and-blood angel was held captive in Pelayo's house. Against the judgment of the wise neighbor woman, for whom angels in those times were the fugitive survivors of a celestial conspiracy, they did not have the heart to club him to death. Pelayo watched over him all afternoon from the kitchen, armed with his bailiff's club, and before going to bed he dragged him out of the mud and locked him up with the hens in the wire chicken coop. In the middle of the night, when the rain stopped, Pelayo and Elisenda were still killing crabs. A short time afterward the child woke up without a fever and with a desire to eat. Then they felt magnanimous and decided to put the angel on a raft with fresh water and provisions for three days and leave him to his fate on the high seas. But when they went out into the courtyard with the first light of dawn, they found the whole neighborhood in front of the chicken coop having fun with the angel, without the slightest reverence, tossing him things to eat through the openings in the wire as if he weren't a supernatural creature but a circus animal.

5 Father Gonzaga arrived before seven o'clock, alarmed at the strange news. By that time onlookers less frivolous than those at dawn had already arrived and they were making all kinds of conjectures concerning the captive's future. The simplest among them thought that he should be named mayor of the world. Others of sterner mind felt that he should be promoted to the rank of five-star general in order to win all wars. Some visionaries hoped that he could be put to stud in order to implant on earth a race of winged wise men who could take charge of the universe. But Father Gonzaga, before becoming a priest, had been a robust woodcutter. Standing by the wire, he reviewed his catechism in an instant and asked them to open the door so that he could take a close look at that pitiful man who looked more like a huge decrepit hen among the fascinated chickens. He was lying in a corner drying his open wings in the sunlight among the fruit peels and breakfast leftovers that the early risers had thrown him. Alien to the impertinences of the world, he only lifted his antiquarian eyes and murmured something in his dialect when Father Gonzaga went into the chicken coop and said good morning to him in Latin. The parish priest had his first suspicion of an imposter when he saw that he did not understand the language of God or know how to greet His ministers. Then he noticed that seen close up he was much too human: he had an unbearable smell of the outdoors, the back side of his wings was strewn with parasites and his main feathers had been mistreated by terrestrial winds, and nothing about him measured up to the proud dignity of angels. Then he came out of the chicken coop and in a brief sermon warned the curious against the risks of being ingenuous. He reminded them that the devil had the bad habit of making use of carnival tricks in order to confuse the unwary. He argued that if wings were not the essential element in determining the difference between a hawk and an airplane, they were even less so in the recognition of angels. Nevertheless, he promised to write a letter to his bishop so that the latter would write to his primate so that the latter would write to the Supreme Pontiff in order to get the final verdict from the highest courts.

His prudence fell on sterile hearts. The news of the captive angel spread with such rapidity that after a few hours the courtyard had the bustle of a marketplace and they had to call in troops with fixed bayonets to disperse the mob that was about to knock the house down. Elisenda, her spine all twisted from sweeping up so much marketplace trash, then got the idea of fencing in the yard and charging five cents admission to see the angel.

The curious came from far away. A traveling carnival arrived with a flying acrobat who buzzed over the crowd several times, but no one paid any attention to him because his wings were not those of an angel but, rather, those of a sideral bat. The most unfortunate invalids on earth came in search of health: a poor woman who since childhood had been counting her heartbeats and had run out of numbers; a Portuguese man who couldn't sleep because the noise of the stars disturbed him; a sleepwalker who got up at night to undo the things he had done while awake; and many others with less serious ailments. In the midst of that shipwreck disorder that made the earth tremble, Pelayo and Elisenda were happy with fatigue, for in less than a week they had crammed their rooms with money and the line of pilgrims waiting their turn to enter still reached beyond the horizon.

The angel was the only one who took no part in his own act. He spent his time trying to get comfortable in his borrowed nest, befuddled by the hellish heat of the oil lamps and sacramental candles that had been placed along the wire. At first they tried to make him eat some mothballs, which, according to the wisdom of the wise neighbor woman, were the food prescribed for angels. But he turned them down, just as he turned down the papal lunches that the penitents brought him, and they never found out whether it was because he was an angel or because he was an old man that in the end he ate nothing but eggplant mush. His only supernatural virtue seemed to be patience. Especially during the first days, when the hens pecked at him, searching for the stellar parasites that proliferated in his wings, and the cripples pulled out feathers to touch their defective parts with, and even the most merciful threw stones at him, trying to get him to rise so they could see him standing. The only time they succeeded in arousing him was when they burned his side with an iron for branding steers, for he had been motionless for so many hours that they thought he was dead. He awoke with a start, ranting in his hermetic language and with tears in his eyes, and he flapped his wings a couple of times, which brought on a whirlwind of chicken dung and lunar dust and a gale of panic that did not seem to be of this world. Although many thought that his reaction had been one not of rage but of pain, from then on they were careful not to annoy him, because the majority understood that his passivity was not that of a hero taking his ease but that of a cataclysm in repose.

Father Gonzaga held back the crowd's frivolity with formulas of maidservant inspiration while awaiting the arrival of a final judgment on the nature of the captive. But the mail from Rome showed no sense of urgency. They spent their time finding out if the prisoner had a navel, if his dialect had any connection with Aramaic, how many times he could fit on the head of a pin, or whether he wasn't just a Norwegian with wings. Those meager letters might have come and gone until the end of time if a providential event had not put an end to the priest's tribulations.

10 It so happened that during those days, among so many other carnival attractions, there arrived in town the traveling show of the woman who had been changed into a spider for having disobeyed her parents. The admission to see her was not only less than the admission to see the angel, but people were permitted to ask her all manner of questions about her absurd state and to examine her up and down so that no one would ever doubt the truth of her horror. She was a frightful tarantula the size of a ram and with the head of a sad maiden. What was most heart-rending, however, was not her outlandish shape but the sincere affliction with which she recounted the details of her misfortune. While still practically a child she had sneaked out of her parents' house to go to a dance, and while she was coming back through the woods after having danced all night without permission, a fearful thunderclap rent the sky in two and through the crack came the lightning bolt of brimstone that changed her into a spider. Her only nourishment came from the meatballs that charitable souls chose to toss into her mouth. A spectacle like that, full of so much human truth and with such a fearful lesson, was bound to defeat without even trying that of a haughty angel who scarcely deigned to look at mortals. Besides, the few miracles attributed to the angel showed a certain mental disorder, like the blind man who didn't recover his sight but grew three new teeth, or the paralytic who didn't get to walk but almost won the lottery, and the leper whose sores sprouted sunflowers. Those consolation miracles, which were more like mocking fun, had already ruined the angel's reputation when the woman who had been changed into a spider finally crushed him completely. That was how Father Gonzaga was cured forever of his insomnia and Pelayo's courtyard went back to being as empty as during the time it had rained for three days and crabs walked through the bedrooms. The owners of the house had no reason to lament. With the money they saved they built a two-story mansion with balconies and gardens and high netting so that crabs wouldn't get in during the winter, and with iron bars on the windows so that angels couldn't get in. Pelayo also set up a rabbit warren close to town and gave up his job as bailiff for good, and Elisenda bought some satin pumps with high heels and many dresses of iridescent silk, the kind worn on Sunday by the most desirable women in those times. The chicken coop was the only thing that didn't receive any attention. If they washed it down with creolin and burned tears of myrrh inside it every so often, it was not in homage to the angel but to drive away the dungheap stench that still hung everywhere like a ghost and was turning the new house into an old one. At first, when the child learned to walk, they were careful that he not get too close to the chicken coop. But then they began to lose their fears and got used to the smell, and before the child got his second teeth he'd gone inside the chicken coop to play, where the wires were falling apart. The angel was no less standoffish with him than with other mortals, but he tolerated the most ingenious infamies with the patience of a dog who had no illusions. They both came down with chicken pox at the same time. The doctor who took care of the child couldn't resist the temptation to listen to the angel's heart, and he found so much whistling in the heart and so many sounds in his kidneys that it seemed impossible for him to be alive. What surprised him most, however, was the logic of his wings. They seemed so natural on that completely human organism that he couldn't understand why other men didn't have them too.

When the child began school it had been some time since the sun and rain had caused the collapse of the chicken coop. The angel went dragging himself about here and there like a stray dying man. They would drive him out of the bedroom with a broom and a moment later find him in the kitchen. He seemed to be in so many places at the same time that they grew to think that he'd been duplicated, that he was reproducing himself all through the house, and the exasperated and unhinged Elisenda shouted that it was awful living in that hell full of angels. He could scarcely eat and his antiquarian eyes had also become so foggy that he went about bumping into posts. All he had left were the bare cannulae[1] of his last feathers. Pelayo threw a blanket over him and extended him the charity of letting him sleep in the shed, and only then did they notice that he had a temperature at night, and was delirious with the tongue twisters of an old Norwegian. That was one of the few times they became alarmed, for they thought he was going to die and not even the wise neighbor woman had been able to tell them what to do with dead angels.

And yet he not only survived his worst winter, but seemed improved with the first sunny days. He remained motionless for several days in the farthest corner of the courtyard, where no one would see him, and at the beginning of December some large, stiff feathers began to grow on his wings, the feathers of a scarecrow, which looked more like another misfortune of decrepitude. But he must have known the reason for those changes, for he was quite careful that no one should notice them, that no one should hear the sea chanteys that he sometimes sang under the stars. One morning Elisenda was cutting some bunches of onions for lunch when a wind that seemed to come from the high seas blew into the kitchen. Then she went to the window and caught the angel in his first attempts at flight. They were so clumsy that his fingernails opened a furrow in the vegetable patch and he was on the point of knocking the shed down with the ungainly flapping that slipped on the light and couldn't get a grip on the air. But he did manage to gain altitude. Elisenda let out a sigh of relief, for herself and for him, when she saw him pass over the last houses, holding himself up in some way with the risky flapping of a senile vulture. She kept watching him even when she was through cutting the onions and she kept on watching until it was no longer possible for her to see him, because then he was no longer an annoyance in her life but an imaginary dot on the horizon of the sea.

[1968]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. The subtitle is "A Tale for Children." Do you think that the story is more suited to children than to adults? What in the story do you think children would especially like, or dislike?
2. Is the story chiefly about the inability of adults to perceive and respect the miraculous world?
3. Characterize the narrator of the story.
4. Characterize Pelayo, Elisenda, their son, and the man with wings.

[1]cannulae from a Latin word meaning small reed or pipe; a narrow tube for draining off fluid, introducing medication, etc.

An Author in Depth: Flannery O'Connor

Flannery O'Connor

Flannery O'Connor (1925–64)—her first name was Mary but she did not use it—was born in Savannah, Georgia, but spent most of her life in Milledgeville, Georgia, where her family moved when she was twelve years old. She was educated in parochial schools and at the local college, and then went to the School for Writers at the University of Iowa, where she earned an MFA in 1946. For a few months, she lived at a writers' colony in Saratoga Springs, New York, and then for a few weeks, she lived in New York City, but most of her life was spent in Milledgeville, where she tended her peacocks and wrote stories, novels, essays (posthumously published as Mystery and Manners [1970]), and letters (posthumously published under the title The Habit of Being [1979]).

In 1951, when she was twenty-five years old, Flannery O'Connor discovered that she had lupus erythematosus, an incurable autoimmune disease that had crippled and then killed her father ten years before. She died at the age of thirty-nine. O'Connor faced her illness with stoic courage, Christian fortitude, and tough humor. Here is a glimpse, from one of her letters, of how she dealt with those who pitied her:

> An old lady got on the elevator behind me and as soon as I turned around she fixed me with a moist gleaming eye and said in a loud voice, "Bless you, darling!" I felt exactly like the Misfit [in "A Good Man Is Hard to Find"] and I gave her a weakly lethal look, whereupon greatly encouraged she grabbed my arm and whispered (very loud) in my ear, "Remember what they said to John at the gate, darling!" It was not my floor but I got off and I suppose the old lady was astounded at how quick I could get away on crutches. I have a one-legged friend and I asked her what they said to John at the gate. She said she reckoned they said, "The lame shall enter first." This may be because the lame will be able to knock everybody else aside with their crutches.

A devout Catholic, O'Connor forthrightly summarized the relationship between her belief and her writing:

> I see from the standpoint of Christian orthodoxy. This means that for me the meaning of life is centered in our Redemption by Christ and what I see in the world I see in its relation to that.

A Good Man Is Hard to Find

The grandmother didn't want to go to Florida. She wanted to visit some of her connections in east Tennessee and she was seizing every chance to change Bailey's mind. Bailey was the son she lived with, her only boy. He was sitting on the edge of his chair at the table, bent over the orange sports section of the Journal. "Now look here, Bailey," she said, "see here, read this," and she stood with one hand on her thin hip and the other rattling the newspaper at his bald head. "Here this fellow that calls himself The Misfit is aloose from the Federal Pen and headed toward Florida and you read here what it says he did to these people. Just you read it. I wouldn't take my children in any direction with a criminal like that aloose in it. I couldn't answer to my conscience if I did."

Bailey didn't look up from his reading so she wheeled around then and faced the children's mother, a young woman in slacks, whose face was as broad and innocent as a cabbage and was tied around with a green headkerchief that had two points on the top like rabbit's ears. She was sitting on the sofa, feeding the baby his apricots out of a jar. "The children have been to Florida before," the old lady said. "You all ought to take them somewhere else for a change so they would see different parts of the world and be broad. They never have been to east Tennessee."

The children's mother didn't seem to hear her, but the eight-year-old boy, John Wesley, a stocky child with glasses, said. "If you don't want to go to Florida, why dontcha stay at home?" He and the little girl, June Star, were reading the funny papers on the floor.

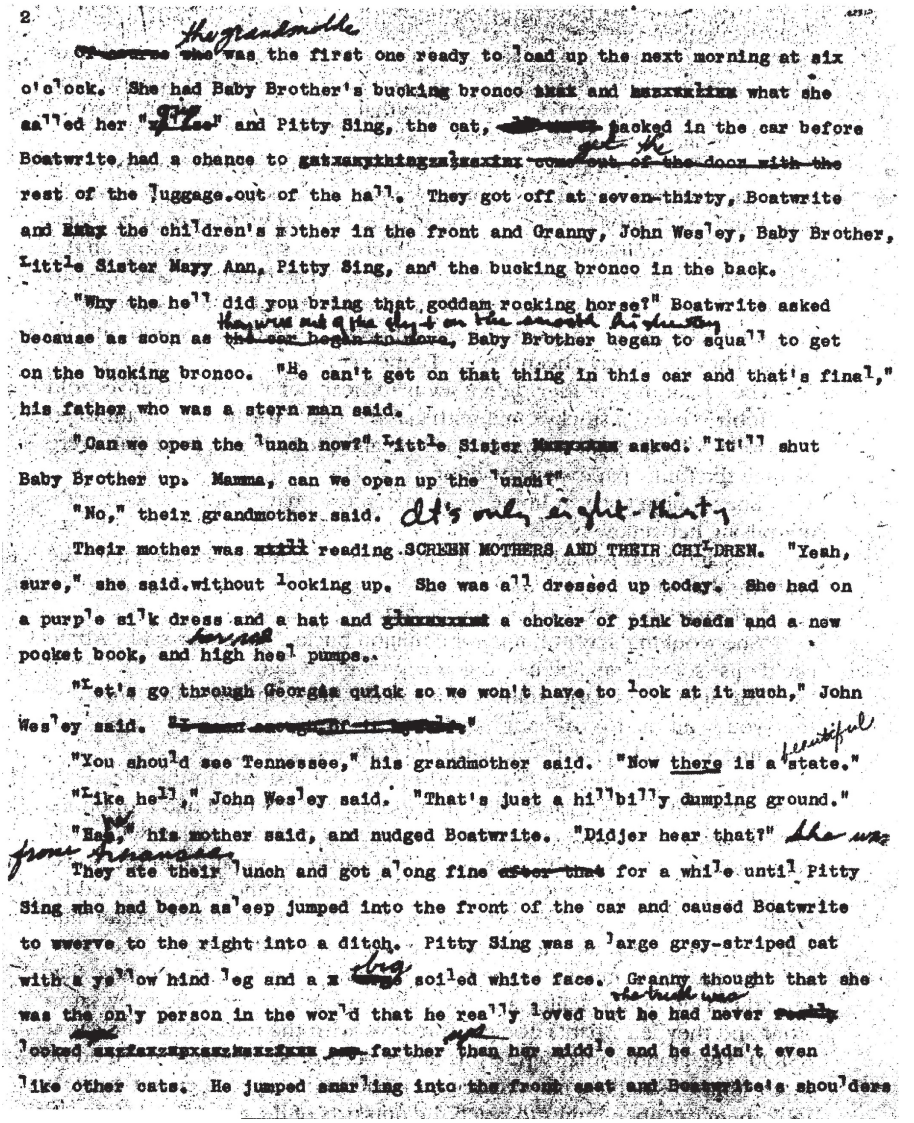
"She wouldn't stay at home to be queen for a day," June Star said without raising her yellow head.

5 "Yes, and what would you do if this fellow, The Misfit, caught you?" the grandmother said.

"I'd smack his face," John Wesley said.

"She wouldn't stay at home for a million bucks," June Star said. "Afraid she'd miss something. She has to go everywhere we go."

"All right, Miss," the grandmother said. "Just remember that the next time you want me to curl your hair."



June Star said her hair was naturally curly.

10 The next morning the grandmother was the first one in the car, ready to go. She had her big black valise that looked like the head of a hippopotamus in one corner, and underneath it she was hiding a basket with Pitty Sing, the cat, in it. She didn't intend for the cat to be left alone in the house for three days because he would miss her too much and she was afraid he might brush against one of the gas burners and accidentally asphyxiate himself. Her son, Bailey, didn't like to arrive at a motel with a cat.

She sat in the middle of the back seat with John Wesley and June Star on either side of her. Bailey and the children's mother and the baby sat in front and they left Atlanta at eight forty-five with the mileage on the car at 55890. The grandmother wrote this down because she thought it would be interesting to say how many miles they had been when they got back. It took them twenty minutes to reach the outskirts of the city.

The old lady settled herself comfortably, removing her white cotton gloves and putting them up with her purse on the shelf in front of the back window. The children's mother still had on slacks and still had her head tied up in a green kerchief, but the grandmother had on a navy blue straw sailor hat with a bunch of white violets on the brim and a navy blue dress with a small white dot in the print. Her collars and cuffs were white organdy trimmed with lace and at her neckline she had pinned a purple spray of cloth violets containing a sachet. In case of an accident, anyone seeing her dead on the highway would know at once that she was a lady.

She said she thought it was going to be a good day for driving, neither too hot nor too cold, and she cautioned Bailey that the speed limit was fifty-five miles an hour and that the patrolmen hid themselves behind bill-boards and small clumps of trees and sped out after you before you had a chance to slow down. She pointed out interesting details of the scenery: Stone Mountain; the blue granite that in some places came up to both sides of the highway; the brilliant red clay banks slightly streaked with purple; and the various crops that made rows of green lace-work on the ground. The trees were full of silver-white sunlight and the meanest of them sparkled. The children were reading comic magazines and their mother had gone back to sleep.

Typescript page from "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," with O'Connor's handwritten changes.

"Let's go through Georgia fast so we won't have to look at it much," John Wesley said.

15 "If I were a little boy," said the grandmother, "I wouldn't talk about my native state that way. Tennessee has the mountains and Georgia has the hills."

"Tennessee is just a hillbilly dumping ground," John Wesley said, "and Georgia is a lousy state too."

"You said it," June Star said.

"In my time," said the grandmother, folding her thin veined fingers, "children were more respectful of their native states and their parents and everything else. People did right then. Oh look at the cute little pickaninny!" she said and pointed to a Negro child standing in the door of a shack. "Wouldn't that make a picture, now?" she asked and they all turned and looked at the little Negro out of the back window. He waved.

"He didn't have any britches on," June Star said.

20 "He probably didn't have any," the grandmother explained. "Little niggers in the country don't have things like we do. If I could paint, I'd paint that picture," she said.

The children exchanged comic books.

The grandmother offered to hold the baby and the children's mother passed him over the front seat to her. She set him on her knee and bounced him and told him about the things they were passing. She rolled her eyes and screwed up her mouth and stuck her leathery thin face into his smooth bland one. Occasionally he gave her a faraway smile. They passed a large cotton field with five or six graves fenced in the middle of it, like a small island. "Look at the graveyard!" the grandmother said, pointing it out. "That was the old family burying ground. That belonged to the plantation." "Where's the plantation?" John Wesley asked.

"Gone With the Wind,"[1] said the grandmother. "Ha. Ha."

25 When the children finished all the comic books they had brought, they opened the lunch and ate it. The grandmother ate a peanut butter sandwich and an olive and would not let the children throw the box and the paper napkins out the window. When there was nothing else to do they played a game by choosing a cloud and making the other two guess what shape it suggested. John Wesley took one the shape of a cow and June Star guessed a cow and John Wesley said, no, an automobile, and June Star said he didn't play fair, and they began to slap each other over the grandmother.

The grandmother said she would tell them a story if they would keep quiet. When she told a story, she rolled her eyes and waved her head and was very dramatic. She said once when she was a maiden lady she had been courted by a Mr. Edgar Atkins Teagarden from Jasper, Georgia. She said he was a very good-looking man and a gentleman and that he brought her a watermelon every Saturday afternoon with his initials cut in it, E.A.T. Well, one Saturday, she said, Mr. Teagarden brought the watermelon and there was nobody at home and he left it on the front porch and returned in his buggy to Jasper, but she never got the watermelon, she said, because a nigger boy ate it when he saw the initials, E.A.T.! This story tickled John Wesley's funny bone and he giggled and giggled but June Star didn't think it was any good. She said she wouldn't marry a man that just brought her a watermelon on Saturday. The grandmother said she would have done well to marry Mr. Teagarden because he was a gentleman and had bought Coca-Cola stock when it first came out and that he had died only a few years ago, a very wealthy man.

They stopped at The Tower for barbecued sandwiches. The Tower was a part-stucco and part-wood filling station and dance hall set in a clearing outside of Timothy. A fat man named Red Sammy Butts ran it and there were signs stuck here and there on the building and for miles up and down the highway saying, TRY RED

[1]Gone With the Wind a 1939 film about the plantation South and the Civil War that was adapted from Margaret Mitchell's 1936 novel of the same name.

SAMMY'S FAMOUS BARBECUE. NONE LIKE FAMOUS RED SAMMY'S! RED SAM! THE FAT BOY WITH THE HAPPY LAUGH. A VETERAN! RED SAMMY'S YOUR MAN!

Red Sammy was lying on the bare ground outside The Tower with his head under a truck while a gray monkey about a foot high, chained to a small china-berry tree, chattered nearby. The monkey sprang back into the tree and got on the highest limb as soon as he saw the children jump out of the car and run toward him.

Inside, The Tower was a long dark room with a counter at one end and tables at the other and dancing space in the middle. They all sat down at a broad table next to the nickelodeon and Red Sam's wife, a tall burnt-brown woman with hair and eyes lighter than her skin, came and took their order. The children's mother put a dime in the machine and played "The Tennessee Waltz," and the grandmother said that tune always made her want to dance. She asked Bailey if he would like to dance but he only glared at her. He didn't have a naturally sunny disposition like she did and trips made him nervous. The grandmother's brown eyes were very bright. She swayed her head from side to side and pretended she was dancing in her chair. June Star said play something she could tap to so the children's mother put in another dime and played a fast number and June Star stepped out onto the dance floor and did her tap routine.

30 "Ain't she cute?" Red Sam's wife said, leaning over the counter. "Would you like to come be my little girl?"

"No, I certainly wouldn't," June Star said. "I wouldn't live in a broken-down place like this for a million bucks!" and she ran back to the table.

"Ain't she cute?" the woman repeated, stretching her mouth politely.

"Aren't you ashamed?" hissed the grandmother.

Red Sam came in and told his wife to quit lounging on the counter and hurry with these people's order. His khaki trousers reached just to his hip bones and his stomach hung over them like a sack of meal swaying under his shirt. He came over and sat down at a table nearby and let out a combination sigh and yodel. "You can't win," he said. "You can't win," and he wiped his sweating red face off with a gray handkerchief. "These days you don't know who to trust," he said. "Ain't that the truth?"

35 "People are certainly not nice like they used to be," said the grandmother.

"Two fellers come in here last week," Red Sammy said, "driving a Chrysler. It was an old beat-up car but it was a good one and these boys looked all right to me. Said they worked at the mill and you know I let them fellers charge the gas they bought? Now why did I do that?"

"Because you're a good man!" the grandmother said at once.

"Yes'm, I suppose so," Red Sam said as if he were struck with this answer.

His wife brought the orders, carrying the five plates all at once without a tray, two in each hand and one balanced on her arm. "It isn't a soul in this green world of God's that you can trust," she said. "And I don't count nobody out of that, not nobody," she repeated, looking at Red Sammy.

40 "Did you read about that criminal, The Misfit, that's escaped?" asked the grandmother.

"I wouldn't be a bit surprised if he didn't attack this place right here," said the woman. "If he hears about it being here, I wouldn't be none surprised to see him. If he hears it's two cent in the cash register, I wouldn't be a tall surprised if he . . ."

"That'll do," Red Sam said. "Go bring these people their Co'Colas," and the woman went off to get the rest of the order.

"A good man is hard to find," Red Sammy said. "Everything is getting terrible. I remember the day you could go off and leave your screen door unlatched. Not no more."

He and the grandmother discussed better times. The old lady said that in her opinion Europe was entirely to blame for the way things were now. She said the way Europe acted you would think we were made of money and Red Sam said it was no use talking about it, she was exactly right. The children ran outside into the white sunlight and looked at the monkey in the lacy chinaberry tree. He was busy catching fleas on himself and biting each one carefully between his teeth as if it were a delicacy.

45 They drove off again into the hot afternoon. The grandmother took cat naps and woke up every five minutes with her own snoring. Outside of Toombsboro she woke up and recalled an old plantation that she had visited in this neighborhood once when she was a young lady. She said the house had six white columns across the front and that there was an avenue of oaks leading up to it and two little wooden trellis arbors on either side in front where you sat down with your suitor after a stroll in the garden. She recalled exactly which road to turn off to get to it. She knew that Bailey would not be willing to lose any time looking at an old house, but the more she talked about it, the more she wanted to see it once again and find out if the little twin arbors were still standing. "There was a secret panel in this house," she said craftily, not telling the truth but wishing that she were, "and the story went that all the family silver was hidden in it when Sherman came through but it was never found . . . "

"Hey!" John Wesley said. "Let's go see it! We'll find it! We'll poke all the woodwork and find it! Who lives there? Where do you turn off at? Hey, Pop, can't we turn off there?"

"We never have seen a house with a secret panel!" June Star shrieked. "Let's go to the house with the secret panel! Hey, Pop, can't we go see the house with the secret panel!"

"It's not far from here, I know," the grandmother said. "It wouldn't take over twenty minutes."

Bailey was looking straight ahead. His jaw was as rigid as a horseshoe. "No," he said.

50 The children began to yell and scream that they wanted to see the house with the secret panel. John Wesley kicked the back of the front seat and June Star hung over her mother's shoulder and whined desperately into her ear that they never had any fun even on their vacation, that they could never do what THEY wanted to do. The baby began to scream and John Wesley kicked the back of the seat so hard that his father could feel the blows in his kidney.

"All right!" he shouted and drew the car to a stop at the side of the road. "Will you all shut up? Will you all just shut up for one second? If you don't shut up, we won't go anywhere."

"It would be very educational for them," the grandmother murmured.

"All right," Bailey said, "but get this. This is the only time we're going to stop for anything like this. This is the one and only time."

"The dirt road that you have to turn down is about a mile back," the grandmother directed. "I marked it when we passed."

55 "A dirt road," Bailey groaned.

After they had turned around and were headed toward the dirt road, the grandmother recalled other points about the house, the beautiful glass over the front doorway and the candle lamp in the hall. John Wesley said that the secret panel was probably in the fireplace.

"You can't go inside this house," Bailey said. "You don't know who lives there."

"While you all talk to the people in front, I'll run around behind and get in a window," John Wesley suggested.

"We'll all stay in the car," his mother said.

60 They turned onto the dirt road and the car raced roughly along in a swirl of pink dust. The grandmother recalled the times when there were no paved roads and thirty miles was a day's journey. The dirt road was hilly and there were sudden washes in it and sharp curves on dangerous embankments. All at once they would be on a hill, looking down over the blue tops of trees for miles around, then the next minute, they would be in a red depression with the dust-coated trees looking down on them.

"This place had better turn up in a minute," Bailey said, "or I'm going to turn around."

The road looked as if no one had traveled on it in months.

"It's not much farther," the grandmother said and just as she said it, a horrible thought came to her. The thought was so embarrassing that she turned red in the face and her eyes dilated and her feet jumped up, upsetting her valise in the corner. The instant the valise moved, the newspaper top she had over the basket under it rose with a snarl and Pitty Sing, the cat, sprang onto Bailey's shoulder.

The children were thrown to the floor and their mother, clutching the baby, was thrown out the door onto the ground; the old lady was thrown into the front seat. The car turned over once and landed right-side-up in a gulch on the side of the road. Bailey remained in the driver's seat with the cat—gray-striped with a broad white face and an orange nose—clinging to his neck like a caterpillar.

65 As soon as the children saw they could move their arms and legs, they scrambled out of the car, shouting, "We've had an ACCIDENT!" The grandmother was curled up under the dashboard, hoping she was injured so that Bailey's wrath would not come down on her all at once. The horrible thought she had had before the accident was that the house she had remembered so vividly was not in Georgia but in Tennessee.

Bailey removed the cat from his neck with both hands and flung it out the window against the side of a pine tree. Then he got out of the car and started looking for the children's mother. She was sitting against the side of the red gutted ditch, holding the screaming baby, but she only had a cut down her face and a broken shoulder. "We've had an ACCIDENT!" the children screamed in a frenzy of delight.

"But nobody's killed," June Star said with disappointment as the grandmother limped out of the car, her hat still pinned to her head but the broken front brim standing up at a jaunty angle and the violet spray hanging off the side. They all sat down in the ditch, except the children, to recover from the shock. They were all shaking.

"Maybe a car will come along," said the children's mother hoarsely.

"I believe I have injured an organ," said the grandmother, pressing her side, but no one answered her. Bailey's teeth were clattering. He had on a yellow sport shirt with bright blue parrots designed in it and his face was as yellow as the shirt. The grandmother decided that she would not mention that the house was in Tennessee.

70 The road was about ten feet above and they could see only the tops of the trees on the other side of it. Behind the ditch they were sitting in there were more woods, tall and dark and deep. In a few minutes they saw a car some distance away on top of a hill, coming slowly as if the occupants were watching them. The grandmother stood up and waved both arms dramatically to attract their attention. The car continued to come on slowly, disappeared around a bend and appeared again, moving even slower on top of the hill they had gone over. It was a big black battered hearselike automobile. There were three men in it.

It came to a stop just over them and for some minutes, the driver looked down with a steady expressionless gaze to where they were sitting, and didn't speak. Then he turned his head and muttered something to the other two and they got out. One was a fat boy in black trousers and a red sweat shirt with a silver stallion embossed on the front of it. He moved around on the right side of them and stood staring, his mouth partly open in a kind of loose grin. The other had on khaki pants and a blue striped coat and a gray hat pulled down very low, hiding most of his face. He came around slowly on the left side. Neither spoke.

The driver got out of the car and stood by the side of it, looking down at them. He was an older man than the other two. His hair was just beginning to gray and he wore silver-rimmed spectacles that gave him a scholarly look. He had a long creased face and didn't have on any shirt or undershirt. He had on blue jeans that were too tight for him and was holding a black hat and a gun. The two boys also had guns.

"We've had an ACCIDENT!" the children screamed.

The grandmother had the peculiar feeling that the bespectacled man was someone she knew. His face was as familiar to her as if she had known him all her life but she could not recall who he was. He moved away from the car and began to come down the embankment, placing his feet carefully so that he wouldn't slip. He had on tan and white shoes and no socks, and his ankles were red and thin. "Good afternoon," he said. "I see you all had you a little spill."

75 "We turned over twice!" said the grandmother.

"Oncet," he corrected. "We seen it happen. Try their car and see will it run, Hiram," he said quietly to the boy with the gray hat.

"What you got that gun for?" John Wesley asked. "Whatcha gonna do with that gun?"

"Lady," the man said to the children's mother, "would you mind calling them children to sit down by you? Children make me nervous. I want all you to sit down right together there where you're at."

"What are you telling us what to do for?" June Star asked.

80 Behind them the line of woods gaped like a dark open mouth. "Come here," said their mother.

"Look here now," Bailey began suddenly, "we're in a predicament! We're in . . ."

The grandmother shrieked. She scrambled to her feet and stood staring. "You're The Misfit!" she said. "I recognized you at once!"

"Yes'm," the man said, smiling slightly as if he were pleased in spite of himself to be known, "but it would have been better for all of you, lady, if you hadn't of reckernized me."

Bailey turned his head sharply and said something to his mother that shocked even the children. The old lady began to cry and The Misfit reddened.

85 "Lady," he said, "don't you get upset. Sometimes a man says things he don't mean. I don't reckon he meant to talk to you thataway."

"You wouldn't shoot a lady, would you?" the grandmother said and removed a clean handkerchief from her cuff and began to slap at her eyes with it.

The Misfit pointed the toe of his shoe into the ground and made a little hole and then covered it up again. "I would hate to have to," he said.

"Listen," the grandmother almost screamed, "I know you're a good man. You don't look a bit like you have common blood. I know you must come from nice people!"

"Yes ma'm," he said, "finest people in the world." When he smiled he showed a row of strong white teeth. "God never made a finer woman than my mother and my daddy's heart was pure gold," he said. The boy with the red sweat shirt had come around behind them and was standing with his gun at his hip. The Misfit squatted down on the ground. "Watch them children, Bobby Lee," he said. "You know they make me nervous." He looked at the six of them huddled together in front of him and he seemed to be embarrassed as if he couldn't think of anything to say. "Ain't a cloud in the sky," he remarked, looking up at it. "Don't see no sun but don't see no cloud neither."

90 "Yes, it's a beautiful day," said the grandmother. "Listen," she said, "you shouldn't call yourself The Misfit because I know you're a good man at heart. I can just look at you and tell."

"Hush!" Bailey yelled, "Hush! Everybody shut up and let me handle this!" He was squatting in the position of a runner about to sprint forward but he didn't move.

"I pre-chate that, lady," The Misfit said and drew a little circle in the ground with the butt of his gun.

"It'll take a half a hour to fix this here car," Hiram called, looking over the raised hood of it.

"Well, first you and Bobby Lee get him and that little boy to step over yonder with you," The Misfit said, pointing to Bailey and John Wesley. "The boys want to ask you something," he said to Bailey. "Would you mind stepping back in them woods there with them?"

95 "Listen," Bailey began, "we're in a terrible predicament! Nobody realizes what this is," and his voice cracked. His eyes were as blue and intense as the parrots in his shirt and he remained perfectly still.

The grandmother reached up to adjust her hat brim as if she were going to the woods with him but it came off in her hand. She stood staring at it and after a second she let it fall on the ground. Hiram pulled Bailey up by the arm as if he were assisting an old man. John Wesley caught hold of his father's hand and Bobby Lee followed. They went off toward the woods and just as they reached the dark edge, Bailey turned and supporting himself against a gray naked pine trunk, he shouted, "I'll be back in a minute, Mamma, wait on me!"

"Come back this instant!" his mother shrilled but they all disappeared into the woods.

"Bailey Boy!" the grandmother called in a tragic voice but she found she was looking at The Misfit squatting on the ground in front of her. "I just know you're a good man," she said desperately. "You're not a bit common!"

"Nome, I ain't a good man," The Misfit said after a second as if he had considered her statement carefully, "but I ain't the worst in the world neither. My daddy said I was a different breed of dog from my brothers and sisters. 'You know,' Daddy said, 'It's some that can live their whole life without asking about it and it's others has to know why it is, and this boy is one of the latters. He's going to be into everything!'" He put on his black hat and looked up suddenly and then away deep into the woods as if he were embarrassed again. "I'm sorry I don't have on a shirt before you ladies," he said, hunching his shoulders slightly. "We buried our clothes that we had on when we escaped and we're just making do until we can get better. We borrowed these from some folks we met," he explained.

100 "That's perfectly all right," the grandmother said. "Maybe Bailey has an extra shirt in his suitcase."

"I'll look and see terrectly," The Misfit said.

"Where are they taking him?" the children's mother screamed.

"Daddy was a card himself," The Misfit said. "You couldn't put anything over on him. He never got in trouble with the Authorities though. Just had the knack of handling them."

"You could be honest too if you'd only try," said the grandmother. "Think how wonderful it would be to settle down and live a comfortable life and not have to think about somebody chasing you all the time."

105 The Misfit kept scratching in the ground with the butt of his gun as if he were thinking about it. "Yes'm, somebody is always after you," he murmured.

The grandmother noticed how thin his shoulder blades were just behind his hat because she was standing up looking down on him. "Do you ever pray?" she asked.

He shook his head. All she saw was the black hat wiggle between his shoulder blades. "Nome," he said.

There was a pistol shot from the woods, followed closely by another. Then silence. The old lady's head jerked around. She could hear the wind move through the tree tops like a long satisfied insuck of breath. "Bailey Boy!" she called.

"I was a gospel singer for a while," The Misfit said. "I been most everything. Been in the arm service, both land and sea, at home and abroad, been twict married, been an undertaker, been with the railroads, plowed Mother Earth, been in a tornado, seen a man burnt alive oncet," and he looked up at the children's mother and the little girl who were sitting close together, their faces white and their eyes glassy; "I even seen a woman flogged," he said.

110 "Pray, pray," the grandmother began, "pray, pray. . . ."

"I never was a bad boy that I remember of," The Misfit said in an almost dreamy voice, "but somewheres along the line I done something wrong and got sent to the penitentiary. I was buried alive," and he looked up and held her attention to him by a steady stare.

"That's when you should have started to pray," she said. "What did you do to get sent up to the penitentiary that first time?"

"Turn to the right, it was a wall," The Misfit said, looking up again at the cloudless sky. "Turn to the left, it was a wall. Look up it was a ceiling, look down it was a floor. I forget what I done, lady. I set there and set there, trying to remember what it was I done and I ain't recalled it to this day. Oncet in a while, I would think it was coming to me, but it never come."

"Maybe they put you in by mistake," the old lady said vaguely.

115 "Nome," he said. "It wasn't no mistake. They had the papers on me."

"You must have stolen something," she said.

The Misfit sneered slightly. "Nobody had nothing I wanted," he said. "It was a head-doctor at the penitentiary said what I had done was kill my daddy but I known that for a lie. My daddy died in nineteen ought nineteen of the epidemic flu and I never had a thing to do with it. He was buried in the Mount Hopewell Baptist churchyard and you can go there and see for yourself."

"If you would pray," the old lady said, "Jesus would help you."

"That's right," The Misfit said.

120 "Well then, why don't you pray?" she asked trembling with delight suddenly.

"I don't want no hep," he said. "I'm doing all right by myself."

Bobby Lee and Hiram came ambling back from the woods. Bobby Lee was dragging a yellow shirt with bright blue parrots on it.

"Throw me that shirt, Bobby Lee," The Misfit said. The shirt came flying at him and landed on his shoulder and he put it on. The grandmother couldn't name what the shirt reminded her of. "No, lady," The Misfit said while he was buttoning it up, "I found out the crime don't matter. You can do one thing or you can do another, kill a man or take a tire off his car, because sooner or later you're going to forget what it was you done and just be punished for it."

The children's mother had begun to make heaving noises as if she couldn't get her breath. "Lady," he asked, "would you and that little girl like to step off yonder with Bobby Lee and Hiram and join your husband?"

125 "Yes, thank you," the mother said faintly. Her left arm dangled helplessly and she was holding the baby, who had gone to sleep, in the other. "Hep that lady up, Hiram," The Misfit said as she struggled to climb out of the ditch, "and Bobby Lee, you hold onto that little girl's hand."

"I don't want to hold hands with him," June Star said. "He reminds me of a pig."

The fat boy blushed and laughed and caught her by the arm and pulled her off into the woods after Hiram and her mother.

Alone with The Misfit, the grandmother found that she had lost her voice. There was not a cloud in the sky nor any sun. There was nothing around her but woods. She wanted to tell him that he must pray. She opened and closed her mouth several times before anything came out. Finally she found herself saying, "Jesus, Jesus," meaning, Jesus will help you, but the way she was saying it, it sounded as if she might be cursing.

"Yes'm," The Misfit said as if he agreed. "Jesus thown everything off balance. It was the same case with Him as with me except He hadn't committed any crime and they could prove I had committed one because they had the papers on me. Of course," he said, "they never shown me my papers. That's why I sign myself now. I said long ago, you get you a signature and sign everything you do and keep a copy of it. Then you'll know what you done and you can hold up the crime to the punishment and see do they match and in the end you'll have something to prove you ain't been treated right. I call myself The Misfit," he said, "because I can't make what all I done wrong fit what all I gone through in punishment."

130 There was a piercing scream from the woods, followed closely by a pistol report. "Does it seem right to you, lady, that one is punished a heap and another ain't punished at all?"

"Jesus!" the old lady cried. "You've got good blood! I know you wouldn't shoot a lady! I know you come from nice people! Pray! Jesus, you ought not to shoot a lady. I'll give you all the money I've got!"

"Lady," The Misfit said, looking beyond her far into the woods, "there never was a body that give the undertaker a tip."

There were two more pistol reports and the grandmother raised her head like a parched old turkey hen crying for water and called, "Bailey Boy, Bailey Boy!" as if her heart would break.

"Jesus was the only One that ever raised the dead," The Misfit continued, "and He shouldn't have done it. He thown everything off balance. If He did what He said, then it's nothing for you to do but thow away everything and follow Him, and if He didn't, then it's nothing for you to do but enjoy the few minutes you got left the best way you can—by killing somebody or burning down his house or doing some other meanness to him. No pleasure but meanness," he said and his voice had become almost a snarl.

135 "Maybe He didn't raise the dead," the old lady mumbled, not knowing what she was saying and feeling so dizzy that she sank down in the ditch with her legs twisted under her.

"I wasn't there so I can't say He didn't," The Misfit said. "I wisht I had of been there," he said, hitting the ground with his fist. "It ain't right I wasn't there because if I had of been there I would of known. Listen lady," he said in a high voice, "if I had of been there I would of known and I wouldn't be like I am now." His voice seemed about to crack and the grandmother's head cleared for an instant. She saw the man's face twisted close to her own as if he were going to cry and she murmured, "Why you're one of my babies. You're one of my own children!" She reached out and touched him on the shoulder. The Misfit sprang back as if a snake had bitten him and shot her three times through the chest. Then he put his gun down on the ground and took off his glasses and began to clean them.

Hiram and Bobby Lee returned from the woods and stood over the ditch, looking down at the grandmother who half sat and half lay in a puddle of blood with her legs crossed under her like a child's and her face smiling up at the cloudless sky.

Without his glasses, The Misfit's eyes were red-rimmed and pale and defenseless-looking. "Take her off and thow her where you thown the others," he said, picking up the cat that was rubbing itself against his leg.

"She was a talker, wasn't she?" Bobby Lee said, sliding down the ditch with a yodel.

140 "She would of been a good woman," The Misfit said, "if it had been somebody there to shoot her every minute of her life."

"Some fun!" Bobby Lee said.

"Shut up, Bobby Lee," The Misfit said. "It's no real pleasure in life."

[1953]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Explain the significance of the title "A Good Man Is Hard to Find."
2. Interpret and evaluate The Misfit's comment on the grandmother: "She would of been a good woman if it had been somebody there to shoot her every minute of her life."
3. O'Connor reported that once, when she read aloud "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," one of her listeners said that "it was a shame someone with so much talent should look upon life as a horror story." Two questions: What evidence of O'Connor's talent do you see in the story, and does the story suggest that O'Connor looked on life as a horror story?
4. What are the values of the members of the family?
5. Flannery O'Connor, a Roman Catholic, wrote, "I see from the standpoint of Christian orthodoxy. This means that for me the meaning of life is centered in our Redemption by Christ and what I see in the world I see in relation to that." In the light of this statement and drawing on "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," explain what O'Connor saw in the world.

Remarks from Essays and Letters

From "The Fiction Writer and His Country"

In the greatest fiction, the writer's moral sense coincides with his dramatic sense, and I see no way for it to do this unless his moral judgment is part of the very act of seeing, and he is free to use it. I have heard it said that belief in Christian dogma is a hindrance to the writer, but I myself have found nothing further from the truth. Actually, it frees the storyteller to observe. It is not a set of rules which fixes what he sees in the world. It affects his writing primarily by guaranteeing his respect for mystery. . . .

When I look at stories I have written I find that they are, for the most part, about people who are poor, who are afflicted in both mind and body, who have little—or at best a distorted—sense of spiritual purpose, and whose actions do not apparently give the reader a great assurance of the joy of life.

Yet how is this? For I am no disbeliever in spiritual purpose and no vague believer. I see from the standpoint of Christian orthodoxy. This means that for me the meaning of life is centered in our Redemption by Christ and what I see in the world I see in its relation to that. . . .

The novelist with Christian concerns will find in modern life distortions which are repugnant to him, and his problem will be to make these appear as distortions to an audience which is used to seeing them as natural; and he may well be forced to take ever more violent means to get his vision across to this hostile audience. When you can assume that your audience holds the same beliefs you do, you can relax a little and use more normal means of talking to it; when you have to assume that it does not, then you have to make your vision apparent by shock—to the hard of hearing you shout, and for the almost-blind you draw large and startling figures.

From "Some Aspects of the Grotesque in Southern Fiction"

If the writer believes that our life is and will remain essentially mysterious, if he looks upon us as beings existing in a created order to whose laws we freely respond, then what he sees on the surface will be of interest to him only as he can go through it into an experience of mystery itself. His kind of fiction will always be pushing its own limits outward toward the limits of mystery, because for this kind of writer, the meaning of a story does not begin except at a depth where adequate motivation and adequate psychology and the various determinations have been exhausted. Such a writer will be interested in what we don't understand rather than in what we do. He will be interested in possibility rather than in probability. He will be interested in characters who are forced out to meet evil and grace and who act on a trust beyond themselves—whether they know very clearly what it is they act upon or not. To the modern mind, this kind of character, and his creator, are typical Don Quixotes, tilting at[1] what is not there.

From "The Nature and Aim of Fiction"

The novel works by a slower accumulation of detail than the short story does. The short story requires more drastic procedures than the novel because more has to be accomplished in less space. The details have to carry more immediate weight. In good fiction, certain of the details will tend to accumulate meaning from the story itself, and when this happens, they become symbolic in their action.

Now the word symbol scares a good many people off, just as the word art does. They seem to feel that a symbol is some mysterious thing put in arbitrarily by the writer to frighten the common reader—sort of a literary Masonic grip that is only for the initiated. They seem to think that it is a way of saying something that you aren't actually saying, and so if they can be got to read a reputedly symbolic work at all, they approach it as if it were a problem in algebra. Find x. And when they do find or think they find this abstraction, x, then they go off with an elaborate sense of satisfaction and the notion that they have "understood" the story. Many students confuse the process of understanding a thing with understanding it.

[1]tilting at "tilting at windmills" is a popular expression that derives from Cervantes's novel Don Quixote, published in 1604–05.

I think that for the fiction writer himself, symbols are something he uses simply as a matter of course. You might say that these are details that, while having their essential place in the literal level of the story, operate in depth as well as on the surface, increasing the story in every direction. . . .

People have a habit of saying, "What is the theme of your story?" and they expect you to give them a statement: "The theme of my story is the economic pressure of the machine on the middle class"—or some such absurdity. And when they've got a statement like that, they go off happy and feel it is no longer necessary to read the story.

Some people have the notion that you read the story and then climb out of it into the meaning, but for the fiction writer himself the whole story is the meaning, because it is an experience, not an abstraction.

From "Writing Short Stories"

Being short does not mean being slight. A short story should be long in depth and should give us an experience of meaning. . . .

Meaning is what keeps the short story from being short. I prefer to talk about the meaning in a story rather than the theme of a story. People talk about the theme of a story as if the theme were like the string that a sack of chicken feed is tied with. They think that if you can pick out the theme, the way you pick the right thread in the chicken-feed sack, you can rip the story open and feed the chickens. But this is not the way meaning works in fiction.

When you can state the theme of a story, when you can separate it from the story itself, then you can be sure the story is not a very good one. The meaning of a story has to be embodied in it, has to be made concrete in it. A story is a way to say something that can't be said any other way, and it takes every word in the story to say what the meaning is. You tell a story because a statement would be inadequate. When anybody asks what a story is about, the only proper thing is to tell him to read the story. The meaning of fiction is not abstract meaning but experienced meaning, and the purpose of making statements about the meaning of a story is only to help you to experience that meaning more fully.

On Interpreting "A Good Man Is Hard to Find"

A professor of English had sent O'Connor the following letter: "I am writing as spokesman for three members of our department and some ninety university students in three classes who for a week now have been discussing your story 'A Good Man Is Hard to Find.' We have debated at length several possible interpretations, none of which fully satisfies us. In general we believe that the appearance of the Misfit is not 'real' in the same sense that the incidents of the first half of the story are real. Bailey, we believe, imagines the appearance of the Misfit, whose activities have been called to his attention on the night before the trip and again during the stopover at the roadside restaurant. Bailey, we further believe, identifies himself with the Misfit and so plays two roles in the imaginary last half of the story. But we cannot, after great effort, determine the point at which reality fades into illusion or reverie. Does the accident literally occur, or is it a part of Bailey's dream? Please believe me when I say we are not seeking an easy way out of our difficulty. We admire your story and have examined it with great care, but we are convinced that we are missing something important which you intended for us to grasp. We will all be very grateful if you comment on the interpretation which I have outlined above and if you will give us further comments about your intention in writing 'A Good Man Is Hard to Find.'" She replied:

28 March 61

To a Professor of English

The interpretation of your ninety students and three teachers is fantastic and about as far from my intentions as it could get to be. If it were a legitimate interpretation, the story would be little more than a trick and its interest would be simply for abnormal psychology. I am not interested in abnormal psychology.

There is a change of tension from the first part of the story to the second where the Misfit enters, but this is no lessening of reality. This story is, of course, not meant to be realistic in the sense that it portrays the everyday doings of people in Georgia. It is stylized and its conventions are comic even though its meaning is serious.

Bailey's only importance is as the Grandmother's boy and the driver of the car. It is the Grandmother who first recognizes the Misfit and who is most concerned with him throughout. The story is a duel of sorts between the Grandmother and her superficial beliefs and the Misfit's more profoundly felt involvement with Christ's action which set the world off balance for him.

The meaning of a story should go on expanding for the reader the more he thinks about it, but meaning cannot be captured in an interpretation. If teachers are in the habit of approaching a story as if it were a research problem for which any answer is believable so long as it is not obvious, then I think students will never learn to enjoy fiction. Too much interpretation is certainly worse than too little and where feeling for a story is absent, theory will not supply it.

My tone is not meant to be obnoxious. I am in a state of shock.

"A Reasonable Use of the Unreasonable"

Last fall I received a letter from a student who said she would be "graciously appreciative" if I would tell her "just what enlightenment" I expected her to get from each of my stories. I suspect she had a paper to write. I wrote her back to forget about the enlightenment and just try to enjoy them. I knew that was the most unsatisfactory answer I could have given because, of course, she didn't want to enjoy them, she just wanted to figure them out.

In most English classes the short story has become a kind of literary specimen to be dissected. Every time a story of mine appears in a Freshman anthology, I have a vision of it, with its little organs laid open, like a frog in a bottle.

I realize that a certain amount of this what-is-the-significance has to go on, but I think something has gone wrong in the process when, for so many students, the story becomes simply a problem to be solved, something which you evaporate to get Instant Enlightenment.

A story really isn't any good unless it successfully resists paraphrase, unless it hangs on and expands in the mind. Properly, you analyze to enjoy, but it's equally true that to analyze with any discrimination, you have to have enjoyed already, and I think that the best reason to hear a story read is that it should stimulate that primary enjoyment.

I don't have any pretensions to being an Aeschylus or Sophocles and providing you in this story with a cathartic experience out of your mythic background, though this story I'm going to read certainly calls up a good deal of the South's mythic background, and it should elicit from you a degree of pity and terror, even though its way of being serious is a comic one. I do think, though, that like the Greeks you should know what is going to happen in this story so that any element of suspense in it will be transferred from its surface to its interior.

I would be most happy if you have already read it, happier still if you knew it well, but since experience has taught me to keep my expectations along these lines modest, I'll tell you that this is the story of a family of six which, on its way driving to Florida, gets wiped out by an escaped convict who calls himself the Misfit. The family is made up of the Grandmother and her son, Bailey, and his children, John Wesley and June Star and the baby, and there is also the cat and the children's mother. The cat is named Pitty Sing, and the Grandmother is taking him with them, hidden in a basket.

Now I think it behooves me to try to establish with you the basis on which reason operates in this story. Much of my fiction takes its character from a reasonable use of the unreasonable, though the reasonableness of my use of it may not always be apparent. The assumptions that underlie this use of it, however, are those of the central Christian mysteries. These are assumptions to which a large part of the modern audience takes exception. About this I can only say that there are perhaps other ways than my own in which this story could be read, but none other by which it could have been written. Belief, in my own case anyway, is the engine that makes perception operate.

The heroine of this story, the Grandmother, is in the most significant position life offers the Christian. She is facing death. And to all appearances she, like the rest of us, is not too well prepared for it. She would like to see the event postponed. Indefinitely.

I've talked to a number of teachers who use this story in class and who tell their students that the Grandmother is evil, that in fact, she's a witch, even down to the cat. One of these teachers told me that his students, and particularly his Southern students, resisted this interpretation with a certain bemused vigor, and he didn't understand why. I had to tell him that they resisted it because they all had grandmothers or great-aunts just like her at home, and they knew, from personal experience, that the old lady lacked comprehension, but that she had a good heart. The Southerner is usually tolerant of those weaknesses that proceed from innocence, and he knows that a taste for self-preservation can be readily combined with the missionary spirit.

This same teacher was telling his students that morally the Misfit was several cuts above the Grandmother. He had a really sentimental attachment to the Misfit. But then a prophet gone wrong is almost always more interesting than your grandmother, and you have to let people take their pleasures where they find them.

It is true that the old lady is a hypocritical old soul; her wits are no match for the Misfit's, nor is her capacity for grace equal to his; yet I think the unprejudiced reader will feel that the Grandmother has a special kind of triumph in this story which instinctively we do not allow to someone altogether bad.

I often ask myself what makes a story work, and what makes it hold up as a story, and I have decided that it is probably some action, some gesture of a character that is unlike any other in the story, one which indicates where the real heart of the story lies. This would have to be an action or a gesture which was both totally right and totally unexpected; it would have to be one that was both in character and beyond character; it would have to suggest both the world and eternity. The action or gesture I'm talking about would have to be on the anagogical level, that is, the level which has to do with the Divine life and our participation in it. It would be a gesture that transcended any neat allegory that might have been intended or any pat moral categories a reader could make. It would be a gesture which somehow made contact with mystery.

There is a point in this story where such a gesture occurs. The Grandmother is at last alone, facing the Misfit. Her head clears for an instant and she realizes, even in her limited way, that she is responsible for the man before her and joined to him by ties of kinship which have their roots deep in the mystery she has been merely prattling about so far. And at this point, she does the right thing, she makes the right gesture.

I find that students are often puzzled by what she says and does here, but I think myself that if I took out this gesture and what she says with it, I would have no story. What was left would not be worth your attention. Our age not only does not have a very sharp eye for the almost imperceptible intrusions of grace, it no longer has much feeling for the nature of the violences which precede and follow them. The devil's greatest wile, Baudelaire has said, is to convince us that he does not exist.

I suppose the reasons for the use of so much violence in modern fiction will differ with each writer who uses it, but in my own stories I have found that violence is strangely capable of returning my characters to reality and preparing them to accept their moment of grace. Their heads are so hard that almost nothing else will do the work. This idea, that reality is something to which we must be returned at considerable cost, is one which is seldom understood by the casual reader, but it is one which is implicit in the Christian view of the world.

I don't want to equate the Misfit with the devil. I prefer to think that, however unlikely this may seem, the old lady's gesture, like the mustard-seed, will grow to be a great crow-filled tree in the Misfit's heart, and will be enough of a pain to him there to turn him into the prophet he was meant to become. But that's another story.

This story has been called grotesque, but I prefer to call it literal. A good story is literal in the same sense that a child's drawing is literal. When a child draws, he doesn't intend to distort but to set down exactly what he sees, and as his gaze is direct, he sees the lines that create motion. Now the lines of motion that interest the writer are usually invisible. They are lines of spiritual motion. And in this story you should be on the lookout for such things as the action of grace in the Grandmother's soul, and not for the dead bodies.

We hear many complaints about the prevalence of violence in modern fiction, and it is always assumed that this violence is a bad thing and meant to be an end in itself. With the serious writer, violence is never an end in itself. It is the extreme situation that best reveals what we are essentially, and I believe these are times when writers are more interested in what we are essentially than in the tenor of our daily lives. Violence is a force which can be used for good or evil, and among other things taken by it is the kingdom of heaven. But regardless of what can be taken by it, the man in the violent situation reveals those qualities least dispensable in his personality, those qualities which are all he will have to take into eternity with him; and since the characters in this story are all on the verge of eternity, it is appropriate to think of what they take with them. In any case, I hope that if you consider these points in connection with the story, you will come to see it as something more than an account of a family murdered on the way to Florida.

CHAPTER 13

Reading and Writing about Graphic Fiction

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Define visual literacy
- Demonstrate visual literacy by reading graphic fiction
- Analyze elements of graphic fiction
- Consider how words and images work together to create meaning in graphic fiction

Letters and Pictures, Words and Images

Literature is, literally speaking, made out of letters (literature, literally, literate, literacy, and letters all come from the Latin word littera, meaning "letter"). A person who can read letters is literate. Yet, today, we hear a good deal about "visual literacy," which means the ability to understand visual things. In this usage, literacy is metaphoric. You cannot literally (again that word!) read a picture; you can look at it and either understand it or not understand it. In order to help prepare you to read a story that is partly told by means of pictures, we will be talking about achieving visual literacy—that is, achieving the ability to understand pictures and to "read" pictures, specifically pictures that are used to tell stories.

The good news is that, if you have spent any time at all looking at comic strips or comic books, you already know a great deal about how to "read" pictures that tell stories.

- You know, for instance, that you should read the pictures and the words from left to right (if you were brought up in China or Japan, you would begin at the right and read the first column downward, then the next column, again reading downward, unless the book were a Western-style book).
- You also know that, in the usual comic strip, a box represents a particular scene; the next box may show the same characters but at a later moment in time.
- You know that human actions can be conveyed by showing figures in certain postures (walking, eating, and so forth) and making certain gestures (pointing or making a fist).
- You know that emotions can be conveyed by facial expressions (think Smiley Face, where two dots and a curve say it all).
- You know that the setting can easily be established (a tree indicates the outdoors, the Capitol indicates Washington, DC).

- You know that, when a heavy object is shown on the ground with the word bang in large thick letters next to it, a character has just dropped the object.
- You know that words enclosed in a circle over a character's head indicate words that the character is speaking.
- You know that a character is cursing or using dirty language when words are represented, not by letters, but by symbols such as @ and # and !
- You know that, when the line that encloses words is scalloped or looks something like a cloud, the words represent thoughts rather than utterances.

In short, you know the conventions that enable you to understand what the cartoonist/storyteller is doing, and you can follow the story, the narrative conveyed by words and pictures, all of which says that you are already visually literate. Yet, because you may not have developed the habit of reading images closely and taking in all the subtleties that they may offer, we will talk a bit about reading images.

Let's look at a single image that tells a story. Look, for instance, at this painting by Grant Wood, Death on the Ridge Road. The title—words!—tells you what the picture is about, but even if you found the picture in the attic, with no title affixed, you could infer what is about to happen, what story the picture tells.

A big black car, apparently a limousine, is going to collide with a truck.

Death on the Ridge Road (1935), Grant Wood (American; 1892–1942). Oil on masonite, frame: 39 × 46 1/16 in. (99 × 117 cm) Williams College Museum of Art, Williamstown, MA, Gift of Cole Porter, (47.1.3). Art © Figge Art Museum, successors to the Estate of Nan Wood Graham/Licensed by VAGA, New York, NY.

We think all viewers will agree with this statement, and perhaps we can go a little further. (First, let us note that the cars are black, the truck is red, the grass is green, and the sky is darkening.)

- Given the facts that the cars are black—in the context, an ominous color—that the sky shows a storm brewing, that the intersecting diagonals of the limousine and the truck imply conflict, and that the telephone pole appears at an angle, the picture makes the viewer uneasy.
- Apparently, the limousine was behind the car that is now at the bottom of the picture; in order to pass the car, the limousine must have crossed into the left lane, and it is now cutting to the right in order to return to its proper lane.
- The telephone poles, in this context of vehicles about to collide, we perceive as crosses, and thus they turn the pretty landscape with its winding road into a cemetery.
- The picture may cause us to moralize: "Death comes unexpectedly"; "Even in lovely rural surroundings, death can be present."

But, even when a viewer has such thoughts—and we think these thoughts are supported by the picture—the picture itself tells only a simple story:

- A car, having passed another car on the left, is cutting back into the right lane and will in a moment collide with a truck coming over a hill.

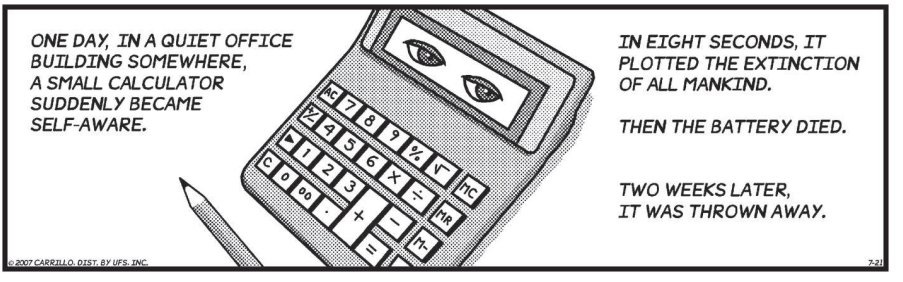
The picture does not tell us anything about the minds of the people involved in the accident to come. Conceivably, a viewer may conjecture that the driver of the limousine was impatient, driving behind someone in a dinky car going at twenty miles an hour, and—such is the personality of the rich men who drive big cars, or of their chauffeurs—that this driver confidently and recklessly crossed the dividing line marked on the road, entered the left lane, zoomed ahead of the slowpoke, and now (here, we return to the facts shown in the picture) is cutting back into the right lane but is too near the truck to avoid a crash. Clearly, this interpretation of the character of the driver cannot be supported by the picture. For all we know, the smaller car may have stalled in the middle of the road, and the driver of the limousine—maybe a very cautious woman—was forced to go around the stalled car.

As our thoughts about this single image show, we crave a complex story that we can interpret. In the next sections, we'll turn to two strategies that are used in graphic fiction to tell more complex stories: the use of words in combination with images and the use of sequential images.

Joining the Conversation: Two Topics for Creative Writing

1. Write two versions (each about five hundred to one thousand words) of a story based on Grant Wood's painting. In one version, tell the story from the point of view of the driver of the car that is being passed. This driver cannot know the exact thoughts of the other driver, but he or she can say such things as, "This guy was behind me, honking like crazy, so I deliberately slowed down, just to teach him a lesson." In the second version, use a different point of view—perhaps the point of view of the driver of the car that will be struck, or perhaps the point of view of a spectator, or, if you wish, an omniscient point of view.

2. Grant Wood's most famous painting is American Gothic, a picture that shows a man, holding a pitchfork, and a woman standing in front of their home, a house with a window shaped like a gothic (pointed) arch. (You can find the picture on the Internet.) Do you see a story, a narrative, or a sequence of events in this picture? If so, what is the story? If you do not see a story, invent a very short one that might plausibly use this painting as an illustration of some episode.



Now let's look at a picture that is accompanied by words.

Reading an Image: A Short Story Told in One Panel

Tony Carrillo

Tony Carrillo was born and raised in Tempe, Arizona. He conceived F Minus when he was a sophomore at Arizona State University. The comic strip is currently syndicated in more than one hundred newspapers.

F Minus

Tony Carrillo: "F Minus" © 2007 Tony Carrillo. Universal Uclick.

For now, let's pretend that the picture doesn't exist and that we have been given only some text:

> One day, in a quiet office building somewhere, a small calculator suddenly became self-aware.
> In eight seconds, it plotted the extinction of all mankind.
> Then the battery died.
> Two weeks later, it was thrown away.

We don't want to make extravagant claims, but we think this is pretty good as a mini-sci-fi story. We hear much about the possibility that someday there may be machines that "think," and we hear even more about technology possibly getting out of control and destroying its creators. In the words of Elias Canetti, winner of a Nobel Prize in Literature, "The planet's survival has become so uncertain that any effort, any thought that presupposes an assured future amounts to a mad gamble."

So, the graphic story begins with something fantastic yet something that we hear about and that we can imagine may become real:

> One day, in a quiet office building somewhere, a small calculator suddenly became self-aware.
> In eight seconds, it plotted the extinction of all mankind.

There is an engaging combination of vagueness ("One day," "somewhere") and of the highly specific ("In eight seconds"); that is, things in a leisurely once-upon-a-time land suddenly come down to a matter of seconds. The vague fairy-tale world of "one day" has been transformed into real time, and the "small calculator" is now a big threat. Like all good fiction, each sentence of this tiny story stimulates the reader to wonder, "What happens next?"

What does happen after the calculator "plotted the extinction of all mankind"? "Then the battery died." Well, that makes sense. We haven't anticipated this happening, but, again, the happening is a plausible one, and we are relieved, satisfied. In a sense, the story is over—the battery is dead, so what more can be said?—but we see additional words:

> Two weeks later, it was thrown away.

We think this ending is masterful. It is as if we heard a joke, laughed, and thought we had heard the end of the matter, and then the narrator went on to top the joke, giving us an unexpected joke that builds on the first joke—a line that, after we have heard it, seems inevitable. The calculator, once an enormous menace, fails to be of even the slightest significance because—as is entirely natural, if we can speak of naturalness in connection with a mechanical device—the battery dies. The story seems to be over, and there is nothing more to say. But there is more to say. The battery-dead calculator for two weeks is not even noticed, and, then, when presumably it somehow comes to some unspecified person's attention, it is unceremoniously discarded, "thrown away." The way of all flesh.

What is convincing is not simply that A is followed by B and that B is followed by C, but that there is a logic to the sequence, even (may we say?) a truth to the sequence. Notice, too, that the artist–writer does not moralize; rather, it is the reader–viewer who draws conclusions.

The theme is a great one, the humbling of the ambitious. Shakespeare often treated it—for instance, in Richard II, in which the king meditates on his "state" (that is, high status, exalted rank) and sees death as an "antic" (buffoon, jester) mocking even a king:

> Within the hollow crown
> That rounds the mortal temples of a king
> Keeps Death his court and there the antic sits,
> Scoffing his state and grinning at his pomp,
> Allowing him a breath, a little scene,
> To monarchize, be feared and kill with looks,
> Infusing him with self and vain conceit,
> As if this flesh which walls about our life,
> Were brass impregnable, and humored thus > Comes at the last and with a little pin
> Bores through his castle wall, and farewell king!

We are not claiming that the story about the calculator is in the same league with Shakespeare's play, but we do find it memorable. We think the text of this graphic story makes a pretty good short, short story, even without the picture. Now let's examine the accompanying picture.

We think the accompanying picture is clever and cute. The cartoonist might simply have drawn a calculator, but he brilliantly put two eyes into the liquid crystal display and thus animated the whole thing. The calculator does seem to be aware, doesn't it? So, in our view, the story becomes enriched by the image. We can call this sort of thing "graphic fiction," but, to go back to our earlier point, the truth is that the picture doesn't tell the story. It merely enriches a story that is told in words.

That last sentence is, we admit, unfair. The image doesn't "merely" enrich the words. The picture is literally central to the story. If the story consisted only of text, or if all of the text were written above or below the story, the story would not be as effective. The image is integral.

And that's our point: The best graphic fiction does not merely illustrate the verbal story; rather, the images are inseparable from the words. The story is text-and-image, not just text-adorned-with-image.

Elements of Graphic Fiction

Graphic fiction often expands the structure of the single panel into a series of panels, taking the form of a sequential series of images and text. Graphic fiction often features narrative development and depth, translating the elements that we know from fiction—plot, character, setting, tone, style—into a visual form. The term graphic fiction is broadly applied and can encompass anything from a single panel, to a series of panels, to a novel-length story. Graphic literature can also encompass nonfiction, such as an autobiography or a historical account.

Visual Elements

Graphic fiction shares many literary elements with fiction, such as plot, character, and setting. However, because graphic fiction is told through a visual rather than a verbal form, it introduces a new set of formal or structural elements that can be analyzed. A graphic novel is typically constructed out of the following:

- Panels: the square or rectangles that contain a single image; the graphic novel page is made up of a series of panels that we read in sequential order.
- Gutters: the blank space between the panels, revealing the unillustrated white space on the page.
- Captions: the descriptive text that contains information about a scene or a character, often placed in a square at the top or bottom of the panel.
- Dialogue balloons: the balloon-like space that contains the spoken communication between characters.
- Thought balloons: the balloon-like space that contains a character's unspoken thoughts.
- Sound effects: the reproduction of sound through words, such as "pow!" or "crrrackkkk."

As you read graphic fiction, notice how these different visual elements work to convey key aspects of the story being told.

Narrative and Graphic Jumps

In Understanding Comics, Scott McCloud emphasizes that, due to its unique formal elements, graphic fiction requires imaginative engagement on the part of the reader. As graphic fiction shows a scene developing visually, it typically divides that scene up into a series of panels, separated by blank space, or gutter. This division into panels creates visual gaps on the page. As he or she reads graphic fiction's sequential images, the reader must, as McCloud says, "jump the gutter" and move from one panel to the next. The reader must fill in the information that takes place between the panels—information that, in a story, would often be provided by a narrator or central character. For example, if one panel shows a person standing at the bottom of a mountain and the next panel shows that person standing at the top of the mountain, we make an interpretive leap and assume that the character climbed the mountain, imagining the time and effort that climb took. As we "jump the gutter," moving from one image to the next, we would not, presumably, imagine that the character flew up to the top of the mountain. When we read graphic fiction, we often fill in lots of narrative information, understanding the story without realizing how extensively we have been guided by the skillful artist to make assumptions and interpretations based on visual cues.

Graphic Style

In graphic fiction, the artist's style quite literally leaps off the page. You can tell at a glance how a page reflects an artist's unique drawing style and how he or she uses that style to create an atmosphere for the story that it is telling. In some graphic fiction, the author and artist are the same; in others, the story is written by the author and the imagery is provided by an artist and sometimes completed by a colorist. Graphic style relies on numerous elements, but it is often helpful to start by asking how "realistic" the style is. Graphic works can employ a style that is highly detailed and looks similar to a fine art painting or a style that is very stripped-down and overly simplified, such as in the drawing of a stick figure. Graphic fiction often employs icons, or simplified images that can be understood at a glance. For example, comic strips often use variations of a round "smiley face" to represent a human face and its emotions. To take another example, if you were asked to draw an image of a house, you might draw a triangle for a roof on top of a square, with a window and a door and maybe a chimney. Even if houses don't really look like this, we have come to accept this as an easily recognizable image—or icon—of a house. How much or how little do graphic artists rely on icons, and varying levels of visual symbolism and realism, to define their style?

The most successful examples of graphic fiction marry style and content; the graphic style becomes a perfect match for the story being told. For example, Persepolis, told and drawn by Marjane Satrapi, purposefully employs a rudimentary drawing style that evokes the young age of its narrator as she comes of age in Iran. Drawn in black and white with the use of a relatively thick line, Persepolis evokes the harsh "black-and-white" contrasts between a rebellious girl and her surrounding repressive world. In contrast, Allan Moore's popular Watchman series, illustrated by Dave Gibbons and colored by John Higgins, is lush, multicolored, and full of action. Watchman imitates the style of a superhero comic in order to critique the idea of superheroes, imagining a world in which such heroes are manipulated by a corrupt government. As you read a graphic fiction, notice the elements of line, shading, and color and how they are used to convey meaning.

Reading a Series of Images: A Story Told in Sequential Panels

Let's look now at an example of more complex sequential work of graphic fiction, consisting of eight panels. The artist–writer is Art Spiegelman.

Art Spiegelman

Born in Sweden in 1948, Art Spiegelman was raised in New York City. His two-part graphic story (part novel, part memoir), Maus (1986, 1991), based on his Polish-Jewish parents' experiences during the Holocaust, was awarded a Pulitzer Prize in 1992. A highly inventive artist–writer, Spiegelman not only cofounded several outlets for comic books but also created Garbage Candy (edible candy in the shape of garbage, packaged in miniature garbage cans). In 2005, Time magazine included Spiegelman in its list of the one hundred most influential people.

Nature vs. Nature

If you were explaining Nature vs. Nurture to critters from outer space, you might point out the following conventions, moving from panel to panel:

- Spiegelman sets the scene at the extreme upper left, in the first panel, with some text in a small box. This text box, providing the reader–viewer with background rather than dialogue, is appropriately distinct in shape from the speech balloons.
- The little girl in the first panel is obviously happy. Her happiness is conveyed not only by the text's expressions of motherly love but also by the expression on her face. The father is also smiling.
- In the second panel, the well-intentioned, politically correct father takes the doll from the girl. The girl is puzzled (the balloon says "uk?" and the smile is gone from her face).
- In the third panel, the father is full of enthusiasm—his mouth is open, he has a big smile—and the text conveys his enthusiasm. Additional text, "Skreeee," in different lettering (to indicate it is not human speech) comes out of the fire truck. The father has presumably pushed a button or flicked a switch so that the fire truck emits a sound. The girl's face and posture show puzzlement.
- The enthusiastic father (still with a big smile) seeks to show the girl how to play with the fire truck. His talk is (how shall we put it?) male talk, loud and aggressive ("Clang! Clang! Clang! Everybody get outa the way!").
- In the fifth panel, the father, still teaching his daughter but evidently having a great time, is verging on the maniacal with his toothy grin and his "Vroom! Vroom!" A reader–viewer probably thinks, "Hmmm, boys will be boys," and may also think, seeing this father's childish enthusiasm, "You can't take the boy out of the man."
- The next panel shows the smiling—and complacent—father handing the fire truck to the girl, whose face conveys uncertainty.
- The bottom row begins with more uncertainty, indicated by a big question mark over the girl's head. She says nothing—there is no speech balloon—but we know that she is puzzled.
- The final panel shows that the girl has covered half the fire truck with a blanket instead of thrusting it crazily around and making loud noises, and the father is reduced to silence. His posture—hands thrust into pockets, head slightly turned down—shows that he has given up his attempt (the "nurture" of the title) to stifle the expression of motherly feelings (the "nature" of the title), and a balloon indicates that he is heaving a sigh of resignation. The sigh is conveyed by enclosing the word "sigh" within elongated dots, indicating that he is sighing rather than saying "sigh."

If we were to think about the story in terms of the elements of fiction, what might we say? Well, so far as character (personality) goes, each of the two figures is relatively simple: The girl is just a girl—at her young age, we hardly expect her to be a richly complex figure—and the father is essentially a well-meaning dad who wants his daughter to grow up free from gender stereotypes. Surely, that is an admirable ambition. The plot—the sequence of events—shows the father's attempt to free her by offering her an alternative, a fire truck instead of a doll. He is apparently rather pleased with his efforts (the seventh panel shows him smiling when his little daughter touches the fire truck), but, with the final panel, reality breaks in. The girl does not careen around the room shouting "Vroom!" as the father did; rather, her maternal instinct manifests itself even toward the fire truck. But this is not quite the end of the story: At the extreme right-hand side, we see the father heaving a sigh, shoulders slumped and hands in pockets: He has been forced to accept reality. This is not always a bad thing, really, when you think about it. If we are asked what the theme of the story is—that is, "What does the story add up to?" (which is very different from the plot, which is "What happens in the story?")—we can say that the theme concerns (as the title of the story indicates) the conflict between Nature and Nurture, or, to put it a bit differently, biology versus socialization. We most emphatically do not wish to say anything like "Spiegelman shows that human nature is unchangeable." For one thing, Spiegelman doesn't "show" us (in the sense of prove or demonstrate) anything. He just drew some pictures and wrote some words; he didn't offer anything that can be called evidence. Even if the pictures represented something that happened in his own family, his graphic report of his experience would not prove that other fathers had the same experience with their daughters. Spiegelman is entertaining us, not arguing, not preaching. Still, one feels that Spiegelman's story—the events that he illustrates and the actions of the two characters—is plausible. One thing follows from another:

- The father sees his daughter playing with dolls, and
- being a good father, he wishes to free his daughter from stereotypical limited behavior, so
- he gives his daughter a toy that is usually associated with boys, but
- nature will have its way, and the girl turns the fire truck into an object that allows her to express her maternal instinct.
- Heaving a sigh, the father appears to recognize that his efforts have failed.

You have now instructed your Martian visitors in the language of graphic fiction. Yes, you knew it all along, and maybe the Martian visitors did, too.

Graphic fiction asks you apply your understanding of storytelling to a form that combines words and images. The questions in the following checklist may help you to focus on the unique elements of graphic fiction, analyzing how it uses pictures to create a narrative.

✔ CHECKLIST: Getting Ideas for Writing Arguments about Graphic Fiction

Elements of Fiction

- ☐ Does the graphic fiction feature a central character or a set of characters? How does this character or set of characters provide a focal lens for the story?
- ☐ How do the characters contribute to the graphic fiction's narrative progression? How are the characters developed? Do the characters have clear motivations? How do the characters change? What are the relationships among the characters? Are the characters defined by conflict?
- ☐ How are the characters represented graphically? How is characterization achieved visually? How do you recognize the characters? What are the key graphic features used for each character?
- ☐ What is the plot of the graphic work? What story is being told? What are the story's beginning, middle, and end?
- ☐ How do events structure the story? What are the story's most important "turning point" events? Do cause-and-effect relationships among events order the story?

(continued)

- ☐ How are these key events represented graphically? How do visual elements convey the importance of specific events? Do certain events take place "off-panel," or outside the graphic panels, forcing the reader to imagine and interpret the event that took place?
- ☐ What symbols convey meaning within the story? Are symbolic objects presented graphically? Are certain images repeated, gaining symbolic significance? What meaning do you ascribe to these symbols?
- ☐ How has the author used additional elements of fiction to convey meaning, such as point of view, mood and atmosphere, and setting?
- ☐ What is the thematic meaning of the graphic work? What conceptual ideas are being conveyed by the story? What is the point or message of the story? How do the elements of fiction and the story's graphic style come together to convey that meaning?

Visual Elements

- ☐ How do the visual elements of the graphic work together to create the story's meaning? What are the most important graphic elements being used by the artist to convey the story?
- ☐ How are the story's panels composed? How is the layout of the page broken into a series of panels or boxed images? Are the panels always the same size and shape, or do they vary? Why? How do we read the panels sequentially; for example, do they always follow a left-to-right order?
- ☐ How are the gutters used to sequence the story? Do the gutters become a graphic element that helps to organize the page?
- ☐ How are words introduced into the images? Do the words themselves become graphic, presented in an interesting font or a variety of styles?
- ☐ Does the graphic work use captions? Do the captions function as a narrator? What types of information do the captions convey? Are the captions used in a consistent way?
- ☐ How is dialogue presented graphically? How is dialogue presented in words but also presented through visual elements, such as balloons or a change in font?
- ☐ How are the character's thoughts presented graphically? How do you know that the words being presented are thoughts? How are thoughts presented through visual elements, such as balloons or a change in font?
- ☐ How are sound effects captured in the graphic fiction? Are sounds presented through words or images, or a combination of the two?
- ☐ How would you characterize the relationship between words and images in the graphic work? What sort of balance is created between the two?

Narrative and Graphic Jumps

- ☐ How does the graphic fiction rely on the reader's ability to provide narrative information that is not presented by the words or images on the page? Does the work contain few or many narrative and visual gaps?
- ☐ What meaning is conveyed in the gutter? Examine how the break provided by the gutter conveys different types of information. For example, is the gutter used to convey the passage of time or a change in location?
- ☐ How does the work use your ability to "jump the gutter"? Is there a moment in the story when this ability to make an interpretive leap seems especially important?

- ☐ Are there moments in the story when the sequence of panels becomes confusing? Is the graphic fiction purposely using the gaps created by panels to convey meaning, such as a feeling of disruption or confusion?

Graphic Style

- ☐ How would you describe the style of the graphic work? What seems to be the artist's signature style?
- ☐ How does the artist represent reality? Is the work realistic? Or, is it stripped down? Are objects and characters presented in realistic forms, or are they presented in more symbolic forms or as "icons"?
- ☐ How elaborate or simplified is the graphic style? Is the imagery detailed or stripped down? How does the level of detail relate to the size of the panel?
- ☐ How does the artist use elements of line, shading, and color? Are thick or thin lines used; when and why? Are smooth or jagged lines use; when and why? Is the imagery presented in black and white, or is shading used? How does shading contribute to the graphic style? Is color used? What is the color range? How does the color convey meaning, such as atmosphere?
- ☐ How does the style match the story being told? Is the style a good match for the themes and concepts being conveyed by the narrative?

Your Turn: Additional Graphic Fiction for Analysis

Will Eisner

Born in Brooklyn, New York, Will Eisner (1917–2005) drew cartoons for his high school newspaper and after graduation studied for a year at the Art Students League of New York. He was soon publishing cartoons and comic strips, and he became an important figure in establishing the graphic novel ("sequential art") as a form of fiction. He taught at the School of Visual Arts in New York, and he published two highly informative books derived from his lectures, Comics and Sequential Art (1985) and Graphic Storytelling and Visual Narrative (1996). In Comics and Sequential Art, Eisner includes a chapter titled "Expressive Anatomy." Among the illustrations in this chapter is Hamlet on a Rooftop, first published in June 1981. Eisner prefaces the Hamlet drawings with the following remark and then offers a running commentary on the pictures.

Hamlet on a Rooftop

The Body and the Face

The employment of body posture and facial expression (both having equal attention) is a major undertaking and an area of frequent failure. Properly and skillfully done, it can carry the narrative without resorting to unnecessary props or scenery. The use of expressive anatomy in the absence of words is less demanding because the latitude for the art is wider. Where the words have a depth of meaning and nuance, the task is more difficult.

This represents an example of a classic situation — that of author vs. artist. The artist must decide at the outset what his 'input' shall be; to slavishly make visual that which is in the author's mind or to embark on the raft of the author's words onto a visual sea of his own charting.

In this experiment, Shakespeare's words are intact. The soliloquy is broken up into balloons at the artist's discretion. The intent here is to permit a meaningful fusing of word, imagery and timing. The result should provide the reader with necessary pauses.

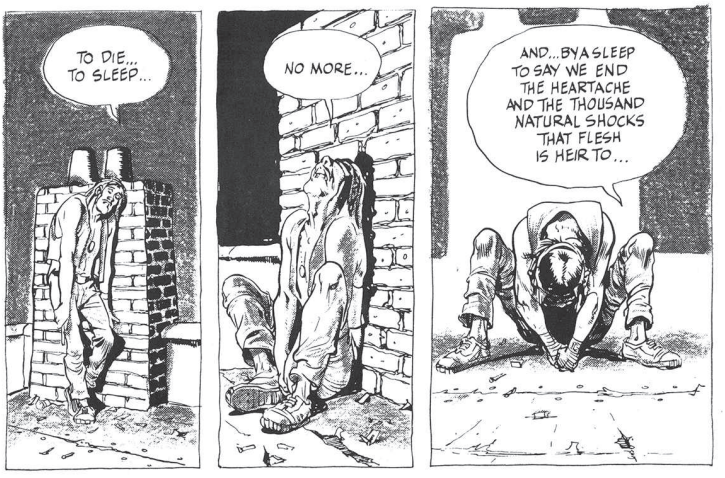
The artist here functions as actor and in the process gives his own meaning to the lines.

A gesture signifying contemplation.

Furniture employed in intimate involvement with the actor gives the 'background' story value because it is part of the action.

Submission . . . to a ''heavy'' thought.

Here, the postures are more than a classical portrayal of emotions. This man is not the Danish Prince Hamlet! His gestures and postures are derivative of his special background. The question of how he would deliver the standard gesture for self-doubt and internal agony is the artist's real challenge!



Bravado . . . he envisions himself as challenging the forces of troubles.

Exhaustion — beaten by the enormity of his problems

Seeking comfort he lets his body slide down along the wall

Retreat . . . into his refuge . . . sleep

Wishing with all his might.

The language of posture is universal and interchangeable — the application is not.

Withdrawing into sleep or oblivion, he assumes an almost fetal posture.

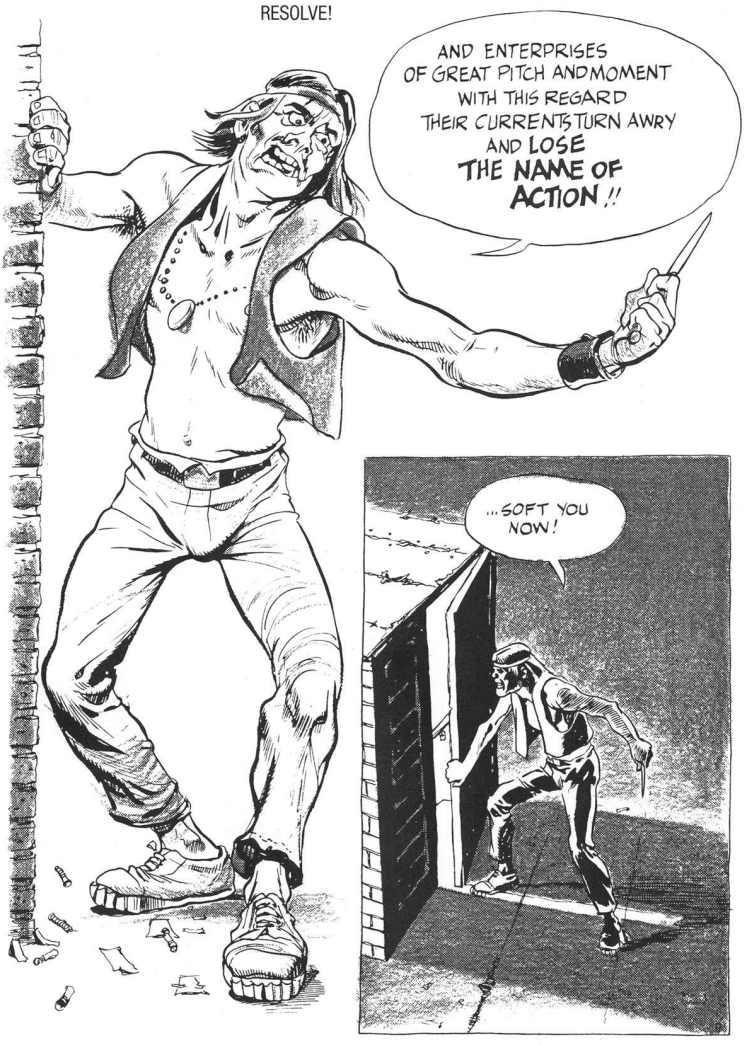
Terror . . . in the realization of his options

Awake again to the thoughts that will not leave him!

Candor . . . addressing the unseen manipulator of his fate

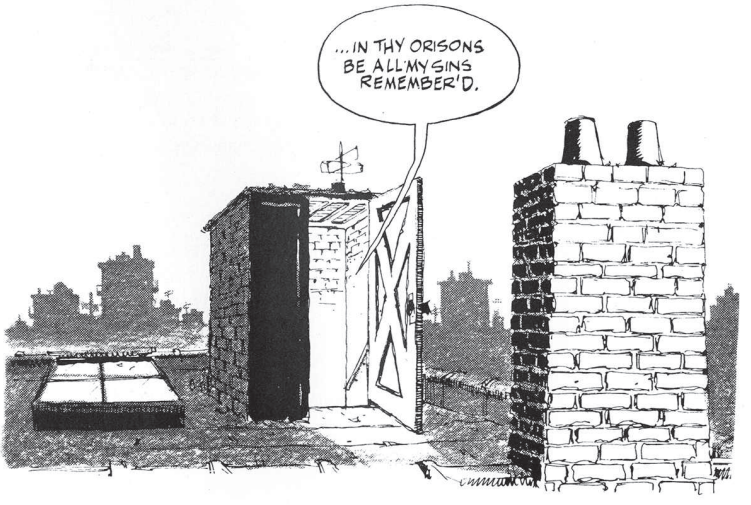
Anger . . . now he builds his resolution

Arguing . . . he begins to make a case to buttress growing resolve.



Debating . . . the postures of a courtroom advocate

The use of a long-shot, here is meant to reinforce realism — and in that way try to deal with the problem of putting Shakespeare's language in the mouth of such a man.

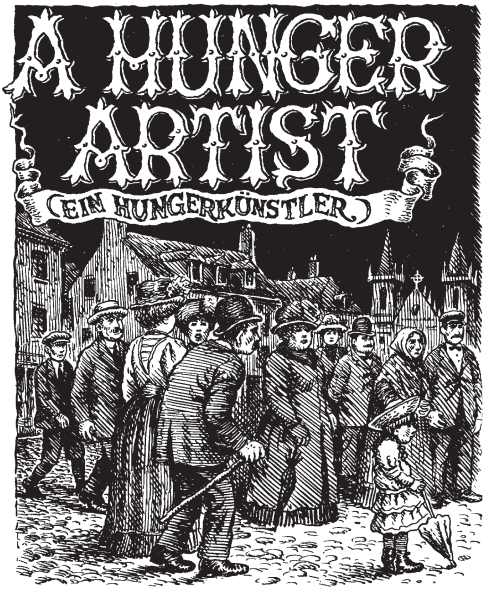


Hesitation . . . a recurrence of doubt

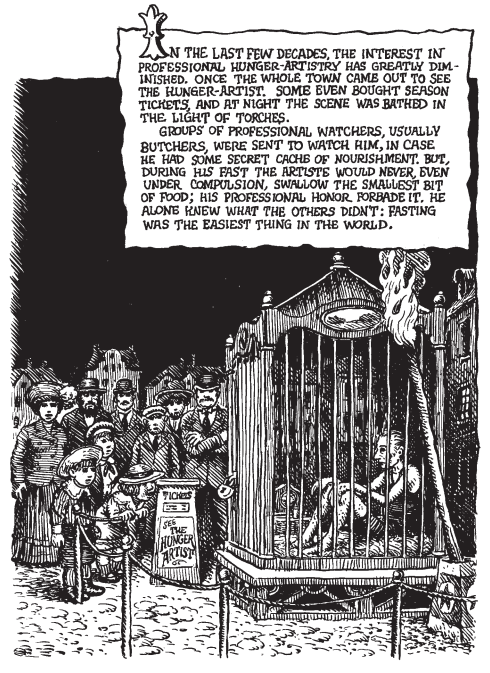
ATTACK . . . he now moves to act upon his resolve.

This wedding of Shakespearean language with a modern denizen of the ghetto may not be appropriate but the exercise serves to demonstrate the potential of the medium because the emotional content is so universal.

Now let's examine a contemporary graphic treatment of an early twentieth-century short story, Franz Kafka's "A Hunger Artist." In one obvious way, the job of the illustrator of a classic text is easier than the job of the creator of an entirely original work, but in another way, it is also more difficult because the artist who illustrates a classic is in some sense putting himself or herself up against a classic writer: The reader–viewer will inevitably expect the artist to contribute something to the work, to do more than ride piggyback on the original author.

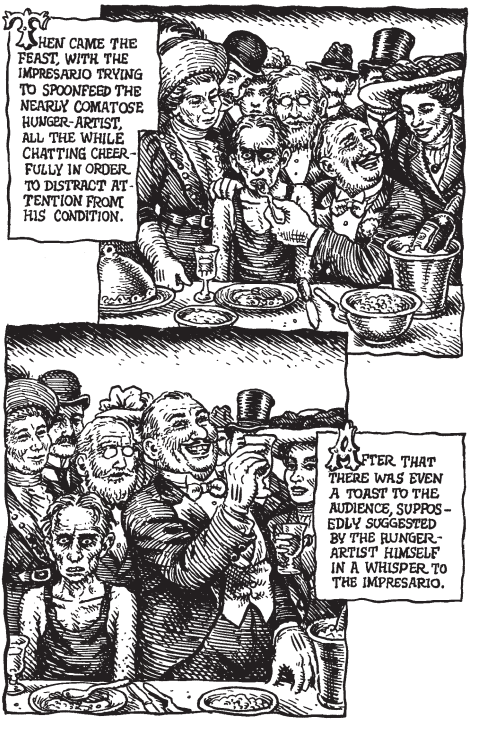


R. Crumb and David Zane Mairowitz



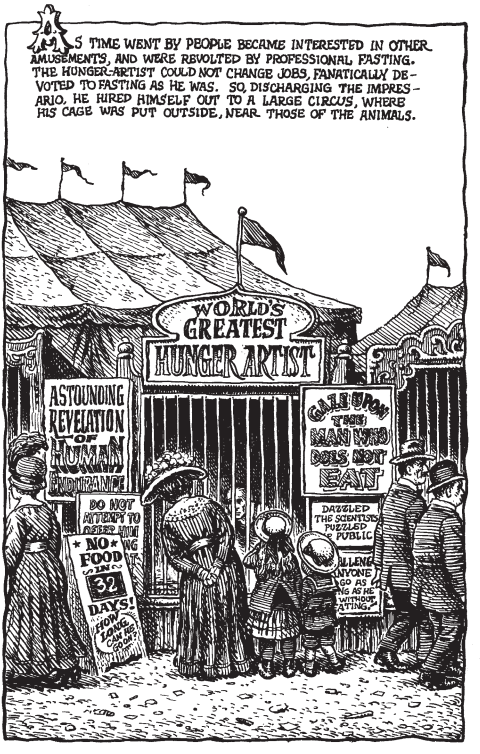
Robert Dennis Crumb, born in Philadelphia in 1943, worked for a while in Cleveland as a designer of greeting cards and then began drawing for underground newspapers. Some of his work is strongly sexual and highly satiric, but he has also drawn R. Crumb's Kafka (1993), with a text by David Zane Mairowitz, illustrating several works of fiction by the writer Franz Kafka (1883–1924).

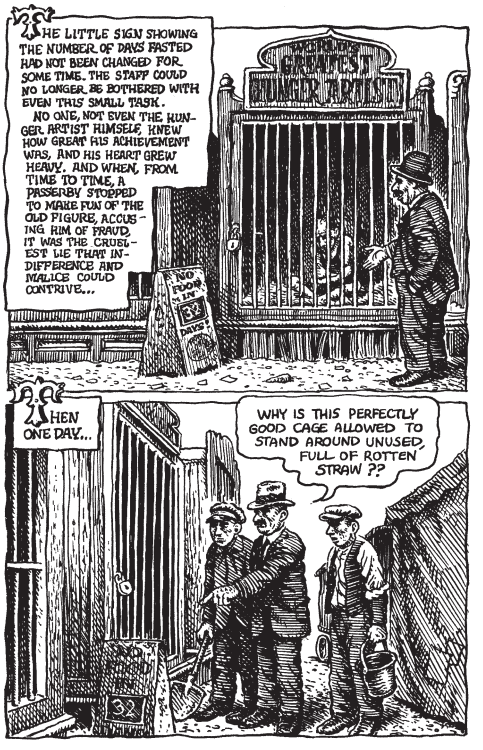
David Zane Mairowitz, born in New York City in 1943, emigrated in 1968 to England, where he works as a freelance writer.



A Hunger Artist

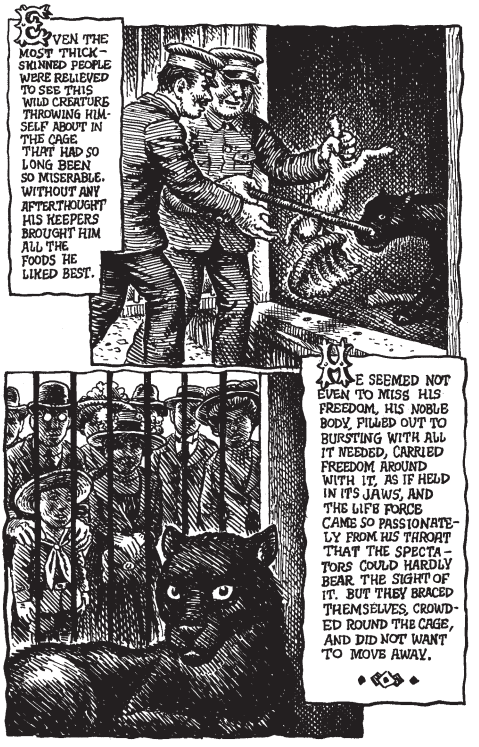
In June 1924, his "phantoms" saw to it — with their usual irony — that while dying of starvation, he would be correcting the galley-proofs of an astonishing masterwork called…





THE PERIOD OF FASTING WAS SET BY HIS IMPRESARIO AT FORTY DAYS MAXIMUM, BECAUSE AFTER THAT TIME THE PUBLIC BEGAN TO LOSE INTEREST. SO ON THE FORTIETH DAY, WITH AN EXCITED CROWD FILLING THE ARENA AND A MILITARY BAND PLAYING, TWO YOUNG LADIES CAME TO LEAD THE HUNGER-ARTIST OUT OF HIS CAGE. WHEN THIS HAPPENED HE ALWAYS PUT UP SOME RESISTANCE...WHY STOP AFTER ONLY FORTY DAYS?!? WHY SHOULD THEY TAKE FROM HIM THE GLORY OF FASTING EVEN LONGER, OF SURPASSING EVEN HIMSELF TO REACH UNIMAGINABLE HEIGHTS, FOR HE SAW HIS ABILITY TO GO ON FASTING AS UNLIMITED!

THEN CAME THE FEAST, WITH THE IMPRESARIO TRYING TO SPOONFEED THE NEARLY COMATOSE HUNGER-ARTIST, ALL THE WHILE CHATTING CHEERFULLY IN ORDER TO DISTRACT ATTENTION FROM HIS CONDITION.
AFTER THAT THERE WAS EVEN A TOAST TO THE AUDIENCE, SUPPOSEDLY SUGGESTED BY THE HUNGER-ARTIST HIMSELF IN A WHISPER TO THE IMPRESARIO.



HE LIVED THIS WAY FOR MANY YEARS, HONORED BY ALL THE WORLD, YET TROUBLED IN HIS SOUL, DEEPLY FRUSTRATED THAT THEY WOULD NOT ALLOW HIS FASTING TO EXCEED FORTY DAYS. HE SPENT MOST OF HIS TIME IN A GLOOMY MOOD, AND WHEN SOME KIND-HEARTED PERSON WOULD TRY TO EXPLAIN THAT HIS DEPRESSION WAS THE RESULT OF THE FASTING, HE WOULD SOMETIMES FLY INTO A RAGE AND BEGIN RATTLING THE BARS OF HIS CAGE LIKE AN ANIMAL.

AS TIME WENT BY PEOPLE BECAME INTERESTED IN OTHER AMUSEMENTS, AND WERE REVOLTED BY PROFESSIONAL FASTING. THE HUNGER-ARTIST COULD NOT CHANGE JOBS, FANATICALLY DEVOTED TO FASTING AS HE WAS. SO, DISCHARGING THE IMPRESARIO, HE HIRED HIMSELF OUT TO A LARGE CIRCUS, WHERE HIS CAGE WAS PUT OUTSIDE, NEAR THOSE OF THE ANIMALS.
WORLD'S GREATEST HUNGER ARTIST
ASTOUNDING REVELATION OF HUMAN ENDURANCE
DO NOT ATTEMPT TO FEED HIM
* NO * FOOD FOR 32 DAYS!
HOW LONG CAN HE GO? 32 DAYS
COME SEE THE MAN WHO DOES NOT EAT
DAZZLED THE SCIENTISTS PUZZLED THE PUBLIC
CHALLENGE ANYONE TO GO AS LONG AS HE WITHOUT EATING

THE LITTLE SIGN SHOWING THE NUMBER OF DAYS FASTED HAD NOT BEEN CHANGED FOR SOME TIME. THE STAFF COULD NO LONGER BE BOTHERED WITH EVEN THIS SMALL TASK.
NO ONE, NOT EVEN THE HUNGER ARTIST HIMSELF, KNEW HOW GREAT HIS ACHIEVEMENT WAS, AND HIS HEART GREW HEAVY. AND WHEN, FROM TIME TO TIME, A PASSERBY STOPPED TO MAKE FUN OF THE OLD FIGURE, ACCUSING HIM OF FRAUD, IT WAS THE CRUELEST LIE THAT INDIFFERENCE AND MALICE COULD CONTRIVE...
GREATEST HUNGER ARTIST
NO FOOD IN 32 DAYS
THEN ONE DAY...
WHY IS THIS PERFECTLY GOOD CAGE ALLOWED TO STAND AROUND UNUSED, FULL OF ROTTEN STRAW??
32

HE'S STILL IN THERE!
YOU STILL FASTING? AREN'T YOU EVER GOING TO STOP??
FORGIVE ME...
OF COURSE WE FORGIVE YOU!
I ALWAYS WANTED PEOPLE TO ADMIRE MY FASTING...
WE DO ADMIRE IT!
YOU SHOULDN'T..
WELL, ALRIGHT, WE DON'T ADMIRE IT, BUT WHY SHOULDN'T WE ADMIRE IT?
...BECAUSE I HAVE NO CHOICE... I HAVE TO FAST...
YOU HAVE NO CHOICE? WHY DON'T YOU HAVE ANY CHOICE?

BECAUSE...BECAUSE I COULD NEVER FIND ANY FOOD I LIKED... IF I HAD FOUND ANY, BELIEVE ME, I WOULDN'T HAVE MADE ALL THIS FUSS! I'D HAVE STUFFED MYSELF THE SAME AS YOU OR ANYBODY ELSE!
THESE WERE HIS LAST WORDS, BUT IN HIS BROKEN EYES ONE COULD SEE THE FIRM, IF NO LONGER PROUD, CONVICTION THAT HE WAS FASTING STILL....
ALRIGHT, CLEAN UP THIS MESS...
THEY BURIED THE HUNGER-ARTIST TOGETHER WITH THE STRAW. INTO HIS CAGE THEY NOW PUT A YOUNG PANTHER...

EVEN THE MOST THICK-SKINNED PEOPLE WERE RELIEVED TO SEE THIS WILD CREATURE THROWING HIMSELF ABOUT IN THE CAGE THAT HAD SO LONG BEEN SO MISERABLE. WITHOUT ANY AFTERTHOUGHT HIS KEEPERS BROUGHT HIM ALL THE FOODS HE LIKED BEST.
HE SEEMED NOT EVEN TO MISS HIS FREEDOM. HIS NOBLE BODY, FILLED OUT TO BURSTING WITH ALL IT NEEDED, CARRIED FREEDOM AROUND WITH IT, AS IF HELD IN ITS JAWS, AND THE LIFE FORCE CAME SO PASSIONATELY FROM HIS THROAT THAT THE SPECTATORS COULD HARDLY BEAR THE SIGHT OF IT. BUT THEY BRACED THEMSELVES, CROWDED ROUND THE CAGE, AND DID NOT WANT TO MOVE AWAY.

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Select one panel from the graphic version of A Hunger Artist for close examination. How do the visual elements and the narrative elements work together to convey the meaning of the story? Write an explication of your selected panel, describing specific visual and verbal elements in turn. Explain how these elements reinforce each other to convey the panel's key ideas.
2. Does R. Crumb and David Zane Mairowitz's graphic style seem to be a good match for the content of Kafka's story? Do the heavily lined and crosshatched images capture the emotional content of a story about fasting and starvation, exhibitionism and viewership? Why or why not?
3. Analyze A Hunger Artist as a sequential series of images that culminate in the final images of the dying artist and the panther. Consider how one panel leads to another, encouraging us to connect images across the panels. For example, notice the repeated imagery of cage bars. Also consider how the panels are separated by gutters, encouraging us to compare and contrast panels. Compare and contrast the last few images of the artist with the image of the panther, while also comparing and contrasting images of the viewers and images of the cage. How does the visual contrast between the dying man and the sleek panther convey Kafka's thematic ideas?

CHAPTER 14

Reading and Writing about Plays

Chapter Preview

After reading this chapter, you will be able to

- Identify and define the types of plays
- Identify and analyze the elements of drama
- Evaluate a dramatic production
- Compare filmed plays to stage productions
- Describe the conventions of Greek tragedy
- Write a successful paper about a play, using a writing process that moves from first annotation to final draft

Types of Plays

Most of the world's great plays that were written before the twentieth century may be regarded as one of two kinds: tragedy or comedy. Roughly speaking, tragedy dramatizes the conflict between the vitality of the individual life and the laws or limits of life. The tragic hero reaches a height, going beyond the experience of others but at the cost of his or her life. Comedy, on the other hand, dramatizes the vitality of the laws of social life. In comedy, the good life is seen to reside in the shedding of an individualism that isolates in favor of a union with a genial and enlightened society. These points must be amplified a bit before we go on to the further point that any important play does much more than can be put into such crude formulas.

Tragedy

Tragic heroes usually go beyond the standards to which reasonable people adhere; they do some type of fearful deed that ultimately destroys them. This deed is often said to be an act of hubris, a Greek word meaning something like "overweening pride." It may involve, for instance, violating a taboo, such as that against taking a life. But, if the hubristic act ultimately destroys the man or woman who performs it, it also shows that person (paradoxically) to be in some way more fully a living being—a person who has experienced life more fully, whether by heroic action or by a capacity for enduring suffering—than the other characters in the play. (If the tragic hero does not die, he or she is usually left in a death-like state, as is the blind Oedipus in Oedipus the King.) In tragedy, we see humans pushed to an extreme state; the hero enters a world unknown to most people and reveals magnificence. After the hero's departure from the stage, we are left in a world of smaller people.

What has just been said may (or may not) be true of most tragedies, but it is not true of all. If you were writing about a tragedy, you might consider whether the points just made are illustrated in the play about which you were writing. Is Willy Loman, in Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman (page 1057), a tragic figure, or is he merely a pathetic figure? In our first paragraph, we said that a tragic figure "reaches a height, going beyond the experience of others but at the cost of his or her life," and, in our next paragraph, we said that "[a]fter the hero's departure from the stage, we are left in a world of smaller people." Do these words apply to Death of a Salesman? Or is Biff right when, in the second act (page 1117), he says to Willy, "Pop, I'm a dime a dozen, and so are you." If Biff is right, is the play not a tragedy? Or does our statement describing tragedy need to be emended? Is the tragic hero guilty of hubris? Does the hero seem a greater person than the others in the play? An essay examining these questions probably requires not only a character sketch but also comparison with other characters.

Tragedy commonly involves irony of two sorts: unconsciously ironic deeds and unconsciously ironic speeches. Ironic deeds have some type of consequence that are more or less the reverse of what the doer intends. In Shakespeare's Macbeth, Macbeth thinks that by killing Duncan he will gain happiness, but he finds that his deed brings him sleepless nights. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, Brutus thinks that by killing Caesar he will bring liberty to Rome, but his action brings tyranny. In an unconsciously ironic speech, the words mean one thing to the speaker but something more significant to the audience, as when King Duncan, baffled by Cawdor's treason, says

> There's no art
> To find the mind's construction in the face:
> He was a gentleman on whom I built
> An absolute trust.

At this moment, Macbeth, whom we have already heard meditating on the murder of Duncan, enters. Duncan's words are true, but he does not apply them to Macbeth as the audience does. A few moments later, Duncan praises Macbeth as "a peerless kinsman." Soon Macbeth will indeed become peerless, when he kills Duncan and ascends to the throne.[1] Sophocles's use of ironic deeds and speeches is so pervasive, especially in Oedipus Rex, that Sophoclean irony has become a critical term.

When a deed backfires or has a reverse effect, such as Macbeth's effort to gain happiness, we have what Aristotle (the first—and still the greatest—drama critic) called a peripeteia, or a reversal. A character who comes to perceive what has happened (Macbeth's "I have lived long enough: my way of life / Is fall'n into the sere, the yellow leaf") experiences (in Aristotle's language) an anagnorisis, or recognition. Strictly speaking, for Aristotle, the recognition was a matter of literal identification—for example, the recognition that Oedipus was the son of a man that he had killed. In Macbeth, the recognition in this sense is that Macduff, "from his mother's womb / Untimely ripped," is the man who fits the prophecy that Macbeth can be conquered only by someone not "of woman born." Does Willy Loman in Death of a Salesman ever experience a recognition? If not, does this lack of recognition indicate that the play is not a tragedy or, on the other hand, that the description of tragedy needs to be emended?

[1]Dramatic irony (ironic deeds, or happenings, and unconsciously ironic speeches) must be distinguished from verbal irony, which is produced when the speaker is conscious that his or her words mean something different from what the speakers says. In Macbeth, Lennox says, "The gracious Duncan / Was pitied of Macbeth. Marry, he was dead! / And the right valiant Banquo walked too late. / . . . / Men must not walk too late." He says nothing about Macbeth's having killed Duncan and Banquo, but he means that Macbeth has killed them.

In his analysis of drama, Aristotle says that the tragic hero comes to grief through his hamartia, a term sometimes translated as tragic flaw but perhaps better translated as tragic error, since flaw implies a moral fault. Thus, it is a great error for Hamlet not to inspect the foils at the start of the deadly fencing match with Laertes; had he done so, he would have seen that one of the foils was blunt and one was pointed. If we hold to the translation flaw, we begin to hunt for a fault in the tragic hero's character, and we say, for instance, that Hamlet is gullible, or some such thing. In doing this, we may diminish or even overlook the hero's grandeur.

Comedy

Although in tragedy the hero usually seems to embody certain values that are superior to those of the hero's surrounding society, in comedy the fullest life is seen to reside within enlightened social norms: At the beginning of a comedy, we find banished dukes, unhappy lovers, crabby parents, jealous husbands, and harsh laws, but, at the end of the comedy, we usually have a unified and genial society, often symbolized by a marriage feast to which everyone, or almost everyone, is invited. Early in A Midsummer Night's Dream, for instance, we meet quarreling young lovers and a father who demands that his daughter either marry a man she does not love or enter a convent. Such is the Athenian law. At the end of the play, the lovers are properly matched, to everyone's satisfaction.

Speaking broadly, most comedies fall into one of two classes: satiric comedy or romantic comedy. In satiric comedy, the emphasis is on the obstructionists—the irate fathers, hardheaded businessmen, and other members of the establishment who at the beginning of the play seem to hold all the cards, preventing joy from reigning. They are held up to ridicule because they are repressive monomaniacs enslaved to themselves, acting mechanistically (always irate, always hardheaded) instead of responding genially to the ups and downs of life. The outwitting of these obstructionists, usually by the younger generation, often provides the resolution of the plot. Ben Jonson, Molière, and George Bernard Shaw are in this tradition; their satiric comedy, according to an ancient Roman formula, "chastens morals with ridicule"—that is, it reforms folly or vice by laughing at it. On the other hand, in romantic comedy (think of Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night), the emphasis is on a pair or pairs of delightful people who engage our sympathies as they run their obstacle race to the altar. There are obstructionists here, too, but the emphasis is on festivity.

When writing about comedy, you may be concerned with the function of one scene or character. But whatever your topic, you may find it helpful to begin by trying to decide whether the play is primarily romantic or primarily satiric (or something else). One way of getting at this is to ask yourself to what degree you sympathize with the characters. Do you laugh with them, sympathetically, or do you laugh at them, regarding them as being at least somewhat contemptible?

Elements of Drama

Theme

If we have read or seen a drama thoughtfully, we ought to be able to formulate its theme, its underlying idea—and perhaps we can even go so far as to say its moral attitudes, its view of life, and its wisdom. Some critics have argued that the concept of theme is meaningless. They hold that Macbeth, for example, gives us only an extremely detailed history of one imaginary man. In this view, Macbeth says nothing to you or me; it tells only what happened to an imaginary man. Even Julius Caesar says nothing about the historical Julius Caesar or about the nature of Roman politics. Here we can agree; no one would offer Shakespeare's play as evidence of what the historical Caesar said or did. But surely the view that the concept of theme is meaningless and that a work tells us only about imaginary creatures is a desperate one. We can say that we see in Julius Caesar the fall of power, or (thinking of Brutus) the vulnerability of idealism, or some such thing.

To the reply that these are mere truisms, we can counter: Yes, but the truisms are presented in such a way that they take on life and become a part of us rather than remain things of which we say, "I've heard it said, and I guess it's so." The play offers instruction, in a pleasant and persuasive way. And surely we are in no danger of equating the play with the theme that we sense underlies it. We recognize that the play presents the theme with such detail that our statement is only a wedge to help us enter into the play.

Some critics (influenced by Aristotle's statement that a drama is an imitation of an action) use action as if it were equivalent to theme. In this sense, the action is the underlying happening—the inner happening—for example, "the enlightenment of a character," "the coming of unhappiness to a character," or "the finding of the self by self-surrender." It might be said that the theme of Macbeth is embodied in words that Macbeth himself utters: "Blood will have blood." This is not to say that these words and no other words embody the theme or the action; it is only to say that these words seem to the writer (and, if the essay is effective, to the reader) to bring us close to the center of the play.

Plot

Plot is variously defined, sometimes as the equivalent of story (in this sense, a synopsis of Julius Caesar has the same plot as Julius Caesar), but more often, and more usefully, as the dramatist's particular arrangement of the story. Thus, because Shakespeare's Julius Caesar begins with a scene dramatizing an encounter between plebeians and tribunes, its plot is different from that of a play on Julius Caesar in which such a scene (not necessary to the story) is omitted.

Handbooks on drama often suggest that a plot (an arrangement of happenings) should have a rising action, a climax, and a falling action. This sort of plot can be diagrammed as a pyramid: The tension rises through complications or crises to a climax, at which point the climax is the apex, and the tension allegedly slackens as we witness the dénouement (literally, unknotting). Shakespeare sometimes used a pyramidal structure, placing his climax neatly in the middle of what seems to us to be the third of five acts. In Hamlet, the protagonist proves to his own satisfaction Claudius's guilt in 3.2, with the play within the play, but almost immediately he begins to worsen his position by failing to kill Claudius when he is an easy target (3.3) and by contaminating himself with the murder of Polonius (3.4). In Romeo and Juliet, the first half shows Romeo winning Juliet; however, when in 3.1 Romeo kills Juliet's cousin Tybalt, Romeo sets in motion the second half of the play, the losing of Juliet and of his own life.

Of course, no law demands such a structure, and a hunt for the pyramid usually causes the hunter to overlook all the crises but the middle one. William Butler Yeats once suggestively diagrammed a good plot, not as a pyramid, but as a line moving diagonally upward, punctuated by several crises. Perhaps it is sufficient to say that a good plot has its moments of tension, but their location will vary with the play. They are the product of conflict, but it should be noted that not all conflict produces tension; there is conflict but little tension in a baseball game when the home team is ahead 10–0 and a pinch hitter comes to bat in the bottom of the ninth inning with two out and no one on base.

Regardless of how a plot is diagrammed, the exposition is that part that tells the audience what it has to know about the past, the antecedent action. Two gossiping servants who reveal that, after a year away in Paris, the young master is coming home tomorrow with a new wife are giving the audience the exposition. However, the exposition may also extend far into the play, coming to light in small, explosive revelations.

Exposition has been discussed as though it consists simply of informing the audience about events, but exposition can do much more. It can give us an understanding of the characters who themselves are talking about other characters, it can evoke a mood, and it can generate tension. When we summarize the opening act by treating it as "mere exposition," we are probably losing what is dramatic in it.

Exposition usually includes foreshadowing. Details given in the exposition, which we may at first take as mere background, often turn out to be highly relevant to later developments. For instance, in the very short first scene of Macbeth, the witches introduce the name of Macbeth, but, in such words as "Fair is foul" and "when the battle's lost and won," they also give glimpses of what will happen: Macbeth will become foul, and though he will seem to win (he becomes king), he will lose the most important battle. Similarly, during the exposition in the second scene, we learn that Macbeth has loyally defeated Cawdor, who betrayed King Duncan, and Macbeth has been given Cawdor's title. Later, we will find that, like Cawdor, Macbeth betrays Duncan. That is, in giving us the background about Cawdor, the exposition also tells us (though we don't know it when we first see or read the play) something about what will happen to Macbeth.

In writing about an aspect of plot, you may want to consider the following approaches:

- Is the plot improbable? If so, is the play therefore weak?
- Does a scene that might at first seem unimportant or even irrelevant serve an important function?
- If certain actions that could be shown onstage take place offstage, is there a reason? (A good way to approach this sort of question is to think of what your own reaction would be if the action were shown onstage.)

- If there are several conflicts—for example, between pairs of lovers or between parents and their children and also between the parents themselves—how are these conflicts related? Are they parallel? Or are they contrasting?
- Does the arrangement of scenes have a structure? For instance, do the scenes depict a rise and then a fall?
- Does the plot seem satisfactorily concluded? Are there loose threads? If so, is the apparent lack of a complete resolution a weakness in the play? Or does it serve a function?

Gestures

The language of a play, broadly conceived, includes the gestures that the characters make and the settings in which they make them. As Ezra Pound said, "The medium of drama is not words, but persons moving about on a stage using words." Because plays are meant to be seen, you'll want to make every effort to visualize the action when you read a play. Ibsen is getting at something important when he tells us in a stage direction that Nora "walks cautiously over to the door to the study and listens." Her silent actions tell us as much about her as many of her speeches do.

Gestures can be interpreted even more broadly: The mere fact that a character enters, leaves, or does not enter may be highly significant. John Russell Brown comments on the actions and the absence of certain words that in Hamlet convey the growing separation between King Claudius and his wife, Gertrude:

> Their first appearance together with a public celebration of marriage is a large and simple visual effect, and Gertrude's close concern for her son suggests a simple, and perhaps unremarkable modification. . . . But Claudius enters without Gertrude for his "Prayer Scene" (3.2) and, for the first time, Gertrude enters without him for the Closet Scene (3.4) and is left alone, again for the first time, when Polonius hides behind the arras. Thereafter earlier accord is revalued by an increasing separation, often poignantly silent and unexpected. When Claudius calls Gertrude to leave with him after Hamlet has dragged off Polonius' body, she makes no reply; twice more he urges her and she is still silent. But he does not remonstrate or question; rather he speaks of his own immediate concerns and, far from supporting her with assurances, becomes more aware of his own fears:
>
> O, come away!
> My soul is full of discord and dismay. (4.1.44–45)
>
> Emotion has been so heightened that it is remarkable that they leave together without further words. The audience has been aware of a new distance between Gertrude and Claudius, of her immobility and silence, and of his self-concern, haste, and insistence.[2]

Setting

Drama of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (especially the plays of Henrik Ibsen, Anton Chekhov, and George Bernard Shaw) is often thought to be

[2]John Russell Brown, Shakespeare's Plays in Performance (New York: St. Martin's, 1967), 139.

"realistic," but even a realistic playwright or stage designer selects from among many available materials. A realistic setting (indication of the locale), then, can say a great deal, and it can even serve as a symbol. Over and over again in Ibsen, we find the realistic setting of a nineteenth-century drawing room, with its heavy draperies and its bulky furniture, helping to convey Ibsen's vision of a bourgeois world that oppresses the individual who struggles to affirm other values.

Twentieth-century dramatists are often explicit about the symbolic qualities of the setting. Here is an example from Eugene O'Neill's Desire Under the Elms; only a part of the initial stage direction is given:

> The house is in good condition but in need of paint. Its walls are a sickly grayish, the green of the shutters faded. Two enormous elms are on each side of the house. They bend their trailing branches down over the roof. They appear to protect and at the same time subdue. There is a sinister maternity in their aspect, a crushing, jealous absorption. . . . They are like exhausted women resting their sagging breasts and hands and hair on its roof.

Not surprisingly, the action in the play includes deeds of "sinister maternity" (a mother kills her infant) and "jealous absorption."

In The Glass Menagerie Tennessee Williams tells us that > the apartment faces an alley and is entered by a fire-escape, a structure whose name is a touch of accidental poetic truth, for all of these huge buildings are always burning with the slow and implacable fires of human desperation.

Death of a Salesman opens with a long stage direction that includes this statement: "Before us is the Salesman's house. We are aware of towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides." Later, we will understand that this setting is a way of conveying Willy's sense that he is hemmed in, oppressed.

Characterization and Motivation

Characterization, or personality, is defined, as in fiction (see pages 351–52), by what the characters do (a stage direction tells us that "Nora dances more and more wildly"), by what they say (she asks her husband to play the piano), by what others say about them, and by the setting in which they move. The characters are also defined in part by other characters whom they in some degree resemble or from whom they in some degree differ. Hamlet, Laertes, and Fortinbras have each lost a father, but Hamlet spares the praying King Claudius, whereas Laertes, seeking vengeance on Hamlet for murdering Laertes's father, says he would cut Hamlet's throat in church. Hamlet meditates about the nature of action, but Fortinbras leads the Norwegians in a military campaign and ultimately acquires Denmark.

Other plays also provide examples of foils, or characters who are structured to create a comparison that heightens our understanding of each character. Macbeth and Banquo both hear prophecies, but they act and react differently; Brutus is one kind of assassin, and Cassius another, and Casca still another. Any analysis of a character, then, will probably have to take into account, in some degree, the other characters who help to show what he or she is, and who thus help to set forth his or her motivation (grounds for action, inner drives, goals).

✔CHECKLIST: Getting Ideas for Writing Arguments about Plays

Plot and Conflict

- ☐ Does the exposition introduce elements that will be ironically fulfilled? During the exposition, do you perceive things differently from the way the characters perceive them?
- ☐ Are certain happenings or situations recurrent? If so, what significance do you attach to them?
- ☐ If there is more than one plot, do the plots seem to be related? Is one plot clearly the main plot and another a sort of subplot, a minor variation on the theme?
- ☐ Do any scenes strike you as irrelevant?
- ☐ Are certain scenes so strongly foreshadowed that you anticipated them? If so, did the happenings in those scenes merely fulfill your expectations, or did they also surprise you?
- ☐ What kinds of conflict are there? Is one character pitted against another, one group against another, or one part of a personality against another part in the same person?
- ☐ How is the conflict resolved? Is the conflict resolved by an unambiguous triumph of one side or by a triumph that is in some degree a loss for the triumphant side? Do you find the resolution satisfying, or unsettling, or what? Why?

Character

- ☐ A dramatic character is not likely to be thoroughly realistic, a copy of someone we might know. Still, we can ask if the character is consistent and coherent. We can also ask whether the character is complex or a rather simple representative of some human type.
- ☐ How is the character defined? Consider what the character says and does, what others say about him or her, and what others do to him or her. Also consider other characters who more or less resemble the character in question; the similarities—and the differences—may be significant.
- ☐ How trustworthy are the characters when they characterize themselves? When they characterize others?
- ☐ Do characters change as the play goes on, or do we simply know them better at the end?
- ☐ What do you make of the minor characters? Are they merely necessary to the plot, or are they foils to other characters? Or do they serve some other function?
- ☐ If a character is tragic, does the tragedy seem to proceed from a moral flaw, from an intellectual error, from the malice of others, from sheer chance, or from some combination of these factors?
- ☐ What are the character's goals? To what degree do you sympathize with them? If a character is comic, do you laugh with or at the character?
- ☐ Do you think the characters are adequately motivated?
- ☐ Is a given character so meditative that you feel he or she is engaged less in a dialogue with others than in a dialogue with the self? If so, do you feel that this character is to some extent a spokesperson for the author, commenting not only on the world within the play but also on the outside world?

Nonverbal Language

- ☐ If the playwright does not provide full stage directions, try to imagine for at least one scene what gestures and tones might accompany each speech. (The first scene is usually a good one to try your hand at.)
- ☐ What do you make of the setting? Does it help to reveal character? Do changes of scene strike you as symbolic? If so, symbolic of what?

Thinking about a Film Version of a Play

Although one might at first think that a film version of a play is pretty much the play caught on film, as soon as one realizes that movies use such techniques as close-ups and high and low angle shots (the action is seen from above or below), one realizes that the film version of a play can be very different from the stage version, even though in both forms a story is told by means of actors. In Laurence Olivier's Hamlet (1944), dream-like dissolves (the shot fades into the background while a new shot appears to emerge from beneath it) suggest the prince's irresoluteness. Or consider the use of black-and-white versus color film; Olivier made Shakespeare's Henry V (1944) in color but made Hamlet in black and white because, in Olivier's view, color conveyed a splendor appropriate to England's heroic history, whereas black and white seemed more suited to somber tragedy.

Filmmakers customarily "open out" plays, giving us skies, beaches, city streets, and so forth. In Olivier's Hamlet, we get shots of the sea and the sky. The camera descends from a great height just before Hamlet delivers his first soliloquy, and when the Ghost leaves at 1.5.96, the camera soars into the air, as though with the Ghost, and then, from above, the camera shows Hamlet fainting at the battlements. Even when the camera shows us scenes within the palace, it opens out the play by panning and traveling through long, empty corridors and over staircases, suggesting Hamlet's irresolute mind. (Kenneth Branagh's film version of Hamlet [1996] is very different; for a student's discussion of this film, see the essay by Will Saretta that appears on page 764.)

In the 1985 film (for television) version of Death of a Salesman, with Dustin Hoffman, perhaps the most impressive example of opening out the play comes at the very beginning, when the screen credits are given: We read the words while we see Willy, through the windshield of his car, driving home. Other examples of opening out the play show Willy walking the streets, muttering to strangers, and at least one scene shows the outside of Willy's house, with its paint peeling.

The 1987 film version of The Glass Menagerie, directed by Paul Newman, may suffer in part because the camera is not adventurous enough. Much of the play is shot in close-up, with the result that this film of Tennessee Williams's "memory play" has a realism and an in-your-face quality that is at odds with the dreaminess and fragility of the play. A stage production—usually set within a proscenium and making use of evidently theatrical lighting—has an illusionary or unrealistic quality that is appropriate to Williams's play, in which a narrator (Tom) conjures up scenes. Newman gives us almost all of Williams's dialogue, but he loses almost all of the magic of the play.

Getting Ready to Write about a Filmed Play

A mastery of the terminology does not make anyone a perceptive film critic, but it helps writers communicate their perceptions to readers. Probably an essay on a film will not be primarily about the use of establishing shots or wipes; rather, it will be about the reasons why a particular film pleases or displeases, succeeds or fails, seems significant or insignificant; and, in discussing these large matters, it is sometimes necessary (or at least economical) to use common technical terms. Large matters are often determined in part by such seemingly small matters as the distance of the camera from its subject or the way in which transitions are made, and one may as well use the conventional terms. However, a filmmaker's technique and technology alone cannot make a first-rate film. An idea, a personal vision, a theme must be embodied in all that is flashed on the screen.

Writing an essay about a new film—one not yet available for study on DVD—presents difficulties that are not encountered when we are writing about stories, plays, or poems. Because we experience film in a darkened room, we cannot easily take notes, and, because the film may be shown only once, we cannot always take another look at passages that puzzle us. When brief notes can be taken in the dark, however, it is best to amplify them as soon as light is available, while you still know what the scrawls mean. If you can see the film more than once, do so, and if the script has been published, study it. Draft your paper as soon as possible after your first viewing, and then see the film again. You can sometimes check hazy memories of certain scenes and techniques with fellow viewers. Even with multiple viewings and the aid of friends, it is almost impossible to get all the details right; it is best for the writer to be humble and for the reader to be tolerant.

Reminder: For a sample essay by a student, see the essay on Kenneth Branagh's Hamlet, which appears at the end of this chapter.

✔ CHECKLIST: Writing about a Filmed Play

Preliminaries

- ☐ Is the title of the film the same as the title of the play? If not, what is implied?

Dramatic Adaptations

- ☐ Does the film closely follow the original play and neglect the potentialities of the camera? Or does it so revel in cinematic devices that it distorts the original?
- ☐ Does the film do violence to the theme of the original? Is the film better than its source? Are additions or omissions due to the medium or to a crude or faulty interpretation of the original?

Plot and Character

- ☐ Can film deal as effectively with inner action—mental processes—as with external, physical action? In a given film, how is the inner action conveyed? Olivier used voice-over for parts of Hamlet's soliloquies—that is, we hear Hamlet's voice, but his lips do not move.

- ☐ Are shots and sequences adequately developed, or do they seem jerky? (A shot may be jerky by being extremely brief or at an odd angle; a sequence may be jerky by using discontinuous images or fast cuts. Sometimes, of course, jerkiness may be desirable.) If such cinematic techniques as wipes, dissolves, and slow motion are used, are they meaningful and effective?
- ☐ Are the characters believable?
- ☐ Are the actors appropriately cast?

Sound Track

- ☐ Does the sound track offer more than realistic dialogue? Is the music appropriate and functional? (Music may, among other things, imitate natural sounds, give a sense of locale or of ethnic group, suggest states of mind, provide ironic commentary, or—by repetition—help establish connections.) Are volume, tempo, and pitch—whether of music or of such sounds as the wind blowing or cars moving—used to stimulate emotions?

Student Writing Portfolio

COMPARISON PAPER

Writing a Comparison Paper

Comparison provides a popular means of generating an analytical paper. Bringing together two or more literary works encourages you to think about the relationships that can be created between authors, texts, and ideas. Comparing and contrasting texts allows you to see each text with new eyes. This form of critical thinking puts each text into a new context—the context of the other text—and reveals ideas that may be hidden when a text is considered in isolation. Writing a comparison paper allows you to explore how ideas are developed differently in two texts, how themes may work across texts to connect them, and how literary elements are used similarly or differently in two texts. Comparison/contrast allows you to stretch your thinking about a text by putting it into a relationship.

A comparison/contrast assignment asks for juxtaposition. The term "juxtapose" captures the idea of bringing two texts together, placing them side by side, and seeing how they resonate. Rather than thinking of comparing texts (finding similarities between them) and then contrasting texts (finding differences between them), think of putting the texts into a dynamic relationship. For example, you can think of the two texts as if they were talking to each other: What would they argue about; what would they agree on? Or, you can think of connecting the texts by asking where, why, and how the two texts connect. In juxtaposition, you create the relationship between the texts, explaining what connections are most important.

Before we explore one student's writing process for her comparison paper, let's look at the two selections that Yuki Chen was asked to compare: two versions of the same plot, as written and rewritten by Susan Glaspell in her play, Trifles, and in her short story, "A Jury of Her Peers."

Susan Glaspell

Susan Glaspell (1876–1948) was born in Davenport, Iowa, and was educated at Drake University in Des Moines. In 1903, she married the novelist, poet, and playwright George Cram Cook and, with Cook and other writers, actors, and artists, in 1915 founded the Provincetown Players, a group that remained vital until 1929. Glaspell wrote Trifles (1916) for the Provincetown Players, and she also wrote stories, novels, and a biography of her husband. In 1931, she won a Pulitzer Prize for Alison's House*, a play about the family of a deceased poet who in some ways resembles Emily Dickinson.*

Trifles

SCENE: The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of JOHN WRIGHT, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order—unwashed pans under the sink, a loaf of bread outside the breadbox, a dish towel on the table—other signs of incompleted work. At the rear the outer door opens, and the SHERIFF comes in, followed by the COUNTY ATTORNEY and HALE. The SHERIFF and HALE are men in middle life, the COUNTY ATTORNEY is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the SHERIFF'S WIFE first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. MRS. HALE is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly and stand close together near the door.

COUNTY ATTORNEY [rubbing his hands]: This feels good. Come up to the fire, ladies.

MRS. PETERS [after taking a step forward]: I'm not—cold.

SHERIFF [unbuttoning his overcoat and stepping away from the stove as if to the beginning of official business]: Now, Mr. Hale, before we move things about, you explain to Mr. Henderson just what you saw when you came here yesterday morning.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: By the way, has anything been moved? Are things just as you left them yesterday?

SHERIFF [looking about]: It's just the same. When it dropped below zero last night, I thought I'd better send Frank out this morning to make a fire for us—no use getting pneumonia with a big case on; but I told him not to touch anything except the stove—and you know Frank.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Somebody should have been left here yesterday.

SHERIFF: Oh—yesterday. When I had to send Frank to Morris Center for that man who went crazy—I want you to know I had my hands full yesterday. I knew you could get back from Omaha by today, and as long as I went over everything here myself—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Well, Mr. Hale, tell just what happened when you came here yesterday morning.

HALE: Harry and I had started to town with a load of potatoes. We came along the road from my place; and as I got here, I said, "I'm going to see if I can't get Harry and I had started to town John Wright to go in with me on a party telephone." I spoke to Wright about it once before, and he put me off, saying folks talked too much anyway, and all he asked was peace and quiet—I guess you know about how much he talked himself; but I thought maybe if I went to the house and talked about it before his wife, though I said to Harry that I didn't know as what his wife wanted made much difference to John—

The original Provincetown Players production (1916) of Trifles. The New York Public Library/Art Resource, NY.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Let's talk about that later, Mr. Hale. I do want to talk about that, but tell now just what happened when you got to the house.

HALE: I didn't hear or see anything; I knocked at the door, and still it was all quiet inside. I knew they must be up, it was past eight o'clock. So I knocked again, and I thought I heard somebody say, "Come in." I wasn't sure, I'm not sure yet, but I opened the door—this door [indicating the door by which the two women are still standing], and there in that rocker—[pointing to it] sat Mrs. Wright. [They all look at the rocker.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: What—was she doing?

HALE: She was rockin' back and forth. She had her apron in her hand and was kind of—pleating it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And how did she—look?

HALE: Well, she looked queer.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: How do you mean—queer?

HALE: Well, as if she didn't know what she was going to do next. And kind of done up.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: How did she seem to feel about your coming?

HALE: Why, I don't think she minded—one way or other. She didn't pay much attention. I said, "How do, Mrs. Wright, it's cold, ain't it?" And she said, "Is it?"—and went on kind of pleating at her apron. Well, I was surprised; she didn't ask me to come up to the stove, or to set down, but just sat there, not even looking at me, so I said, "I want to see John." And then she—laughed. I guess you would call it a laugh. I thought of Harry and the team outside, so I said a little sharp: "Can't I see John?" "No," she says, kind o' dull like. "Ain't he home?" says I. "Yes," says she, "he's home." "Then why can't I see him?" I asked her, out of patience. "'Cause he's dead," says she. "Dead?" says I. She just nodded her head, not getting a bit excited, but rockin' back and forth. "Why—where is he?" says I, not knowing what to say. She just pointed upstairs—like that [himself pointing to the room above]. I got up, with the idea of going up there. I walked from there to here—then I says, "Why, what did he die of?" "He died of a rope around his neck," says she, and just went on pleatin' at her apron. Well, I went out and called Harry. I thought I might—need help. We went upstairs, and there he was lyin'—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I think I'd rather have you go into that upstairs, where you can point it all out. Just go on now with the rest of the story.

HALE: Well, my first thought was to get that rope off. I looked . . . [Stops, his face twitches.] . . . but Harry, he went up to him, and he said, "No, he's dead all right, and we'd better not touch anything." So we went back downstairs. She was still sitting that same way. "Has anybody been notified?" I asked. "No," says she, unconcerned. "Who did this, Mrs. Wright?" said Harry. He said it businesslike—and she stopped pleatin' of her apron. "I don't know," she says. "You don't know?" says Harry. "No," says she. "Weren't you sleepin' in the bed with him?" says Harry. "Yes," says she, "but I was on the inside." "Somebody slipped a rope round his neck and strangled him, and you didn't wake up?" says Harry. "I didn't wake up," she said after him. We must 'a looked as if we didn't see how that could be, for after a minute she said, "I sleep sound." Harry was going to ask her more questions, but I said maybe we ought to let her tell her story first to the coroner, or the sheriff, so Harry went fast as he could to Rivers' place, where there's a telephone.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And what did Mrs. Wright do when she knew that you had gone for the coroner?

HALE: She moved from that chair to this over here . . . [Pointing to a small chair in the corner.] . . . and just sat there with her hands held together and looking down. I got a feeling that I ought to make some conversation, so I said I had come in to see if John wanted to put in a telephone, and at that she started to laugh, and then she stopped and looked at me—scared. [The COUNTY ATTORNEY, who has had his notebook out, makes a note.] I dunno, maybe it wasn't scared. I wouldn't like to say it was. Soon Harry got back, and then Dr. Lloyd came, and you, Mr. Peters, and so I guess that's all I know that you don't.

COUNTY ATTORNEY [looking around]: I guess we'll go upstairs first—and then out to the barn and around there. [To the SHERIFF.] You're convinced that there was nothing important here—nothing that would point to any motive?

SHERIFF: Nothing here but kitchen things. [The COUNTY ATTORNEY, after again looking around the kitchen, opens the door of a cupboard closet. He gets up on a chair and looks on a shelf. Pulls his hand away, sticky.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Here's a nice mess. [The women draw nearer.]

MRS. PETERS [to the other woman]: Oh, her fruit; it did freeze. [To the LAWYER.] She worried about that when it turned so cold. She said the fire'd go out and her jars would break.

SHERIFF: Well, can you beat the women! Held for murder and worryin' about her preserves.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I guess before we're through she may have something more serious than preserves to worry about.

HALE: Well, women are used to worrying over trifles.

[The two women move a little closer together.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY [with the gallantry of a young politician]: And yet, for all their worries, what would we do without the ladies? [The women do not unbend. He goes to the sink, takes a dipperful of water from the pail and, pouring it into a basin, washes his hands. Starts to wipe them on the roller towel, turns it for a cleaner place.] Dirty towels! [Kicks his foot against the pans under the sink.] Not much of a housekeeper, would you say, ladies?

MRS. HALE [stiffly]: There's a great deal of work to be done on a farm.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: To be sure. And yet . . . [With a little bow to her.] . . . I know there are some Dickson county farmhouses which do not have such roller towels. [He gives it a pull to expose its full length again.]

MRS. HALE: Those towels get dirty awful quick. Men's hands aren't always as clean as they might be.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Ah, loyal to your sex, I see. But you and Mrs. Wright were neighbors. I suppose you were friends, too.

MRS. HALE [shaking her head]: I've not seen much of her of late years. I've not been in this house—it's more than a year.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And why was that? You didn't like her?

MRS. HALE: I liked her all well enough. Farmers' wives have their hands full, Mr. Henderson. And then—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Yes—?

MRS. HALE [looking about]: It never seemed a very cheerful place.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: No—it's not cheerful. I shouldn't say she had the homemaking instinct.

MRS. HALE: Well, I don't know as Wright had, either.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: You mean that they didn't get on very well?

MRS. HALE: No, I don't mean anything. But I don't think a place'd be any cheerfuler for John Wright's being in it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I'd like to talk more of that a little later. I want to get the lay of things upstairs now. [He goes to the left, where three steps lead to a stair door.]

SHERIFF: I suppose anything Mrs. Peters does'll be all right. She was to take in some clothes for her, you know, and a few little things. We left in such a hurry yesterday.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Yes, but I would like to see what you take, Mrs. Peters, and keep an eye out for anything that might be of use to us.

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mr. Henderson.

[The women listen to the men's steps on the stairs, then look about the kitchen.]

MRS. HALE: I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing. [She arranges the pans under sink which the LAWYER had shoved out of place.]

MRS. PETERS: Of course it's no more than their duty.

MRS. HALE: Duty's all right, but I guess that deputy sheriff that came out to make the fire might have got a little of this on. [Gives the roller towel a pull.] Wish I'd thought of that sooner. Seems mean to talk about her for not having things slicked up when she had to come away in such a hurry.

MRS. PETERS [who has gone to a small table in the left rear corner of the room, and lifted one end of a towel that covers a pan]: She had bread set. [Stands still.]

MRS. HALE [eyes fixed on a loaf of bread beside the breadbox, which is on a low shelf at the other side of the room; moves slowly toward it]: She was going to put this in there. [Picks up loaf, then abruptly drops it. In a manner of returning to familiar things.] It's a shame about her fruit. I wonder if it's all gone. [Gets up on the chair and looks.] I think there's some here that's all right, Mrs. Peters. Yes—here; [Holding it toward the window.] this is cherries, too. [Looking again.] I declare I believe that's the only one. [Gets down, bottle in her hand. Goes to the sink and wipes it off on the outside.] She'll feel awful bad after all her hard work in the hot weather. I remember the afternoon I put up my cherries last summer. [She puts the bottle on the big kitchen table, center of the room, front table. With a sigh, is about to sit down in the rocking chair. Before she is seated realizes what chair it is; with a slow look at it, steps back. The chair, which she has touched, rocks back and forth.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, I must get those things from the front room closet. [She goes to the door at the right, but after looking into the other room steps back.] You coming with me, Mrs. Hale? You could help me carry them. [They go into the other room; reappear, MRS. PETERS carrying a dress and skirt, MRS. HALE following with a pair of shoes.]

MRS. PETERS: My, it's cold in there. [She puts the cloth on the big table, and hurries to the stove.]

MRS. HALE [examining the skirt]: Wright was close. I think maybe that's why she kept so much to herself. She didn't even belong to the Ladies' Aid. I suppose she felt she couldn't do her part, and then you don't enjoy things when you feel shabby. She used to wear pretty clothes and be lively, when she was Minnie Foster, one of the town girls singing in the choir. But that—oh, that was thirty years ago. This all you was to take in?

MRS. PETERS: She said she wanted an apron. Funny thing to want, for there isn't much to get you dirty in jail, goodness knows. But I suppose just to make her feel more natural. She said they was in the top drawer in this cupboard. Yes, here. And then her little shawl that always hung behind the door. [Opens stair door and looks.] Yes, here it is. [Quickly shuts door leading upstairs.]

MRS. HALE [abruptly moving toward her]: Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: Do you think she did it?

MRS. PETERS [in a frightened voice]: Oh, I don't know.

MRS. HALE: Well, I don't think she did. Asking for an apron and her little shawl. Worrying about her fruit.

MRS. PETERS [starts to speak, glances up, where footsteps are heard in the room above. In a low voice.]: Mr. Peters says it looks bad for her. Mr. Henderson is awful sarcastic in speech, and he'll make fun of her sayin' she didn't wake up.

MRS. HALE: Well, I guess John Wright didn't wake when they was slipping that rope under his neck.

MRS. PETERS: No, it's strange. It must have been done awful crafty and still. They say it was such a—funny way to kill a man, rigging it all up like that.

MRS. HALE: That's just what Mr. Hale said. There was a gun in the house. He says that's what he can't understand.

MRS. PETERS: Mr. Henderson said coming out that what was needed for the case was a motive; something to show anger, or—sudden feeling.

MRS. HALE [who is standing by the table]: Well, I don't see any signs of anger around here. [She puts her hand on the dish towel which lies on the table, stands looking down at the table, one half of which is clean, the other half messy.] It's wiped here. [Makes a move as if to finish work, then turns and looks at loaf of bread outside the breadbox. Drops towel. In that voice of coming back to familiar things.] Wonder how they are finding things upstairs? I hope she had it a little more red-up up there. You know, it seems kind of sneaking. Locking her up in town and then coming out here and trying to get her own house to turn against her!

MRS. PETERS: But, Mrs. Hale, the law is the law.

MRS. HALE: I s'pose 'is. [Unbuttoning her coat.] Better loosen up your things, Mrs. Peters. You won't feel them when you go out.

[MRS. PETERS takes off her fur tippet, goes to hang it on hook at the back of room, stands looking at the under part of the small corner table.]

MRS. PETERS: She was piecing a quilt. [She brings the large sewing basket, and they look at the bright pieces.]

MRS. HALE: It's log cabin pattern. Pretty, isn't it? I wonder if she was goin' to quilt or just knot it?

[Footsteps have been heard coming down the stairs. The SHERIFF enters, followed by HALE and the COUNTY ATTORNEY.]

SHERIFF: They wonder if she was going to quilt it or just knot it. [The men laugh, the women look abashed.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY [rubbing his hands over the stove]: Frank's fire didn't do much up there, did it? Well, let's go out to the barn and get that cleared up.

[The men go outside.]

MRS. HALE [resentfully]: I don't know as there's anything so strange, our takin' up our time with little things while we're waiting for them to get the evidence. [She sits down at the big table, smoothing out a block with decision.] I don't see as it's anything to laugh about.

MRS. PETERS [apologetically]: Of course they've got awful important things on their minds. [Pulls up a chair and joins MRS. HALE at the table.]

MRS. HALE [examining another block]: Mrs. Peters, look at this one. Here, this is the one she was working on, and look at the sewing! All the rest of it has been so nice and even. And look at this! It's all over the place! Why, it looks as if she didn't know what she was about! [After she has said this, they look at each other, then start to glance back at the door. After an instant MRS. HALE has pulled at a knot and ripped the sewing.]

MRS. PETERS: Oh, what are you doing, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE [mildly]: Just pulling out a stitch or two that's not sewed very good. [Threading a needle.] Bad sewing always made me fidgety.

MRS. PETERS [nervously]: I don't think we ought to touch things.

MRS. HALE: I'll just finish up this end. [Suddenly stopping and leaning forward.] Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: What do you suppose she was so nervous about?

MRS. PETERS: Oh—I don't know. I don't know as she was nervous. I sometimes sew awful queer when I'm just tired. [MRS. HALE starts to say something, looks at MRS. PETERS, then goes on sewing.] Well, I must get these things wrapped up. They may be through sooner than we think. [Putting apron and other things together.] I wonder where I can find a piece of paper, and string.

MRS. HALE: In that cupboard, maybe.

MRS. PETERS [looking in cupboard]: Why, here's a birdcage. [Holds it up.] Did she have a bird, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: Why, I don't know whether she did or not—I've not been here for so long. There was a man around last year selling canaries cheap, but I don't know as she took one; maybe she did. She used to sing real pretty herself.

MRS. PETERS [glancing around]: Seems funny to think of a bird here. But she must have had one, or why should she have a cage? I wonder what happened to it?

MRS. HALE: I s'pose maybe the cat got it.

MRS. PETERS: No, she didn't have a cat. She's got that feeling some people have about cats—being afraid of them. My cat got in her room, and she was real upset and asked me to take it out.

MRS. HALE: My sister Bessie was like that. Queer, ain't it?

MRS. PETERS [examining the cage]: Why, look at this door. It's broke. One hinge is pulled apart.

MRS. HALE [looking, too]: Looks as if someone must have been rough with it.

MRS. PETERS: Why, yes. [She brings the cage forward and puts it on the table.]

MRS. HALE: I wish if they're going to find any evidence they'd be about it. I don't like this place.

MRS. PETERS: But I'm awful glad you came with me, Mrs. Hale. It would be lonesome for me sitting here alone.

MRS. HALE: It would, wouldn't it? [Dropping her sewing.] But I tell you what I do wish, Mrs. Peters. I wish I had come over sometimes when she was here. I—[Looking around the room.]—wish I had.

MRS. PETERS: But of course you were awful busy, Mrs. Hale—your house and your children.

MRS. HALE: I could've come. I stayed away because it weren't cheerful—and that's why I ought to have come. I—I've never liked this place. Maybe because it's down in a hollow, and you don't see the road. I dunno what it is, but it's a lonesome place and always was. I wish I had come over to see Minnie Foster sometimes. I can see now—[Shakes her head.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, you mustn't reproach yourself, Mrs. Hale. Somehow we just don't see how it is with other folks until—something comes up.

MRS. HALE: Not having children makes less work—but it makes a quiet house, and Wright out to work all day, and no company when he did come in. Did you know John Wright, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Not to know him; I've seen him in town. They say he was a good man.

MRS. HALE: Yes—good; he didn't drink, and kept his word as well as most, I guess, and paid his debts. But he was a hard man, Mrs. Peters. Just to pass the time of day with him. [Shivers.] Like a raw wind that gets to the bone. [Pauses, her eye falling on the cage.] I should think she would 'a wanted a bird. But what do you suppose went with it?

MRS. PETERS: I don't know, unless it got sick and died. [She reaches over and swings the broken door, swings it again; both women watch it.]

MRS. HALE: You weren't raised round here, were you? [MRS. PETERS shakes her head.] You didn't know—her?

MRS. PETERS: Not till they brought her yesterday.

MRS. HALE: She—come to think of it, she was kind of like a bird herself—real sweet and pretty, but kind of timid and—fluttery. How—she—did—change. [Silence; then as if struck by a happy thought and relieved to get back to everyday things.] Tell you what, Mrs. Peters; why don't you take the quilt in with you? It might take up her mind.

MRS. PETERS: Why, I think that's a real nice idea, Mrs. Hale. There couldn't possibly be any objection to it, could there? Now, just what would I take? I wonder if her patches are in here—and her things. [They look in the sewing basket.]

MRS. HALE: Here's some red. I expect this has got sewing things in it. [Brings out a fancy box.] What a pretty box. Looks like something somebody would give you. Maybe her scissors are in here. [Opens box. Suddenly puts her hand to her nose.] Why—[MRS. PETERS bends nearer, then turns her face away.] There's something wrapped up in this piece of silk.

MRS. PETERS: Why, this isn't her scissors.

MRS. HALE [lifting the silk]: Oh, Mrs. Peters—it's—[MRS. PETERS bends closer.]

MRS. PETERS: It's the bird.

MRS. HALE [jumping up]: But, Mrs. Peters—look at it. Its neck! Look at its neck! It's all—other side to.

MRS. PETERS: Somebody—wrung—its neck.

[Their eyes meet. A look of growing comprehension of horror. Steps are heard outside. MRS. HALE slips box under quilt pieces, and sinks into her chair. Enter SHERIFF and COUNTY ATTORNEY. MRS. PETERS rises.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY [as one turning from serious things to little pleasantries]: Well, ladies, have you decided whether she was going to quilt it or knot it?

MRS. PETERS: We think she was going to—knot it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Well, that's interesting, I'm sure. [Seeing the birdcage.] Has the bird flown?

MRS. HALE [putting more quilt pieces over the box]: We think the—cat got it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY [preoccupied]: Is there a cat?

[MRS. HALE glances in a quick covert way at MRS. PETERS.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, not now. They're superstitious, you know. They leave.

COUNTY ATTORNEY [to SHERIFF, continuing an interrupted conversation]: No sign at all of anyone having come from the outside. Their own rope. Now let's go up again and go over it piece by piece. [They start upstairs.] It would have to have been someone who knew just the—[MRS. PETERS sits down.

The two women sit there not looking at one another, but as if peering into something and at the same time holding back. When they talk now, it is the manner of feeling their way over strange ground, as if afraid of what they are saying, but as if they cannot help saying it.]

MRS. HALE: She liked the bird. She was going to bury it in that pretty box.

MRS. PETERS [in a whisper]: When I was a girl—my kitten—there was a boy took a hatchet, and before my eyes—and before I could get there—[Covers her face an instant.] If they hadn't held me back, I would have—[Catches herself, looks upstairs where steps are heard, falters weakly.]—hurt him.

MRS. HALE [with a slow look around her]: I wonder how it would seem never to have had any children around. [Pause.] No, Wright wouldn't like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too.

MRS. PETERS [moving uneasily]: We don't know who killed the bird.

MRS. HALE: I knew John Wright.

MRS. PETERS: It was an awful thing was done in this house that night, Mrs. Hale. Killing a man while he slept, slipping a rope around his neck that choked the life out of him.

MRS. HALE: His neck. Choked the life out of him.

[Her hand goes out and rests on the birdcage.]

MRS. PETERS [with a rising voice]: We don't know who killed him. We don't know.

MRS. HALE [her own feeling not interrupted]: If there'd been years and years of nothing, then a bird to sing to you, it would be awful—still, after the bird was still.

MRS. PETERS [something within her speaking]: I know what stillness is. When we homesteaded in Dakota, and my first baby died—after he was two years old, and me with no other then—

MRS. HALE [moving]: How soon do you suppose they'll be through, looking for the evidence?

MRS. PETERS: I know what stillness is. [Pulling herself back.] The law has got to punish crime, Mrs. Hale.

MRS. HALE [not as if answering that]: I wish you'd seen Minnie Foster when she wore a white dress with blue ribbons and stood up there in the choir and sang. [A look around the room.] Oh, I wish I'd come over here once in a while! That was a crime! That was a crime! Who's going to punish that?

MRS. PETERS [looking upstairs]: We mustn't—take on.

MRS. HALE: I might have known she needed help! I know how things can be—for women. I tell you, it's queer, Mrs. Peters. We live close together and we live far apart. We all go through the same things—it's all just a different kind of the same thing. [Brushes her eyes, noticing the bottle of fruit, reaches out for it.] If I was you, I wouldn't tell her her fruit was gone. Tell her it ain't. Tell her it's all right. Take this in to prove it to her. She—she may never know whether it was broke or not.

MRS. PETERS [takes the bottle, looks about for something to wrap it in; takes petticoat from the clothes brought from the other room, very nervously begins winding this around the bottle. In a false voice]: My, it's a good thing the men couldn't hear us. Wouldn't they just laugh! Getting all stirred up over a little thing like a—dead canary. As if that could have anything to do with—with—wouldn't they laugh!

[The men are heard coming downstairs.]

MRS. HALE [under her breath]: Maybe they would—maybe they wouldn't.

COUNTY ATTORNEY : No, Peters, it's all perfectly clear except a reason for doing it. But you know juries when it comes to women. If there was some definite thing. Something to show—something to make a story about—a thing that would connect up with this strange way of doing it.

[The women's eyes meet for an instant. Enter HALE from outer door.]

HALE: Well, I've got the team around. Pretty cold out there.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I'm going to stay here awhile by myself. [To the SHERIFF.] You can send Frank out for me, can't you? I want to go over everything. I'm not satisfied that we can't do better.

SHERIFF: Do you want to see what Mrs. Peters is going to take in?

[The LAWYER goes to the table, picks up the apron, laughs.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Oh I guess they're not very dangerous things the ladies have picked up. [Moves a few things about, disturbing the quilt pieces which cover the box. Steps back.] No, Mrs. Peters doesn't need supervising. For that matter, a sheriff's wife is married to the law. Ever think of it that way, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Not—just that way.

SHERIFF [chuckling]: Married to the law. [Moves toward the other room.] I just want you to come in here a minute, George. We ought to take a look at these windows.

COUNTY ATTORNEY [scoffingly]: Oh, windows!

SHERIFF: We'll be right out, Mr. Hale.

[HALE goes outside. The SHERIFF follows the COUNTY ATTORNEY into the other room. Then MRS. HALE rises, hands tight together, looking intensely at MRS. PETERS, whose eyes take a slow turn, finally meeting MRS. HALE*'s. A moment* MRS. HALE holds her, then her own eyes point the way to where the box is concealed. Suddenly MRS. PETERS throws back quilt pieces and tries to put the box in the bag she is wearing. It is too big. She opens box, starts to take the bird out, cannot touch it, goes to pieces, stands there helpless. Sound of a knob turning in the other room. MRS. HALE snatches the box and puts it in the pocket of her big coat. Enter COUNTY ATTORNEY and SHERIFF.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY [facetiously]: Well, Henry, at least we found out that she was not going to quilt it. She was going to—what is it you call it, ladies?

MRS. HALE [her hand against her pocket]: We call it—knot it, Mr. Henderson.

CURTAIN

[1916]

A Jury of Her Peers

When Martha Hale opened the storm-door and got a cut of the north wind, she ran back for her big woolen scarf. As she hurriedly wound that round her head her eye made a scandalized sweep of her kitchen. It was no ordinary thing that called her away—it was probably farther from ordinary than anything that had ever happened in Dickson County. But what her eye took in was that her kitchen was in no shape for leaving; her bread all ready for mixing, half the flour sifted and half unsifted.

She hated to see things half done; but she had been at that when the team from town stopped to get Mr. Hale, and then the sheriff came running in to say his wife wished Mrs. Hale would come too—adding, with a grin, that he guessed she was getting scarey and wanted another woman along. So she had dropped everything right where it was.

"Martha!" now came her husband's impatient voice. "Don't keep folks waiting out here in the cold."

She again opened the storm-door, and this time joined the three men and the one woman waiting for her in the big two-seated buggy.

5 After she had the robes tucked around her she took another look at the woman who sat beside her on the back seat. She had met Mrs. Peters the year before at the county fair, and the thing she remembered about her was that she didn't seem like a sheriffs wife. She was small and thin and didn't have a strong voice. Mrs. Gorman, sheriffs wife before Gorman went out and Peters came in, had a voice that somehow seemed to be backing up the law with every word. But if Mrs. Peters didn't look like a sheriffs wife, Peters made it up in looking like a sheriff. He was to a dot the kind of man who could get himself elected sheriff—a heavy man with a big voice, who was particularly genial with the law-abiding, as if to make it plain that he knew the difference between criminals and non-criminals. And right there it came into Mrs. Hale's mind, with a stab, that this man who was so pleasant and lively with all of them was going to the Wrights' now as a sheriff.

"The country's not very pleasant this time of year," Mrs. Peters at last ventured, as if she felt they ought to be talking as well as the men.

Mrs. Hale scarcely finished her reply, for they had gone up a little hill and could see the Wright place now, and seeing it did not make her feel like talking. It looked very lonesome this cold March morning. It had always been a lonesome-looking place. It was down in a hollow, and the poplar trees around it were lonesome-looking trees. The men were looking at it and talking about what had happened. The county attorney was bending to one side of the buggy, and kept looking steadily at the place as they drew up to it.

"I'm glad you came with me," Mrs. Peters said nervously, as the two women were about to follow the men in through the kitchen door.

Even after she had her foot on the door-step, her hand on the knob, Martha Hale had a moment of feeling she could not cross that threshold. And the reason it seemed she couldn't cross it now was simply because she hadn't crossed it before. Time and time again it had been in her mind, "I ought to go over and see Minnie Foster"—she still thought of her as Minnie Foster, though for twenty years she had been Mrs. Wright. And then there was always something to do and Minnie Foster would go from her mind. But now she could come.

10 The men went over to the stove. The women stood close together by the door. Young Henderson, the county attorney, turned around and said, "Come up to the fire, ladies."

Mrs. Peters look a step forward, then stopped. "I'm not—cold," she said.

And so the two women stood by the door, at first not even so much as looking around the kitchen.

The men talked for a minute about what a good thing it was the sheriff had sent his deputy out that morning to make a fire for them, and then Sheriff Peters stepped back from the stove, unbuttoned his outer coat, and leaned his hands on the kitchen table in a way that seemed to mark the beginning of official business. "Now, Mr. Hale," he said in a sort of semi-official voice, "before we move things about, you tell Mr. Henderson just what it was you saw when you came here yesterday morning."

The county attorney was looking around the kitchen.

"By the way," he said, "has anything been moved?" He turned to the sheriff. "Are things just as you left them yesterday?"

Peters looked from cupboard to sink; from that to a small worn rocker a little to one side of the kitchen table.

"It's just the same."

"Somebody should have been left here yesterday," said the county attorney.

"Oh—yesterday," returned the sheriff, with a little gesture as of yesterday having been more than he could bear to think of. "When I had to send Frank to Morris Center for that man who went crazy—let me tell you. I had my hands full yesterday. I knew you could get back from Omaha by to-day, George, and as long as I went over everything here myself—"

"Well, Mr. Hale," said the county attorney, in a way of letting what was past and gone go, "tell just what happened when you came here yesterday morning."

Mrs. Hale, still leaning against the door, had that sinking feeling of the mother whose child is about to speak a piece. Lewis often wandered along and got things mixed up in a story. She hoped he would tell this straight and plain, and not say unnecessary things that would just make things harder for Minnie Foster. He didn't begin at once, and she noticed that he looked queer—as if standing in that kitchen and having to tell what he had seen there yesterday morning made him almost sick.

"Yes, Mr. Hale?" the county attorney reminded.

"Harry and I had started to town with a load of potatoes," Mrs. Hale's husband began.

Harry was Mrs. Hale's oldest boy. He wasn't with them now, for the very good reason that those potatoes never got to town yesterday and he was taking them this morning, so he hadn't been home when the sheriff stopped to say he wanted Mr. Hale to come over to the Wright place and tell the county attorney his story there, where he could point it all out. With all Mrs. Hale's other emotions came the fear now that maybe Harry wasn't dressed warm enough—they hadn't any of them realized how that north wind did bite.

"We come along this road," Hale was going on, with a motion of his hand to the road over which they had just come, "and as we got in sight of the house I says to Harry, 'I'm goin' to see if I can't get John Wright to take a telephone.' You see," he explained to Henderson, "unless I can get somebody to go in with me they won't come out this branch road except for a price / can't pay. I'd spoke to Wright about it once before; but he put me off, saying folks talked too much anyway, and all he asked was peace and quiet—guess you know about how much he talked himself. But I thought maybe if I went to the house and talked about it before his wife, and said all the women-folks liked the telephones, and that in this lonesome stretch of road it would be a good thing—well, I said to Harry that that was what I was going to say—though I said at the same time that I didn't know as what his wife wanted made much difference to John—"

Now, there he was!—saying things he didn't need to say. Mrs. Hale tried to catch her husband's eye, but fortunately the county attorney interrupted with:

"Let's talk about that a little later, Mr. Hale. I do want to talk about that, but I'm anxious now to get along to just what happened when you got here."

When he began this time, it was very deliberately and carefully:

"I didn't see or hear anything. I knocked at the door. And still it was all quiet inside. I knew they must be up—it was past eight o'clock. So I knocked again, louder, and I thought I heard somebody say, 'Come in.' I wasn't sure—I'm not sure yet. But I opened the door—this door," jerking a hand toward the door by which the two women stood, "and there, in that rocker"—pointing to it—"sat Mrs. Wright."

Every one in the kitchen looked at the rocker. It came into Mrs. Hale's mind that that rocker didn't look in the least like Minnie Foster—the Minnie Foster of twenty years before. It was a dingy red, with wooden rungs up the back, and the middle run was gone, and the chair sagged to one side.

"How did she—look?" the county attorney was inquiring.

"Well," said Hale, "she looked—queer."

"How do you mean—queer?"

As he asked it he took out a note-book and pencil. Mrs. Hale did not like the sight of that pencil. She kept her eye fixed on her husband, as if to keep him from saying unnecessary things that would go into that notebook and make trouble.

Hale did speak guardedly, as if the pencil had affected him too.

"Well, as if she didn't know what she was going to do next. And kind of—done up."

"How did she seem to feel about your coming?"

"Why, I don't think she minded—one way or other. She didn't pay much attention. I said, 'Ho' do, Mrs. Wright? It's cold, ain't it?' And she said, 'Is it?'—and went on pleatin' at her apron.

"Well, I was surprised. She didn't ask me to come up to the stove, or to sit down, but just set there, not even lookin' at me. And so I said: 'I want to see John.'

"And then she—laughed. I guess you would call it a laugh.

"I thought of Harry and the team outside, so I said, a little sharp, 'Can I see John?' 'No,' says she—kind of dull like. 'Ain't he home?' says I. Then she looked at me. 'Yes,' says she, 'he's home.' 'Then why can't I see him?' I asked her, out of patience with her now. "Cause he's dead,' says she, just as quiet and dull—and fell to pleatin' her apron. 'Dead?' says I, like you do when you can't take in what you've heard.

"She just nodded her head, not getting a bit excited, but rockin' back and forth.

"'Why—where is he?' says I, not knowing what to say.

"She just pointed upstairs—like this"—pointing to the room above.

"I got up, with the idea of going up there myself. By this time I—didn't know what to do. I walked from there to here; then I says: 'Why, what did he die of?'

"'He died of a rope round his neck,' says she; and just went on pleatin' at her apron."

Hale stopped speaking, and stood staring at the rocker, as if he were still seeing the woman who had sat there the morning before. Nobody spoke; it was as if every one were seeing the woman who had sat there the morning before.

"And what did you do then?" the county attorney at last broke the silence.

"I went out and called Harry. I thought I might—need help. I got Harry in, and we went upstairs." His voice fell almost to a whisper. "There he was—lying over the—"

"I think I'd rather have you go into that upstairs," the county attorney interrupted, "where you can point it all out. Just go on now with the rest of the story."

"Well, my first thought was to get that rope off. It looked—"

He stopped, his face twitching.

"But Harry, he went up to him, and he said, 'No, he's dead all right, and we'd better not touch anything.' So we went downstairs.

"She was still sitting that same way. 'Has anybody been notified?' I asked. 'No,' says she, unconcerned.

55 "'Who did this, Mrs. Wright?' said Harry. He said it businesslike, and she stopped pleatin' at her apron. 'I don't know,' she says. 'You don't know?' says Harry. 'Weren't you sleepin' in the bed with him?' 'Yes,' says she, 'but I was on the inside.' 'Somebody slipped a rope round his neck and strangled him, and you didn't wake up?' says Harry. 'I didn't wake up,' she said after him.

"We may have looked as if we didn't see how that could be, for after a minute she said, 'I sleep sound.'

"Harry was going to ask her more questions, but I said maybe that weren't our business; maybe we ought to let her tell her story first to the coroner or the sheriff. So Harry went fast as he could over to High Road—the Rivers' place, where there's a telephone."

"And what did she do when she knew you had gone for the coroner?" The attorney got his pencil in his hand all ready for writing.

"She moved from that chair to this one over here"—Hale pointed to a small chair in the corner—"and just sat there with her hands held together and looking down. I got a feeling that I ought to make some conversation, so I said I had come in to see if John wanted to put in a telephone; and at that she started to laugh, and then she stopped and looked at me—scared."

60 At sound of a moving pencil the man who was telling the story looked up.

"I dunno—maybe it wasn't scared," he hastened; "I wouldn't like to say it was. Soon Harry got back, and then Dr. Lloyd came, and you, Mr. Peters, and so I guess that's all I know that you don't."

He said that last with relief, and moved a little, as if relaxing. Every one moved a little. The county attorney walked toward the stair door.

"I guess we'll go upstairs first—then out to the barn and around there."

He paused and looked around the kitchen.

65 "You're convinced there was nothing important here?" he asked the sheriff. "Nothing that would—point to any motive?"

The sheriff too looked all around, as if to re-convince himself.

"Nothing here but kitchen things," he said, with a little laugh for the insignificance of kitchen things.

The county attorney was looking at the cupboard—a peculiar, ungainly structure, half closet and half cupboard, the upper part of it being built in the wall, and the lower part just the old-fashioned kitchen cupboard. As if its queerness attracted him, he got a chair and opened the upper part and looked in. After a moment he drew his hand away sticky.

"Here's a nice mess," he said resentfully.

70 The two women had drawn nearer, and now the sheriffs wife spoke.

"Oh—her fruit," she said, looking to Mrs. Hale for sympathetic understanding. She turned back to the county attorney and explained: "She worried about that when it turned so cold last night. She said the fire would go out and her jars might burst."

Mrs. Peters' husband broke into a laugh.

"Well, can you beat the women! Held for murder, and worrying about her preserves!"

The young attorney set his lips.

"I guess before we're through with her she may have something more serious than preserves to worry about."

"Oh, well," said Mrs. Hale's husband, with good-natured superiority, "women are used to worrying over trifles."

The two women moved a little closer together. Neither of them spoke. The county attorney seemed suddenly to remember his manners—and think of his future.

"And yet," said he, with the gallantry of a young politician, "for all their worries, what would we do without the ladies?"

The women did not speak, did not unbend. He went to the sink and began washing his hands. He turned to wipe them on the roller towel—whirled it for a cleaner place.

"Dirty towels! Not much of a housekeeper, would you say, ladies?"

He kicked his foot against some dirty pans under the sink.

"There's a great deal of work to be done on a farm," said Mrs. Hale stiffly.

"To be sure. And yet"—with a little bow to her—"I know there are some Dickson County farm-houses that do not have such roller towels." He gave it a pull to expose its full length again.

"Those towels get dirty awful quick. Men's hands aren't always as clean as they might be."

"Ah, loyal to your sex, I see." he laughed. He stopped and gave her a keen look. "But you and Mrs. Wright were neighbors. I suppose you were friends, too."

Martha Hale shook her head.

"I've seen little enough of her of late years. I've not been in this house—it's more than a year."

"And why was that? You didn't like her?"

"I liked her well enough," she replied with spirit. "Farmers' wives have their hands full, Mr. Henderson. And then—" She looked around the kitchen.

"Yes?" he encouraged.

"It never seemed a very cheerful place," said she, more to herself than to him.

"No," he agreed; "I don't think any one would call it cheerful. I shouldn't say she had the home-making instinct."

"Well, I don't know as Wright had, either," she muttered.

"You mean they didn't get on very well?" he was quick to ask.

"No; I don't mean anything," she answered, with decision. As she turned a little away from him, she added: "But I don't think a place would be any the cheerfuler for John Wright's bein' in it."

"I'd like to talk to you about that a little later, Mrs. Hale," he said. "I'm anxious to get the lay of things upstairs now."

He moved toward the stair door, followed by the two men.

"I suppose anything Mrs. Peters does'll be all right?" the sheriff inquired. "She was to take in some clothes for her, you know—and a few little things. We left in such a hurry yesterday."

The county attorney looked at the two women whom they were leaving alone there among the kitchen things.

"Yes—Mrs. Peters," he said, his glance resting on the woman who was not Mrs. Peters, the big farmer woman who stood behind the sheriff's wife. "Of course Mrs. Peters is one of us," he said, in a manner of entrusting responsibility. "And keep your eye out, Mrs. Peters, for anything that might be of use. No telling; you women might come upon a clue to the motive—and that's the thing we need."

Mr. Hale rubbed his face after the fashion of a show man getting ready for a pleasantry.

"But would the women know a clue if they did come upon it?" he said; and, having delivered himself of this, he followed the others through the stair door.

The women stood motionless and silent, listening to the footsteps, first upon the stairs, then in the room above them.

Then, as if releasing herself from something strange, Mrs. Hale began to arrange the dirty pans under the sink, which the county attorney's disdainful push of the foot had deranged.

105 "I'd hate to have men comin' into my kitchen," she said testily—"snoopin' round and criticizin'."

"Of course it's no more than their duty," said the sheriff's wife, in her manner of timid acquiescence.

"Duty's all right," replied Mrs. Hale bluffly; "but I guess that deputy sheriff that come out to make the fire might have got a little of this on." She gave the roller towel a pull. "Wish I'd thought of that sooner! Seems mean to talk about her for not having things slicked up, when she had to come away in such a hurry."

She looked around the kitchen. Certainly it was not "slicked up." Her eye was held by a bucket of sugar on a low shelf. The cover was off the wooden bucket, and beside it was a paper bag—half full.

Mrs. Hale moved toward it.

110 "She was putting this in there," she said to herself—slowly.

She thought of the flour in her kitchen at home—half sifted, half not sifted. She had been interrupted, and had left things half done. What had interrupted Minnie Foster? Why had that work been left half done? She made a move as if to finish it,—unfinished things always bothered her,—and then she glanced around and saw that Mrs. Peters was watching her—and she didn't want Mrs. Peters to get that feeling she had got of work begun and then—for some reason—not finished.

"It's a shame about her fruit," she said, and walked toward the cupboard that the county attorney had opened, and got on the chair, murmuring: "I wonder if it's all gone."

It was a sorry enough looking sight, but "Here's one that's all right," she said at last. She held it toward the light. "This is cherries, too." She looked again. "I declare I believe that's the only one."

With a sigh, she got down from the chair, went to the sink, and wiped off the bottle.

115 "She'll feel awful bad, after all her hard work in the hot weather. I remember the afternoon I put up my cherries last summer."

She set the bottle on the table, and, with another sigh, started to sit down in the rocker. But she did not sit down. Something kept her from sitting down in that chair. She straightened—stepped back, and, half turned away, stood looking at it, seeing the woman who had sat there "pleatin' at her apron."

The thin voice of the sheriff's wife broke in upon her: "I must be getting those things from the front room closet." She opened the door into the other room, started in, stepped back. "You coming with me, Mrs. Hale?" she asked nervously. "You—you could help me get them."

They were soon back—the stark coldness of that shut-up room was not a thing to linger in.

"My!" said Mrs. Peters, dropping the things on the table and hurrying to the stove.

Mrs. Hale stood examining the clothes the woman who was being detained in town had said she wanted.

"Wright was close!" she exclaimed, holding up a shabby black skirt that bore the marks of much making over. "I think maybe that's why she kept so much to herself. I s'pose she felt she couldn't do her part; and then, you don't enjoy things when you feel shabby. She used to wear pretty clothes and be lively—when she was Minnie Foster, one of the town girls, singing in the choir. But that—oh, that was twenty years ago."

With a carefulness in which there was something tender, she folded the shabby clothes and piled them at one corner of the table. She looked up at Mrs. Peters, and there was something in the other woman's look that irritated her.

"She don't care," she said to herself. "Much difference it makes to her whether Minnie Foster had pretty clothes when she was a girl."

Then she looked again, and she wasn't so sure; in fact, she hadn't at any time been perfectly sure about Mrs. Peters. She had that shrinking manner, and yet her eyes looked as if they could see a long way into things.

"This all you was to take in?" asked Mrs. Hale.

"No," said the sheriffs wife; "she said she wanted an apron. Funny thing to want," she ventured in her nervous little way, "for there's not much to get you dirty in jail, goodness knows. But I suppose just to make her feel more natural. If you're used to wearing an apron—. She said they were in the bottom drawer of this cupboard. Yes—here they are. And then her little shawl that always hung on the stair door."

She took the small gray shawl from behind the door leading upstairs, and stood a minute looking at it.

Suddenly Mrs. Hale took a quick step toward the other woman.

"Mrs. Peters!"

"Yes, Mrs. Hale?"

"Do you think she—did it?"

A frightened look blurred the other thing in Mrs. Peters' eyes.

"Oh, I don't know," she said, in a voice that seemed to shrink away from the subject.

"Well, I don't think she did," affirmed Mrs. Hale stoutly. "Asking for an apron, and her little shawl. Worryin' about her fruit."

"Mr. Peters says—" Footsteps were heard in the room above; she stopped, looked up, then went on in a lowered voice: "Mr. Peters says—it looks bad for her. Mr. Henderson is awful sarcastic in a speech, and he's going to make fun of her saying she didn't—wake up."

For a moment Mrs. Hale had no answer. Then, "Well, I guess John Wright didn't wake up—when they was slippin' that rope under his neck," she muttered.

"No, it's strange," breathed Mrs. Peters. "They think it was such a—funny way to kill a man."

She began to laugh; at sound of the laugh, abruptly stopped.

"That's just what Mr. Hale said," said Mrs. Hale, in a resolutely natural voice. "There was a gun in the house. He says that's what he can't understand."

"Mr. Henderson said, coming out, that what was needed for the case was a motive. Something to show anger—or sudden feeling."

"Well, I don't see any signs of anger around here," said Mrs. Hale. "I don't—"

She stopped. It was as if her mind tripped on something. Her eye was caught by a dish-towel in the middle of the kitchen table. Slowly she moved toward the table. One half of it was wiped clean, the other half messy. Her eyes made a slow, almost unwilling turn to the bucket of sugar and the half empty bag beside it. Things begun—and not finished.

After a moment she stepped back, and said, in that manner of releasing herself:

"Wonder how they're finding things upstairs? I hope she had it a little more red up up there. You know,"—she paused, and feeling gathered,—"it seems kind of sneaking: locking her up in town and coming out here to get her own house to turn against her!"

"But, Mrs. Hale," said the sheriff's wife, "the law is the law."

"I s'pose 'tis," answered Mrs. Hale shortly.

She turned to the stove, saying something about that fire not being much to brag of. She worked with it a minute, and when she straightened up she said aggressively:

"The law is the law—and a bad stove is a bad stove. How'd you like to cook on this?"—pointing with the poker to the broken lining. She opened the oven door and started to express her opinion of the oven; but she was swept into her own thoughts, thinking of what it would mean, year after year, to have that stove to wrestle with. The thought of Minnie Foster trying to bake in that oven—and the thought of her never going over to see Minnie Foster—.

She was startled by hearing Mrs. Peters say: "A person gets discouraged—and loses heart."

The sheriff's wife had looked from the stove to the sink—to the pail of water which had been carried in from outside. The two women stood there silent, above them the footsteps of the men who were looking for evidence against the woman who had worked in that kitchen. That look of seeing into things, of seeing through a thing to something else, was in the eyes of the sheriff's wife now. When Mrs. Hale next spoke to her, it was gently:

"Better loosen up your things, Mrs. Peters. We'll not feel them when we go out."

Mrs. Peters went to the back of the room to hang up the fur tippet she was wearing. A moment later she exclaimed, "Why, she was piecing a quilt," and held up a large sewing basket piled high with quilt pieces.

Mrs. Hale spread some of the blocks out on the table.

"It's log cabin pattern." she said, putting several of them together. "Pretty, isn't it?"

They were so engaged with the quilt that they did not hear the footsteps on the stairs. Just as the stair door opened Mrs. Hale was saying:

"Do you suppose she was going to quilt it or just knot it?"

The sheriff threw up his hands.

"They wonder whether she was going to quilt it or just knot it!"

There was a laugh for the ways of women, a warming of hands over the stove, and then the county attorney said briskly:

"Well, let's go right out to the barn and get that cleared up."

"I don't see as there's anything so strange," Mrs. Hale said resentfully, after the outside door had closed on the three men—"our taking up our time with little things while we're waiting for them to get the evidence. I don't see as it's anything to laugh about."

"Of course they've got awful important things on their minds," said the sheriff's wife apologetically.

They returned to an inspection of the block for the quilt. Mrs. Hale was looking at the fine, even sewing, and preoccupied with thoughts of the woman who had done that sewing, when she heard the sheriff's wife say, in a queer tone:

"Why, look at this one."

She turned to take the block held out to her.

"The sewing," said Mrs. Peters, in a troubled way. "All the rest of them have been so nice and even—but—this one. Why, it looks as if she didn't know what she was about!"

Their eyes met—something flashed to life, passed between them; then, as if with an effort, they seemed to pull away from each other. A moment Mrs. Hale sat there, her hands folded over that sewing which was so unlike all the rest of the sewing. Then she had pulled a knot and drawn the threads.

"Oh, what are you doing, Mrs. Hale?" asked the sheriff's wife, startled.

"Just pulling out a stitch or two that's not sewed very good," said Mrs. Hale mildly.

"I don't think we ought to touch things," Mrs. Peters said, a little helplessly.

"I'll just finish up this end," answered Mrs. Hale, still in that mild, matter-of-fact fashion.

She threaded a needle and started to replace bad sewing with good. For a little while she sewed in silence. Then, in that thin, timid voice, she heard:

"Mrs. Hale!"

"Yes, Mrs. Peters?"

"What do you suppose she was so—nervous about?"

"Oh, / don't know," said Mrs. Hale, as if dismissing a thing not important enough to spend much time on, "I don't know as she was—nervous. I sew awful queer sometimes when I'm just tired."

She cut a thread, and out of the corner of her eye looked up at Mrs. Peters. The small, lean face of the sheriff's wife seemed to have tightened up. Her eyes had that look of peering into something. But next moment she moved, and said in her thin, indecisive way:

"Well, I must get those clothes wrapped. They may be through sooner than we think. I wonder where I could find a piece of paper—and string."

"In that cupboard, maybe," suggested Mrs. Hale, after a glance around.

One piece of the crazy sewing remained unripped. Mrs. Peters' back turned, Martha Hale now scrutinized that piece, compared it with the dainty, accurate sewing of the other blocks. The difference was startling. Holding this block made her feel queer, as if the distracted thoughts of the woman who had perhaps turned to it to try and quiet herself were communicating themselves to her.

Mrs. Peters' voice roused her.

"Here's a bird-cage," she said, "Did she have a bird, Mrs. Hale?"

"Why, I don't know whether she did or not." She turned to look at the cage Mrs. Peter was holding up. "I've not been here in so long." She sighed. "There was a man round last year selling canaries cheap—but I don't know as she look one. Maybe she did. She used to sing real pretty herself."

Mrs. Peters looked around the kitchen.

"Seems kind of funny to think of a bird here." She half laughed—an attempt to put up a barrier. "But she must have had one—or why would she have a cage? I wonder what happened to it."

"I suppose maybe the cat got it," suggested Mrs. Hale, resuming her sewing.

"No; she didn't have a cat. She's got that feeling some people have about cats—being afraid of them. When they brought her to our house yesterday, my cat got in the room, and she was real upset and asked me to take it out."

"My sister Bessie was like that," laughed Mrs. Hale.

190 The sheriff's wife did not reply. The silence made Mrs. Hale turn round. Mrs. Peters was examining the bird-cage.

"Look at this door," she said slowly. "It's broke. One hinge has been pulled apart."

Mrs. Hale came nearer.

"Looks as if some one must have been—rough with it."

Again their eyes met—startled, questioning, apprehensive. For a moment neither spoke nor stirred. Then Mrs. Hale, turning away, said brusquely:

195 "If they're going to find any evidence, I wish they'd be about it. I don't like this place."

"But I'm awful glad you came with me, Mrs. Hale." Mrs. Peters put the bird-cage on the table and sat down. "It would be lonesome for me—sitting here alone."

"Yes, it would, wouldn't it?" agreed Mrs. Hale, a certain determined naturalness in her voice. She had picked up the sewing, but now it dropped in her lap, and she murmured in a different voice: "But I tell you what I do wish, Mrs. Peters. I wish I had come over sometimes when she was here. I wish—I had."

"But of course you were awful busy, Mrs. Hale. Your house—and your children."

"I could've come," retorted Mrs. Hale shortly. "I stayed away because it weren't cheerful—and that's why I ought to have come. I"—she looked around—"I've never liked this place. Maybe because it's down in a hollow and you don't see the road. I don't know what it is, but it's a lonesome place, and always was. I wish I had come over to see Minnie Foster sometimes. I can see now—" She did not put it into words.

200 "Well, you mustn't reproach yourself," counseled Mrs. Peters. "Somehow, we just don't see how it is with other folks till—something comes up."

Not having children makes less work," mused Mrs. Hale, after a silence, "but it makes a quiet house—and Wright out to work all day—and no company when he did come in. Did you know John Wright, Mrs. Peters?"

"Not to know him. I've seen him in town. They say he was a good man."

"Yes—good," conceded John Wright's neighbor grimly. "He didn't drink, and kept his word as well as most, I guess, and paid his debts. But he was a hard man, Mrs. Peters. Just to pass the time of day with him—." She stopped, shivered a little. "Like a raw wind that gets to the bone." Her eye fell upon the cage on the table before her, and she added, almost bitterly: "I should think she would've wanted a bird!"

Suddenly she leaned forward, looking intently at the cage. "But what do you s'pose went wrong with it?"

205 "I don't know," returned Mrs. Peters; "unless it got sick and died."

But after she said it she reached over and swung the broken door. Both women watched it as if somehow held by it.

"You didn't know—her?" Mrs. Hale asked, a gentler note in her voice.

"Not till they brought her yesterday," said the sheriff's wife.

"She—come to think of it, she was kind of like a bird herself. Real sweet and pretty, but kind of timid and—fluttery. How—she—did—change."

That held her for a long time. Finally, as if struck with a happy thought and relieved to get back to everyday things, she exclaimed:

"Tell you what, Mrs. Peters, why don't you take the quilt in with you? It might take up her mind."

"Why, I think that's a real nice idea, Mrs. Hale," agreed the sheriff's wife, as if she too were glad to come into the atmosphere of a simple kindness. "There couldn't possibly be any objection to that, could there? Now, just what will I take? I wonder if her patches are in here—and her things."

They turned to the sewing basket.

"Here's some red," said Mrs. Hale, bringing out a roll of cloth. Underneath that was a box. "Here, maybe her scissors are in here—and her things." She held it up. "What a pretty box! I'll warrant that was something she had a long time ago—when she was a girl."

She held it in her hand a moment; then, with a little sigh, opened it.

Instantly her hand went to her nose.

"Why—!"

Mrs. Peters drew nearer—then turned away.

"There's something wrapped up in this piece of silk," faltered Mrs. Hale.

"This isn't her scissors," said Mrs. Peters, in a shrinking voice.

Her hand not steady, Mrs. Hale raised the piece of silk. "Oh, Mrs. Peters!" she cried. "It's —"

Mrs. Peters bent closer.

"It's the bird," she whispered.

"But, Mrs. Peters!" cried Mrs. Hale. "Look at it! Its neck—look at its neck! It's all—other side to"

She held the box away from her.

The sheriff's wife again bent closer.

"Somebody wrung its neck," said she, in a voice that was slow and deep.

And then again the eyes of the two women met—this time clung together in a look of dawning comprehension, of growing horror. Mrs. Peters looked from the dead bird to the broken door of the cage. Again their eyes met. And just then there was a sound at the outside door.

Mrs. Hale slipped the box under the quilt pieces in the basket, and sank into the chair before it. Mrs. Peters stood holding to the table. The county attorney and the sheriff came in from outside.

"Well, ladies," said the county attorney, as one turning from serious things to little pleasantries, "have you decided whether she was going to quilt it or knot it?"

"We think," began the sheriff's wife in a flurried voice, "that she was going to—knot it."

He was too preoccupied to notice the change that came in her voice on that last.

"Well, that's very interesting, I'm sure," he said tolerantly. He caught sight of the bird-cage. "Has the bird flown?"

"We think the cat got it," said Mrs. Hale in a voice curiously even.

He was walking up and down, as if thinking something out.

"Is there a cat?" he asked absently.

Mrs. Hale shot a look up at the sheriff's wife.

"Well, not now" said Mrs. Peters. "They're superstitious, you know; they leave."

She sank into her chair.

The county attorney did not heed her. "No sign at all of any one having come in from the outside," he said to Peters, in the manner of continuing an interrupted conversation. "Their own rope. Now let's go upstairs again and go over it, piece by piece. It would have to have been some one who knew just the—"

The stair door closed behind them and their voices were lost.

The two women sat motionless, not looking at each other, but as if peering into something and at the same time holding back. When they spoke now it was as if they were afraid of what they were saying, but as if they could not help saying it.

"She liked the bird," said Martha Hale, low and slowly. "She was going to bury it in that pretty box."

"When I was a girl," said Mrs. Peters, under her breath, "my kitten—there was a boy took a hatchet, and before my eyes—before I could get there—" She covered her face an instant. "If they hadn't held me back I would have"—she caught herself, looked upstairs where footsteps were heard, and finished weakly—"hurt him."

Then they sat without speaking or moving.

"I wonder how it would seem," Mrs. Hale at last began, as if feeling her way over strange ground—"never to have had any children around?" Her eyes made a slow sweep of the kitchen, as if seeing what that kitchen had meant through all the years. "No, Wright wouldn't like the bird," she said after that—"a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that too." Her voice tightened.

Mrs. Peters moved uneasily.

"Of course we don't know who killed the bird."

"I knew John Wright," was Mrs. Hale's answer.

"It was an awful thing was done in this house that night, Mrs. Hale," said the sheriff's wife. "Killing a man while he slept—slipping a thing round his neck that choked the life out of him."

Mrs. Hale's hand went out to the bird-cage.

"His neck. Choked the life out of him."

"We don't know who killed him," whispered Mrs. Peters wildly. "We don't know."

Mrs. Hale had not moved. "If there had been years and years of—nothing, then a bird to sing to you, it would be awful—still—after the bird was still."

It was as if something within her not herself had spoken, and it found in Mrs. Peters something she did not know as herself.

"I know what stillness is," she said, in a queer, monotonous voice. "When we homesteaded in Dakota, and my first baby died—after he was two years old—and me with no other then—"

Mrs. Hale stirred.

"How soon do you suppose they'll be through looking for the evidence?"

"I know what stillness is," repeated Mrs. Peters, in just that same way. Then she too pulled back. "The law has got to punish crime, Mrs. Hale," she said in her tight little way.

"I wish you'd seen Minnie Foster," was the answer, "when she wore a white dress with blue ribbons, and stood up there in the choir and sang."

The picture of that girl, the fact that she had lived neighbor to that girl for twenty years, and had let her die for lack of life, was suddenly more than she could bear.

"Oh, I wish I'd come over here once in a while!" she cried. "That was a crime! That was a crime! Who's going to punish that?"

"We mustn't take on," said Mrs. Peters, with a frightened look toward the stairs.

"I might 'a' known she needed help! I tell you, it's queer, Mrs. Peters. We live close together, and we live far apart. We all go through the same things—it's all just a different kind of the same thing! If it weren't—why do you and I understand? Why do we know—what we know this minute?"

She dashed her hand across her eyes. Then, seeing the jar of fruit on the table, she reached for it and choked out:

"If I was you I wouldn't tell her her fruit was gone! Tell her it ain't. Tell her it's all right—all of it. Here—take this in to prove it to her! She—she may never know whether it was broke or not,"

She turned away.

Mrs. Peters reached out for the bottle of fruit as if she were glad to take it—as if touching a familiar thing, having something to do, could keep her from something else. She got up, looked about for something to wrap the fruit in, took a petticoat from the pile of clothes she had brought from the front room, and nervously started winding that round the bottle.

"My!" she began, in a high, false voice, "it's a good thing the men couldn't hear us! Getting all stirred up over a little thing like a—dead canary." She hurried over that. "As if that could have anything to do with—with—My, wouldn't they laugh?"

Footsteps were heard on the stairs.

"Maybe they would," muttered Mrs. Hale—"maybe they wouldn't."

"No, Peters," said the county attorney incisively; "it's all perfectly clear, except the reason for doing it. But you know juries when it comes to women. If there was some definite thing—something to show. Something to make a story about. A thing that would connect up with this clumsy way of doing it."

In a covert way Mrs. Hale looked at Mrs. Peters, Mrs. Peters was looking at her. Quickly they looked away from each other. The outer door opened and Mr. Hale came in.

"I've got the team round now," he said, "Pretty cold out there."

"I'm going to stay here awhile by myself," the county attorney suddenly announced. "You can send Frank out for me, can't you?" he asked the sheriff. "I want to go over everything. I'm not satisfied we can't do better."

Again, for one brief moment, the two women's eyes found one another.

The sheriff came up to the table.

"Did you want to see what Mrs. Peters was going to take in?"

The county attorney picked up the apron. He laughed.

"Oh, I guess they're not very dangerous things the ladies have picked out."

Mrs. Hale's hand was on the sewing basket in which the box was concealed. She felt that she ought to take her hand off the basket. She did not seem able to. He picked up one of the quilt blocks which she had piled on lo cover the box. Her eyes felt like fire. She had a feeling that if he took up the basket she would snatch it from him.

But he did not take it up. With another little laugh, he turned away, saying:

"No; Mrs. Peters doesn't need supervising. For that matter, a sheriff's wife is married to the law. Ever think of it that way, Mrs. Peters?"

Mrs. Peters was standing beside the table. Mrs. Hale shot a look up at her; but she could not see her face. Mrs. Peters had turned away. When she spoke, her voice was muffled.

"Not—just that way," she said.

"Married to the law!" chuckled Mrs. Peters' husband. He moved toward the door into the front room, and said to the county attorney:

"I just want you to come in here a minute, George. We ought to take a look at these windows."

"Oh—windows," said the county attorney scoffingly.

"We'll be right out, Mr. Hale," said the sheriff to the farmer, who was still waiting by the door.

290 Hale went to look after the horses. The sheriff followed the county attorney into the other room. Again—for one final moment—the two women were alone in that kitchen.

Martha Hale sprang up, her hands tight together, looking at that other woman, with whom it rested. At first she could not see her eyes, for the sheriff's wife had not turned back since she turned away at that suggestion of being married to the law. But now Mrs. Hale made her turn back. Her eyes made her turn back. Slowly, unwillingly, Mrs. Peters turned her head until her eyes met the eyes of the other woman. There was a moment when they held each other in a steady, burning look in which there was no evasion nor flinching. Then Martha Hale's eyes pointed the way to the basket in which was hidden the thing that would make certain the conviction of the other woman—that woman who was not there and yet who had been there with them all through that hour.

For a moment Mrs. Peters did not move. And then she did it. With a rush forward, she threw back the quilt pieces, got the box, tried to put it in her handbag. It was too big. Desperately she opened it, started to take the bird out. But there she broke—she could not touch the bird. She stood there helpless, foolish.

There was the sound of a knob turning in the inner door. Martha Hale snatched the box from the sheriff's wife, and got it in the pocket of her big coat just as the sheriff and the county attorney came back into the kitchen.

"Well, Henry," said the county attorney facetiously, "at least we found out that she was not going to quilt it. She was going to—what is it you call it, ladies?"

295 Mrs. Hale's hand was against the pocket of her coat.

"We call it—knot it, Mr. Henderson."

[1917]

Now, let's explore Yuki Chen's comparison paper, including the reading, brainstorming, and drafting steps that led up to the final paper. As previously mentioned, Yuki's composition class explored two versions of the same plot as written and rewritten by Susan Glaspell in her play, Trifles, and her short story, "A Jury of Her Peers." The class has been assigned a six-page paper that asks for a comparison/contrast of the play and the short story. The student, Yuki, must not only develop ideas on one text but also examine the two texts and decide how to weave them together. In order to do this, Yuki works her way through a series of reading and writing steps: After her first reading, she makes notes on the text itself and on her computer; then, she engages in freewriting that leads to her first draft; finally, she revises and reshapes her first draft into a final draft.

Assignment

Six-page Comparison/Contrast Paper (about 1,500 words):

- This assignment asks you to compare and contrast Susan Glaspell's play Trifles and her short story "A Jury of Her Peers." Create an argument that explores what changes Glaspell makes as she re-creates the play as a story. Explain how or why the plot, characters, and themes change as they are transformed from a play into a short story. Although the play and short story are very similar, there are changes. Locate changes that seem significant or meaningful to you. Then, explore why those changes might have been made.

- Write a six-page comparison/contrast paper that:
  1. creates an argument about differences and similarities between the play and short story;
  2. develops ideas about how and why the play and short story are different, showing an understanding of these different genres;
  3. compares specific moments from the play and short story; and
  4. quotes specific words and phrases.

Annotation: Marginal Notes

With the comparison/contrast assignment in mind, Yuki knows that she will have to find similarities and differences that connect the play and the short story. She decides to annotate both Trifles and "A Jury of Her Peers" by highlighting the differences between the two. A crucial moment occurs near the end of Susan Glaspell's play, Trifles. In this dramatic scene, the two central woman characters discover a rather grisly clue to a murder. Yuki's notes focus on this scene as a key point of comparison.

As we've discussed, annotating is the activity of marking up your text, noting your responses on the text as you read it. Annotation provides a way of capturing your ideas as you create them. Literary annotation explores both content, or the meaning of a text, and form, or the literary structures and devices used to convey that meaning. For example, Yuki notes that the play contains stage directions that reveal much of the important events, thoughts, and emotions in the play; as a result, she highlights all stage directions and underlines those she finds most interesting. In contrast, the short story contains descriptions; as a result, she highlights all of the descriptions in the story. After highlighting these differences, Yuki adds annotations that capture her thinking about what those differences might mean.

Student Work: Annotation
Marginal Notes on a Play

[They look in the sewing basket.]

stage direction = they are doing it together

Mrs. Hale: Here's some red. I expect this has got sewing things in it. [Brings out a fancy box.] What a pretty box. Look like something somebody would give you. Maybe her scissors are in here. [Opens box. Suddenly puts her hand to her nose.] Why—[Mrs. Peters bends nearer, then turns her face away.] There's something wrapped up in this piece of silk."

action reveals bad smell, bad look

Mrs. Peters: Why, this isn't her scissors.

Mrs. Hale: [Lifting the silk.] Oh, Mrs. Peters—it's—[Mrs. Peters bends closer.]

action = peeking need to bend closer = like a secret?

Mrs. Peters: It's the bird.

Mrs. Hale: [Jumping up.] But, Mrs. Peters—look at it! It's neck! Look at its neck! It's all—other side too. — Jump = shock

Mrs. Peters: Somebody—wrung—its—neck.

[Their eyes meet. A look of growing comprehension, of horror. Steps are heard outside. Mrs. Hale slips box under quilt pieces, and sinks into her chair. Enter Sheriff and County Attorney. Mrs. Peters rises.] — eyes meet = connection / KEY: hides box

Now, let's turn to the same plot moment as it appears in Susan Glaspell's short story, "A Jury of Her Peers." The short story follows the play closely and is rewritten in prose form. Yuki uses annotation to highlight the differences that she finds.

Student Work: Annotation
Marginal Notes on a Story

They turned to the sewing basket.

"Here's some red," said Mrs. Hale, bringing out a roll of cloth. Underneath that was a box. "Here, maybe her scissors are in here—and her things." She held it up, "What a pretty box! I'll warrant that was something she had a long time ago—when she was a girl." — the pretty box

She held it in her hand a moment; then, with a little sigh, opened it. — action described

Instantly, her hand went to her nose. — the smell!

"Why—!"

Mrs. Peters drew nearer—then tuned away.

"There's something wrapped up in this piece of silk, faltered Mrs. Hale. — silk reaction

This isn't her scissors," said Mrs. Peters, in a shrinking voice. — voice described

Her hand not steady, Mrs. Hale raised the piece of silk. "Oh, Mrs. Peters!" she cried. "It's—"

Mrs. Peters bent closer. — bends closer—this is in the play

"It's the bird," she whispered.

But, Mrs. Peter!" cried Mrs. Hale. "Look at it! Its neck—look at its neck! It's all—other side too." — jump in play?

She held the box away from her. — Held = not in play

The sheriff's wife again bent closer.

"Somebody wrung its neck," said she, in a voice that was slow and deep. — voice described

And then again the eyes of the two women met—this time clung together in the dawning comprehension, of growing horror. Mrs. Peters looked from the dead bird to the broken door of the cage. Again their eyes met. And just then there was a sound at the outside door. — strong description / more looks

Mrs. Hale slipped the box under the quilt pieces in the basket, and sank into the chair before it. Mrs. Peters stood holding to the table. The county attorney and the sheriff came in from outside. — KEY: hides box

Comparison as a Form of Critical Thinking

When you compare and contrast the play and the short story, you might initially think that the two texts are very similar. At first, you might concentrate on the action that is at the center of each scene: the discovery of the dead bird. In both the play and the short story, this discovery is shocking. In both genres, there are the details of the bird: Its broken neck and it being covered in silk catch our attention. In both genres, a sense of surprise turning into horror is captured.

As you place the play and short story side by side, reading more closely and annotating as you read, you can highlight and analyze the differences and similarities between the two. In addition to reading to understand the plot, you can read to understand the two genres and their key features. A closer look at the play will reveal its use of a structural aspect of drama: stage directions. Because it relies on stage directions, the play might seem shorter and more action-packed: It puts the characters and their discovery into a series of actions. In contrast, the short story spends more time and space describing the women and their reactions. The story's prose form relies on description rather than on stage directions. With this observation in mind, you can start to generate ideas about how that difference might affect the meaning of the play and the short story.

By comparing the play and the short story, you can start to think about the larger differences between the two genres. In the play, the stage directions will be interpreted by the actors, who will bring the directions to life in a unique way. Every time the play is performed, the audience is watching a different enactment of those stage directions. In contrast, the short story offers more information, but that information will remain static and unchanging. How does the active nature of drama shape the story's plot? How does the more static, descriptive form of the short story change the plot?

Inquiry Notes: Comparison Grid

The inquiry process helps you to translate your reading into writing. It captures the questions that you see in the text and your attempt to develop answers. Yuki employs prewriting strategies that help her create a comprehensive comparison of Trifles and "A Jury of Her Peers." Although she understands the central events and characters of the play and short story, she needs to dig deeper to find out how best to connect the play and the short story. Planning for the comparison/contrast paper, Yuki wants to make sure her prewriting finds details that will reveal the similarities and differences between the two.

Yuki uses her note taking to trigger the comparison/contrast thinking process. She uses listing to start to bring the play and the short story together—to quite literally get them "on the same page." Working on her computer, she creates a grid-like comparison chart to capture the information that she sees as central to the short story and the play and to start the process of building a concept bridge between the short story and the play. The comparison grid allows her to organize those details to generate questions and ideas. Listing not only gets ideas down on paper but also leads to the creation of more ideas and shapes them for further analysis.

The comparison grid highlights which ideas are most interesting, clarifies those ideas by organizing them as a comparison/contrast, and allows those ideas to be digested and developed. In order to add organization and clarity to your thinking, consider creating a list or grid that collects and categorizes your ideas, as seen here.

Student Work: Inquiry Notes Comparison/Contrast Grid

Key Moment	Trifles vs.	"A Jury of Her Peers"
Opening	p. 558 Right into the action Men and women enter Men start questioning Mr. Hale starts in on long story	p. 567 Starts with long description Describes Mrs. Hale leaving kitchen Mrs. Hale doesn't want to leave things ½-finished Describes trip Describes characters Describes setting: lonesome Describes thoughts: should have visited Minnie Lots of info before Hale's story LOTS OF DESCRIPTION
Hale's story	p. 558 almost same	p. 569 almost same emphasizes "lonesome stretch of road"
Fruit that has burst jars	p. 560 Attorney criticizes mess women try to explain women draw together ACTION	p. 571 same women have "sympathetic understanding" women DESCRIBED DESCRIPTION AGAIN Attorney laughs
Unfinished Work	p. 561 Dirty towels, pans p. 561 Bread is set out Bread is out, not put back Why bread changed to sugar?	p. 572 same p. 573 Sugar part put away Job is not finished

Inquiry Notes: Journal Writing

As we explored in Chapter 4, journal writing is an exploratory stage of writing that enacts the crucial step of translating your ideas into sentences and paragraphs. As she starts her journaling, Yuki uses a technique presented in her class: She uses the category of "observations" and the category of "ideas," followed by the category of "analysis" to shape her thinking and move it toward an argument. The "observations" section captures the information that she feels is important to the play, while, in the "ideas" section, she starts to think about why that information might be important. The "analysis" section offers an interpretation that brings together the information and concepts. These categories start Yuki's ideas flowing and also help her to clarify her thinking. As Yuki puts these ideas into more complete sentences and paragraphs, she knows that she wants to emphasize the category of "analysis." Yuki avoids plot summary by avoiding repeating her observations; she uses those observations as evidence for her analytical ideas.

The process of journal writing is a process of discovery. Here, Yuki starts to discover her unique interpretation of Trifles and "A Jury of Her Peers." We start to see glimpses of original ideas, such as the difference between "seeing" and "describing" and, at the end, the idea that an audience is a "detective." These ideas will become central arguments in her paper's drafts.

Student Work: Journal Writing "Close Reading → Inquiry → Analysis" Writing

Close reading (information)

1. There are NOT many changes from play to story.
2. Major changes are the opening of the story (a lot more detail on the characters and setting in the short story). A lot more detail on the travel to the house—page 567
3. Another major change is that the play has stage directions.

Inquiry Ideas (concepts)

1. The play must put the story's key ideas into actions—must show actions.
2. The short story describes the ideas. The story can also describe the internal thoughts of the characters. The play must make this into actions.
   Story = internal stuff Play = makes it into actions so you can see it
3. Audience can SEE the actions—can figure them out.

Analysis (developing information and concepts)

Trifles and "A Jury of Her Peers" are very similar, using the same characters and following the same plot. But, when you take a closer look, you start to notice small changes throughout the play and story that make the two versions start to feel different.

The beginning of the short story has the most changes compared to the play. The story adds a lots of details. Most importantly, it starts in a different place: Mrs. Hale's kitchen. It has her working in the kitchen—and then going to the murder scene. She needs to leave her work half-finished. She leaves her flour half sifted/unsifted. After she leaves the house, the story describes her trip. The story then describes the other characters on the trip. Then, as they approach the Wrights' home, it describes the home—and the fact that it is lonesome. It also describes Mrs. Hale's internal thoughts—that she wishes she had gone to see Mrs. Wright.

At first I liked all of these details because they gave insight into the characters. But, then I thought about the play and the fact that it puts you right into the action. Ultimately, I like the play's opening better. It is more action-oriented. The audience is in the action and needs to figure out what is going on. We are not told what is going on and what to think. As an audience, we would just see it. We would then have to figure out that we think is happening. So, we'd have to realize on our own that this is a lonely place. In a play, we'd have to SEE the differences between Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters and not be told about them.

A key difference between the play and the story is the idea that the play must SHOW IN ACTION all the ideas, making them come to life in actions and dialog. In contrast, the short story can DESCRIBE the ideas without having to make them come to life. Ideas can be described by the narrator. The characters' thoughts and emotions can be described—in a short story they don't have to be put into action. In the play, all the internal ideas of the characters must become outside. Become external.

In the play, the audience must SEE the actions. The play's audience must watch and figure out what is going on without being directly told. The audience is more active (???). The audience must observe and decide on their own. The audience is like a detective at the Wright murder scene—they are trying to figure out what has happened. The short story makes it easier on the reader.

Drafting and Revision: Using Comparison to Create Interpretation and Argument

Drafting provides a space of sustained analytical writing, in which you can generate ideas and push them to a higher level of insight, sophistication, or creativity. A final paper demonstrates your understanding of the literary text by showing that you have created an insightful, thought-provoking, and well-organized interpretation of it; however, you need to push your writing through several drafts before you can attain that ideal. Yuki's drafting of her paper moves her thinking toward this well-formed interpretation. Her paper contains a good thesis, emphasizing that the play is action-oriented while the short story is description-oriented. Using subpoints, she builds several layers of connections between the play and the short story. In addition, she uses several quotations from both the play and the short story.

As you read Yuki's draft, think about its strengths and weaknesses. Which ideas are Yuki's best ideas? Which ideas are less well formed? Which ideas should Yuki develop further? What evidence should Yuki add to this paper? Can the thesis or the conclusion be strengthened? How can Yuki continue to improve her thinking and her writing?

Student Analytical Essay: "Trifles, the Play, versus 'A Jury of Her Peers,' the Short Story" (Preliminary Draft)

This first draft of Yuki's is a rough attempt to reshape a series of ideas into an analytical argument. Yuki's draft still contains weaknesses that, through the revision process, will be deleted or rewritten. As we look at the first draft, we'll use marginal annotations to capture our observations, noting the strengths of the paper and making suggestions for how it could be strengthened even further.

Yuki Chen

English 102

Professor Dutta

April 2, 2016

Trifles, the Play, versus. "A Jury of Her Peers," the Short Story writer names texts being compared

In 1917, Susan Glaspell rewrote her 1916 play Trifles in the form of a short story titled "A Jury of Her Peers." Both the play and short story show a group of people investigating the home of Mrs. Minnie Wright, a woman charged with murdering her husband John Wright. By looking at the details of the home, the women in the group are able to figure out that she must have committed the murder. They also figure out the motive for the murder. The story makes very few changes to the play's plot and characters. But, in the play, the character's thoughts are shown through dramatic actions—the play is about showing. First, the opening of the play jumps right into action, while the opening of the story gives more description than the play. Then, in the body of the play, big events such as the discovery of the bird, are put in stage directions, meaning they'd be acted out (shown in action) by the actors. In the short story, these events and the women's thinking about them are described in ways that are more detailed. But they are less active. When trying to portray how people think, the drama Trifles is more action-oriented, while the story "A Jury of Her Peers" is more description-oriented. The play is thus more interesting.

writer develops thesis that captures most important comparison between two texts

The play opens by putting the audience right into the middle of the crime scene. The scene opens with a large group entering the Wright's kitchen: Sheriff Henry Peters, County Attorney George Henderson, a neighboring farmer Lewis Hale, Mrs. Peters, and Mrs. Hale. They immediately start questioning the events that took place in the Wright's home. The County Attorney and the Sheriff question Mr. Hale because he was the first person to visit the Wright home after the murder; he described talking with Mrs. Wright, realizing something wasn't right, and then discovering the strangled Mr. Wright. Mr. Hale explains that when he first sees Mrs. Hale, she doesn't respond, "I said, "How do, Mrs. Wright, it's cold, ain't it?" And she said, "It is?" and went on pleating her apron. Well I was surprised; she didn't ask me to come to the stove, or set down, but she just sat there, not even looking at me" (559). Then, Mr. Hale asked for John: "I said, "I want to see John." And then she—laughed. I guess you would call it a laugh" (559). He then explains that he asked if he can see John and how Mrs Wright responds: "I said a little sharp: "Can't I see John?" "No, She says, kind o' dull like. "aint he home?" says I. "Yes," says she, he's home." "Then why can't I see him?" I asked her, out of patience" (560). Then comes the shocking reply: "'Cause he's dead, says she" (560). The scene then shows the men criticizing the housekeeping of Mrs. Wright, criticizing her dirty towel and dirty dishes. Right in this first set of actions, the women start to feel sorry for Mrs. Wright. When they realize that the glass jars holding Mrs. Wright's fruit preserves have broken, they realize all of her lost work.

writer uses direct quotes as evidence, but uses quotes to provide plot summary; plot summary should be limited discussion remains on level of plot summary—needs to be more analytical

"A Jury of Her Peers," or the short story version of the play, opens with lots of description of the group of characters gathering together and travelling to the Wright home before they arrive at the home and start to discuss the house. The short story contains a lot more exposition, or description of the characters and setting. The short story does not open with the action-filled events of the play. The short story tells you about the characters by having us see their actions and figure out who they are based on their actions. For example, the short story describes how Mrs. Hale perceives and thinks about Mrs. Peters: "She had met Mrs. Peters the year before at the country fair, and the thing she remembered about her was that she didn't seem like a sheriff's wife. She was small and thin and didn't have a strong voice" (568). The short story also describes the setting as a writer integrates new analysis, highlighting formal aspects of story lonesome place. The short story takes more time setting up the characters and the location—and telling you what to think about them.

writer juxtaposes two texts; brings them into dialogue that can be developed further

The opening of the short story is effective, but it delays the action-filled events of the play. The short story tells you how to think about the characters and setting. In contrast, the play must show you the characters and the setting. You've gotta come to your own conclusion. In this way, the play makes you into a detective-like person—the audience has to watch and figure out things, just like the women do.

writer captures her unique reading in draft

The stage directions read "The two women move a little closer together" (561). Right from the beginning, the dynamic of the women being together against the men is created. Importantly, the connection of the women is shown by their movement rather than described. In both the play and the short story, the women are described as moving close to each other. But, in the play, the movement is part of the stage directions—the movement would be seen. It would not be read. In the short story, the movement must be described and left as a description. After the men leave the women, in both the play and short story. Mrs. Hale explains, "I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing" (561). The short story contains the same sentence but tries to convey the slang of a spoken voice by having Mrs. Hale say, "I'd hate to have men comin' into my kitchen . . . snoopin' round and criticizin'" (573). The short story surrounds that statement with an explanation of some of Mrs. Hale's thoughts.

paper emphasizes strong point of contrast between play and short story

As the plot in both forms develops, the women start to feel for Mrs. Wright. They start to feel for her situation—and they even put themselves into her situation. Ultimately, hiding the evidence that Mrs. Wright murdered her husband is what they had then decided to do. Her motive, the reason for murdering her husband by strangling him, would have been understood by the women, and is realized by them, in a way that the men would have not.

The men need the motive, and the women make an unspoken agreement to hide the motive from them. This understanding is shown through a series of unspoken agreements. These agreements take the form of actions. Because these agreements take the form of actions, the play is a more effective way to get the story across. The women show sympathetic actions, such as when they save an unbroken bottle of cherries to take to Mrs. Wright. Then, the women start to feel for Mrs. Wright by putting themselves into her place and understanding her emotional situation.

writer makes strong statement that judges effectiveness of play

For example, the women take out Mrs. Wright's bad quilt stitching and replace it with more organized quilt stitching. The women connect with Mrs. Wright and they also connect with each other. In the play, they look at each other as they discover the bad stitching. Mrs. Hale explains, "Why, it looks as if she didn't know what she was about!" and then the stage directions explain, "After she has said this they look at each other, then start to glance back at the door. After an instant Mrs. Hale has pulled at a knot and ripped the sewing" (576). The audience is expected to figure out that the women are connecting through the sewing. By glancing at the door, they are connecting. In the short story, the connection between the women is described and given more explanation: "Their eyes met—something flashed to life, passed between them; then, as if with an effort they seemed to pull away from each other. A moment Mrs. Hale sat there, her hands folded over that sewing which was unlike all the rest of the sewing" (576). The story has the women connecting.

writer supports ideas with specific quotations from text, followed by analysis of their meaning

At the end of the play, the women's understanding of Mrs. Wright slowly becomes actions that hide Mrs. Wright's guilt from the men. Ultimately, the women do not just feel for her and understand her, but decide to protect her. The play highlights these actions of sympathy, understanding, and protection. The climax of the play and short story is the women's discovery of Mrs. Wright's canary. The canary is dead. When inspected, the canary has a snapped neck. In addition, its cage door had writer uses literary elements, such as symbolism, as foundation for draft's preliminary interpretation been broken. The canary is an important symbol. Symbols are always important in literature. Symbols can represent important ideas. Because birds are sweet, innocent, and happy, it could represent the sweetness, innocence, and happiness of life. Life that is now gone.

The women's discovery of the motive for the murder is accomplished through a series of shared looks and actions. In the play, there is a discovery of the bird and the understanding that it is the motive for the murder—these are put in the stage directions. Right after Mrs. Peters says, "Somebody—wrung—its—neck," the stage directions state:

> Their eyes meet. A look of growing comprehension of horror. Steps are heard outside. Mrs. Hale slips box under quilt pieces, and sinks into her chair.
>
> Enter Sheriff and County Attorney. Mrs. Peter rises. (565)

The stage directions show the women connecting. The women do not just understand and feel for Mrs. Wright, but protect her.

writer continues to analyze in detail strong point of contrast between two texts

In the short story, the women's connection is described in similar way. But, in contrast to the play, this description will remain a description. It must explain what to think. The short story explains, "And then again the eyes of the two women met—this time clung together in a look of dawning comprehension, of growing horror. Mrs. Peters looked from the dead bird to the broken door of the cage. Again their eyes met. And just then there was a sound at the outside door" (578). The story puts together the pieces for the reader.

writer creates a strong argument in conclusion, leaving reader with strong sense of writer's interpretation of two texts

By comparing the play Trifles and the short story "A Jury of Her Peers," it becomes clear that the play is a better match for this plot and the plot's ideas. In the play, the audience members must see the clues being gathered. The play thus makes the audience into a detective who must figure out what is going on by watching it. In this way, the audience becomes like the two detective women, Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters. In contrast, the short story often tells the reader what the characters are thinking and tells the reader how to interpret the plot. The short story does not let the reader become like a detective.

[New page]

Chen 6

Works Cited

Glaspell, Susan. Trifles. Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 558-67. Print.

Glaspell, Susan. "A Jury of Her Peers." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 567-81. Print.

Revision: Using a Revision Strategy

As we saw in Chapter 8, the revision process gives the writer the time and space to rethink his or her reactions to the literary work, understanding of information in the text, insights into the ideas conveyed by the text, and questions about the text. Yuki uses revision to highlight which ideas are most interesting to her and then to further digest and develop those ideas. Before we explore Yuki's use of selected aspects of the revision process, let's revisit our revision checklist.

✔REVISION CHECKLIST

Strengthen Your Thesis

☐ Add focus and depth to your central argument.

Develop Your Ideas

☐ Revisit your best responses to literary form and content, adding more thinking to those responses.

Integrate and Explain Your Evidence

☐ Select and analyze rich, interesting quotations to provide evidence for your ideas.

Improve the Organization

☐ Structure your ideas to follow a clear sequence.

Clarify Your Style and Edit for Correctness

☐ Use a consistent, professional style to explain your ideas, correcting sentence structure, word usage, and grammar.

Revision: Revising to Develop Ideas

Let's look at a paragraph that starts to develop a concept bridge between the short story and the play by describing the women coming together when the men criticize Mrs. Wright's housekeeping. As Yuki starts the revision process, she notices a critical flaw in her writing. She has spent much time and space giving a plot summary of Mr. Hale's explanation of the murder; her paper contains long quotes that distract the reader's attention from her thesis. This does not help to develop her thesis. She deletes this long section. She then replaces it with sentences that work to develop her best ideas: The women have an emotional connection and, in the play, that emotional connection must be shown through actions.

Student Work: Revision
Revising to Develop Ideas

Rough Draft

The County Attorney and the Sheriff question Mr. Hale because he was the first person to visit the Wright home after the murder; ~~he described talking with Mrs.. Wright, realizing something wasn't right, and then discovering the strangled Mr. Wright. Mr. Hale explains that when he first sees Mrs. Hale, she doesn't respond, "I said, "How do, Mrs. Wright, it's cold, ain't it?" And she said, "Is is?" and went on pleating her apron. Well I was surprised; she didn't ask me to come to the stove, or set down, but she just sat there, not even looking at me" (559). Then, Mr. Hale asked for John: "I said, "I want to see John." And then she laughed. I guess you would call it a laugh" (559). He then explains that he asked if he can see John and how Mrs Wright responds: I said a little sharp: "Can't I see John?" "No, She says, kind o' dull like. "Aint he home?" says I. "Yes," says she, he's home." "Then why can't I see him?" I asked her, out of patience" (560). Then comes the shocking reply: "'Cause he's dead, says she" (560).~~ The scene then shows the men criticizing the housekeeping of Mrs. Wright, criticizing her dirty towel and dirty dishes. Right in this first set of actions, the women start to feel sorry for Mrs. Wright. When they realize that the glass jars holding Mrs. Wright's fruit preserves have broken, they realize all of her lost work.

As part of revision process, writer locates and deletes unnecessary plot summary

↓

First Revision

The County Attorney and the Sheriff question Mr. Hale because he was the first person to visit the Wright home after the murder. The scene then shows the men criticizing the housekeeping of Mrs. Wright, criticizing her dirty towel and dirty dishes. Right away, in this first set of actions, the women start to feel sorry for Mrs. Wright. When they realize writer locates areas of interpretation that could be expanded through more analysis that the glass jars holding Mrs. Wright's fruit preserves have broken, they realize all of her lost work and they have even more sympathy for her. Because this is a play, the characters have to talk to each other to explain their thoughts. This is most important for Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters, who start to connect through their actions and dialogue.

writer adds new sentences that develop ideas

↓

Second Revision:

The County Attorney and the Sheriff question Mr. Hale because he was the first person to visit the Wright home after the murder. The scene then shows the men criticizing the housekeeping of Mrs. Wright, criticizing her dirty towel and dirty dishes. Right away, in this first set of actions, the women start to feel sorry for Mrs. Wright. When they realize that the glass jars holding Mrs. Wright's fruit preserves have broken, they realize all of her lost work and they have even more sympathy for her. Because this is a play, the characters have to talk to each other to explain their thoughts. This is most important for Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters, who start to connect through their actions and dialogue. Mrs. Peters says, "Oh her fruit; it did freeze" and explains, "She worried about that when it turned so cold. She said the fire'd go out and her jars would break" (560). The men dismiss the women's feelings. The Sheriff says, "Well, can you beat the women! Held for murder and worryin' about her preserves (561). Mr. Hall dismisses the women's sympathy as "worrying over trifles" (561).

writer supports new ideas with focused evidence

Revision: Revising to Clarify Style

As one of the last steps in revision, you should edit your paper for style and correctness. An academic paper should show off the writer's ability to express his or her ideas in a clear, convincing, and professional manner. When you are revising to improve your writing style, you can work on the paragraph level, aiming for focus and flow; the sentence level, crafting clear structure and using correct grammar; and the word level, strengthening your word choice. Let's distill these ideas down into a Writing Style Checklist featuring three distinct style tips:

✔WRITING STYLE CHECKLIST

Style Tip #1: Keep focused on your best ideas

- ☐ Delete generalizations.
- ☐ Delete "filler" ideas and phrases.
- ☐ Delete repetition (don't be afraid to delete!).

Style Tip #2: Make your ideas active and energetic

- ☐ Move the subject noun/verb to the front of the sentence.
- ☐ Use present-tense verbs.
- ☐ Use active verbs and strong nouns.

Style Tip #3: Express your ideas in an academic, intellectual way

- ☐ Replace colloquialisms.
- ☐ Replace tentative phrases.
- ☐ Use precise references.
- ☐ Use correct grammar.

Let's look at how Yuki revises three specific sentences, applying these goals of bringing focus, energy, and intellectual sophistication to her writing. Although we focus on only three sentences here, her final draft reveals that she has used these three style tips to revise her entire draft.

Student Work: Revision
Revising to Clarify Style

Style Tip #1: Keep focused on your best ideas: Delete generalizations; delete "filler" ideas and phrases; delete repetition (don't be afraid to delete!).

The canary is an important symbol. ~~Symbols are always important in literature. Symbols can represent important ideas. Because birds are sweet, innocent, and happy, it could represent the sweetness, innocence, and happiness of life. Life that is now gone~~.

in revising for style, writer deletes overly general statements

↓

Thus, the canary becomes an important symbol. First, the bird symbolizes an act of violence, and reveals that violence can lead to death. Second, it symbolizes Mrs. Wright herself. Mrs Hale explains, "She—come to think of it, she was kind of like a bird herself—real sweet and pretty, but kind of timid and—fluttery" (565). Third, the bird symbolizes that Mrs. Wright cared for it and wanted some happiness in her life. The women realize that the canary must have been killed by Mr. Wright. Through this symbol, they understand Mr. Wright must have been cruel, even violent to Mrs. Wright.

The writer improves her paper by making her interpretation more specific to the text being analyzed.

Style Tip #2: Make your ideas active and energetic: Move the subject noun/verb to the front of the sentence; use present-tense verbs; use active verbs and strong nouns.

Ultimately, hiding the evidence that Mrs. Wright murdered her husband is what they had then decided to do. Her motive, the reason for murdering her husband by strangling him, would have been understood by the women, and as had been realized by them, in a way that the men would have not.

writer locates and revises past tense verbs

↓

Ultimately, they decide to hide the evidence that Mrs. Wright murdered her husband. The women realize that they understand her motive for murdering her husband in a way that the men do not.

writer improves paper by using present tense and active verbs

Style Tip #3: Express your ideas in an academic, intellectual way: Delete colloquialisms; delete tentative phrases; use precise references; use correct grammar.

The short story tells you how to think about the characters and setting. In contrast, the play must show you the characters and the setting. Then, it's up to you to come up with your own conclusion. In this way, the play makes you into a detective.

writer locates and replaces informal language and colloquialisms, such as referring to "you"

↓

The short story tells the reader how to think about the characters and setting. In contrast, the play opens with action and the audience must decipher what is happening. The play shows the characters and the setting on the stage, and must let the audience come to its own interpretation of them. In this way, the play makes the audience figure out clues, and the audience starts to think like a detective.

writer uses more precise and academic language, such as "the reader"

Student Analytical Essay: "The Dramatic Action of Trifles: Making the Audience into Detectives" (Final Draft)

Compare this final draft to the preliminary draft on page 588. Notice in this paper how Yuki continues to strengthen her ideas and improve several aspects of her writing. In this final draft, she has

- clarified and deepened the thesis argument,
- developed the series of connected claims,
- created an organizational structure to capture the development of ideas,
- used evidence to support her ideas, and
- improved her phrasing, style, and grammar.

Yuki Chen

English 102

Professor Dutta

April 21, 2016

The Dramatic Action of Trifles: Making the Audience into Detectives

In 1917, Susan Glaspell rewrote her 1916 play Trifles in form of a short story titled "A Jury of her Peers." Both the play and short story show a group of people investigating the home of Mrs. Minnie Wright, a woman charged with murdering her husband John Wright. By looking at the details of the home, the women in the group, Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters, are able to figure out that she must have committed the murder. They also figure out the motive for the murder. The main difference between the story and the play is that the story has a narrator who reveals the unspoken thoughts of the main characters and explains the plot's main ideas. In the play, this information is given through dramatic action that is shown to the audience. As a result, the drama Trifles is a more action-oriented, while the story "A Jury of Her Peers" is more description-oriented. This difference between the play and the short story can be seen in the opening of the plot, and the different strategies each genre uses to set up the idea that the Wright home is cheerless. The play's use of action can also be seen in events that show that the women are connecting and bonding. In addition, the play's use of action is also central to the events that show the women protecting Mrs. Wright: they re-sew her stitches and they hide the dead bird. In the short story, these key moments are described in more detail, but are less active. Because the plot relies in the actions of the women, the action-filled play is the better genre for this plot. The play fits the idea of the women needing to act on their ideas, and not just describe them, and as a result the play is the best genre.

writer creates a clear comparison/ contrast argument writer develops a strong thesis statement that presents a clear argument

The contrast between the play and the short story shows that the play Trifles encourages the audience to experience the actions of the women. The play has the women characters show their ideas to the audience rather than describe those ideas to the audience. The play puts the women's thoughts into action. This is especially important because the play is all about thinking—it is about two women who become detectives, think through the clues before them, and solve a crime by thinking about it. The play encourages the audience to think along with the women. By comparing scenes from the play and the short story, it becomes clear that the play puts ideas into action in the stage directions.

paper now develops, explains the writer's best insights

The play opens by putting the audience right into the middle of the crime scene. A large group enters the Wright's kitchen: Sheriff Henry Peters, County Attorney George Henderson, a neighboring farmer Lewis Hale, Mrs. Peters, and Mrs. Hales. They immediately start questioning the events that took place in the Wright home. The County Attorney and the Sheriff question Mr. Hale because he was the first person to visit the Wright home after the murder. The scene then shows the men criticizing the housekeeping of Mrs. Wright, criticizing her dirty towel and dirty dishes. Right away, in this first set of actions, the women start to feel sorry for Mrs. Wright. When they realize that the glass jars holding Mrs. Wright's fruit preserves have broken, they realize all of her lost work and they have even more sympathy for her. Because this is a play, the characters have to talk to each other to explain their thoughts. This is most important for Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters, who start to connect through their actions and dialogue. Mrs. Peters says, "Oh, her fruit; it did freeze" and explains, "She worried about that when it turned so cold. She said the fire'd go out and her jars would break" (560). The men dismiss the women's feelings. The Sheriff says "Well, can you beat the women! Held for murder and worryin' about her preserves" (561). Mr. Hall dismisses the women's sympathy as "worrying over trifles" (561).

paper now keeps plot summary short and moves quickly to analysis

The women's emotions are not trifles and lead them to solve the murder. In the play, their emotions are put into dialogue so that the writer uses strong topic sentences to develop the paper's arguments audience can experience them. Right after feeling sorry for Mrs. Wright and her lost preserves, the women explain that the household was not a cheerful place. Mrs. Hale says, "It never seemed a cheerful place" (561). She then criticizes John Wright, explaining that "I don't think a place'd be any cheerfuller for John Wright's being in it" (561). The play must put the women's ideas into active dialogue. In contrast, in the short story, the cheerlessness of the place is shown in description that is less active and more passive.

"A Jury of Her Peers," the short story version of the play, opens with a long description of the group of characters gathering together and travelling to the Wright home. Before they arrive at the home, the short story contains a lot more exposition, or description of the characters and setting. The short story does not open with the action-filled events of the play. The short story tells the reader about the characters by describing them. For example, the short story describes how Mrs. Hale perceives and thinks about Mrs. Peters: "She had met Mrs. Peters the year before at the country fair, and the thing she remembered about her was that she didn't seem like a sheriff's wife she was small and thin and didn't have a strong voice" (568). The short story also describes the Wright home's setting; Mrs. Hale "could see the Wright place now, and seeing it did not make her feel like talking. It looked very lonesome this cold March morning. It had always been a lonesome-looking place. It was down in a hollow, and the popular trees around it were lonesome looking trees" (568). The short story takes more time setting up the characters and the location—and telling the reader, what to think about them. In contrast, the play does not describe the setting, but shows the setting.

writer continues to make comparison/ contrasts as she analyzes each text

The opening of the short story is effective, but it delays the action-filled events of the play. The short story tells the reader how to think about the characters and setting. In contrast, the play opens with action and the audience must decipher what is happening. The play shows the characters and the setting on the stage, and must let the audience come to its own interpretation of them. In this way, the play makes the audience figure out clues, and the audience starts to think like a detective. The women must figure out the motive for the murder, and the audience must, too.

paper has been revised to strengthen the juxtapositions that bring the two texts together

The play shows complicated ideas through actions, such as the development of a strong connection between the women. Early in the play and short story, the women start to bond together against the men. After the women are criticized for worrying about trifles, the stage directions read "The two women move a little closer together" (561). Right from the beginning, the dynamic of the women being together against the men is created. Importantly, the connection of the women is shown by their movements. In both the play and the short story, the women are described as moving close to each other. But, in the play, the movement is part of the stage directions—the movement would be seen and not read. In the short story, the movement must be described and left as a description. After the men leave the women, Mrs. Hale explains, "I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing" (561). The short story contains the same sentence but tries to convey the slang of a spoken voice by having Mrs. Hale say, "I'd hate to have men comin' into my kitchen . . . snoopin' round and criticizin'" (573). The short story surrounds that statement with an explanation of some of Mrs. Hale's thoughts. For example, before she criticizes the men, Mrs. Hale is described as experiencing a strange emotion: "Then, as if releasing something strange, Mrs. Hale began to rearrange the dirt pans under the sink" (573). The play cannot provide description of emotions, but must show them as actions.

final paper continues to interpret specific literary details

As the plot of the play and the short story develops, the women start to sympathize more and more with Mrs. Wright. They start to feel for her situation—and they even put themselves into her situation. Ultimately, they decide to hide the evidence that Mrs. Wright murdered her husband. They realize that they understand her motive for murdering her husband in a way that the men do not. The men need the motive, and the women make an unspoken agreement to hide the motive from them. This understanding is shown through a series of actions. Because these agreements take the form of actions, the play is a more effective way to get the story across.

paper analyzes genre as a way of making a strong argument

Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters start to feel for Mrs. Wright by putting themselves into her place and understanding her emotional situation. For example, the women take out Mrs. Wright's bad quilt stitching and replace it with more organized quilt stitching. The women connect with Mrs. Wright's emotions through this action. They also connect with each other. In the play, they look at each other as they discover the bad stitching. Mrs. Hale explains, "Why, it looks as if she didn't know what she was about!" and then the stage directions explain, "After she has said this they look at each other, then start to glance back at the door. After an instant Mrs. Hale has pulled at a knot and ripped the sewing" (563). The audience is expected to figure out that the women are bonding through the sewing. By glancing at the door, the women are becoming allies against the men. In the short story, the connection between the women is described and given more explanation: "Their eyes met—something flashed to life, passed between them; then, as if with an effort they seemed to pull away from each other. A moment Mrs. Hale sat there, her hands folded over that sewing which was unlike all the rest of the sewing" (576). The play shows the women in action. The short story must describe those actions and thoughts and give them an interpretation.

writer develops ideas by adding layers to them (here, the idea of "connection" is used) paper also includes revisions for style; direct, concise statement emphasizes the paper's main argument

At the end of the play, the women's understanding of Mrs. Wright slowly becomes actions that hide Mrs. Wright's guilt from the men. Ultimately, the women do not just feel for her and understand her, but decide to protect her. The play highlights these actions of sympathy, understanding, and protection. The climax of the play and short story is the women's discovery of Mrs. Wright's canary. The canary is dead, but it has been carefully wrapped up in a piece of silk and stored in a special box. When inspected, the canary has a snapped neck. Mrs. Hale explains, "Look at it! Its neck! Look at its neck" (565). In addition, the cage door had been broken. Thus, the canary becomes an important symbol. First, the bird symbolizes an act of violence, and reveals that violence can lead to death. Second, it symbolizes Mrs. Wright herself. Mrs. Hale explains, "She—come to think of it, she was kind of like a bird herself—real sweet and pretty, but kind of timid and—fluttery" (565). Third, the bird symbolizes that Mrs. Wright cared for it and wanted some happiness in her life. The women realize that the canary must have been killed by Mr. Wright. Through this symbol, they understand Mr. Wright must have been cruel, even violent to Mrs. Wright. The bird, one of the few things to bring cheer to Mrs. Wright's cheerless life, is now gone. Mrs. Wright has a reason to murder her husband—she needs to seek revenge on the murderer of her bird.

writer has used organizational structure within paragraphs to keep ideas clear

The women's discovery of the motive for this murder is accomplished through a series of shared looks and actions. In the play, the discovery of the bird and the understanding that it is the motive for the murder is put in the stage directions. Right after Mrs. Peters says, "Somebody—wrung—its—neck," the stage directions state:

> Their eyes meet. A look of growing comprehension of horror. Steps are heard outside. Mrs. Hale slips box under quilt pieces, and sinks into her chair. Enter Sheriff and County Attorney. Mrs. Peter rises. (565) writer presents the most important evidence in her selected quotations

The stage directions show the women connecting with each other. The women do not just understand and feel for Mrs. Wright, but protect her. Because this information is put in the stage directions, it must be acted out writer introduces and follows the quotations with interpretation and shown. It is not described to the audience, but would be shown to the audience through the acting. The women decide that they must hide the evidence of Mrs. Wright's motive.

throughout, writer maintains an argumentative tone

The play is very effective in getting across the idea that an unspoken agreement can be important. The audience must see actions that reveal this unspoken agreement—it will not be described and explained to them. So, in a way, the audience shares in that unspoken agreement. The audience saw the same things as the women, and had to come to the same understanding of the same evidence in the same way. The audience is included in the women's realization.

In the short story, the women's connection is described in a similar way. But, in contrast to the play, this description does not become active and remains a description. It must explain what to think. The short story explains, "And then again the eyes of the two women met—this time clung together in a look of dawning comprehension, of growing horror. Mrs. Peters looked from the dead bird to the broken door of the cage. Again their eyes met. And just then there was a sound at the outside door" (578). The story puts together the pieces for the reader. The reader does not have to do much interpreting. The short story explains that the two women have bonded by using the phrase "clung together." The short story also explains exactly how the two women are connecting the clues of the murder—it explains that the women look at the dead bird and the broken birdcage. The short story makes the connections between the clues obvious. So, in the short story, the reader has to do less thinking and less connecting of the clues—and thus less detecting. The reader of the story is less of a detective.

within each paragraph, paper continues to move back and forth between the two texts writer continues to push her thinking and develop her best insights

By comparing the play Trifles and the short story "A Jury of Her Peers," it becomes clear that the play genre is a better match for this plot's ideas. In the play, the audience members must see the clues being gathered, with no description to tell them what the characters on stage are thinking and no description telling them how to interpret the plot. The play thus makes the audience into a detective who must figure out what is going on by watching it. In this way, the audience becomes like the two detective women, Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters. In contrast, the short story often tells the reader what the characters are thinking and tells the reader how to interpret the plot. The short story lets the reader be more passive and less active. It tells the reader what to think. As a result, the short story does not let the reader become a detective. The play is a more successful version of the plot, as it makes the audience become more active in interpreting the plot. In the play, the audience becomes a detective.

Chen 8

writer concludes with a strong argument that juxtaposes the two texts

[New page]

Chen 9

Works Cited

Glaspell, Susan. Trifles. Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 558-67. Print.

Glaspell, Susan. "A Jury of Her Peers." Literature for Composition. Ed. Sylvan Barnet, William Burto, William E. Cain, and Cheryl L. Nixon. 11th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2017. 567-81. Print.

Your Turn: Additional Plays for Analysis

A Modern Comedy

David Ives

David Ives, born in Chicago in 1950, was educated at Northwestern University and at the Yale Drama School. Sure Thing was first publicly staged in 1988, and it was later staged with six other one-act plays, grouped under the title All in the Timing.

Sure Thing

This play is for Jason Buzas

BETTY, a woman in her late twenties, is reading at a café table. An empty chair is opposite her. BILL, same age, enters.

BILL: Excuse me. Is this chair taken?
BETTY: Excuse me?
BILL: Is this taken?
BETTY: Yes it is.
BILL: Oh. Sorry.
BETTY: Sure thing.

[A bell rings softly.]

BILL: Excuse me. Is this chair taken?
BETTY: Excuse me?
BILL: Is this taken?
BETTY: No, but I'm expecting somebody in a minute.
BILL: Oh. Thanks anyway.
BETTY: Sure thing.

[A bell rings softly.]

BILL: Excuse me. Is this chair taken?
BETTY: No, but I'm expecting somebody very shortly.
BILL: Would you mind if I sit here till he or she or it comes?
BETTY [glances at her watch]: They do seem to be pretty late. . . .
BILL: You never know who you might be turning down.
BETTY: Sorry. Nice try, though.
BILL: Sure thing.

[Bell.]

Is this seat taken?

BETTY: No it's not.
BILL: Would you mind if I sit here?
BETTY: Yes I would.
BILL: Oh.

[Bell.]

Is this chair taken?

BETTY: No it's not.
BILL: Would you mind if I sit here?
BETTY: No. Go ahead.
BILL: Thanks. [He sits. She continues reading.] Everyplace else seems to be taken.
BETTY: Mm-hm.
BILL: Great place.
BETTY: Mm-hm.
BILL: What's the book?
BETTY: I just wanted to read in quiet, if you don't mind.
BILL: No. Sure thing.

[Bell.]

Everyplace else seems to be taken.

BETTY: Mm-hm.
BILL: Great place for reading.
BETTY: Yes, I like it.
BILL: What's the book?
BETTY: The Sound and the Fury.
BILL: Oh. Hemingway.

[Bell.]

What's the book?

BETTY: The Sound and the Fury.
BILL: Oh. Faulkner.
BETTY: Have you read it?
BILL: Not . . . actually. I've sure read about it, though. It's supposed to be great.
BETTY: It is great.
BILL: I hear it's great. [Small pause.] Waiter?

[Bell.]

What's the book?

BETTY: The Sound and the Fury.
BILL: Oh. Faulkner.
BETTY: Have you read it?
BILL: I'm a Mets fan, myself.

[Bell.]

BETTY: Have you read it?
BILL: Yeah, I read it in college.
BETTY: Where was college?
BILL: I went to Oral Roberts University.

[Bell.]

BETTY: Where was college?
BILL: I was lying. I never really went to college. I just like to party.

[Bell.]

BETTY: Where was college?
BILL: Harvard.
BETTY: Do you like Faulkner?
BILL: I love Faulkner. I spent a whole winter reading him once.
BETTY: I've just started.
BILL: I was so excited after ten pages that I went out and bought everything else he wrote. One of the greatest reading experiences of my life. I mean, all that incredible psychological understanding. Page after page of gorgeous prose. His profound grasp of the mystery of time and human existence. The smells of the earth . . . What do you think?
BETTY: I think it's pretty boring.

[Bell.]

BILL: What's the book?
BETTY: The Sound and the Fury.
BILL: Oh! Faulkner!

BETTY: Do you like Faulkner?
BILL: I love Faulkner.
BETTY: He's incredible.
BILL: I spent a whole winter reading him once.
BETTY: I was so excited after ten pages that I went out and bought everything else he wrote.
BILL: All that incredible psychological understanding.
BETTY: And the prose is so gorgeous.
BILL: And the way he's grasped the mystery of time—
BETTY: —and human existence. I can't believe I've waited this long to read him.
BILL: You never know. You might not have liked him before.
BETTY: That's true.
BILL: You might not have been ready for him. You have to hit these things at the right moment or it's no good.
BETTY: That's happened to me.
BILL: It's all in the timing. [Small pause.] My name's Bill, by the way.
BETTY: I'm Betty.
BILL: Hi.
BETTY: Hi. [Small pause.]
BILL: Yes I thought reading Faulkner was . . . a great experience.
BETTY: Yes. [Small pause.]
BILL: The Sound and the Fury . . . [Another small pause.]
BETTY: Well. Onwards and upwards. [She goes back to her book.]
BILL: Waiter—?

[Bell.]

You have to hit these things at the right moment or it's no good.

BETTY: That's happened to me.
BILL: It's all in the timing. My name's Bill, by the way.
BETTY: I'm Betty.
BILL: Hi.
BETTY: Hi.
BILL: Do you come in here a lot?
BETTY: Actually I'm just in town for two days from Pakistan.
BILL: Oh. Pakistan.

[Bell.]

My name's Bill, by the way.

BETTY: I'm Betty.
BILL: Hi.
BETTY: Hi.
BILL: Do you come in here a lot?
BETTY: Every once in a while. Do you?
BILL: Not so much anymore. Not as much as I used to. Before my nervous breakdown.

[Bell.]

Do you come in here a lot?

BETTY: Why are you asking?
BILL: Just interested.

BETTY: Are you really interested, or do you just want to pick me up?
BILL: No, I'm really interested.
BETTY: Why would you be interested in whether I come in here a lot?
BILL: I'm just . . . getting acquainted.
BETTY: Maybe you're only interested for the sake of making small talk long enough to ask me back to your place to listen to some music, or because you've just rented this great tape for your VCR, or because you've got some terrific unknown Django Reinhardt° record, only all you really want to do is fuck—which you won't do very well—after which you'll go into the bathroom and pee very loudly, then pad into the kitchen and get yourself a beer from the refrigerator without asking me whether I'd like anything, and then you'll proceed to lie back down beside me and confess that you've got a girlfriend named Stephanie who's away at medical school in Belgium for a year, and that you've been involved with her—off and on—in what you'll call a very "intricate" relationship, for the past seven YEARS. None of which interests me, mister!
BILL: Okay.

[Bell.]

Do you come in here a lot?

BETTY: Every other day, I think.
BILL: I come in here quite a lot and I don't remember seeing you.
BETTY: I guess we must be on different schedules.
BILL: Missed connections.
BETTY: Yes. Different time zones.
BILL: Amazing how you can live right next door to somebody in this town and never even know it.
BETTY: I know.
BILL: City life.
BETTY: It's crazy.
BILL: We probably pass each other in the street every day. Right in front of this place, probably.
BETTY: Yep.
BILL [looks around]: Well the waiters here sure seem to be in some different time zone. I can't seem to locate one anywhere. . . . Waiter! [He looks back.] So what do you—[He sees that she's gone back to her book.]
BETTY: I beg pardon?
BILL: Nothing. Sorry.

[Bell.]

BETTY: I guess we must be on different schedules.
BILL: Missed connections.
BETTY: Yes. Different time zones.
BILL: Amazing how you can live right next door to somebody in this town and never even know it.
BETTY: I know.
BILL: City life.
BETTY: It's crazy.
BILL: You weren't waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?

Django Reinhardt: jazz guitarist (1910–1953), famous in Paris in the 1930s.

BETTY: Actually I was.
BILL: Oh. Boyfriend?
BETTY: Sort of.
BILL: What's a sort-of boyfriend?
BETTY: My husband.
BILL: Ah-ha.

[Bell.]

You weren't waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?

BETTY: Actually I was.
BILL: Oh. Boyfriend?
BETTY: Sort of.
BILL: What's a sort-of boyfriend?
BETTY: We were meeting here to break up.
BILL: Mm-hm . . .

[Bell.]

What's a sort-of boyfriend?

BETTY: My lover. Here she comes right now!

[Bell.]

BILL: You weren't waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?
BETTY: No, just reading.
BILL: Sort of a sad occupation for a Friday night, isn't it? Reading here, all by yourself?
BETTY: Do you think so?
BILL: Well sure. I mean, what's a good-looking woman like you doing out alone on a Friday night?
BETTY: Trying to keep away from lines like that.
BILL: No, listen—

[Bell.]

You weren't waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?

BETTY: No, just reading.
BILL: Sort of a sad occupation for a Friday night, isn't it? Reading here all by yourself?
BETTY: I guess it is, in a way.
BILL: What's a good-looking woman like you doing out alone on a Friday night anyway? No offense, but . . .
BETTY: I'm out alone on a Friday night for the first time in a very long time.
BILL: Oh.
BETTY: You see, I just recently ended a relationship.
BILL: Oh.
BETTY: Of rather long standing.
BILL: I'm sorry. [Small pause.] Well listen, since reading by yourself is such a sad occupation for a Friday night, would you like to go elsewhere?
BETTY: No . . .
BILL: Do something else?
BETTY: No thanks.

BILL: I was headed out to the movies in a while anyway.
BETTY: I don't think so.
BILL: Big chance to let Faulkner catch his breath. All those long sentences get him pretty tired.
BETTY: Thanks anyway.
BILL: Okay.
BETTY: I appreciate the invitation.
BILL: Sure thing.

[Bell.]

You weren't waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?

BETTY: No, just reading.
BILL: Sort of a sad occupation for a Friday night, isn't it? Reading here all by yourself?
BETTY: I guess I was trying to think of it as existentially romantic. You know—cappuccino, great literature, rainy night . . .
BILL: That only works in Paris. We could hop the late plane to Paris. Get on a Concorde. Find a café . . .
BETTY: I'm a little short on plane fare tonight.
BILL: Darn it, so am I.
BETTY: To tell you the truth, I was headed to the movies after I finished this section. Would you like to come along? Since you can't locate a waiter?
BILL: That's a very nice offer, but . . .
BETTY: Uh-huh. Girlfriend?
BILL: Two, actually. One of them's pregnant, and Stephanie—

[Bell.]

BETTY: Girlfriend?
BILL: No, I don't have a girlfriend. Not if you mean the castrating bitch I dumped last night.

[Bell.]

BETTY: Girlfriend?
BILL: Sort of. Sort of.
BETTY: What's a sort-of girlfriend?
BILL: My mother.

[Bell.]

I just ended a relationship, actually.

BETTY: Oh.
BILL: Of rather long standing.
BETTY: I'm sorry to hear it.
BILL: This is my first night out alone in a long time. I feel a little bit at sea, to tell you the truth.
BETTY: So you didn't stop to talk because you're a Moonie, or you have some weird political affiliation—?
BILL: Nope. Straight-down-the-ticket Republican.

[Bell.]

Straight-down-the-ticket Democrat.

[Bell.]

Can I tell you something about politics?

[Bell.]

I like to think of myself as a citizen of the universe.

[Bell.]

I'm unaffiliated.

BETTY: That's a relief. So am I.
BILL: I vote my beliefs.
BETTY: Labels are not important.
BILL: Labels are not important, exactly. Take me, for example. I mean, what does it matter if I had a two-point at—

[Bell.]

three-point at—

[Bell.]

four-point at college? Or if I did come from Pittsburgh—

[Bell.]

Cleveland—

[Bell.]

Westchester County?

BETTY: Sure.
BILL: I believe that a man is what he is.

[Bell.]

A person is what he is.

[Bell.]

A person is . . . what they are.

BETTY: I think so too.
BILL: So what if I admire Trotsky?

[Bell.]

So what if I once had a total-body liposuction?

[Bell.]

So what if I don't have a penis?

[Bell.]

So what if I spent a year in the Peace Corps? I was acting on my convictions.

BETTY: Sure.
BILL: You just can't hang a sign on a person.

BETTY: Absolutely. I'll bet you're a Scorpio.

[Many bells ring.]

Listen, I was headed to the movies after I finished this section. Would you like to come along?

BILL: That sounds like fun. What's playing?
BETTY: A couple of the really early Woody Allen movies.
BILL: Oh.
BETTY: You don't like Woody Allen?
BILL: Sure. I like Woody Allen.
BETTY: But you're not crazy about Woody Allen.
BILL: Those early ones kind of get on my nerves.
BETTY: Uh-huh.

[Bell.]

BILL: Y'know I was headed to the—
BETTY [simultaneously]: I was thinking about—
BILL: I'm sorry.
BETTY: No, go ahead.
BILL: I was going to say that I was headed to the movies in a little while, and . . .
BETTY: So was I.
BILL: The Woody Allen festival?
BETTY: Just up the street.
BILL: Do you like the early ones?
BETTY: I think anybody who doesn't ought to be run off the planet.
BILL: How many times have you seen Bananas?
BETTY: Eight times.
BILL: Twelve. So are you still interested? [Long pause.]
BETTY: Do you like Entenmann's crumb cake . . . ?
BILL: Last night I went out at two in the morning to get one. Did you have an Etch-a-Sketch as a child?
BETTY: Yes! And do you like Brussels sprouts? [Pause.]
BILL: No, I think they're disgusting.
BETTY: They are disgusting!
BILL: Do you still believe in marriage in spite of current sentiments against it?
BETTY: Yes.
BILL: And children?
BETTY: Three of them.
BILL: Two girls and a boy.
BETTY: Harvard, Vassar, and Brown.
BILL: And will you love me?
BETTY: Yes.
BILL: And cherish me forever?
BETTY: Yes.
BILL: Do you still want to go to the movies?
BETTY: Sure thing.
BILL AND BETTY [together]: Waiter!

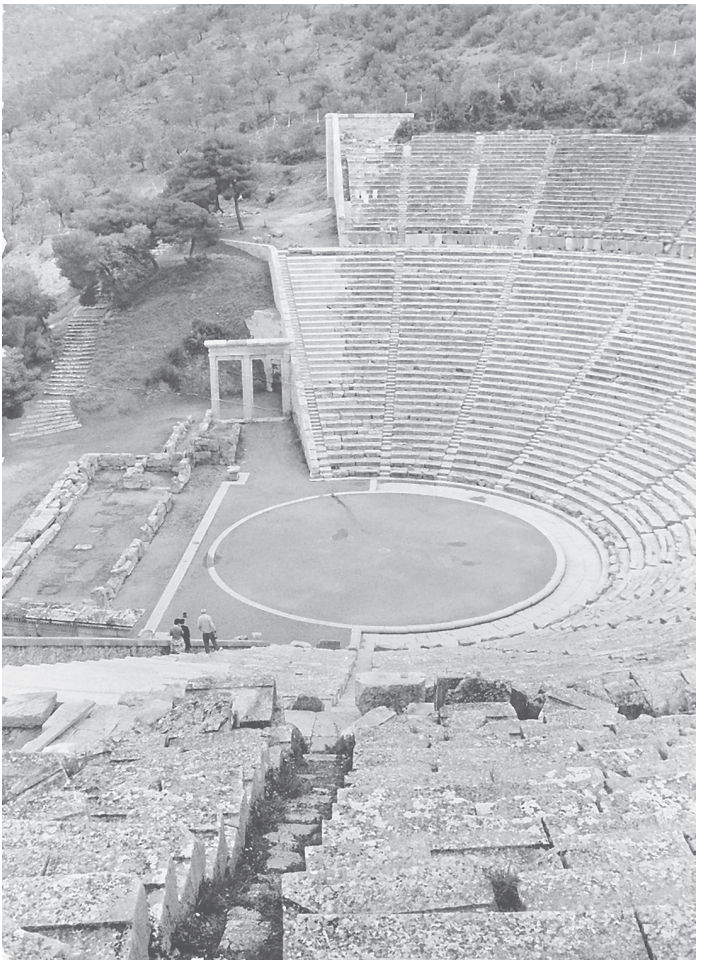
BLACKOUT

[1988]



Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Does Sure Thing have a plot? Does it follow the traditional formula of a beginning, a middle, and an end? (The conventional advice to playwrights is, "Get your guy up a tree, throw rocks at him, and get him down.") Is there an ending, a resolution, or do you think the play could go on and on? Please explain.
2. Ives's opening stage direction tells us that the play is set in a café, but no details are given. If you were staging the play, would you provide more than a table and two chairs? Some sort of atmosphere? Why, or why not?
3. Ives's text calls at the end for a blackout—a sudden darkening of the stage. Do you think this ending is preferable to a gradual fading of the lights, or a gradual closing of the curtain? Or, for that matter, why shouldn't the two characters leave some money on the table and walk out together? In short, staying with Ives's dialogue, evaluate other possible endings and present an argument for which one you believe is most effective. Ask yourself, "What kind of evidence do I need to make my argument as convincing as possible?"
4. If someone were to say to you that the play shows the need for people to keep revising their personalities, to (so to speak) keep reinventing themselves if they wish to function efficiently in the world, what might you reply? What does it mean to say that someone is "reinventing" himself or herself? Is that a desirable thing to do?

A Note on Greek Tragedy

Little or nothing is known for certain of the origin of Greek tragedy. The most common hypothesis holds that it developed from improvised speeches during choral dances honoring Dionysus, a Greek nature god associated with spring, fertility, and wine. Thespis (who perhaps never existed) is said to have introduced an actor into these choral performances in the sixth century BCE. Aeschylus (525–456 BCE), Greece's first great writer of tragedies, added the second actor, and Sophocles (496?–406 BCE) added the third actor and fixed the size of the chorus at fifteen. (Because the chorus leader often functioned as an additional actor, and because the actors sometimes doubled in their parts, a Greek tragedy could have more characters than might at first be thought.)

All the extant great Greek tragedy is of the fifth century BCE. It was performed at religious festivals in the winter and early spring, in large outdoor amphitheaters built on hillsides. Some of these theaters were enormous; the one at Epidaurus held about fifteen thousand people. The audience sat in tiers, looking down on the orchestra (a place for dancing), with the acting area behind it and the skene (the scene building) placed farther back. The scene building served as dressing room, background (suggesting a palace or temple), and place for occasional entrances and exits. Furthermore, this building helped to provide good acoustics, since speech travels well if there is a solid barrier behind the speakers and a hard, smooth surface in front of them, and if the audience sits in tiers. The wall of the scene building provided the barrier; the orchestra provided the surface in front of the actors; and the seats on the hillside fulfilled the third requirement. Moreover, the acoustics were somewhat improved by slightly elevating the actors above the orchestra, but it is not known exactly when this platform was first constructed in front of the scene building.

The theater at Epidaurus, located on the Peloponnesus, east of Nauplia, Greece.

A tragedy commonly begins with a prologos* (prologue), during which the exposition is given. Next comes the párodos, the chorus's ode of entrance, sung while the chorus marches into the theater through the side aisles and onto the orchestra. The epeisodion* (episode) is the ensuing scene; it is followed by a stasimon (choral song, ode). Usually, there are four or five epeisodia, alternating with stasima. Each of these choral odes has a strophe (lines presumably sung while the chorus dances in one direction) and an antistrophe (lines presumably sung while the chorus retraces its steps). Sometimes a third part, an epode, concludes an ode. (In addition to odes that are stasima, there can be odes within episodes; the fourth episode of Antigonê contains an ode complete with epode.) After the last part of the last ode comes the exodus, the epilogue or final scene.

The actors (all male) wore masks, and they seem to have chanted much of the play. Perhaps the total result of combining speech with music and dancing was a sort of music–drama roughly akin to opera with some spoken dialogue, such as Mozart's The Magic Flute (1791).

A Greek Tragedy

Jane Lapotaire in Antigone. National Theatre, London, 1984. (Donald Cooper/Photostage)

SOPHOCLES

One of the three great writers of tragedies in ancient Greece, Sophocles (496?–406 BCE) was born in Colonus, near Athens, into a well-to-do family. Well educated, he first won public acclaim as a tragic poet at the age of twenty-seven, in 468 BCE, when he defeated Aeschylus in a competition for writing a tragic play. He is said to have written some 120 plays, but only seven tragedies are extant; among them are Oedipus the King Antigone, and Oedipus at Colonus. He died, much honored, in his ninetieth year, in Athens, where he had lived his entire life.

BACKGROUND TO THE STORY: Once King of Thebes, Oedipus was the Should be ISMENE of two sons, Polynices and Eteocles, and of two daughters, ANTIGONE and ISMENE. Oedipus unwittingly killed his father, Laius, and married his own mother, Jocasta. When he learned what he had done, he blinded himself and left Thebes. Eteocles and Polynices quarreled, Polynices was driven out but returned to assault Thebes. In the battle, each brother killed the other; CREON (uncle of Oedipus's four children) became king and ordered that Polynices (whom CREON regards as a traitor because he invaded his own land) be left to rot on the battlefield unburied.

Antigone

*Translated by Michael Townsend

CHARACTERS

ANTIGONE	HAEMON	EURYDICE
ISMENE	TEIRESIAS	SERVANT
CREON	BOY	CHORUS
GUARD	MESSENGER

Stage directions and footnotes have been added by the editors.

[Enter ANTIGONE and ISMENE.]

ANTIGONE: My darling sister Ismene, we have had
A fine inheritance from Oedipus.
God has gone through the whole range of sufferings
And piled them all on us,—grief upon grief,
Humiliation upon humiliation.
And now this latest thing that our dictator
Has just decreed . . . you heard of it? Or perhaps
You haven't noticed our enemies at work.
ISMENE: No news, either good or bad, has come
To me, Antigone: nothing since the day
We were bereaved of our two brothers. No,
Since the withdrawal of the Argive army
Last night, I've heard nothing about our loved ones
To make me glad or sad.
ANTIGONE: I thought as much.
That's why I brought you out, outside the gate,
So we could have a talk here undisturbed.
ISMENE: You've something on your mind. What is it then?
ANTIGONE: Only that our friend Creon has decided
To discriminate between our brothers' corpses.
Eteocles he buried with full honors
To light his way to hell in a blaze of glory.
But poor dear Polynices,—his remains
Are not allowed a decent burial.
He must be left unmourned, without a grave,
A happy hunting ground for birds
To peck for tidbits. This ukase applies
To you,—and me of course. What's more, friend Creon
Is on his way here now to supervise
Its circulation in person. And don't imagine
He isn't serious,—the penalty
For disobedience is to be stoned to death.
So, there you have it. You're of noble blood.
Soon you must show your mettle,—if you've any.
ISMENE: Oh my fire-eating sister, what am I
Supposed to do about it, if this is the case?
ANTIGONE: Just think it over—if you'll give a hand . . .
ISMENE: In doing what? What do you have in mind?
ANTIGONE: Just helping me do something for the corpse.
ISMENE: You don't intend to bury him? It's forbidden.
ANTIGONE: He is my brother, and yours. My mind's made up.
You please yourself.
ISMENE: But Creon has forbidden. . . .
ANTIGONE: What Creon says is quite irrelevant.
He is my brother. I will bury him.
ISMENE: Oh God.
Have you forgotten how our father died,
Despised and hated? How he turned Detective to discover his own crimes,
Then stabbed his own eyes out with his own hands?

And then Jocasta, who was both together
His mother and his wife,
Hanged herself with a rope? Next, our two brothers
Became each other's murderers. We are left,
We two. How terrible if we as well
Are executed for disobeying
The lawful orders of the head of state.
Oh please remember,—we are women, aren't we?
We shouldn't take on men. In times of crisis
It is the strongest men who take control.
We must obey their orders, however harsh.
So, while apologizing to the dead,
Regretting that I act under constraint,
I will comply with my superior's orders.
Sticking one's neck out would be merely foolish.

ANTIGONE: Don't think I'm forcing you. In fact, I wouldn't Have your assistance if you offered it.
You've made your bed; lie on it. I intend
To give my brother burial. I'll be glad
To die in the attempt,—if it's a crime,
Then it's a crime that God commands. I then
Could face my brother as a friend and look
Him in the eyes. Why shouldn't I make sure
I get on with the dead rather than with
The living? There is all eternity
To while away below. And as for you,
By all means be an atheist if you wish.

ISMENE: I'm not. I'm simply powerless to act
Against this city's laws.

ANTIGONE: That's your excuse.
Good-bye. I'm going now to make a grave
For our brother, whom I love.

ISMENE: Oh, dear.
I'm terribly afraid for you.

ANTIGONE: Don't make a fuss
On my account,—look after your own skin.

ISMENE: At least then promise me that you will tell
No one of this; and I'll keep quiet too.

ANTIGONE: For God's sake don't do that,—you're sure to be Far more unpopular if you keep quiet.
No; blurt it out, please do.

ISMENE: You're very cheerful.

ANTIGONE: That is because I'm helping those I know
That I should help.

ISMENE: I only hope you can,
But it's impossible.

ANTIGONE: Must I hang back
From trying, just because you say I can't?

ISMENE: If it's impossible, you shouldn't try
At all.

ANTIGONE: If that's your line, you've earned my hatred
And that of our dead brother too, by rights.
Oh, kindly let me go my foolish way,
And take the consequences. I will suffer
Nothing worse than death in a good cause.
ISMENE: All right then, off you go. I'm bound to say
You're being very loyal, but very silly.

[Exit ANTIGONE and ISMENE, separately. Enter CHORUS.]

CHORUS: At last it has dawned, the day that sees
The force that rode from Argos driven
Back upon its road again
With headlong horses on a looser rein.

Roused by Polynices to aid his claim,
Like an eagle screaming,
With snow-tipped wings and bloody claws
And mouth agape, it wheeled about our fortress doors.

But Thebes, a hissing snake, fought back.
The god of fire could get no grip
Upon our crown of walls. That bird of prey,
Its beak balked of our blood, has turned away.

God hates presumption. When he saw
Those men in ostentatious force
And clash of gold advancing,
He singled out one man all set
To shout the victory cry upon the parapet,
And flung at him a lightning bolt, to curtail his prancing.

Covered in flame he dropped
Down like an empty balance and drummed the earth;
He who before had breathed
The winds of hate against us. In many a foray and rout,
War, a runaway horse, was hitting out.

Seven enemy kings at seven gates,
Fighting at equal odds,
Left their arms as trophies to Theban gods.

Elsewhere, the hated pair,
Sons of the same mother,
Crossed their swords in combat and killed each other.

But now that Victory has smiled on us,
Let us forget the war, and dance
At every temple all night long. And let Bacchus be king in Thebes, until the strong earth reels.

Ah, here comes Creon, our ruler,—in haste.
Something new has developed.
He has something afoot . . .
Else why has he summoned us to council?

[Enter CREON.]

CREON: Well, friends, our city has passed through stormy weather.
But now God has restored an even keel.
Why have I summoned you? Because I know
That you were at all times loyal to Laius.
And afterwards, when Oedipus put things right,
Then ruined them again, you showed
Your steadiness throughout his sons' dispute.
Well, now they're dead; and so, by due succession,
The power of the crown passes to me.
You cannot possibly judge a ruler's worth
Until he exercises the power he's got.
I've no time for the man who has full powers
Yet doesn't use them to enact good measures,
But adopts a timid policy of "do nothing."
Those aren't my principles. I'm not the man
To sit quietly by and watch my country
Sliding towards the precipice of ruin.
Nor can I be a friend to my country's foes.
This I believe—and God may witness it—
Our safety is bound up with that of our country. Therefore All other loyalties are subject to
Our country's interests.
By such measures I'll make this city great;—
Measures like those that I have just enacted
Concerning Oedipus' sons. That Eteocles
Who died while fighting in his country's service,
Is to be buried with ceremonial honors.
But Polynices,—whose intention was
To fight his way back from exile, burn to the ground
His mother city and the temples of
His family's gods, to slaughter out of hand
And to enslave his fellow citizens—
He's not to have a grave or any mourning.
His corpse is to be left, a grim warning,
Pecked at by birds and worried by the dogs.
That is my policy. A malefactor mustn't
Have the same treatment as the loyal man.
I intend to see our country's friends rewarded
When they are dead, as well as while they live.
CHORUS: We understand the attitude you take Towards these men. It's true your word is law,
And you can legislate for living and dead. . . .
CREON: What do you think then of this new enactment?
CHORUS: If I were younger, I might criticize. . . .
CREON: No turning back. The guard is set on the corpse.
CHORUS: What are the penalties for disobeying?
CREON: The penalty is death. As simple as that.
CHORUS: That ought to stop them. Who'd be such a fool?
CREON: You'd be surprised. Men led astray by hopes
Of gain will risk even their lives for money.

[Enter GUARD.]

GUARD: Sir, here I am. I can't pretend I'm puffed
From running here with all possible speed.
I kept changing my mind on the way.
One moment I was thinking, "What's the hurry?
You're bound to catch it when you get there." Then:
"What are you dithering for? You'll get it hot
And strong if Creon finds out from someone else."
Torn by these doubts I seem to have taken my time.
So what should be a short journey has become
A long one. Anyway I have arrived.
And now I'm going to tell you what I came
To tell you, even if you've heard it. See,
I've made up my mind to expect the worst.
We can't avoid what's coming to us, can we?
CREON: Well then, what puts you in such deep despair?
GUARD: First I must make a statement—about myself.
I didn't do it, and didn't see who did it.
So I'm quite in the clear, you understand.
CREON: For God's sake tell me what it is, and then Get out.
GUARD: All right, all right. It amounts to this.
Somebody's buried the body, thrown earth on it,
And done the necessary purifications.
CREON: Someone has been a damn fool. Who was it?
GUARD: Dunno. There were no spade-marks in the earth.
The ground was hard and dry, and so there was
No sign of the intruder.
See, when the man who had the first day watch
Told us about it, we had the shock of our lives.
The corpse had not been buried in a grave,
But enough dust was thrown on to avoid
The curse unburied bodies suffer from.
There wasn't even a sign of any dog
That might have come and scuffed the dust upon him.
Then everyone started shouting. Each man blamed
His mate. We very nearly came to blows.
Everyone claimed that one of the others had done it,
And tried to prove that he himself was blameless.
To prove their innocence, some said they were Prepared to pick up red-hot coals or walk
Through fire. While others swore on oath,
By a catalog of gods, they didn't do it
And weren't accomplices in any form.
When our investigations made no progress,
In the end one man came out with a sobering speech.
We couldn't answer him, though what he said
Was none too pleasant.
He said we mustn't try to hush it up,
But tell you everything. His view prevailed.
Who was to bring the news? We tossed for it.

I was the lucky person. I can tell you,
I don't like being the bearer of bad news.
CHORUS: I think I see the hand of God in this,
Bringing about the body's burial.
CREON: Shut up, before I lose my temper.
You may be old, try not to be foolish as well.
How can you say God cares about this corpse?
Do you suppose God feels obliged to him
For coming to burn down his temples and
His statues, in defiance of his laws?
Ever noticed God being kind to evildoers?
No. Certain hostile elements in the city
Who don't like discipline and resent my rule,
Are in on this. They've worked upon the guards
By bribes. There is no human institution
As evil as money. Money ruins nations,
And makes men refugees. Money corrupts
The best of men into depravity.
The people who have done this thing for money
Will get what's coming to them. Listen here,
I swear to you by God who is my judge,
That if you and your friends do not divulge
The name of him who did the burying
One hell won't be enough for you. You'll all
Be hanged up and flogged until you tell.
That ought to teach you to be more selective
About what you get your money from.
GUARD: Am I dismissed?
Or may I speak?
CREON: I thought I made it plain
I couldn't stand your talk.
GUARD: Where does it hurt you,—
Your ears, or in your mind?
CREON: What do you mean?
What does it matter where you give me pain?
GUARD: The guilty party bothers you deep down.
But my offense is only at ear level.
CREON: My dear good man, you're much too talkative.
GUARD: I may be that, but I am not your culprit.
CREON: I think you are, and that you did it for money.
GUARD: Oh God! I tell you your suspicions are wrong.
CREON: Suspicion he calls it! Look here, if you Don't tell me who the culprits are, you'll find
That ill-gotten gains are not without their drawbacks. [Exit CREON.]
GUARD: Good luck to you, I hope you find the man.
In any case I won't be in a hurry
To come back here again. I thank my stars
That I have saved my skin. I didn't expect to. [Exit GUARD.]
CHORUS: Many amazing things exist, and the most amazing is man.
He's the one, when the gale-force winds
Blow and the big waves
Tower and topple on every side,

Cruises over the deep on the gray tide.
He's the one that to and fro
Over the clods year after year
Wends with his horses and ploughing gear,
Works to his will the untiring Earth, the greatest of gods.

He traps the nitwit birds, and the wild
Beasts in their lairs. The ocean's myriad clan
In woven nets he catches,—ingenious man.

He has devised himself shelter against
The rigors of frost and the pelting weather.
Speech and science he's taught himself,
And the city's political arts for living together.

For incurable diseases he has found a cure;
By his inventiveness defying
Every eventuality there can be,—except dying.

But the most brilliant gifts
Can be misapplied.
On his moral road
Man swerves from side to side.

God and the government ordain
Just laws; the citizen
Who rules his life by them
Is worthy of acclaim.

But he that presumes
To set the law at naught
Is like a stateless person,
Outlawed, beyond the pale.

With such a man I'd have
No dealings whatsoever.
In public and in private
He'd get the cold shoulder.

What's this? What on earth?
My God. Can it be? Yes, Antigone.
Your father before, now you!
Is it so, you were caught disobeying the law?
How could you have been so stupid?

[Enter GUARD with ANTIGONE.]

GUARD: Here she is. She is the one,—the one that did it.
We caught her in the act. Where's Creon gone?
CHORUS: There, by good luck he's coming out right now.

[Enter CREON.]

CREON: Soon as I leave the house, some trouble starts.
What's happening?
GUARD: Well, well, I never thought
That I'd be coming back here again so soon,

Considering how you swore at me just now.
But here I am, in spite of what I said.
I'm bringing in this girl. I caught her tending
The grave. I caught her, no one else. And so
I hand her over to you to stand her trial.
And now I reckon I'm entitled to beat it.

CREON: Give me full details, with the circumstances.
GUARD: This girl was burying him. As simple as that.
CREON: I trust you understand what you are saying.
GUARD: I saw her burying the corpse you said
Was not permitted to be buried. Clear enough?
CREON: Tell me precisely how you saw and caught her.
GUARD: It was like this. When we got back,
With your threats still smarting in our ears,
We swept all the dust from off the corpse,
And laid the moldering thing completely bare.
Then we went and sat on the high ground to windward,
To avoid the smell. And everyone gave hell
To the man who was on duty, to keep him up
To scratch. We watched till midday, when the sun
Is hottest. Suddenly a squall came on,—
A whirlwind with a thunderstorm; it ripped
The leaves from every tree in all the plain.
The air was full of it; we had to keep
Our eyes tight shut against the wrath of heaven.
At last, when all was over, there we see
The girl,—crying like a bird that finds
Its nest empty of chicks,—her having seen
The corpse uncovered. Then she started cursing
Whoever did it. Next she goes and fetches
Dust in her hands; and from a jug she pours
A set of three libations on the corpse.
When we saw that of course we jumped straight up
And grabbed the girl. She took it very calmly.
We charged her with this crime and the previous one,
And she admitted them. So I'm half glad,
Half sorry. Glad that I am out of danger,
But sorry someone that I like's in trouble.
However, main thing is that I'm all right.
CREON: You, with your eyes fixed on the ground.
Do you admit the charges or deny them?
ANTIGONE: I don't deny the charges. I admit them.
CREON: (to GUARD) All right, clear off. [Exit GUARD.] Consider yourself lucky
To be absolved of guilt.
(to ANTIGONE) Now tell me, briefly,—I don't want a speech.
You knew about my edict which forbade this?
ANTIGONE: Of course I knew. You made it plain enough.
CREON: You took it on yourself to disobey?
ANTIGONE: Sorry, who made this edict? Was it God?
Isn't a man's right to burial decreed
By divine justice? I don't consider your Pronouncements so important that they can

Just . . . overrule the unwritten laws of heaven.
You are a man, remember.
These divine laws are not just temporary measures.
They stand forever. I would have to face
Them when I died. And I will die, without Your troubling to arrange it. So, what matter
If I must die before my time? I'd welcome
An early death, living as I do now.
What I can't stand is passively submitting
To my own brother's body being unburied.
I dare say you think I'm being silly.
Perhaps you're not so very wise yourself.
CHORUS: She's difficult, just like her father was.
She doesn't realize when to give in.
CREON: I know these rigid temperaments. They're the first
To break. The hardest-tempered steel
Will shatter at a blow. The highest-mettled
Horses are broken in with a small bit.
That's what is needed, discipline. This girl
Knew damned well she was kicking over the traces,
Breaking the law. And now when she has done it,
She boasts about it, positively gloats.
If she gets away with this behavior,
Call me a woman and call her a man.
I don't care if she is my sister's daughter.
I don't care if she's closer to me than all
My family. She and her sister won't get off.
I'll execute them.
Oh yes, her as well.
She's in it too. Go get her. She's inside.
I saw her in there muttering, half-balmy.
It is her conscience. She can't hide her guilt.
At least she doesn't try to justify it.
ANTIGONE: Won't my death be enough? Do you want more?
CREON: No, that will do, as far as I'm concerned.
ANTIGONE: Then why not do it now? Our wills conflict
Head-on. No chance of reconciliation.
I can't think of a finer reason for dying,—
Guilty of having buried my own brother.
These men are on my side. But they daren't say so.
CREON: That's where you're wrong. You're quite alone in this.
ANTIGONE: They're on my side. They're forced to cringe to you.
CREON: These men obey. But you and you alone
Decide to disobey. Aren't you ashamed?
ANTIGONE: Ashamed? Ashamed of what? Ashamed of being Loyal to my own family, my own brother?
CREON: Eteocles was also your own brother.
ANTIGONE: Indeed he was. Of course he was my brother.
CREON: Then why were you so disloyal to him?
ANTIGONE: If he were living now, he'd back me up.
CREON: For treating his brother no differently from him!
ANTIGONE: It was his brother that died, not just some servant.

CREON: Died while commanding an invading force!
But Eteocles died fighting for his country.
ANTIGONE: That doesn't affect the laws of burial.
CREON: You can't treat friend and enemy the same.
ANTIGONE: Who knows what the rules are among the dead?
CREON: Your enemy doesn't become your friend by dying.
ANTIGONE: If we must have these groupings, let me say
I'll join anyone in loving, but not in hating.
CREON: All right then, die, and love them both in hell.
I'm not here to be shoved around by a woman.

[Enter ISMENE, guarded.]

CHORUS: Oh, look, by the gate, here's Ismene.
She's crying because of her sister.
What a shame this heavy cloud of grief
Should spoil her attractive appearance.
CREON: And now for you. You who've been skulking quiet,
Injecting your slow poison like a viper.
Imagine my not noticing,—I've been rearing
Two furies in my house, ready to bite
The hand that fed them. Just you tell me now—
Will you confess you were party to this burial,
Or will you swear you had no knowledge of it?
ISMENE: I did it, if she did it. I'm involved.
I'm in with her and bear my share of blame.
ANTIGONE: That's quite unjustified. You didn't want
To help me, and I didn't let you join me.
ISMENE: You are in trouble. May I then not make Myself your comrade in adversity?
ANTIGONE: The dead know who it was that did the deed.
You took no action. Your speeches don't impress me.
ISMENE: How can you, being my sister, deny my wish
To die with you for Polynices' sake?
ANTIGONE: Don't go and die as well as me, and don't Lay claim to what you haven't done. I'm going To die. One death's enough.
ISMENE: Will life be worth
Living to me, left all alone without you?
ANTIGONE: May I suggest an object of affection?
Creon. He is your uncle, after all.
ISMENE: Why do you try to hurt me? What's the point?
ANTIGONE: I may make fun of you, but I feel this deeply.
ISMENE: I only want to know how I can help you.
ANTIGONE: Well, save yourself then. I don't grudge you that.
ISMENE: I don't want that. I want to die with you.
ANTIGONE: You chose to live; I chose to die, remember?
ISMENE: I didn't express my innermost convictions.
ANTIGONE: You sounded pretty convinced at the time.
ISMENE: I still maintain that we two share the guilt.
ANTIGONE: Don't worry. You won't die. But I've already Sacrificed my life to help the dead.

CREON: These girls! One of them's been mad all her life.
And now the other one's gone balmy too.
ISMENE: But, sir, however sensible one is,
Adversity is bound to affect one's judgment.
CREON: Well, it has yours! You join this criminal,
And identify yourself with her misdeeds . . .
ISMENE: There is no life left for me without her.
CREON: Forget about her. She's as good as dead.
ISMENE: So you would execute your own son's bride?
CREON: Plenty of other women in the world.
ISMENE: But they were so well suited to each other.
CREON: I won't have my son marrying a bitch.
ANTIGONE: Poor Haemon! See how much your father cares.
CREON: Oh, go to hell,—you and your marriage with you.
ISMENE: You really intend to take her from your son?
CREON: I won't stop the marriage. Death will stop it.
ISMENE: There's no way out? It is fixed that she dies?
CREON: Of course it's fixed. Stop wasting time.
You servants, take her in. It's very important
To keep women strictly disciplined.
That's the deterrent. Even the bravest people
Will step down quick when they see death loom up.

[Exit ISMENE, ANTIGONE, and GUARDS.]

CHORUS: Happy the man whose life is uneventful.
For once a family is cursed by God,
Disasters come like earthquake tremors, worse
With each succeeding generation.

It's like when the sea is running rough
Under stormy winds from Thrace.
The black ooze is stirred up from the sea-bed,
And louder and louder the waves crash on shore.

Look now at the last sunlight that sustains
The one surviving root of Oedipus' tree,—
The sword of death is drawn to hack it down.

And all through nothing more than intemperate language.
All through nothing more than hasty temper.

What power on earth can resist
Your strength, O God? You stand supreme,
Untouched by sleep that makes all else feel old,
Untired by the passing years that wear all else away.

I know one rule that has stood,
And will stand, forever.
That nothing in our life can be exempt
From the universal forces that make for ruin.

Hope, that tramps all roads, may help at times.
More often, it deludes weak-minded men.

They never notice, till they feel the fire.

It is a wise saying, that
When God is set against you,
You welcome the path to ruin,—but not for long.

Here comes Haemon, your youngest son.
I expect he's grieved about his bride,
And this sudden bar to his marriage.

[Enter HAEMON.]

CREON: There's one way of finding out for certain.
My son, you've heard about this public decree.
Have you come here in a spirit of indignation
About your bride, or are you going to be Loyal to me whatever I'm involved in?
HAEMON: I am your son. So while your policies
Are just, you have my full obedience.
I certainly wouldn't consider any marriage
As important as the right leadership by you.
CREON: Good, good. Your heart is in the right place. Nothing
Should come before your loyalty to your father.
Why else do fathers pray for well-behaved sons?
They do things together. Work together against Their common enemy. Vie with each
Other in being good friends to their friends.
As for the man who brings up useless sons,
He's got himself a load of trouble,—all
His enemies laugh at them, a bad team.
Never get carried away by a woman, son.
Sex isn't everything. If she's a bitch,
You'll feel a coldness as she lies beside you.
Can there be anything worse than giving your love
To a bitch that doesn't deserve it? No, reject her,
And let her go and find a husband in hell.
Now that I've caught her flagrantly disobeying
When everybody else has toed the line,
The eyes of the nation are on me. I must stay
True to my principles. I must execute her.
I don't give a damn for all her talk
About family ties. If I allow
My own relations to get out of control,
That gives the cue to everybody else.
People who are loyal members of their families
Will be good citizens too. But if a person
Sets himself up above the law and tries
To tell his rulers what they ought to do,—
You can't expect me to approve of that.
Once a man has authority, he must be obeyed,—
In big things and in small, in every act,
Whether just or not so just. I tell you this,
The well-disciplined man is good

At giving orders and at taking them too.
In war, in a crisis, he's the sort of man
You like to have beside you. On the other hand,
There's nothing so disastrous as anarchy.
Anarchy means an ill-disciplined army,
A rabble that will break into a panic rout.
What follows? Plundered cities, homeless people.
A disciplined army loses few men;
Discipline pulls them through to victory.
We can't go about kowtowing to women.
If I must lose my throne, let it be a man
That takes it from me. I can't have people saying
My will has been defeated by a woman.

CHORUS: I think your observations very just,
In general . . . though perhaps I'm old and silly.

HAEMON: Father, don't you agree,—
Of all God's gifts, good sense is far the best.
I'm sure I'd be the last person to deny
That what you said is true. Yet there may be
A lot of justice in the opposite view.
I've one advantage over you,—I know
Before you what the people think about you,
Especially criticism. You're so held in awe
That people dare not say things to your face.
But I am able to hear their secret talk.
The people feel sorry for Antigone.
They say it isn't equitable she must die
A horrible death for such a noble action.
They say that she in fact deserves special
Honor for refusing to allow
The body of her brother to be left
Unburied for dogs and birds to pull to pieces.
That is their secret opinion, and it's gaining ground.
Of course I want your rule to be a success.
There's nothing more important to me than that.
Such feeling is mutual, between father and son,—
One's glad to see the other doing well.
Don't be too single-minded, then. Don't think
You have a complete monopoly of the truth.
Isn't it true that people who refuse
To see any other point of view but theirs
Often get shown up and discredited?
However acute one is, there's no disgrace
In being able to learn, being flexible.
In winter, when the streams turn into torrents,
You can see the trees that try to resist the water
Get rooted out and killed. But those that bend
A little, manage to survive the flood.
In a gale at sea if you cram on full sail,
You'll soon have the waves breaking aboard
And bowling over all the furniture.

Why not relax and change your mind for once?
Perhaps at my age I should not express
An opinion, but I would like to say this:—
Not everyone can be right on every issue,
But the next best thing is to take notice of
And learn from the judicious thoughts of others.
CHORUS: Yes, everyone can learn. You, sir, can learn
From him,—and he of course from you. There's much
Of substance in the arguments on both sides.
CREON: Am I to stand here and be lectured to
By a kid? A man of my experience!
HAEMON: I'm not suggesting anything illegal.
I may be young, but judge me by the facts.
CREON: The facts are, you're encouraging my detractors.
HAEMON: I'm not encouraging anything that's wrong.
CREON: You seem to have caught Antigone's disease.
HAEMON: The people of Thebes don't call it a disease.
CREON: Must I ask their permission for everything?
HAEMON: You're talking like an adolescent now.
CREON: Am I the king of Thebes, or am I not?
HAEMON: It takes more than one person to make a nation.
CREON: But a nation is personified in its ruler.
HAEMON: In that case Thebes has got no population.
CREON: I take it you are siding with this woman.
HAEMON: It is your interests I have at heart.
CREON: You show it by arguing against me?
HAEMON: Because I think you're making a mistake.
CREON: Must I let my authority be undermined?
HAEMON: Yes, rather your authority than God's.
CREON: What character! Subservient to a woman.
HAEMON: Subservient to what I think is right.
CREON: You've done nothing but back Antigone up.
HAEMON: Not only her, but God, and you as well.
CREON: Don't try to butter me up, you ladies' man.
HAEMON: You like to talk, but you're not prepared to listen.
CREON: This woman will not live to marry you.
HAEMON: Then she won't be the only one to die.
CREON: Oh, oh. Threats is it now? You've got a nerve.
HAEMON: I'm trying to show you that you're being perverse.
CREON: You will regret you tried to schoolmaster me.
HAEMON: If you weren't my father, I'd say you were deranged.
CREON: What's that? I've had enough of your abuse.
By heaven, I swear I'll make you suffer for it.
Take that hell-cat away. You'll watch her die.
Ha, she will die in front of her bridegroom's nose.
HAEMON: I won't give you that satisfaction.
I won't be around when she dies.
You must find other friends to condone your madness.
You will never set eyes on me again. [Exit HAEMON.]
CHORUS: He's rushed off in a really furious temper.
He's young,—I fear he may do something rash.

CREON: Let him.
Who does he think he is, God almighty?
In any case, he won't save these girls from death.
CHORUS: You don't mean to execute them both?
CREON: No, no. You're right. Not her that wasn't involved.
CHORUS: What sort of execution do you intend?
CREON: I'll take her to a deserted spot
And bury her alive in a trench.
She'll have enough food to avoid the curse,—
The people mustn't suffer because of her.
There she can pray to the god she likes so much,—
The god of death. Perhaps he'll save her life.
Either that, or she'll find out too late
That corpses are more trouble than they're worth.
CHORUS: What is it that nestles in
The soft cheeks of a girl,
And pervades the deep sea and the teeming earth,
And persecutes god and man, a force
Irresistible? We call it Love.
A man possessed by Love loses control.
Love drives the law-abiding into crime;
And sets a family against itself.

So here a lovely girl's appealing glance
Has prevailed, and destroyed the bonds of blood.
For Love makes mock of time-honored laws
Ordaining loyalty from son to father.

And grief also is irresistible.
The tears come to my eyes,—I cannot stop them;
Seeing Antigone go to such a bed,
The bed that puts all mortal things to sleep.

ANTIGONE: Take a good look. With life still strong in me,
I'm going on my last journey, seeing
For the last time the bright rays of the sun.
Unmarried, never having heard my wedding song,
Death takes me to the dark riverbanks to be his bride.
CHORUS: You have one glorious consolation.
By your own choice you go down to death
Alive, not wasted by disease,
Nor hacked by instruments of war.
ANTIGONE: I shall go to sleep like Niobe.°
I know her story well. On Mount Sipylus
The rock grew, like ivy, round her and weighed her down.
And now the rain and snow
Make tears that run across her stony face.

710 Niobe Niobe boasted of her numerous children, provoking Apollo's mother to destroy them. Niobe wept uncontrollably, and was turned into stone on Mount Sipylus, whose streams are her tears.

CHORUS: There's no comparison. For she was born
Of divine parentage. You would be lucky
To share the fate of mythical heroines.
ANTIGONE: Are you getting at me? Wait till I'm dead.
I'm going to die,—do I merit no respect?
O my city, O my friends, rich householders,
O river Dirce, with the sacred grove
Of Thebes the Charioteer, I call you all
To witness that I die with nobody
To shed a tear for me, the victim
Of an unjust law. Who'd like to go with me
To an eerie heap of stones, a tomb that is no tomb,
A no-man's land between the living and the dead?
CHORUS: You tried to do the right thing by your brother.
You stepped boldly towards the altar of Justice,
But somehow stumbled. I fear you must suffer
For your father's sins.
ANTIGONE: Don't speak of it again. It's only too well known,—
My father's fate. To think how much
Our family was admired, in generations past.
Then came successive strokes of doom. My mother's Marriage to her son, the union
From which I came, to end like this.
My brother, dishonored, drags me down with him,
And so I go to join my stricken family in hell.
CHORUS: We respect what you did for your brother.
But there's no question that the orders
Of those in authority must be obeyed.
You were self-willed. That has been your undoing.
ANTIGONE: I see I have no friends to say good-bye.
No friends, no tears for me, no marriage to look back on.
Never again to see the face of the sun.
CREON: If I don't stop this blubbering, we'll be here
All night. Stop wasting time. Take her away.
As my instructions state, you are to place
Her in the vaulted trench, and brick it in.
It's up to her then,—either live or die.
My hands are clean in this. I've merely Deprived her of all contact with the living.
ANTIGONE: This stone dugout, half tomb, half bridal-chamber,
Will house me now for good. By this road
I go below to Queen Persephone's kingdom,
To see again so many of my family.
As I am the latest recruit, so is my fate
By far the cruelest. And I've not used
My life's full span.
At least I can look forward to a warm
Welcome from my dear mother and father and
My brother Eteocles. When they were dead,
I washed them and prepared them for the grave
With my own hands, and poured libations over them.

But now, for doing the same to Polynices,
This is my reward. Because Creon thinks
I have committed an act of brazen defiance.
For this I'm being dragged off by force,
Deprived of my chance to marry and raise children.
I'm to be buried alive, not very pleasant. . . .
I just want to ask, what moral law
Have I disobeyed? But what's the point
Of appealing to God? Or asking
Help from my fellow humans? It appears
That virtue is to be repaid by malice.
If that is God's idea of what is right,
Then I apologize; I made a mistake.
But if Creon is wrong, I only hope
He isn't treated any better than me.

CHORUS: A hurricane of passionate conviction
Still sweeps her mind.

CREON: Don't stand about, you lot; or else . . .
Hurry, and off with her.

ANTIGONE: Oh, right before me now. Death.

CHORUS: If you had any hopes, I should forget them.
Your punishment is fixed. There's no appeal.

ANTIGONE: This is it. The time has come.
For doing what was right,
I'm dragged away to death.
And Thebes, city where I was born,
And you my friends, the rich people of Thebes,
Will you judge between us?
You might at least look and remember.

[Exit ANTIGONE guarded.]

CHORUS: My poor child, what must be
Must be. Console yourself,
Such things have happened before.

There's nothing that can win the fight
Against the force of destiny;
Not wealth, or military might,
Or city walls, or ships that breast the sea.

Lycurgus, king of Thrace, tried to stop
The bacchanal women and their torchlit orgies.
For his vindictive rage,
He lost his liberty with his temper, locked
By Bacchus in a mountain cave
To let his anger simmer down.

In Salmydessus on the Euxine Sea,
The two sons of Phineus lost their eyes.
In their stepmother's hand, a pointed shuttle . . .
And their blood on her nails cried out for vengeance.

But their mother was jailed in a cavern
Under a steep mountain far away.
She was Cleopatra, the North Wind's daughter.
A god's daughter, but fate weighed her down.

[Enter TEIRESIAS, led by a boy.]

TEIRESIAS: Councillors of Thebes, I have come,—
A man with four eyes, half of them blind . . .
CREON: It's old Teiresias. What's up, old fellow?
TEIRESIAS: Listen, and I will tell you. I'm no liar . . .
CREON: I've never suggested that. Quite the reverse.
TEIRESIAS: By doing so, you were able to save Thebes.
CREON: True, I have found what you have said most useful.
TEIRESIAS: Listen to me. You're on the razor's edge.
CREON: What's wrong? The way you talk gives me a turn.
TEIRESIAS: You may think nothing's wrong. But my skill
Says differently.
I went to my accustomed place
Of augury, where there's a wide view of
The sky, to observe the birds. There I heard
An unprecedented din of birds, barbarous,
Confused, as though some madness stung them into Screaming. I heard them fighting with their claws;
The noise was unmistakable, their wings
Whirring . . . and I felt fear. Immediately
I tried the burnt sacrifices, but
They gave no flame. Only a damp vapor
Smoldered and spat. The gall burst in the fire,
Exposing the thighbones bare of fat.
The boy saw all this and told it me.
Thus I interpret. These signs portend evil
For Thebes; and the trouble stems from your policy.
Why? Because our altars are polluted
By flesh brought by dogs and birds, pickings
From Polynices' corpse. Small wonder that
The gods won't accept our sacrifices.
My son, I ask you to consider well
What you are doing. We all make mistakes.
The wise man, having made an error of judgment,
Will seek a remedy, not keep grinding on.
Obstinacy isn't far removed from folly.
The man is dead. No need to persecute him.
You can give way, with good grace, to a corpse.
He has died once, why try to kill him again?
I'm saying this because I wish you well.
A bit of sound advice is always welcome.
CREON: Money! Must everyone set their cap at me
Because of money? Even you augurers
Have formed a corporation to exploit me.
For years now I have been traded about
By your gang in the open market like

A piece of merchandise. All right, rake in
The cash, pile up the wealth of Lydia
And all the gold of India in bribes.
You'll never persuade me to bury that corpse.
Not even if the eagles of Zeus decide
To carry off its flesh in their claws
And place it right on their master's throne.
I refuse for the simple reason that
It's quite impossible for any man
To throw pollution on the gods. They are Inviolate. But certain gifted men
That I could mention do not seem to mind
A little sharp practice, in the matter
Of telling a lie or two, strictly for cash.
TEIRESIAS: Well!
Can there exist a man who doesn't know . . .
CREON: Watch out, here comes another resounding cliché!
TEIRESIAS: . . . Good sense is a man's most precious attribute?
CREON: And bad judgment is a great encumbrance?
TEIRESIAS: It's an encumbrance you have plenty of.
CREON: . . . No.
You started it, but I won't insult a "seer."
TEIRESIAS: You've done that already,—accused me of lying.
CREON: The whole lot of you seers are on the make.
TEIRESIAS: Kings also have been known to make their pile.
CREON: Are you implying some reflection on me?
TEIRESIAS: You wouldn't be king now, but for me.
CREON: You're good at your job. But you've gone crooked.
TEIRESIAS: Much more of this, and you'll make me reveal . . .
CREON: Reveal away. But straight, and not for bribes.
TEIRESIAS: You'll wish you had bribed me not to speak . . .
CREON: Don't try to pull the wool over my eyes.
TEIRESIAS: The sun won't run its course for many days
Before you have to repay a corpse of your own,
One of your own children as recompense.
One body that belongs to this world
You have locked up in a tomb. Another body
That rightly should be in the underworld
You have forcibly retained here on earth.
Because of this, the Furies have been waiting
To pay you back in your own coin. And so
It won't be long before your house is full
Of grief; I can see men and women crying.
Make up your own mind whether I've been bribed
To say this. Yes, it hurts. But you provoked me.
My boy, take me home. I'm not so young,—
I dare not be around when he explodes.
I only hope he learns from this to show
A little sense and keep a civil tongue. [Exit TEIRESIAS.]
CHORUS: That was a horrible prophecy.
I'm bound to say I've never known him wrong
In any of his predictions.

CREON: Yes, I know,
I know. I can't pretend that I'm not worried.
The consequences of giving in are terrible.
But if I hold out, I court disaster.
CHORUS: The right decision now is vitally important.
CREON: What should I do then? Tell me what to do.
CHORUS: You'll have to go and set Antigone free,
And give the exposed corpse a burial.
CREON: Is that your real opinion? To give in?
CHORUS: And waste no time about it, for the wrath
Of God will not be slow to catch you up.
CREON: Can't fight against what's destined. It is hard,
But I'll change my mind. You servants,—
Pick-axes, hurry, and come with me. I must Personally undo what I have done.
I shouldn't have tried being unorthodox.
I'll stick by the established laws in the future.
[Exit CREON.]
CHORUS: We call on Bacchus, god of many names,
And god of many places.
You were once a little child
In Thebes here, the darling of your mother's eye.
Your father was Zeus, lord of the thundering sky;
But your mother was Semele, a Theban girl.

Are you among the rich cities
Of Italy? Or presiding
Over the cosmopolitan crowds
That throng the Eleusinian Games?°

Perhaps the firebrand lights your face
Between the twin peaks of Mount Parnassus,
Where the nymphs of Castaly°
And Corycus° walk free.

Perhaps you hear the songs of poets
Where the ivy wreathes the crags
On Nysa, looking over green
Vineyards clustering on the plain.

But this is your home,—the oil-like waters
Of Ismene River, and the fields
Where the dragon's teeth were sown.

This is your mother city, Thebes.
This is the city you honor most.
If ever you heard us before, come to us now.
Our nation is in the grip of a dread disease.
Hasten to help us, speed to doctor our pain
Over the slopes of Parnes Hill or over the roaring seas.

938 Eleusis in ancient Greece was the site of celebrations for cults celebrating Demeter and Persephone. 941–42 Castly and Corycus are the locations of springs and fountains.

[Enter MESSENGER.]

MESSENGER: Citizens of Thebes, who knows how long
Their luck will last? Whether you're up or down,
It's all pure chance. You can't predict what's coming.
Take Creon now. I thought he was doing well,—
The savior of his country, king of Thebes,
And the proud father of a lovely family.
He's lost the lot. Oh, yes, he's wealthy still;
But wealth can't buy you happiness. What's the use
Of money without the means of enjoying it?
His wealth's no more to him than a puff of smoke.
You can't say Creon lives; he's just a walking corpse.
CHORUS: About Creon's family, is there bad news then?
MESSENGER: They're dead. And those that live deserve to die.
CHORUS: How did they die? Who's dead? Why can't you tell me?
MESSENGER: Haemon is dead. Committed suicide.
CHORUS: He killed himself? His father didn't do it?
MESSENGER: Suicide, because Creon had murdered her.
CHORUS: Teiresias' prophecy was all too true.
MESSENGER: That's what has happened. Now it's up to you.

[Enter EURYDICE.]

CHORUS: Here is Eurydice, Creon's wife, poor woman.
Why is she coming out? Perhaps she's heard. . . .
EURYDICE: As I was going out, I heard you talking.
I was opening the door when I heard it,
Some more bad news about my children. I fainted,
But my maids held me up. Tell me about it.
I am quite used to suffering.
MESSENGER: I'll tell you everything, my dear mistress.
I was there, you know. No sense in glossing things over;
You've got to hear it sometime.
I went with my master, your husband, to the place
Where Polynices' corpse was exposed,
Cruelly torn by dogs. We said prayers
Placating Hecate and Pluto; then we washed
The body to purify it, gathered branches
Of olive, and cremated him or what
Was left of him. We piled him up a mound
Of his mother-earth; then went to get Antigone. While we were on the way,
Somebody heard a sound of crying coming
From the stone chamber. He went up to Creon
And told him of it. Creon hurried on.
As we got near, the sound was all around us,—
Impossible to tell whose it was.
But Creon, in a voice breaking with grief,
Said, "Dare I prophesy? These yards of ground
Will prove the bitterest journey of my life.
It's faint, but it's my son's voice. Hurry, men,
Get round the tomb, pull back the stones, and look

Inside. Is it Haemon's voice, or do the gods
Delude me?" At the far end of the tomb
We saw Antigone hanging by the neck
In a noose of linen. He was hugging her
And talking bitterly of their marriage and His father's action. Creon saw him and Cried out and ran in, shouting, "Oh my son,
What is this? What possessed you? Why are you trying To kill yourself? Come out now, please, I beg you."
His son made no reply, just looked at him
Savagely with a look of deep contempt.
Then he suddenly drew his sword, evaded Creon,
Held it out, and plunged the blade into his ribs.
He collapsed against Antigone's arms which were Still warm, and hugged her. Then his blood came coughing,
And covered all her white cheeks with scarlet.
So now he lies, one corpse upon another;
And thus their marriage is consummated,—in hell.
It only goes to show good sense is best,
When all this tragedy comes from one rash action.

[Exit EURYDICE into palace.]

CHORUS: What a strange thing. Eurydice has gone,
Without saying a word.
MESSENGER: It is surprising.
I dare say she's too well-bred to go
Showing her grief in public. I expect
She's gone to have a good cry inside.
CHORUS: Perhaps. Noisy grief is a bad thing.
But this extraordinary silence is ominous.
MESSENGER: You're right. Let's go in then, and find out.
She may have had her mind on something rash.
CHORUS: Who's coming? Creon with
The body of his son.
If truth be told, he is Himself the murderer.

[Enter CREON and ATTENDANTS carrying HAEMON'S body.]

CREON: Wrong! How could I have been so wrong?
And these deaths I caused—you have seen them—
In my own family by my stubbornness.
Oh my son, so young, to die so young,
And all because of me!
CHORUS: It's a bit late to find out you were wrong.
CREON: I know that. God has taken his revenge,
Leapt on my head and beaten me
And trampled on the only joy I had.
And all the years that I have labored—wasted.

[Enter SERVANT from the palace.]

SERVANT: My lord, what you see before your eyes,—
It isn't all. You'd better come inside.
CREON: What fresh disaster could I suffer now?
SERVANT: Your wife, the mother of this corpse is dead.
Only a moment ago, she stabbed herself.
CREON: Oh death, can I never wash it away?
Why are you destroying me? What Is your message now? Why stab me again?
My wife dead too?

[The doors are opened, revealing EURYDICE'S body.]

SERVANT: See for yourself. They've brought the body out.
CREON: Oh.
Another blow. What else has fate in store?
My wife, my son.
SERVANT: Stabbed herself by the altar, and so passed on.
But first she bewailed Megareus' death,
Her first son, that was; then Haemon's death.
And her last words were curses on your head.
CREON: Now I'm afraid. Why wasn't I killed?
Why didn't somebody kill me, stab me to death?
SERVANT: Before she died she made a point of planting
The guilt of these two deaths squarely on you.
CREON: How did she die? How did she kill herself?
SERVANT: I told you. Stabbed herself. Under the heart.
Soon as she heard about her son's death.
CREON: Nobody else to share the blame. Just me . . .
I killed you. I killed you, my dear.
Servants, carry me in, away from all this.
I wish I weren't alive.
CHORUS: Try to forget it. It is the only way.
CREON: I invite Death. Do you only come uninvited?
Come and take me. I cannot bear to live.
CHORUS: No time for such thoughts now. You're still in charge.
You've got to see about these corpses, or We'll all be polluted
CREON: I meant what I said.
CHORUS: No use in such prayers. You'll get what's destined.
CREON: Lead me away, a wreck, a useless wreck.
I'll keep out of the way. I killed them both.
Everything has crumbled. I feel
A huge weight on my head. [Exit CREON.]
CHORUS: Who wants happiness? The main
Requirement is to be sensible.
This means not rebelling against
God's law, for that is arrogance.
The greater your arrogance, the heavier God's revenge.
All old men have learned to be sensible;
But their juniors will not take the lesson as proved. [Exit CHORUS.]

[441 BCE]

Joining the Conversation: Critical Thinking and Writing

1. Would you argue that masks should be used for some (or all) of the characters in Antigone? If so, would they be masks that fully cover the face, Greek style, or some sort of half-masks? (A full mask enlarges the face, and conceivably the mouthpiece can amplify the voice, but only an exceptionally large theater might require such help. Perhaps half-masks are enough if the aim is chiefly to distance the actors from the audience and from daily reality, and to force the actors to develop resources other than facial gestures. One director, arguing in favor of half-masks, has said that an actor who wears even a half-mask learns to act not with his eyes but with his neck.)
2. How would you costume the players? Would you dress them as the Greeks might have? Why? One argument sometimes used by those who hold that modern productions of Greek drama should use classical costumes is that Greek drama ought to be remote and ritualistic. Evaluate this view. What sort of modern dress might be effective?
3. If you were directing a college production of Antigone, how large a chorus would you use? (Sophocles is said to have used a chorus of fifteen.) Would you have the chorus recite (or chant) in unison, or would you assign lines to single speakers?
4. Although Sophocles called his play Antigone, many critics say that Creon is the real tragic hero, pointing out that Antigone is absent from the last third of the play. Argue for or against this view.
5. In some Greek tragedies, fate plays a great role in bringing about the downfall of the tragic hero. Though there are references to the curse on the House of Oedipus in Antigone, do we feel that Antigone goes to her death as a result of the workings of fate? Do we feel that fate is responsible for Creon's fall? Are both Antigone and Creon the creators of their own tragedy?
6. Are the words hubris (page 549) and hamartia (page 549) relevant to Antigone? To Creon? Argue your position.
7. Why does Creon, contrary to the Chorus's advice, bury the body of Polynices before he releases Antigone? Does his action show a zeal for piety as shortsighted as his earlier zeal for law? Is his action plausible in view of the facts that Teiresias has dwelt on the wrong done to Polynices and that Antigone has ritual food to sustain her? Or are we not to worry about Creon's motive?
8. A foil is a character who, by contrast, sets off or helps define another character. To what extent is Ismene a foil to Antigone? Is she entirely without courage?
9. What function does Eurydice serve? How deeply do we feel about her fate?

An Author in Depth: William Shakespeare

William Shakespeare

William Shakespeare (1564–1616) was born in Stratford-on-Avon, England, of middle-class parents. Nothing of interest is known about his early years, but by 1590 he was acting and writing plays in London. By the end of the following decade, he had worked in all three Elizabethan dramatic genres—tragedy, comedy, and history. Romeo and Juliet, for example, was written about 1595, the same year as Richard II. Hamlet was probably written in 1600–01. Among the plays that followed were Othello (1603–04), King Lear (1605–06), Macbeth (1605–06), and several "romances"—plays that have happy endings but that seem more meditative and closer to tragedy than such comedies as A Midsummer Night's Dream (c.1595), As You Like It (1598–1600), and Twelfth Night (1600–02).

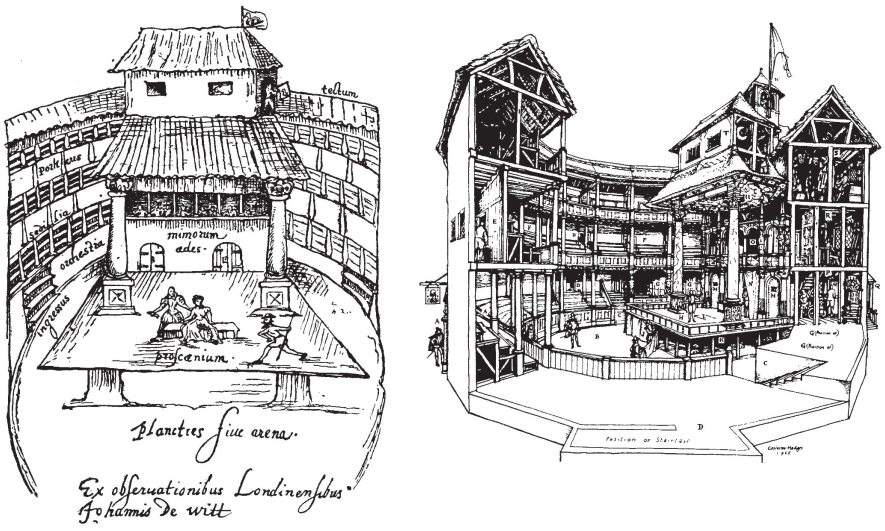
A Note on the Elizabethan Theater



Shakespeare's theater was wooden—round or polygonal (the Chorus in Henry V calls it a "wooden O"). About eight hundred spectators could stand in the yard in front of—and perhaps along the two sides of—the stage that jutted from the rear wall, and another fifteen hundred or so spectators could sit in the three roofed galleries that ringed the stage.

That portion of the galleries that was above the rear of the stage was sometimes used by actors. For instance, in The Tempest, 3.3, a stage direction following line 17 mentions "Prospero on the top, invisible"—that is, he is imagined to be invisible to the characters in the play.

Entry to the stage was normally gained by doors at the rear, but, apparently, on rare occasions, use was made of a curtained alcove—or perhaps a booth—between the doors, which allowed characters to be "discovered" (revealed) as in the modern proscenium theater, which normally employs a curtain. Such "discovery" scenes are rare.

Although the theater as a whole was unroofed, the stage was protected by a roof, supported by two pillars. They could serve (by an act of imagination) as trees behind which actors might pretend to conceal themselves.

A performance was probably uninterrupted by intermissions or by long pauses for the changing of scenery; a group of characters left the stage, another entered, and, if the locale had changed, the new characters somehow told the audience. (Modern editors customarily add indications of locales to help a reader, but it should be remembered that the action on the Elizabethan stage was continuous.)

Left, Johannes de Witt, a Continental visitor to London, made a drawing of the Swan Theater in about the year 1596. The original drawing is lost; this is Arend van Buchel's copy of it. Right, C. Walter Hodges's drawing (1965) of an Elizabethan playhouse.

A Note on Hamlet on the Stage

We know that Hamlet was popular during Shakespeare's lifetime, but the earliest illustration (1709) showing a scene from the play was engraved more than a century after the play was written, so we know little about what Hamlet looked like on Shakespeare's stage. Still, we do have some idea. We know, for instance, that at least in the first scene, Hamlet wore black (he speaks of his "inky cloak"), and we know that, when the Ghost first appears, it is dressed in "the very armor he had on / When he the ambitious Norway combated" (1.1.64–65). We know, too, that when the Ghost appears later, in the Queen's chamber (3.4), he does not wear armor, a sign that his mood is different.

We also have a few tantalizing glimpses of Elizabethan acting. Thus, in the dumb show (pantomime) preceding The Murder of Gonzago that the touring players in 3.2 produce for the court, we get this stage direction: "Enter a King and a Queen [very lovingly]; the Queen embracing him, and he her." A little later, when the Queen in this dumb show finds that the King has been poisoned, she "makes passionate action," but then, when the poisoner woos her, "she seems harsh awhile, but in the end accepts love."

We know something, too, of the sound effects. Possibly the play begins with the bell tolling twelve (in 1.1, Bernardo says, "'Tis now struck twelve"), and, certainly in the first scene, we hear the crowing of a cock, which causes the Ghost to depart. Later, we hear the sound of drums, trumpets, and cannon when Claudius drinks toasts, and the play ends with the sound of cannon, when Fortinbras orders the soldiers to pay tribute to the dead Hamlet.

What about costumes? In their own day, Elizabethan plays were staged chiefly in contemporary dress—doublet (close-fitting jacket) and hose (tights) for the men, gowns of various sorts for the women (whose roles were played by boy actors)—though, for classical plays such as Julius Caesar, some attempt was made in the direction of ancient costumes, at least for the major characters. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, too, the plays were staged in the costume of the day, which, of course, was not Elizabethan. But, in much of the nineteenth century and in the first third of the twentieth century, a strong sense that the plays were "Elizabethan" caused producers to use Elizabethan costumes, although these costumes—contemporary when the plays were first performed—now had become historical costumes, marking the plays as of an age that was remote from our own. In 1925, Barry Jackson staged a modern-dress production in London, in an effort to emphasize the play's contemporary relevance. Today, productions tend to be in modern dress in the sense that they avoid Elizabethan costumes. Usually, in an effort to add color to the stage as well as some (but not a great) sense of remoteness, they use costumes of the nineteenth century, which allow for splendid gowns and military uniforms with sashes.

Figure 1

Figure 1. The Murder of Gonzago, in 3.2. Because this episode is a play-within-the-play, Shakespeare uses a distinctive form of verse (pairs of rhyming lines, eight syllables to a line) that sets it off from the language of the rest of the play (chiefly prose, or unrhymed lines of ten syllables). The language, too, is different, for it is conspicuously old-fashioned (the sun is called "Phoebus' cart," the ocean is called "Neptune's salt wash"). In this modern-dress production done at Stratford, England, in 1975, Claudius wore a blue business suit and Fortinbras wore combat gear, but the characters in the play-within-the-play were masked, to emphasize their theatricality.

Figure 2

Figure 2. The "closet" scene, in 3.4. A line in the preceding scene specifically tells us that Hamlet is "going to his mother's closet." (In Elizabethan language, a "closet" is a private room rather than a public room—for instance, a room in which a monarch might pray, or relax, as opposed to an audience chamber in which he or she would engage in official actions.) In the twentieth century, at least as early as John Gielgud's production in New York in 1935, and probably in response to Freudian interpretations of the play, the Queen's closet was fitted with a bed on which Hamlet and Gertrude tussled, and indeed the scene is often wrongly called "the bedroom scene." In this 1989 Royal Shakespeare Company production, with Mark Rylance as Hamlet, a ranting Hamlet (at the left) confronts Gertrude. The Ghost, unknown to Gertrude, sits on the bed, presumably seeking to protect her from Hamlet's assault. The setting was not realistic but expressionistic; that is, the curtains stirred and the lighting changed, not because a physical wind was blowing or the sources of illumination were changing, but to express the characters' passions.

Figure 3

Figure 3 and (next page) 4. Hamlet meditates on death in the graveyard, in 5.1. Both of these productions used costumes that suggested the late nineteenth century. Kenneth Branagh portrayed Hamlet in 1993 for the Royal Shakespeare Theatre.

In the photograph (next page) showing Kevin Kline as Hamlet in a New York Shakespeare Festival production, Horatio is played by an African American. Other than plays by black authors, and very few plays by whites about blacks (such as Eugene O'Neill's The Emperor Jones), there are few roles in drama that are expressly written for blacks. Shakespeare offers only three: Othello, Aaron (a Moor in Titus Andronicus), and the Prince of Morocco (in The Merchant of Venice). The few black actors who played other Shakespearean roles, such as the great Ira Aldridge who in the nineteenth century was known for his King Lear, performed the roles in whiteface. Since the 1980s, however, directors have engaged in open casting, using blacks (and Asians) in any and all roles without requiring white makeup.

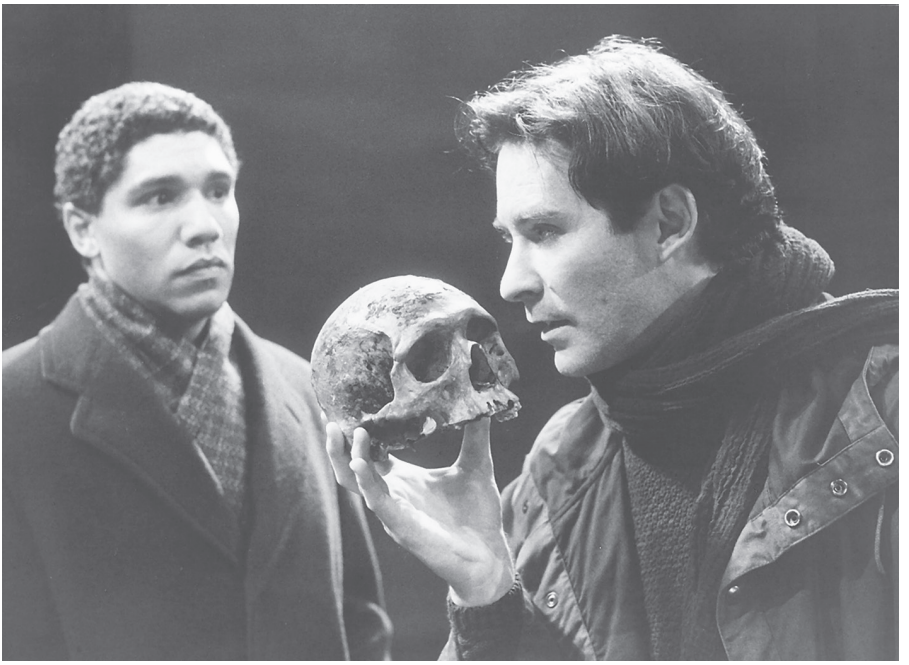

Figure 4. Reprinted by permission of the The New York Public Library.

A Note on the Text of Hamlet

Shakespeare's Hamlet comes to us in three versions. The first printed version, known as the First Quarto (Q1), was published in 1603. It is an illegitimate, garbled version, perhaps derived from the memory of the actor who played Marcellus (this part is conspicuously more accurate than the rest of the play) in a short version of the play.

The second printed version (Q2), which appeared in 1604–05, is almost twice as long as Q1; all in all, it is the best text we have, doubtless published (as Q1 was not) with the permission of Shakespeare's theatrical company.

The third printed version, in the First Folio (the collected edition of Shakespeare's plays, published in 1623), is also legitimate, but it seems to be an acting version, for it lacks some two hundred lines of Q2.

On the other hand, the First Folio text includes some ninety lines that are not found in Q2.

Because Q2 is the longest version, giving us more of the play as Shakespeare conceived it than either of the other texts two versions, it serves as the basic version for this text. Unfortunately, the printers of it often worked carelessly: Words and phrases are omitted, there are plain misreadings of what must have been in Shakespeare's manuscript, and speeches are sometimes wrongly assigned. It was therefore necessary to turn to the First Folio for many readings. It has been found useful, also, to divide the play into acts and scenes; these divisions, not found in Q2 (and only a few are found in the First Folio), are purely editorial additions, and they are therefore enclosed in square brackets.

We use the text edited by David Bevington.

And ſo by continuance, and weakeneſſe of the braine
Into this frenſie, which now poſſeſſeth him:
And if this be not true, take this from this.
King Thinke you 'tis ſo?
Cor. How? ſo my Lord, I would very faine know
That thing that I haue ſaide 'tis ſo, poſitiuely,
And it hath fallen out otherwiſe.
Nay, if circumſtances leade me on,
Ile finde it out, if it were hid
As deepe as the centre of the earth.
King. how ſhould wee trie this ſame?
Cor. Mary my good lord thus,
The Princes walke is here in the galery,
There let Ofelia, walke vntill hee comes:
Your ſelfe and I will ſtand cloſe in the ſtudy,
There ſhall you heare the effect of all his hart,
And if it proue any otherwiſe then loue,
Then let my cenſure faile an other time.
King. ſee where hee comes poring vppon a booke.

Enter Hamlet.

Cor. Madame, will it pleaſe your grace
To leaue vs here?
Que. With all my hart. exit.
Cor. And here Ofelia, reade you on this booke,
And walke aloofe, the King ſhal be vnſeene.
Ham. To be, or not to be, I there's the point,
To Die, to ſleepe, is that all? I all:
No, to ſleepe, to dreame, I mary there it goes,
For in that dreame of death, when wee awake,
And borne before an euerlaſting Iudge,
From whence no paſſenger euer retur'nd,
The vndiſcouered country, at whoſe ſight
The happy ſmile, and the accurſed damn'd.
But for this, the ioyfull hope of this,
Whol'd beare the ſcornes and flattery of the world,
Scorned by the right rich, the rich curſſed of the poore?

The

On this page and on the next page, we give the text of "To be or not to be" from the First Quarto (Q1, 1603). On pages 649–50, we give the text from the Second Quarto (Q2, 1604–05), and on page 651, we give a third version, from the First Folio (F1, 1623), beginning at the bottom of the left-hand column.

The widow being oppreſſed, the orphan wrong'd,
The taſte of hunger, or a tirants raigne,
And thouſand more calamities beſides,
To grunt and ſweate vnder this weary life,
When that he may his full Quietus make,
With a bare bodkin, who would this indure,
But for a hope of ſomething after death?
Which puſles the braine, and doth confound the ſence,
Which makes vs rather beare thoſe euilles we haue,
Than flie to others that we know not of.
I that, O this conſcience makes cowardes of vs all,
Lady in thy orizons, be all my ſinnes remembred.

Ofel. My Lord, I haue ſought opportunitie, which now I haue, to redeliuer to your worthy handes, a ſmall remembrance, ſuch tokens which I haue receiued of you.

Ham. Are you faire?

Ofel. My Lord.

Ham. Are you honeſt?

Ofel. What meanes my Lord?

Ham. That if you be faire and honeſt,
Your beauty ſhould admit no diſcourſe to your honeſty.

Ofel. My Lord, can beauty haue better priuiledge than with honeſty?

Ham. Yea mary may it; for Beauty may transforme
Honeſty, from what ſhe was into a bawd:
Then Honeſty can transforme Beauty:
This was ſometimes a Paradox,
But now the time giues it ſcope.
I neuer gaue you nothing.

Ofel. My Lord, you know right well you did,
And with them ſuch earneſt vowes of loue,
As would haue moou'd the ſtonieſt breaſt aliue,
But now too true I finde,
Rich giftes waxe poore, when giuers grow vnkinde.

Ham. I neuer loued you.

Ofel. You made me beleeue you did.

First Quarto continued.

That ſhow of ſuch an exerciſe may cullour
Your lowlines; we are oft too blame in this,
Tis too much proou'd, that with deuotions viſage
And pious action, we doe ſugar ore
The deuill himſelfe.
King. O tis too true,
How ſmart a laſh that ſpeech doth giue my conſcience.
The harlots cheeke beautied with plaſtring art,
Is not more ougly to the thing that helps it,
Then is my deede to my moſt painted word:
O heauy burthen.

Enter Hamlet.

Pol. I heare him comming, with-draw my Lord.
Ham. To be, or not to be, that is the queſtion,
Whether tis nobler in the minde to ſuffer
The ſlings and arrowes of outragious fortune,
Or to take Armes againſt a ſea of troubles,
And by oppoſing, end them; to die to ſleepe
No more, and by a ſleepe, to ſay we end
The hart-ake, and the thouſand naturall ſhocks
That fleſh is heire to; tis a conſumation
Deuoutly to be wiſht to die to ſleepe,
To ſleepe, perchance to dreame, I there's the rub,
For in that ſleepe of death what dreames may come
When we haue ſhuffled off this mortall coyle
Muſt giue vs pauſe, there's the reſpect
That makes calamitie of ſo long life:
For who would beare the whips and ſcornes of time,
Th'oppreſſors wrong, the proude mans contumely,
The pangs of deſpiz'd loue, the lawes delay,
The inſolence of office, and the ſpurnes
That patient merrit of th'vnworthy takes,
When he himſelfe might his quietas make
With a bare bodkin; who would fardels beare,
To grunt and ſweat vnder a wearie life,
But that the dread of ſomething after death,
The vndiſcouer'd country, from whoſe borne.

On this page and the next page, we give "To be or not to be" as it appears in the Second Quarto (Q2, 1604–05).

The Tragedie of Hamlet

No trauiler returnes, puzzels the will,
And makes vs rather beare thoſe ills we haue,
Then flie to others that we know not of.
Thus conſcience dooes make cowards,
And thus the natiue hiew of reſolution
Is ſickled ore with the pale caſt of thought,
And enterpriſes of great pitch and moment,
With this regard theyr currents turne awry,
And looſe the name of action. Soft you now,
The faire Ophelia, Nimph in thy orizons
Be all my ſinnes remembred.
Oph. Good my Lord,
How dooes your honour for this many a day?
Ham. I humbly thanke you well.
Oph. My Lord, I haue remembrances of yours
That I haue longed long to redeliuer.
I pray you now receiue them.
Ham. No, not I, I neuer gaue you ought.
Oph. My honor'd Lord, you know right well you did,
And with them words of ſo ſweet breath compoſd
As made theſe things more rich, their perfume loſt,
Take theſe againe, for to the noble mind
Rich gifts wax poore when giuers prooue vnkind,
There my Lord.
Ham. Ha, ha, are you honeſt.
Oph. My Lord.
Ham. Are you faire?
Oph. What meanes your Lordſhip?
Ham. That if you be honeſt & faire, you ſhould admit no diſcourſe to your beautie.
Oph. Could beauty my Lord haue better comerſe Then with honeſtie?
Ham. I truly, for the power of beautie will ſooner transforme honeſtie from what it is to a bawde, then the force of honeſtie can tranſlate beautie into his likenes, this was ſometime a paradox, but now the time giues it proofe, I did loue you once.
Oph. Indeed my Lord you made me believe ſo.
Ham. You ſhould not haue beleeu'd me, for vertue cannot ſo enocutat our old ſtock, but we ſhall reliſh of it, I loued you not.

Second Quarto continued.

With turbulent and dangerous Lunacy.
Roſin. He does confeſſe he feeles himſelfe diſtracted,
But from what cauſe he will by no meanes ſpeake.
Guil. Nor do we finde him forward to be ſounded,
But with a crafty Madneſſe keepes aloofe:
When we would bring him on to ſome Confeſſion
Of his true ſtate.
Qu. Did he receiue you well?
Roſin. Moſt like a Gentleman.
Guild. But with much forcing of his diſpoſition.
Roſin. Niggard of queſtion, but of our demands
Moſt free in his reply.
Qu. Did you aſſay him to any paſtime?
Roſin. Madam, it ſo fell out, that certaine Players
We ore-wrought on the way: of theſe we told him,
And there did ſeeme in him a kinde of ioy
To heare of it: They are about the Court,
And (as I thinke) they haue already order
This night to play before him.
Pol. 'Tis moſt true:
And he beſeech'd me to intreate your Maieſties
To heare, and ſee the matter.
King. With all my heart, and it doth much content me
To heare him ſo inclin'd. Good Gentlemen,
Giue him a further edge, and driue his purpoſe on
To theſe delights.
Roſin. We ſhall my Lord. Exeunt.
King. Sweet Gertrude leaue vs too,
For we haue cloſely ſent for Hamlet hither,
That he, as 'twere by accident, may there
Affront Ophelia. Her Father, and my ſelfe (lawfull eſpials)
Will ſo beſtow our ſelues, that ſeeing vnſeene
We may of their encounter frankely iudge,
And gather by him, as he is behaued,
If't be th'affliction of his loue, or no.
That thus he ſuffers for.
Qu. I ſhall obey you,
And for your part Ophelia, I do wiſh
That your good Beauties be the happy cauſe
Of Hamlets wildeneſſe: ſo ſhall I hope your Vertues
Will bring him to his wonted way againe,
To both your Honors.
Ophe. Madam, I wiſh it may.
Pol. Ophelia, walke you heere. Gracious ſo pleaſe ye
We will beſtow our ſelues: Read on this booke,
That ſhew of ſuch an exerciſe may colour
Your lonelineſſe. We are oft too blame in this,
'Tis too much prou'd, that with Deuotions viſage,
And pious Action, we do ſurge o're
The diuell himſelfe.
King. Oh 'tis true:
How ſmart a laſh that ſpeech doth giue my Conſcience?
The Harlots Cheeke beautied with plaiſt'ring Art
Is not more vgly to the thing that helpes it,
Then is my deede, to my moſt painted word.
Oh heauie burthen!
Pol. I heare him comming, let's withdraw my Lord.
Exeunt.

Enter Hamlet.

Ham. To be, or not to be, that is the Queſtion:
Whether tis Nobler in the minde to ſuffer
The Slings and Arrowes of outragious Fortune,
Or to take Armes againſt a Sea of troubles,
And by oppoſing end them: to dye, to ſleepe
No more; and by a ſleepe, to ſay we end
The Heart-ake, and the thouſand Naturall ſhockes
That Fleſh is heyre too? 'Tis a conſummation
Deuoutly to be wiſh'd. To dye to ſleepe,
To ſleepe, perchance to Dreame; I, there's the rub,
For in that ſleepe of death, what dreames may come,
When we haue ſhuffled off this mortall coile,
Muſt giue vs pawſe. There's the reſpect
That makes Calamity of ſo long life:
For who would beare the Whips and Scornes of time,
The Oppreſſors wrong, the poore mans Contumely,
The pangs of diſpriz'd Loue, the Lawes delay,
The inſolence of Office, and the Spurnes
That patient merit of the vnworthy takes,
When he himſelfe might his Quietus make
With a bare Bodkin? Who would theſe Fardles beare
To grunt and ſweat vnder a weary life,
But that the dread of ſomething after death,
The vndiſcouered Countrey, from whoſe Borne
No Traueller returnes, Puzels the will,
And makes vs rather beare thoſe illes we haue,
Then flye to others that we know not of.
Thus Conſcience does make Cowards of vs all,
And thus the Natiue hew of Reſolution
Is ſicklied o're, with the pale caſt of Thought,
And enterprizes of great pith and moment,
With this regard their Currants turne away,
And looſe the name of Action. Soft you now,
The faire Ophelia? Nimph, in thy Orizons
Be all my ſinnes remembred.
Ophe. Good my Lord,
How does your Honor for this many a day?
Ham. I humbly thanke you: well, well, well.
Ophe. My Lord, I haue Remembrances of yours,
That I haue longed long to re-deliuer.
I pray you now, receiue them.
Ham. No, no, I neuer gaue you ought.
Ophe. My honor'd Lord, I know right well you did,
And with them words of ſo ſweet breath compos'd,
As made the things more rich, then perfume left:
Take theſe againe, for to the Noble minde
Rich gifts wax poore, when giuers proue vnkinde.
There my Lord.
Ham. Ha, ha: Are you honeſt?
Ophe. My Lord.
Ham. Are you faire?
Ophe. What meanes your Lordſhip?
Ham. That if you be honeſt and faire, your Honeſty ſhould admit no diſcourſe to your Beautie.
Ophe. Could Beautie my Lord, haue better Comerce then your Honeſtie?
Ham. I truſte: for the power of Beautie, will ſooner transforme Honeſtie from what it is, to a Bawd, then the force of Honeſtie can tranſlate Beautie into his likeneſſe. This was ſometime a Paradox, but now the time giues it proofe. I did loue you once.
Ophe. Indeed my Lord, you made me beleeue ſo.
Ham. You ſhould not haue beleeued me. For vertue cannot ſo innocculate our old ſtocke, but we ſhall reliſh of it. I loued you not.
Ophe. I was the more deceiued.
Ham. Get thee to a Nunnerie. Why would'ſt thou be a breeder of Sinners? I am my ſelfe indifferent honeſt, but yet I could accuſe me of ſuch things, that it were better my Mother had not borne me. I am very proud, reuengefull, Ambitious, with more offences at my becke, then I haue thoughts to put them in imagination, to giue them ſhape, or time to acte them in. What ſhould ſuch Fel-

"To be or not to be," as given in the First Folio (F1, 1623).

The Tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

GHOST of Hamlet, the Former King of Denmark
CLAUDIUS, King of Denmark, the former King's brother
GERTRUDE, Queen of Denmark, widow of the former King and now wife of Claudius
HAMLET, Prince of Denmark, son of the late King and of Gertrude
POLONIUS, councillor to the King
LAERTES, his son
OPHELIA, his daughter
REYNALDO, his servant

HORATIO, Hamlet's friend and fellow student

VOLTIMAND,
CORNELIUS,
ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN,
OSRIC,
A GENTLEMAN,
A LORD,
} members of the Danish court

BERNARDO, FRANCISCO,
MARCELLUS,
} officers and soldiers on watch

FORTINBRAS, Prince of Norway
CAPTAIN in his army
Three or Four PLAYERS, taking the roles of PROLOGUE, PLAYER KING, PLAYER QUEEN, and LUCIANUS
Two MESSENGERS
FIRST SAILOR
Two CLOWNS, a gravedigger and his companion
PRIEST
FIRST AMBASSADOR from England
Lords, Soldiers, Attendants, Guards, other Players, Followers of Laertes, other Sailors, another Ambassador or Ambassadors from England SCENE: Denmark

[1.1]

Enter BERNARDO and FRANCISCO, two sentinels [meeting].

BERNARDO: Who's there?
FRANCISCO: Nay, answer me.° Stand and unfold yourself.°
BERNARDO: Long live the King!
FRANCISCO: Bernardo?

Note: Stage directions that are enclosed within square brackets do not appear in the original text. They have been added by the editor.

[1.1] Location: Elsinore castle. A guard platform. 2 me (Francisco emphasizes that he is the sentry currently on watch.); unfold yourself reveal your identity.

BERNARDO: He.
FRANCISCO: You come most carefully upon your hour.
BERNARDO: 'Tis now struck twelve. Get thee to bed, Francisco.
FRANCISCO: For this relief much thanks. 'Tis bitter cold,
And I am sick at heart.
BERNARDO: Have you had quiet guard?
FRANCISCO: Not a mouse stirring.
BERNARDO: Well, good night.
If you do meet Horatio and Marcellus,
The rivals° of my watch, bid them make haste.

Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.

FRANCISCO: I think I hear them.—Stand, ho! Who is there?
HORATIO: Friends to this ground.°
MARCELLUS: And liegemen to the Dane.°
FRANCISCO: Give° you good night.
MARCELLUS: O, farewell, honest soldier. Who hath relieved you?
FRANCISCO: Bernardo hath my place. Give you good night. Exit FRANCISCO.
MARCELLUS: Holla! Bernardo!
BERNARDO: Say, what, is Horatio there?
HORATIO: A piece of him.
BERNARDO: Welcome, Horatio. Welcome, good Marcellus.
HORATIO: What, has this thing appeared again tonight?
BERNARDO: I have seen nothing.
MARCELLUS: Horatio says 'tis but our fantasy,°
And will not let belief take hold of him
Touching this dreaded sight twice seen of us.
Therefore I have entreated him along°
With us to watch° the minutes of this night,
That if again this apparition come
He may approve° our eyes and speak to it.
HORATIO: Tush, tush, 'twill not appear.
BERNARDO: Sit down awhile,
And let us once again assail your ears,
That are so fortified against our story,
What° we have two nights seen.
HORATIO: Well, sit we down,
And let us hear Bernardo speak of this.
BERNARDO: Last night of all,°
When yond same star that's westward from the pole°
Had made his° course t' illume° that part of heaven
Where now it burns, Marcellus and myself,
The bell then beating one—

14 rivals partners. 16 ground ground, land. 17 liegemen to the Dane men sworn to serve the Danish king. 18 Give i.e., may God give. 27 fantasy imagination. 30 along to come along. 31 watch keep watch during. 33 approve corroborate. 37 What with what. 39 Last . . . all i.e., this very last night (emphatic). 40 pole Pole Star, North Star. 41 his its; illume illuminate.

Enter GHOST.

MARCELLUS: Peace, break thee off! Look where it comes again!
BERNARDO: In the same figure like the King that's dead.
MARCELLUS: Thou art a scholar.° Speak to it, Horatio.
BERNARDO: Looks 'a° not like the King? Mark it, Horatio.
HORATIO: Most like. It harrows me with fear and wonder.
BERNARDO: It would be spoke to.°
MARCELLUS: Speak to it, Horatio.
HORATIO: What art thou that usurp'st° this time of night,
Together with that fair and warlike form
In which the majesty of buried Denmark°
Did sometime° march? By heaven, I charge thee, speak!
MARCELLUS: It is offended.
BERNARDO: See, it stalks away.
HORATIO: Stay! Speak, speak! I charge thee, speak! Exit GHOST.
MARCELLUS: 'Tis gone and will not answer.
BERNARDO: How now, Horatio? You tremble and look pale.
Is not this something more than fantasy?
What think you on 't?°
HORATIO: Before my God, I might not this believe
Without the sensible° and true avouch°
Of mine own eyes.
MARCELLUS: Is it not like the King?
HORATIO: As thou art to thyself.
Such was the very armor he had on
When he the ambitious Norway° combated.
So frowned he once when, in an angry parle,°
He smote the sledded° Polacks° on the ice.
'Tis strange.
MARCELLUS: Thus twice before, and jump° at this dead hour,
With martial stalk° hath he gone by our watch.
HORATIO: In what particular thought to work° I know not,
But in the gross and scope° of mine opinion
This bodes some strange eruption to our state.
MARCELLUS: Good now,° sit down, and tell me, he that knows,
Why this same strict and most observant watch
So nightly toils° the subject° of the land,
And why such daily cast° of brazen cannon
And foreign mart° for implements of war,
Why such impress° of shipwrights, whose sore task

46 scholar one learned enough to know how to question a ghost properly. 47 'a he. 49 It . . . to (It was commonly believed that a ghost could not speak until spoken to.) 50 usurp'st wrongfully takes over. 52 buried Denmark the buried King of Denmark. 53 sometime formerly. 59 on 't of it. 61 sensible confirmed by the sense; avouch warrant evidence. 65 Norway King of Norway. 66 parle parley. 67 sledded traveling on sleds; Polacks Poles. 69 jump exactly. 70 stalk stride. 71 to work i.e., to collect my thoughts and try to understand this. 72 gross and scope general drift. 74 Good now (An expression denoting entreaty or expostulation.) 76 toils causes to toil; subject subjects. 77 cast casting. 78 mart buying and selling. 79 impress impressment, conscription.

Does not divide the Sunday from the week.
What might be toward,° that this sweaty haste
Doth make the night joint-laborer with the day?
Who is 't that can inform me?

HORATIO: That can I;
At least, the whisper goes so. Our last king,
Whose image even but now appeared to us,
Was, as you know, by Fortinbras of Norway,
Thereto pricked on° by a most emulate° pride,°
Dared to the combat; in which our valiant Hamlet—
For so this side of our known world° esteemed him—
Did slay this Fortinbras; who by a sealed° compact
Well ratified by law and heraldry
Did forfeit, with his life, all those his lands
Which he stood seized° of, to the conqueror;
Against the° which a moiety competent°
Was gagèd° by our king, which had returned°
To the inheritance° of Fortinbras
Had he been vanquisher, as, by the same cov'nant°
And carriage of the article designed,°
His fell to Hamlet. Now, sir, young Fortinbras,
Of unimprovèd mettle° hot and full,
Hath in the skirts° of Norway here and there
Sharked up° a list° of lawless resolutes°
For food and diet° to some enterprise
That hath a stomach° in 't, which is no other—
As it doth well appear unto our state—
But to recover of us, by strong hand
And terms compulsatory, those foresaid lands
So by his father lost. And this, I take it,
Is the main motive of our preparations,
The source of this our watch, and the chief head°
Of this posthaste and rummage° in the land.

BERNARDO: I think it be no other but e'en so.
Well may it sort° that this portentous figure
Comes armèd through our watch so like the King
That was and is the question° of these wars.

81 toward in preparation. 87 pricked on incited; emulate emulous, ambitious; Thereto . . . pride (refers to old Fortinbras, not the Danish King.) 89 this . . . world i.e., all Europe, the Western world. 90 sealed certified, confirmed. 93 seized possessed. 94 Against the in return for; moiety competent corresponding portion. 95 gagèd engaged, pledged; had returned would have passed. 96 inheritance possession. 97 cov'nant i.e., the sealed compact on line 90. 98 carriage . . . designed carrying out of the article or clause drawn up to cover the point. 100 unimprovèd mettle untried, undisciplined spirits. 101 skirts outlying regions, outskirts. 102 Sharked up gathered up, as a shark takes fish; list i.e., troop; resolutes Desperadoes. 103 For food and diet i.e., they are to serve as food, or "means," to some enterprises, also they serve in return for the rations they get. 104 stomach (1) a spirit of daring; (2) an appetite that is fed by the lawless resolutes. 110 head source. 111 rummage bustle, commotion. 113 sort suit. 115 question focus of contention.

HORATIO: A mote° it is to trouble the mind's eye.
In the most high and palmy° state of Rome,
A little ere the mightiest Julius fell,
The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted° dead
Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets;
As° stars with trains° of fire and dews of blood,
Disasters° in the sun; and the moist star°
Upon whose influence Neptune's° empire stands°
Was sick almost to doomsday° with eclipse.
And even the like precurse° of feared events,
As harbingers° preceding still° the fates
And prologue to the omen° coming on,
Have heaven and earth together demonstrated
Unto our climatures° and countrymen.

Enter GHOST.

But soft,° behold! Lo, where it comes again!
I'll cross° it, though it blast° me. [It spreads his° arms.]
Stay, illusion!
If thou hast any sound or use of voice,
Speak to me!
If there be any good thing to be done
That may to thee do ease and grace to me,
Speak to me!
If thou art privy to° thy country's fate,
Which, happily,° foreknowing may avoid,
O, speak!
Or if thou hast uphoarded in thy life
Extorted treasure in the womb of earth,
For which, they say, you spirits oft walk in death,
Speak of it! [The cock crows.] Stay and speak!—Stop it, Marcellus.

MARCELLUS: Shall I strike at it with my partisan?°
HORATIO: Do, if it will not stand. [They strike at it.]
BERNARDO: 'Tis here!
HORATIO: 'Tis here! [Exit GHOST.]
MARCELLUS: 'Tis gone.
We do it wrong, being so majestical,
To offer it the show of violence,
For it is as the air invulnerable,
And our vain blows malicious mockery.

116 mote speck of dust. 117 palmy flourishing. 119 sheeted shrouded. 121 As (This abrupt transition suggests that matter is possibly omitted between lines 120 and 121.); trains trails. 122 Disasters unfavorable signs or aspects; moist star i.e., moon, governing tides. 123 Neptune god of the sea; stands depends. 124 sick . . . doomsday (see Matthew 24:29 and Revelation 6:12.) 125 precurse heralding, foreshadowing. 126 harbingers forerunners; still continually. 127 omen calamitous event. 129 climatures regions. 130 soft i.e., enough, break off. 131 cross stand in its path, confront; blast wither, strike with a curse; s.d. his its. 137 privy to in on the secret of. 138 happily haply, perchance. 144 partisan long-handled spear.

BERNARDO: It was about to speak when the cock crew.
HORATIO: And then it started like a guilty thing
Upon a fearful summons. I have heard
The cock, that is the trumpet° to the morn,
Doth with his lofty and shrill-sounding throat
Awake the god of day, and at his warning,
Whether in sea or fire, in earth or air,
Th' extravagant and erring° spirit hies°
To his confine; and of the truth herein
This present object made probation.°
MARCELLUS: It faded on the crowing of the cock.
Some say that ever 'gainst° that season comes
Wherein our Savior's birth is celebrated,
This bird of dawning singeth all night long,
And then, they say, no spirit dare stir abroad;
The nights are wholesome, then no planets strike,°
No fairy takes,° nor witch hath power to charm,
So hallowed and so gracious° is that time.
HORATIO: So have I heard and do in part believe it.
But, look, the morn in russet mantle clad
Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastward hill.
Break we our watch up, and by my advice
Let us impart what we have seen tonight
Unto young Hamlet; for upon my life,
This spirit, dumb to us, will speak to him.
Do you consent we shall acquaint him with it,
As need ful in our loves, fitting our duty?
MARCELLUS: Let's do 't, I pray, and I this morning know
Where we shall find him most conveniently. Exeunt.

[1.2]

Flourish. Enter CLAUDIUS, King of Denmark, GERTRUDE the Queen, [the] Council, as° POLONIUS and his son LAERTES, HAMLET, cum aliis° [including VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS].

KING: Though yet of Hamlet our° dear brother's death
The memory be green, and that it us befitted
To bear our hearts in grief and our whole kingdom
To be contracted in one brow of woe,
Yet so far hath discretion fought with nature
That we with wisest sorrow think on him
Together with remembrance of ourselves.
Therefore our sometime° sister, now our queen,
Th' imperial jointress° to this warlike state,

156 trumpet trumpeter. 160 extravagant and erring wandering beyond bounds. (The words have similar meaning.); hies hastens. 162 probation proof. 164 'gainst just before. 168 strike destroy by evil influence. 169 takes bewitches. 170 gracious full of grace. [1.2] Location: The castle. s.d. as i.e., such as, including; cum aliis with others. 1 our my. (The royal "we"; also in the following lines.) 8 sometime former. 9 jointress woman possessing property with her husband.

Have we, as 'twere with a defeated joy—
With an auspicious and a dropping eye,°
With mirth in funeral and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole°—
Taken to wife: Nor have we herein barred
Your better wisdoms, which have freely gone
With this affair along. For all, our thanks.
Now follows that you know° young Fortinbras,
Holding a weak supposal° of our worth,
Or thinking by our late dear brother's death
Our state to be disjoint and out of frame,
Co-leaguèd with° this dream of his advantage,°
He hath not failed to pester us with message
Importing° the surrender of those lands
Lost by his father, with all bonds° of law,
To our most valiant brother. So much for him.
Now for ourself and for this time of meeting.
Thus much the business is: we have here writ
To Norway, uncle of young Fortinbras—
Who, impotent° and bed-rid, scarcely hears
Of this his nephew's purpose—to suppress
His° further gait° herein, in that the levies,
The lists, and full proportions are all made
Out of his subject;° and we here dispatch
You, good Cornelius, and you, Voltimand,
For bearers of this greeting to old Norway,
Giving to you no further personal power
To business with the King more than the scope
Of these dilated° articles allow. [He gives a paper.]
Farewell, and let your haste commend your duty.°

CORNELIUS, VOLTIMAND: In that, and all things, will we show our duty.
KING: We doubt it nothing.° Heartily farewell.

[Exeunt VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS.]

And now, Laertes, what's the news with you?
You told us of some suit; what is 't, Laertes?
You cannot speak of reason to the Dane°
And lose your voice.° What wouldst thou beg, Laertes,
That shall not be my offer, not thy asking?
The head is not more native° to the heart,

11 With . . . eye with one eye smiling and the other weeping. 13 dole grief. 17 that you know what you know already, that; or, that you be informed as follows. 18 weak supposal low estimate. 21 Co-leaguèd with joined to, allied with; dream . . . advantage illusory hope of having the advantage. (His only ally is this hope.) 23 Importing pertaining to. 24 bonds contracts. 29 impotent helpless. 31 His i.e., Fortinbras'; gait proceeding. 31–33 in that . . . subject since the levying of troops and supplies is drawn entirely from the King of Norway's own subjects. 38 dilated set out at length. 39 let . . . duty let your swift obeying of orders, rather than mere words, express your dutifulness. 41 nothing not at all. 44 the Dane the Danish king. 45 lose your voice waste your speech. 47 native closely connected, related.

The hand more instrumental° to the mouth,
Than is the throne of Denmark to thy father.
What wouldst thou have, Laertes?
LAERTES: My dread lord,
Your leave and favor° to return to France,
From whence though willingly I came to Denmark
To show my duty in your coronation,
Yet now I must confess, that duty done,
My thoughts and wishes bend again toward France
And bow them to your gracious leave and pardon.°
KING: Have you your father's leave? What says Polonius?
POLONIUS: H'ath,° my lord, wrung from me my slow leave
By laborsome petition, and at last
Upon his will I sealed° my hard° consent.
I do beseech you, give him leave to go.
KING: Take thy fair hour,° Laertes. Time be thine,
And thy best graces spend it at thy will!°
But now, my cousin° Hamlet, and my son—
HAMLET: A little more than kin, and less than kind.°
KING: How is it that the clouds still hang on you?
HAMLET: Not so, my lord. I am too much in the sun.°
QUEEN: Good Hamlet, cast thy nighted color° off,
And let thine eye look like a friend on Denmark.°
Do not forever with thy vailèd lids°
Seek for thy noble father in the dust.
Thou know'st 'tis common,° all that lives must die,
Passing through nature to eternity.
HAMLET: Ay, madam, it is common.
QUEEN: If it be,
Why seems it so particular° with thee?
HAMLET: Seems, madam? Nay, it is. I know not "seems."
'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good Mother,
Nor customary° suits of solemn black,
Nor windy suspiration° of forced breath,
No, nor the fruitful° river in the eye,

48 instrumental serviceable. 51 leave and favor kind permission. 56 bow . . . pardon entreatingly make a deep bow, asking your permission to depart. 58 H'ath he has. 60 sealed (as if sealing a legal document.); hard reluctant. 62 Take thy fair hour enjoy your time of youth. 63 And . . . will and may your finest qualities guide the way you choose to spend your time. 64 cousin any kin not of the immediate family. 65 A little . . . kind i.e., closer than an ordinary nephew (since I am stepson), and yet more separated in natural feeling (with pun on kind meaning "affectionate" and "natural," "lawful." This line is often read as an aside, but it need not be. The King chooses perhaps not to respond to Hamlet's cryptic and bitter remark.) 67 the sun i.e., the sunshine of the King's royal favor (with pun on son). 68 nighted color (1) mourning garments of black, (2) dark melancholy. 69 Denmark the King of Denmark. 70 vailèd lids lowered eyes. 72 common of universal occurrence. (But Hamlet plays on the sense of "vulgar" in line 74.) 75 particular personal. 78 customary (1) socially conventional, (2) habitual with me. 79 suspiration sighing. 80 fruitful abundant.

Nor the dejected havior° of the visage,
Together with all forms, moods,° shapes of grief,
That can denote me truly. These indeed seem,
For they are actions that a man might play.
But I have that within which passes show;
These but the trappings and the suits of woe.

KING: 'Tis sweet and commendable in your nature, Hamlet,
To give these mourning duties to your father.
But you must know your father lost a father,
That father lost, lost his, and the survivor bound
In filial obligation for some term
To do obsequious° sorrow. But to persever°
In obstinate condolement° is a course
Of impious stubbornness. 'Tis unmanly grief.
It shows a will most incorrect to heaven,
A heart unfortified,° a mind impatient,
An understanding simple° and unschooled.
For what we know must be and is as common
As any the most vulgar thing to sense,°
Why should we in our peevish opposition
Take it to heart? Fie, 'tis a fault to heaven,
A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,
To reason most absurd, whose common theme
Is death of fathers, and who still° hath cried,
From the first corpse° till he that died today,
"This must be so." We pray you, throw to earth
This unprevailing° woe and think of us
As of a father; for let the world take note,
You are the most immediate° to our throne,
And with no less nobility of love
Than that which dearest father bears his son
Do I impart toward° you. For° your intent
In going back to school° in Wittenberg,°
It is most retrograde° to our desire,
And we beseech you bend you° to remain
Here in the cheer and comfort of our eye,
Our chiefest courtier, cousin, and our son.

QUEEN: Let not thy mother lose her prayers, Hamlet.
I pray thee, stay with us, go not to Wittenberg.

HAMLET: I shall in all my best° obey you, madam.

KING: Why, 'tis a loving and a fair reply.
Be as ourself in Denmark. Madam, come.

81 havior expression. 82 moods outward expression of feeling. 92 obsequious suited to obsequies or funerals; persever persevere. 93 condolement sorrowing. 96 unfortified i.e., against adversity. 97 simple ignorant. 99 As . . . sense as the most ordinary experience. 104 still always. 105 the first corpse (Abel's.) 107 unprevailing unavailing, useless. 109 most immediate next in succession. 112 impart toward i.e., bestow my affection on; For as for. 113 to school i.e., to your studies; Wittenberg famous German university founded in 1502. 114 retrograde contrary. 115 bend you incline yourself. 120 in all my best to the best of my ability.

This gentle and unforced accord of Hamlet
Sits smiling to° my heart, in grace° whereof
No jocund° health that Denmark drinks today
But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,
And the King's rouse° the heaven shall bruit again,°
Respeaking earthly thunder.° Come away.

Flourish. Exeunt all but HAMLET.

HAMLET: O, that this too too sullied° flesh would melt,
Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!
Or that the Everlasting had not fixed
His canon° 'gainst self-slaughter! O God, God,
How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable
Seem to me all the uses° of this world!
Fie on 't, ah fie! 'Tis an unweeded garden
That grows to seed. Things rank and gross in nature
Possess it merely.° That it should come to this!
But two months dead—nay, not so much, not two.
So excellent a king, that was to° this
Hyperion° to a satyr,° so loving to my mother
That he might not beteem° the winds of heaven
Visit her face too roughly. Heaven and earth,
Must I remember? Why, she would hang on him
As if increase of appetite had grown
By what it fed on, and yet within a month—
Let me not think on 't; frailty, thy name is woman!—
A little month, or ere° those shoes were old
With which she followed my poor father's body,
Like Niobe;° all tears, why she, even she—
O God, a beast, that wants discourse of reason,°
Would have mourned longer—married with my uncle,
My father's brother, but no more like my father
Than I to Hercules. Within a month,
Ere yet the salt of most unrighteous tears
Had left the flushing in her gallèd° eyes,
She married. O, most wicked speed, to post°
With such dexterity to incestuous° sheets!
It is not, nor it cannot come to good.
But break, my heart, for I must hold my tongue.

124 to i.e., at; grace thanksgiving. 125 jocund merry. 127 rouse drinking of a draft of liquor; bruit again loudly echo. 128 thunder i.e., of trumpet and kettledrum, sounded when the King drinks; see 1.4.8–12. 129 sullied defiled. (The early quartos read sallied; the Folio, solid.) 132 canon law. 134 all the uses the whole routine. 137 merely completely. 139 to in comparison to. 140 Hyperion Titan sun-god, father of Helios; satyr a lecherous creature of classical mythology, half-human but with a goat's legs, tail, ears, and horns. 141 beteem allow. 147 or ere even before. 149 Niobe Tantalus' daughter, Queen of Thebes, who boasted that she had more sons and daughters than Leto; for this, Apollo and Artemis, children of Leto, slew her fourteen children. She was turned by Zeus into a stone that continually dropped tears. 150 wants . . . reason lacks the faculty of reason. 155 gallèd irritated, inflamed. 156 post hasten. 157 incestuous (In Shakespeare's day, the marriage of a man like Claudius to his deceased brother's wife was considered incestuous.)

Enter HORATIO, MARCELLUS and BERNARDO.

HORATIO: Hail to your lordship!
HAMLET: I am glad to see you well.
Horatio!—or I do forget myself.
HORATIO: The same, my lord, and your poor servant ever.
HAMLET: Sir, my good friend; I'll change that name° with you.
And what make you from° Wittenberg, Horatio?
Marcellus.
MARCELLUS: My good lord.
HAMLET: I am very glad to see you. [To BERNARDO.] Good even, sir.—
But what in faith make you from Wittenberg?
HORATIO: A truant disposition, good my lord.
HAMLET: I would not hear your enemy say so,
Nor shall you do my ear that violence
To make it truster of your own report
Against yourself. I know you are no truant.
But what is your affair in Elsinore?
We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart.
HORATIO: My lord, I came to see your father's funeral.
HAMLET: I prithee, do not mock me, fellow student;
I think it was to see my mother's wedding.
HORATIO: Indeed, my lord, it followed hard° upon.
HAMLET: Thrift, thrift, Horatio! The funeral baked meats°
Did coldly° furnish forth the marriage tables.
Would I had met my dearest° foe in heaven
Or ever° I had seen that day, Horatio!
My father!—Methinks I see my father.
HORATIO: Where, my lord?
HAMLET: In my mind's eye, Horatio.
HORATIO: I saw him once. 'A° was a goodly king.
HAMLET: 'A was a man. Take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.
HORATIO: My lord, I think I saw him yesternight.
HAMLET: Saw? Who?
HORATIO: My lord, the King your father.
HAMLET: The King my father?
HORATIO: Season your admiration° for a while
With an attent° ear till I may deliver,
Upon the witness of these gentlemen,
This marvel to you.
HAMLET: For God's love, let me hear!
HORATIO: Two nights together had these gentlemen,
Marcellus and Bernardo, on their watch,
In the dead waste° and middle of the night,
Been thus encountered. A figure like your father,

163 change that name i.e., give and receive reciprocally the name of "friend" (rather than talk of "servant"). 164 make you from are you doing away from. 179 hard close. 180 baked meats meat pies. 181 coldly i.e., as cold leftovers. 182 dearest closest (and therefore deadliest). 183 Or ever before. 186 'A he. 193 Season your admiration restrain your astonishment. 194 attent attentive. 199 dead waste desolate stillness.

Armèd at point° exactly, cap-à-pie,°
Appears before them, and with solemn march
Goes slow and stately by them. Thrice he walked
By their oppressed and fear-surprisèd eyes
Within his truncheon's° length, whilst they, distilled°
Almost to jelly with the act° of fear,
Stand dumb and speak not to him. This to me
In dreadful° secrecy impart they did,
And I with them the third night kept the watch,
Where, as they had delivered, both in time,
Form of the thing, each word made true and good,
The apparition comes. I knew your father;
These hands are not more like.

HAMLET: But where was this?

MARCELLUS: My lord, upon the platform where we watch.

HAMLET: Did you not speak to it?

HORATIO: My lord, I did,
But answer made it none. Yet once methought
It lifted up its head and did address
Itself to motion, like as it would speak;°
But even then° the morning cock crew loud,
And at the sound it shrunk in haste away
And vanished from our sight.

HAMLET: 'Tis very strange.

HORATIO: As I do live, my honored lord, 'tis true,
And we did think it writ down in our duty
To let you know of it.

HAMLET: Indeed, indeed, sirs. But this troubles me.
Hold you the watch tonight?

ALL: We do, my lord.

HAMLET: Armed, say you?

ALL: Armed, my lord.

HAMLET: From top to toe?

ALL: My lord, from head to foot.

HAMLET: Then saw you not his face?

HORATIO: O, yes, my lord, he wore his beaver° up.

HAMLET: What° looked he, frowningly?

HORATIO: A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.

HAMLET: Pale or red?

HORATIO: Nay, very pale.

HAMLET: And fixed his eyes upon you?

HORATIO: Most constantly.

HAMLET: I would I had been there.

HORATIO: It would have much amazed you.

HAMLET: Very like, very like. Stayed it long?

201 at point correctly in every detail; cap-à-pie from head to foot. 205 truncheon officer's staff; distilled dissolved. 206 act action, operation. 208 dreadful full of dread. 217–18 did . . . speak began to move as though it were about to speak. 219 even then at that very instant. 232 beaver visor on the helmet. 233 What how.

HORATIO: While one with moderate haste might tell° a hundred.
MARCELLUS, BERNARDO: Longer, longer.
HORATIO: Not when I saw 't.
HAMLET: His beard was grizzled°—no?
HORATIO: It was, as I have seen it in his life,
A sable silvered.°
HAMLET: I will watch tonight.
Perchance 'twill walk again.
HORATIO: I warrant° it will.
HAMLET: If it assume my noble father's person,
I'll speak to it though hell itself should gape
And bid me hold my peace. I pray you all,
If you have hitherto concealed this sight,
Let it be tenable° in your silence still,
And whatsoever else shall hap tonight,
Give it an understanding but no tongue.
I will requite your loves. So, fare you well.
Upon the platform twixt eleven and twelve
I'll visit you.
ALL: Our duty to your honor.
HAMLET: Your loves, as mine to you. Farewell. Exeunt [all but HAMLET].
My father's spirit in arms! All is not well.
I doubt° some foul play. Would the night were come!
Till then sit still, my soul. Foul deeds will rise,
Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes. Exit.

[1.3]

Enter LAERTES and OPHELIA, his sister.

LAERTES: My necessaries are embarked. Farewell.
And, sister, as the winds give benefit
And convoy is assistant,° do not sleep
But let me hear from you.
OPHELIA: Do you doubt that?
LAERTES: For Hamlet, and the trifling of his favor,
Hold it a fashion and a toy in blood,°
A violet in the youth of primy° nature,
Forward,° not permanent, sweet, not lasting,
The perfume and suppliance° of a minute—
No more.
OPHELIA: No more but so?
LAERTES: Think it no more.
For nature crescent° does not grow alone
In thews° and bulk, but as this temple° waxes

242 tell count. 245 grizzled gray. 247 sable silvered black mixed with white. 248 warrant assure you. 253 tenable held. 261 doubt suspect. [1.3] Location: Polonius' chambers. 3 convoy is assistant means of conveyance are available. 6 toy in blood passing amorous fancy. 7 primy in its prime, springtime. 8 Forward precocious. 9 suppliance supply, filler. 11 crescent growing, waxing. 12 thews bodily strength; temple i.e., body.

The inward service of the mind and soul
Grows wide withal.° Perhaps he loves you now,
And now no soil° nor cautel° doth besmirch
The virtue of his will,° but you must fear,
His greatness weighed,° his will is not his own.
For he himself is subject to his birth.
He may not, as unvalued persons do,
Carve° for himself, for on his choice depends
The safety and health of this whole state,
And therefore must his choice be circumscribed
Unto the voice and yielding° of that body
Whereof he is the head. Then if he says he loves you,
It fits your wisdom so far to believe it
As he in his particular act and place°
May give his saying deed, which is no further
Than the main voice° of Denmark goes withal.°
Then weigh what loss your honor may sustain
If with too credent° ear you list° his songs,
Or lose your heart, or your chaste treasure open
To his unmastered importunity.
Fear it, Ophelia, fear it, my dear sister,
And keep you in the rear of your affection,°
Out of the shot and danger of desire.
The chariest° maid is prodigal enough
If she unmask her beauty° to the moon.°
Virtue itself scapes not calumnious strokes.
The canker galls° the infants of the spring
Too oft before their buttons° be disclosed,°
And in the morn and liquid dew° of youth
Contagious blastments° are most imminent.
Be wary then; best safety lies in fear.
Youth to itself rebels,° though none else near.

OPHELIA: I shall the effect of this good lesson keep
As watchman to my heart. But, good my brother,
Do not, as some ungracious° pastors do,
Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven,
Whiles like a puffed° and reckless libertine
Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads,
And recks° not his own rede.°

Enter POLONIUS.

14 Grows wide withal grows along with it. 15 soil blemish; cautel deceit. 16 will desire. 17 His greatness weighed if you take into account his high position. 20 Carve i.e., choose. 23 voice and yielding assent, approval. 26 in . . . place in his particular restricted circumstances. 28 main voice general assent; withal along with. 30 credent credulous; list listen to. 34 keep . . . affection don't advance as far as your affection might lead you. (A military metaphor.) 36 chariest most scrupulously modest. 37 If she unmask her beauty if she does no more than show her beauty; moon (symbol of chastity.) 39 canker galls canker-worm destroys. 40 buttons buds; disclosed opened. 41 liquid dew i.e., time when dew is fresh and bright. 42 blastments blights. 44 Youth . . . rebels youth is inherently rebellious. 47 ungracious ungodly. 49 puffed bloated, or swollen with pride. 51 recks heeds; rede counsel.

LAERTES: O, fear me not.°
I stay too long. But here my father comes.
A double° blessing is a double grace;
Occasion smiles upon a second leave.°
POLONIUS: Yet here, Laertes? Aboard, aboard, for shame!
The wind sits in the shoulder of your sail,
And you are stayed for. There—my blessing with thee!
And these few precepts in thy memory
Look° thou character.° Give thy thoughts no tongue,
Nor any unproportioned° thought his° act.
Be thou familiar,° but by no means vulgar.°
Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,°
Grapple them unto thy soul with hoops of steel,
But do not dull thy palm° with entertainment
Of each new-hatched, unfledged courage.° Beware
Of entrance to a quarrel, but being in,
Bear 't that° th' opposèd may beware of thee.
Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice;
Take each man's censure,° but reserve thy judgment.
Costly thy habit° as thy purse can buy,
But not expressed in fancy;° rich, not gaudy,
For the apparel oft proclaims the man,
And they in France of the best rank and station
Are of a most select and generous chief in that.°
Neither a borrower nor a lender be,
For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulleth edge of husbandry.°
This above all: to thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.
Farewell. My blessing season° this in thee!
LAERTES: Most humbly do I take my leave, my lord.
POLONIUS: The time invests° you. Go, your servants tend.°
LAERTES: Farewell, Ophelia, and remember well
What I have said to you.
OPHELIA: 'Tis in my memory locked,
And you yourself shall keep the key of it.
LAERTES: Farewell. Exit LAERTES.
POLONIUS: What is 't, Ophelia, he hath said to you?
OPHELIA: So please you, something touching the Lord Hamlet.

51 fear me not don't worry on my account. 53 double (Laertes has already bid his father good-bye.) 54 Occasion . . . leave happy is the circumstance that provides a second leave-taking. (The goddess Occasion, or Opportunity, smiles.) 59 Look be sure that; character inscribe. 60 unproportioned badly calculated, intemperate; his its. 61 familiar sociable; vulgar common. 62 and their adoption tried and also their suitability for adoption as friends having been tested. 64 dull thy palm i.e., shake hands so often as to make the gesture meaningless. 65 courage young man of spirit. 67 Bear 't that manage it so that. 69 censure opinion, judgment. 70 habit clothing. 71 fancy excessive ornament, decadent fashion. 74 Are . . . that are of a most refined and well-bred preeminence in choosing what to wear. 77 husbandry thrift. 81 season mature. 83 invests besieges, presses upon; tend attend, wait.

POLONIUS: Marry,° well bethought.
'Tis told me he hath very oft of late
Given private time to you, and you yourself
Have of your audience been most free and bounteous.
If it be so—as so 'tis put on° me,
And that in way of caution—I must tell you
You do not understand yourself so clearly
As it behooves° my daughter and your honor.
What is between you? Give me up the truth.
OPHELIA: He hath, my lord, of late made many tenders°
Of his affection to me.
POLONIUS: Affection? Pooh! You speak like a green girl,
Unsifted° in such perilous circumstance.
Do you believe his tenders, as you call them?
OPHELIA: I do not know, my lord, what I should think.
POLONIUS: Marry, I will teach you. Think yourself a baby
That you have ta'en these tenders for true pay
Which are not sterling.° Tender° yourself more dearly,
Or—not to crack the wind° of the poor phrase,
Running it thus—you'll tender me a fool.°
OPHELIA: My lord, he hath importuned me with love
In honorable fashion.
POLONIUS: Ay, fashion° you may call it. Go to,° go to.
OPHELIA: And hath given countenance° to his speech, my lord,
With almost all the holy vows of heaven.
POLONIUS: Ay, springes° to catch woodcocks.° I do know,
When the blood burns, how prodigal° the soul
Lends the tongue vows. These blazes, daughter,
Giving more light than heat, extinct in both
Even in their promise as it° is a-making,
You must not take for fire. From this time
Be something° scanter of your maiden presence.
Set your entreatments° at a higher rate
Than a command to parle.° For Lord Hamlet,
Believe so much in him° that he is young,
And with a larger tether may he walk
Than may be given you. In few,° Ophelia,
Do not believe his vows, for they are brokers,°

91 Marry i.e., by the Virgin Mary. (A mild oath.) 95 put on impressed on, told to. 98 behooves befits. 100 tenders offers. 103 Unsifted i.e., untried. 108 sterling legal currency; Tender hold, look after, offer. 109 crack the wind i.e., run it until it is broken-winded. 110 tender me a fool (1) show yourself to me as a fool, (2) show me up as a fool, (3) present me with a grandchild. (Fool was a term of endearment for a child.) 113 fashion mere form, pretense; Go to (an expression of impatience.) 114 countenance credit, confirmation. 116 springes snares; woodcocks birds easily caught; here used to connote gullibility. 117 prodigal prodigally. 120 it i.e., the promise. 122 something somewhat. 123 entreatments negotiations for surrender. (A military term.) 124 parle discuss terms with the enemy. (Polonius urges his daughter, in the metaphor of military language, not to meet with Hamlet and consider giving in to him merely because he requests an interview.) 125 so . . . him this much concerning him. 127 In few briefly. 128 brokers go-betweens, procurers.

Not of that dye° which their investments° show,
But mere implorators° of unholy suits,
Breathing° like sanctified and pious bawds,
The better to beguile. This is for all:°
I would not, in plain terms, from this time forth
Have you so slander° any moment° leisure
As to give words or talk with the Lord Hamlet.
Look to 't, I charge you. Come your ways.°

OPHELIA: I shall obey, my lord. Exeunt.

[1.4]

Enter HAMLET, HORATIO, and MARCELLUS.

HAMLET: The air bites shrewdly,° it is very cold.
HORATIO: It is a nipping and an eager° air.
HAMLET: What hour now?
HORATIO: I think it lacks of° twelve.
MARCELLUS: No, it is struck.
HORATIO: Indeed? I heard it not.
It then draws near the season°
Wherein the spirit held his wont° to walk.
A flourish of trumpets, and two pieces° go off [within].
What does this mean, my lord?
HAMLET: The King doth wake° tonight and takes his rouse,°
Keeps wassail,° and the swaggering upspring° reels,°
And as he drains his drafts of Rhenish° down,
The kettledrum and trumpet thus bray out
The triumph of his pledge.°
HORATIO: It is a custom?
HAMLET: Ay, marry, is't,
But to my mind, though I am native here
And to the manner° born, it is a custom
More honored in the breach than the observance.°
This heavy-headed revel east and west°
Makes us traduced and taxed of° other nations.
They clepe° us drunkards, and with swinish phrase°
Soil our addition;° and indeed it takes
From our achievements, though performed at height,°
The pith and marrow of our attribute.°

129 dye color or sort; investments clothes. (The vows are not what they seem.) 130 mere implorators out-and-out solicitors. 131 Breathing speaking. 132 for all once for all, in sum. 134 slander abuse, misuse; moment moment's. 136 Come your ways come along.
[1.4] Location: The guard platform. 1 shrewdly keenly, sharply. 2 eager biting. 3 lacks of is just short of. 5 season time. 6 held his wont was accustomed; s.d. pieces i.e., of ordnance, cannon. 8 wake stay awake and hold revel; takes his rouse carouses. 9 wassail carousal; upspring wild German dance; reels dances. 10 Rhenish Rhine wine. 12 The triumph . . . pledge i.e., his feat in draining the wine in a single draft. 16 manner custom (of drinking). 17 More . . . observance better neglected than followed. 18 east and west i.e., everywhere. 19 taxed of censured by. 20 clepe call; with swinish phrase i.e., by calling us swine. 21 addition reputation. 22 at height outstandingly. 23 The pith . . . attribute the essence of the reputation that others attribute to us.

So, oft it chances in particular men,
That for° some vicious mole of nature° in them,
As in their birth—wherein they are not guilty,
Since nature cannot choose his° origin—
By their o'ergrowth of some complexion,°
Oft breaking down the pales° and forts of reason,
Or by some habit that too much o'erleavens°
The form of plausive° manners, that these men,
Carrying, I say, the stamp of one defect,
Being nature's livery° or fortune's star,°
His virtues else,° be they as pure as grace,
As infinite as man may undergo,°
Shall in the general censure° take corruption
From that particular fault. The dram of evil
Doth all the noble substance often dout
To his own scandal.°

Enter GHOST.

HORATIO: Look, my lord, it comes!
HAMLET: Angels and ministers of grace° defend us!
Be thou° a spirit of health° or goblin damned,
Bring° with thee airs from heaven or blasts from hell,
Be thy intents° wicked or charitable,
Thou com'st in such a questionable° shape
That I will speak to thee. I'll call thee Hamlet,
King, father, royal Dane. O, answer me!
Let me not burst in ignorance, but tell
Why thy canonized° bones, hearsèd° in death,
Have burst their cerements;° why the sepulcher
Wherein we saw thee quietly inurned°
Hath oped his ponderous and marble jaws
To cast thee up again. What may this mean,
That thou, dead corpse, again in complete steel,°
Revisits thus the glimpses of the moon,°
Making night hideous, and we fools of nature°
So horridly to shake our disposition°

25 for on account of; mole of nature natural blemish in one's constitution. 27 his its. 28 their o'ergrowth . . . complexion the excessive growth in individuals of some natural trait. 29 pales palings, fences (as of a fortification). 30 o'erleavens induces a change throughout (as yeast works in dough). 31 plausive pleasing. 33 nature's livery sign of one's servitude to nature; fortune's star the destiny that chance brings. 34 His virtues else i.e., the other qualities of these men (line 31). 35 may undergo can sustain. 36 general censure general opinion that people have of him. 37–39 The dram . . . scandal i.e., the small drop of evil blots out or works against the noble substance of the whole and brings it into disrepute. To dout is to blot out. (A famous crux.) 40 ministers of grace messengers of God. 41 Be thou whether you are; spirit of health good angel. 42 Bring whether you bring. 43 Be thy intents whether your intentions are. 44 questionable inviting question. 48 canonized buried according to the canons of the church; hearsèd coffined. 49 cerements grave clothes. 50 inurned entombed. 53 complete steel full armor. 54 glimpses of the moon pale and uncertain moonlight. 55 fools of nature mere men, limited to natural knowledge and subject to nature. 56 So . . . disposition to distress our mental composure so violently.

With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?
Say, why is this? Wherefore? What should we do?

[The GHOST] beckons [HAMLET].

HORATIO: It beckons you to go away with it,
As if it some impartment° did desire
To you alone.
MARCELLUS: Look with what courteous action
It wafts you to a more removèd ground.
But do not go with it.
HORATIO: No, by no means.
HAMLET: It will not speak. Then I will follow it.
HORATIO: Do not, my lord!
HAMLET: Why, what should be the fear?
I do not set my life at a pin's fee,°
And for my soul, what can it do to that,
Being a thing immortal as itself?
It waves me forth again. I'll follow it.
HORATIO: What if it tempt you toward the flood,° my lord,
Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff
That beetles o'er° his° base into the sea,
And there assume some other horrible form
Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason°
And draw you into madness? Think of it.
The very place puts toys of desperation,°
Without more motive, into every brain
That looks so many fathoms to the sea
And hears it roar beneath.
HAMLET: It wafts me still.—Go on, I'll follow thee.
MARCELLUS: You shall not go, my lord. [They try to stop him.]
HAMLET: Hold off your hands!
HORATIO: Be ruled. You shall not go.
HAMLET: My fate cries out,°
And makes each petty° artery° in this body
As hardy as the Nemean lion's° nerve.°
Still am I called. Unhand me, gentlemen.
By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets° me!
I say, away!—Go on, I'll follow thee. Exeunt GHOST and HAMLET.
HORATIO: He waxes desperate with imagination.
MARCELLUS: Let's follow. 'Tis not fit thus to obey him.
HORATIO: Have after.° To what issue° will this come?
MARCELLUS: Something is rotten in the state of Denmark.
HORATIO: Heaven will direct it.°
MARCELLUS: Nay, let's follow him. Exeunt.

60 impartment communication. 66 fee value. 70 flood sea. 72 beetles o'er overhangs threateningly (like bushy eyebrows); his its. 74 deprive . . . reason take away the rule of reason over your mind. 76 toys of desperation fancies of desperate acts, i.e., suicide. 82 My fate cries out my destiny summons me. 83 petty weak; artery (through which the vital spirits were thought to have been conveyed). 84 Nemean lion one of the monsters slain by Hercules in his twelve labors; nerve sinew. 86 lets hinders. 90 Have after let's go after him; issue outcome. 92 it i.e., the outcome.

[1.5]

Enter GHOST and HAMLET.

HAMLET: Whither wilt thou lead me? Speak. I'll go no further.
GHOST: Mark me.
HAMLET: I will.
GHOST: My hour is almost come,
When I to sulfurous and tormenting flames
Must render up myself.
HAMLET: Alas, poor ghost!
GHOST: Pity me not, but lend thy serious hearing
To what I shall unfold.
HAMLET: Speak. I am bound° to hear.
GHOST: So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear.
HAMLET: What?
GHOST: I am thy father's spirit,
Doomed for a certain term to walk the night,
And for the day confined to fast° in fires,
Till the foul crimes° done in my days of nature°
Are burnt and purged away. But that° I am forbid
To tell the secrets of my prison house,
I could a tale unfold whose lightest word
Would harrow up° thy soul, freeze thy young blood,
Make thy two eyes like stars start from their spheres,°
Thy knotted and combinèd locks° to part,
And each particular hair to stand on end
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine.
But this eternal blazon° must not be
To ears of flesh and blood. List, list, O, list!
If thou didst ever thy dear father love—
HAMLET: O God!
GHOST: Revenge his foul and most unnatural murder.
HAMLET: Murder?
GHOST: Murder most foul, as in the best° it is,
But this most foul, strange, and unnatural.
HAMLET: Haste me to know't, that I, with wings as swift
As meditation or the thoughts of love,
May sweep to my revenge.
GHOST: I find thee apt;
And duller shouldst thou be° than the fat° weed
That roots itself in ease on Lethe° wharf,

[1.5] Location: The battlements of the castle. 7 bound (1) ready, (2) obligated by duty and fate. (The Ghost, in line 8, answers in the second sense.) 12 fast do penance by fasting. 13 crimes sins; of nature as a mortal. 14 But that were it not that. 17 harrow up lacerate, tear. 18 spheres i.e., eye-sockets, here compared to the orbits or transparent revolving spheres in which, according to Ptolemaic astronomy, the heavenly bodies were fixed. 19 knotted . . . locks hair neatly arranged and confined. 22 eternal blazon revelation of the secrets of eternity. 28 in the best even at best. 33 shouldst thou be you would have to be; fat torpid, lethargic. 34 Lethe the river of forgetfulness in Hades.

Wouldst thou not stir in this. Now, Hamlet, hear.
'Tis given out that, sleeping in my orchard,°
A serpent stung me. So the whole ear of Denmark
Is by a forgèd process° of my death
Rankly abused.° But know, thou noble youth,
The serpent that did sting thy father's life
Now wears his crown.

HAMLET: O, my prophetic soul! My uncle!

GHOST: Ay, that incestuous, that adulterate° beast,
With witchcraft of his wit, with traitorous gifts°—
O wicked wit and gifts, that have the power
So to seduce!—won to his shameful lust
The will of my most seeming-virtuous queen.
O Hamlet, what a falling off was there!
From me, whose love was of that dignity
That it went hand in hand even with the vow°
I made to her in marriage, and to decline
Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
To° those of mine!
But virtue, as it° never will be moved,
Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven,°
So lust, though to a radiant angel linked,
Will sate itself in a celestial bed°
And prey on garbage.
But soft, methinks I scent the morning air.
Brief let me be. Sleeping within my orchard,
My custom always of the afternoon,
Upon my secure° hour thy uncle stole,
With juice of cursèd hebona° in a vial,
And in the porches of my ears° did pour
The leprous distillment,° whose effect
Holds such an enmity with blood of man
That swift as quicksilver it courses through
The natural gates and alleys of the body,
And with a sudden vigor it doth posset°
And curd, like eager° droppings into milk,
The thin and wholesome blood. So did it mine,
And a most instant tetter° barked° about,
Most lazar-like,° with vile and loathsome crust,
All my smooth body.

36 orchard garden. 38 forgèd process falsified account. 39 abused deceived. 43 adulterate adulterous. 44 gifts (1) talents, (2) presents. 50 even with the vow with the very vow. 53 To compared to. 54 virtue, as it as virtue. 55 shape of heaven heavenly form. 57 sate . . . bed cease to find sexual pleasure in a virtuously lawful marriage. 62 secure confident, unsuspicious. 63 hebona a poison. (The word seems to be a form of ebony, though it is thought perhaps to be related to henbane, a poison, or to ebenus, "yew.") 64 porches of my ears ears as a porch or entrance of the body. 65 leprous distillment distillation causing leprosylike disfigurement. 69 posset coagulate, curdle. 70 eager sour, acid. 72 tetter eruption of scabs; barked recovered with a rough covering, like bark on a tree. 73 lazar-like leperlike.

Thus was I, sleeping, by a brother's hand
Of life, of crown, of queen at once dispatched,°
Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
Unhouseled,° disappointed,° unaneled,°
No reckoning° made, but sent to my account
With all my imperfections on my head.
O, horrible! O, horrible, most horrible!
If thou hast nature° in thee, bear it not.
Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
A couch for luxury° and damnèd incest.
But, howsoever thou pursues this act,
Taint not thy mind nor let thy soul contrive
Against thy mother aught. Leave her to heaven
And to those thorns that in her bosom lodge,
To prick and sting her. Fare thee well at once.
The glowworm shows the matin° to be near,
And 'gins to pale his° uneffectual fire.
Adieu, adieu, adieu! Remember me. [Exit.]

HAMLET: O all you host of heaven! O earth! What else?
And shall I couple° hell? O, fie! Hold,° hold, my heart,
And you, my sinews, grow not instant° old,
But bear me stiffly up. Remember thee?
Ay, thou poor ghost, whiles memory holds a seat
In this distracted globe.° Remember thee?
Yea, from the table° of my memory
I'll wipe away all trivial fond° records,
All saws° of books, all forms,° all pressures° past
That youth and observation copied there,
And thy commandment all alone shall live
Within the book and volume of my brain,
Unmixed with baser matter. Yes, by heaven!
O most pernicious woman!
O villain, villain, smiling, damnèd villain!
My tables°—meet it is° I set it down
That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain.
At least I am sure it may be so in Denmark. [Writing.]
So uncle, there you are.° Now to my word:
It is "Adieu, adieu! Remember me."
I have sworn 't.

Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.

HORATIO: My lord, my lord!
MARCELLUS: Lord Hamlet!

76 dispatched suddenly deprived. 78 Unhouseled without having received the Sacrament; disappointed unready (spiritually) for the last journey; unaneled without having received extreme unction. 79 reckoning settling of accounts. 82 nature i.e., the promptings of a son. 84 luxury lechery. 90 matin morning. 91 his its. 94 couple add; Hold hold together. 95 instant instantly. 98 globe (1) head, (2) world. 99 table tablet, slate. 100 fond foolish. 101 saws wise sayings; forms shapes or images copied onto the slate; general ideas; pressures impressions stamped. 108 tables writing tablets; meet it is it is fitting. 111 there you are i.e., there, I've written that down against you.

HORATIO: Heavens secure him!°
HAMLET: So be it.
MARCELLUS: Hilo, ho, ho, my lord!
HAMLET: Hillo, ho, ho, boy! Come, bird, come.°
MARCELLUS: How is 't, my noble lord?
HORATIO: What news, my lord?
HAMLET: O, wonderful!
HORATIO: Good my lord, tell it.
HAMLET: No, you will reveal it.
HORATIO: Not I, my lord, by heaven.
MARCELLUS: Nor I, my lord.
HAMLET: How say you, then, would heart of man once° think it?
But you'll be secret?
HORATIO, MARCELLUS: Ay, by heaven, my lord.
HAMLET: There's never a villain dwelling in all Denmark
But he's an arrant° knave.
HORATIO: There needs no ghost, my lord, come from the grave
To tell us this.
HAMLET: Why, right, you are in the right.
And so, without more circumstance° at all,
I hold it fit that we shake hands and part,
You as your business and desire shall point you—
For every man hath business and desire,
Such as it is—and for my own poor part,
Look you, I'll go pray.
HORATIO: These are but wild and whirling words, my lord.
HAMLET: I am sorry they offend you, heartily;
Yes, faith, heartily.
HORATIO: There's no offense, my lord.
HAMLET: Yes, by Saint Patrick,° but there is, Horatio,
And much offense° too. Touching this vision here,
It is an honest ghost,° that let me tell you.
For your desire to know what is between us,
O'ermaster 't as you may. And now, good friends,
As you are friends, scholars, and soldiers,
Give me one poor request.
HORATIO: What is 't, my lord? We will.
HAMLET: Never make known what you have seen tonight.
HORATIO, MARCELLUS: My lord, we will not.
HAMLET: Nay, but swear 't.
HORATIO: In faith, my lord, not I.°
MARCELLUS: Nor I, my lord, in faith.
HAMLET: Upon my sword.° [He holds out his sword.]

116 secure him keep him safe. 119 Hillo . . . come (A falconer's call to a hawk in air. Hamlet mocks the halloing as though it were a part of hawking.) 127 once ever. 130 arrant thoroughgoing. 133 circumstance ceremony, elaboration. 142 Saint Patrick (the keeper of Purgatory and patron saint of all blunders and confusion.) 143 offense (Hamlet deliberately changes Horatio's "no offense against all decency.") 144 an honest ghost i.e., a real ghost and not an evil spirit. 153 In faith . . . I i.e., I swear not to tell what I have seen. (Horatio is not refusing to swear.) 155 sword i.e., the hilt in the form of a cross.

MARCELLUS: We have sworn, my lord, already.°
HAMLET: Indeed, upon my sword, indeed.
GHOST [cries under the stage]: Swear.
HAMLET: Ha, ha, boy, sayst thou so? Art thou there, truepenny?°
Come on, you hear this fellow in the cellarage.
Consent to swear.
HORATIO: Propose the oath, my lord.
HAMLET: Never to speak of this that you have seen,
Swear by my sword.
GHOST [beneath]: Swear. [They swear.°]
HAMLET: Hic et ubique? ° Then we'll shift our ground.
[He moves to another spot.]
Come hither, gentlemen,
And lay your hands again upon my sword.
Swear by my sword
Never to speak of this that you have heard.
GHOST [beneath]: Swear by his sword. [They swear.]
HAMLET: Well said, old mole. Canst work i' th' earth so fast?
A worthy pioneer!°—Once more removed, good friends.
[He moves again.]
HORATIO: O day and night, but this is wondrous strange!
HAMLET: And therefore as a stranger° give it welcome.
There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.°
But come;
Here, as before, never, so help you mercy,°
How strange or odd soe'er I bear myself—
As I perchance hereafter shall think meet
To put an antic° disposition on—
That you, at such times seeing me, never shall,
With arms encumbered° thus, or this headshake,
Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase
As "Well, we know," or "We could, an if° we would,"
Or "If we list° to speak," or "There be, an if they might,"°
Or such ambiguous giving out,° to note°
That you know aught° of me—this do swear,
So grace and mercy at your most need help you.
GHOST [beneath]: Swear. [They swear.]

156 We . . . already i.e., we swore in faith. 159 truepenny honest old fellow. 164 s.d. They swear (seemingly they swear here, and at lines 170 and 190, as they lay their hands on Hamlet's sword. Triple oaths would have particular force; these three oaths deal with what they have seen, what they have heard, and what they promise about Hamlet's antic disposition.) 165 *Hic et ubique here and everywhere (Latin). 172 pioneer foot soldier assigned to dig tunnels and excavations. 174 as a stranger i.e., needing your hospitality. 176 your philosophy this subject called "natural philosophy" or "science" that people talk about. 178 so help you mercy as you hope for God's mercy when you are judged. 181 antic fantastic. 183 encumbered folded. 185 an if if. 186 list wished; There . . . might i.e., there are people here (we, in fact) who could tell news if we were at liberty to do so. 187 giving out intimation; note draw attention to the fact. 188 aught i.e., something secret.

HAMLET: Rest, rest, perturbèd spirit! So, gentlemen,
With all my love I do commend me to you;°
And what so poor a man as Hamlet is
May do t' express his love and friending° to you,
God willing, shall not lack.° Let us go in together,
And still° your fingers on your lips, I pray.
The time° is out of joint. O cursèd spite°
That ever I was born to set it right! [They wait for him to leave first.]
Nay, come, let's go together.° Exeunt.

[2.1]

Enter old POLONIUS with his man [REYNALDO].

POLONIUS: Give him this money and these notes, Reynaldo.
[He gives money and papers.]
REYNALDO: I will, my lord.
POLONIUS: You shall do marvelous° wisely, good Reynaldo,
Before you visit him, to make inquire°
Of his behavior.
REYNALDO: My lord, I did intend it.
POLONIUS: Marry, well said, very well said. Look you, sir,
Inquire me first what Danskers° are in Paris,
And how, and who, what means,° and where they keep,°
What company, at what expense; and finding
By this encompassment° and drift° of question
That they do know my son, come you more nearer
Than your particular demands will touch it.°
Take you,° as 'twere, some distant knowledge of him,
As thus, "I know his father and his friends,
And in part him." Do you mark this, Reynaldo?
REYNALDO: Ay, very well, my lord.
POLONIUS: "And in part him, but," you may say, "not well.
But if 't be he I mean, he's very wild,
Addicted so and so," and there put on° him
What forgeries° you please—marry, none so rank°
As may dishonor him, take heed of that,
But, sir, such wanton,° wild, and usual slips
As are companions noted and most known
To youth and liberty.
REYNALDO: As gaming, my lord.
POLONIUS: Ay, or drinking, fencing, swearing,
Quarreling, drabbing°—you may go so far.

192 do . . . you entrust myself to you. 194 friending friendliness. 195 lack be lacking. 196 still always. 197 The time the state of affairs; spite i.e., the spite of Fortune. 199 let's go together (probably they wait for him to leave first, but he refuses this ceremoniousness.) [2.1] Location: Polonius' chambers. 3 marvelous marvelously. 4 inquire inquiry. 7 Danskers Danes. 8 what means what wealth (they have); keep dwell. 10 encompassment roundabout talking; drift gradual approach or course. 11–12 come . . . it you will find out more this way than by asking pointed questions (particular demands). 13 Take you assume, pretend. 19 put on impute to. 20 forgeries invented tales; rank gross. 22 wanton sportive, unrestrained. 27 drabbing whoring.

REYNALDO: My lord, that would dishonor him.
POLONIUS: Faith, no, as you may season° it in the charge.
You must not put another scandal on him
That he is open to incontinency;°
That's not my meaning. But breathe his faults so quaintly°
That they may seem the taints of liberty,°
The flash and outbreak of a fiery mind,
A savageness in unreclaimèd blood,
Of general assault.°
REYNALDO: But, my good lord—
POLONIUS: Wherefore should you do this?
REYNALDO: Ay, my lord, I would know that.
POLONIUS: Marry, sir, here's my drift,
And I believe it is a fetch of warrant.°
You laying these slight sullies on my son,
As 'twere a thing a little soiled wi' the working,°
Mark you,
Your party in converse,° him you would sound,°
Having ever° seen in the prenominate crimes°
The youth you breathe° of guilty, be assured
He closes with you in this consequence:°
"Good sir," or so, or "friend," or "gentleman,"
According to the phrase or the addition°
Of man and country.
REYNALDO: Very good, my lord.
POLONIUS: And then, sir, does 'a this—'a does—what was I about to say? By the Mass, I was about to say something. Where did I leave?
REYNALDO: At "closes in the consequence."
POLONIUS: At "closes in the consequence," ay, marry.
He closes thus: "I know the gentleman,
I saw him yesterday," or "th' other day,"
Or then, or then, with such or such, "and as you say,
There was 'a gaming," "there o'ertook in 's rouse,"°
"There falling out° at tennis," or perchance
"I saw him enter such a house of sale,"
Videlicet° a brothel, or so forth. See you now,
Your bait of falsehood takes this carp° of truth;
And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,°
With windlasses° and with assays of bias,°

29 season temper, soften. 31 incontinency habitual sexual excess. 32 quaintly artfully, subtly. 33 taints of liberty faults resulting from free living. 35–36 A savageness . . . assault a wildness in untamed youth that assails all indiscriminately. 41 fetch of warrant legitimate trick. 43 soiled wi' the working soiled by handling while it is being made, i.e., by involvement in the ways of the world. 45 converse conversation; sound i.e., sound out. 46 Having ever if he has ever; prenominate crimes before-mentioned offenses. 47 breathe speak. 48 closes . . . consequence takes you into his confidence in some fashion, as follows. 50 addition title. 59 o'ertook in 's rouse overcome by drink. 60 falling out quarreling. 62 Videlicet namely. 63 carp a fish. 64 reach capacity, ability. 65 windlasses i.e., circuitous paths. (Literally, circuits made to head off the game in hunting); assays of bias attempts through indirection (like the curving path of the bowling ball, which is biased or weighted to one side).

By indirections find directions° out.
So by my former lecture and advice
Shall you my son. You have° me, have you not?
REYNALDO: My lord, I have.
POLONIUS: God b'wi'° ye; fare ye well.
REYNALDO: Good my lord.
POLONIUS: Observe his inclination in yourself.°
REYNALDO: I shall, my lord.
POLONIUS: And let him ply his music.
REYNALDO: Well, my lord.
POLONIUS: Farewell. Exit REYNALDO.

Enter OPHELIA.

How now, Ophelia, what's the matter?
OPHELIA: O my lord, my lord, I have been so affrighted!
POLONIUS: With what, i' the name of God?
OPHELIA: My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,°
Lord Hamlet, with his doublet° all unbraced,°
No hat upon his head, his stockings fouled,
Ungartered, and down-gyvèd° to his ankle,
Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other,
And with a look so piteous in purport°
As if he had been loosèd out of hell
To speak of horrors—he comes before me.
POLONIUS: Mad for thy love?
OPHELIA: My lord, I do not know,
But truly I do fear it.
POLONIUS: What said he?
OPHELIA: He took me by the wrist and held me hard.
Then goes he to the length of all his arm,
And, with his other hand thus o'er his brow
He falls to such perusal of my face
As° 'a would draw it. Long stayed he so.
At last, a little shaking of mine arm
And thrice his head thus waving up and down,
He raised a sigh so piteous and profound
As it did seem to shatter all his bulk°
And end his being. That done, he lets me go,
And with his head over his shoulder turned
He seemed to find his way without his eyes,
For out o' doors he went without their helps,
And to the last bended their light on me.
POLONIUS: Come, go with me. I will go seek the King.
This is the very ecstasy° of love,
Whose violent property° fordoes° itself
And leads the will to desperate undertakings

66 directions i.e., the way things really are. 68 have understand. 69 b' wi' be with. 71 in yourself in your own person (as well as by asking questions). 78 closet private chamber. 79 doublet close-fitting jacket; unbraced unfastened. 81 down-gyvèd fallen to the ankles (like gyves or fetters). 83 in purport in what it expressed. 92 As as if (also in line 97). 96 bulk body. 103 ecstasy madness. 104 property nature; fordoes destroys.

As oft as any passion under heaven
That does afflict our natures. I am sorry.
What, have you given him any hard words of late?
OPHELIA: No, my good lord, but as you did command
I did repel his letters and denied
His access to me.
POLONIUS: That hath made him mad.
I am sorry that with better heed and judgment
I had not quoted° him. I feared he did but trifle
And meant to wrack° thee. But beshrew my jealousy!°
By heaven, it is as proper to our age°
To cast beyond° ourselves in our opinions
As it is common for the younger sort
To lack discretion. Come, go we to the King.
This must be known,° which, being kept close,° might move
More grief to hide than hate to utter love.°
Come. Exeunt.

[2.2]

Flourish. Enter KING and QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN [with others].

KING: Welcome, dear Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.
Moreover that° we much did long to see you,
The need we have to use you did provoke
Our hasty sending. Something have you heard
Of Hamlet's transformation—so call it,
Sith nor° th' exterior nor the inward man
Resembles that° it was. What it should be,
More than his father's death, that thus hath put him
So much from th' understanding of himself,
I cannot dream of. I entreat you both
That, being of so young days° brought up with him,
And sith so neighbored to° his youth and havior,°
That you vouchsafe your rest° here in our court
Some little time, so by your companies
To draw him on to pleasures, and to gather
So much as from occasion° you may glean,
Whether aught to us unknown afflicts him thus
That, opened,° lies within our remedy.

113 quoted observed. 114 wrack ruin, seduce; beshrew my jealousy a plague upon my suspicious nature. 115 proper . . . age characteristic of us (old) men. 116 cast beyond over-shoot, miscalculate. (A metaphor from hunting.) 119 known made known (to the King); close secret. 119–20 might . . . love i.e., might cause more grief (because of what Hamlet might do) by hiding the knowledge of Hamlet's strange behavior toward Ophelia than unpleasantness by telling it. [2.2] Location: The castle. 2 Moreover that besides the fact that. 6 Sith nor since neither. 7 that what. 11 of . . . days From such early youth. 12 And sith so neighbored to and since you are (or, and since that time you are) intimately acquainted with; havior demeanor. 13 vouchsafe your rest please to stay. 16 occasion opportunity. 18 opened being revealed.

QUEEN: Good gentlemen, he hath much talked of you,
And sure I am two men there is not living
To whom he more adheres. If it will please you
To show us so much gentry° and good will
As to expend your time with us awhile
For the supply and profit of our hope,°
Your visitation shall receive such thanks
As fits a king's remembrance.°
ROSENCRANTZ: Both Your Majesties
Might, by the sovereign power you have of° us,
Put your dread° pleasures more into command
Than to entreaty.
GUILDENSTERN: But we both obey,
And here give up ourselves in the full bent°
To lay our service freely at your feet,
To be commanded.
KING: Thanks, Rosencrantz and gentle Guildenstern.
QUEEN: Thanks, Guildenstern and gentle Rosencrantz.
And I beseech you instantly to visit
My too much changèd son. Go, some of you,
And bring these gentlemen where Hamlet is.
GUILDENSTERN: Heavens make our presence and our practices°
Pleasant and helpful to him!
QUEEN: Ay, amen!
Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN [with some attendants].

Enter POLONIUS.

POLONIUS: Th' ambassadors from Norway, my good lord,
Are joyfully returned.
KING: Thou still° hast been the father of good news.
POLONIUS: Have I, my lord? I assure my good liege
I hold° my duty, as° I hold my soul,
Both to my God and to my gracious king;
And I do think, or else this brain of mine
Hunts not the trail of policy° so sure
As it hath used to do, that I have found
The very cause of Hamlet's lunacy.
KING: O, speak of that! That do I long to hear.
POLONIUS: Give first admittance to th' ambassadors.
My news shall be the fruit° to that great feast.
KING: Thyself do grace° to them and bring them in. [Exit POLONIUS.]
He tells me, my dear Gertrude, he hath found
The head and source of all your son's distemper.
QUEEN: I doubt° it is no other but the main,°
His father's death and our o'erhasty marriage.

22 gentry courtesy. 24 supply . . . hope aid and furtherance of what we hope for. 26 As fits . . . remembrance as would be a fitting gift of a king who rewards true service. 27 of over. 28 dread inspiring awe. 30 in . . . bent to the utmost degree of our capacity. (An archery metaphor.) 38 practices doings. 42 still always. 44 hold maintain; as firmly as. 47 policy sagacity. 52 fruit dessert. 53 grace honor (punning on grace said before a feast, line 52.) 56 doubt fear, suspect; main chief point, principal concern.

Enter Ambassadors VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS, with POLONIUS.

KING: Well, we shall sift him.°—Welcome, my good friends!
Say, Voltimand, what from our brother° Norway?
VOLTIMAND: Most fair return of greetings and desires.°
Upon our first,° he sent out to suppress
His nephew's levies, which to him appeared
To be a preparation 'gainst the Polack,
But, better looked into, he truly found
It was against Your Highness. Whereat grieved
That so his sickness, age, and impotence°
Was falsely borne in hand,° sends out arrests°
On Fortinbras, which he, in brief, obeys,
Receives rebuke from Norway, and in fine°
Makes vow before his uncle never more
To give th' assay° of arms against Your Majesty.
Whereon old Norway, overcome with joy,
Gives him three thousand crowns in annual fee
And his commission to employ those soldiers,
So levied as before, against the Polack,
With an entreaty, herein further shown, [giving a paper]
That it might please you to give quiet pass
Through your dominions for this enterprise
On such regards of safety and allowance°
As therein are set down.
KING: It likes° us well,
And at our more considered° time we'll read,
Answer, and think upon this business.
Meantime we thank you for your well-took labor.
Go to your rest; at night we'll feast together.
Most welcome home! Exeunt Ambassadors.
POLONIUS: This business is well ended.
My liege, and madam, to expostulate°
What majesty should be, what duty is,
Why day is day, night night, and time is time,
Were nothing but to waste night, day, and time.
Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit,°
And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,
I will be brief. Your noble son is mad.
Mad call I it, for, to define true madness,
What is't but to be nothing else but mad?
But let that go.
QUEEN: More matter, with less art.

58 sift him question Polonius closely. 59 brother fellow king. 60 desires good wishes. 61 Upon our first at our first words on the business. 66 impotence helplessness. 67 borne in hand deluded, taken advantage of; arrests orders to desist. 69 in fine in conclusion. 71 give th' assay make trial of strength, challenge. 78 On . . . allowance i.e., with such considerations for the safety of Denmark and permission for Fortinbras. 80 likes pleases. 81 considered suitable for deliberation. 86 expostulate expound, inquire into. 90 wit sense or judgment.

POLONIUS: Madam, I swear I use no art at all.
That he's mad, 'tis true; 'tis true tis pity.
And pity 'tis 'tis true—a foolish figure,°
But farewell it, for I will use no art.
Mad let us grant him, then, and now remains
That we find out the cause of this effect,
Or rather say, the cause of this defect,
For this effect defective comes by cause.°
Thus it remains, and the remainder thus.
Perpend.°
I have a daughter—have while she is mine—
Who, in her duty and obedience, mark,
Hath given me this. Now gather and surmise.°
[He reads the letter.] "To the celestial and my soul's idol, the most beautified Ophelia"—
That's an ill phrase, a vile phrase; "beautified" is a vile phrase. But you shall hear. Thus: [He reads.]
"In her excellent white bosom,° these,° etc."
QUEEN: Came this from Hamlet to her?
POLONIUS: Good madam, stay° awhile, I will be faithful.° [He reads.]

"Doubt thou the stars are fire,
Doubt that the sun doth move,
Doubt° truth to be a liar,
But never doubt I love.

O dear Ophelia, I am ill at these numbers.° I have not art to reckon° my groans. But that I love thee best, O most best, believe it. Adieu.
Thine evermore, most dear lady, whilst this machine° is to him,
Hamlet."

This in obedience hath my daughter shown me,
And, more above,° hath his solicitings,
As they fell out° by° time, by means, and place,
All given to mine ear.°
KING: But how hath she Received his love?
POLONIUS: What do you think of me?
KING: As of a man faithful and honorable.
POLONIUS: I would fain° prove so. But what might you think,
When I had seen this hot love on the wing—
As I perceived it, I must tell you that,
Before my daughter told me—what might you,
Or my dear Majesty your queen here, think,
If I had played the desk or table book,°
Or given my heart a winking,° mute and dumb,

98 figure figure of speech. 103 For . . . cause i.e., for this defective behavior, his madness, has a cause. 105 Perpend consider. 108 gather and surmise draw your own conclusions. 113 In . . . bosom (The letter is poetically addressed to her heart.); these i.e., the letter. 115 stay wait; faithful i.e., in reading the letter accurately. 118 Doubt suspect. 120 ill . . . numbers unskilled at writing verses; reckon (1) count, (2) number metrically, scan. 122 machine i.e., body. 124 more above moreover. 125 fell out occurred; by according to. 126 given . . . ear i.e., told me about. 129 fain gladly. 134 played . . . table book i.e., remained shut up, concealing the information. 135 given . . . winking closed the eyes of my heart to this.

Or looked upon this love with idle sight?°
What might you think? No, I went round° to work,
And my young mistress thus I did bespeak:°
"Lord Hamlet is a prince out of thy star;°
This must not be." And then I prescripts° gave her,
That she should lock herself from his resort,°
Admit no messengers, receive no tokens.
Which done, she took the fruits of my advice;
And he, repellèd—a short tale to make—
Fell into a sadness, then into a fast,
Thence to a watch,° thence into a weakness,
Thence to a lightness,° and by this declension°
Into the madness wherein now he raves,
And all we° mourn for.

KING [to the QUEEN]: Do you think 'tis this?

QUEEN: It may be, very like.

POLONIUS: Hath there been such a time—I would fain know that—
That I have positively said "'Tis so,"
When it proved otherwise?

KING: Not that I know.

POLONIUS: Take this from this,° if this be otherwise.
If circumstances lead me, I will find
Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the center.°

KING: How may we try° it further?

POLONIUS: You know sometimes he walks four hours together
Here in the lobby.

QUEEN: So he does indeed.

POLONIUS: At such a time I'll loose° my daughter to him.
Be you and I behind an arras° then.
Mark the encounter. If he love her not
And be not from his reason fall'n thereon,°
Let me be no assistant for a state,
But keep a farm and carters.°

KING: We will try it.

Enter HAMLET [reading on a book].

QUEEN: But look where sadly° the poor wretch comes reading.

POLONIUS: Away, I do beseech you both, away.
I'll board° him presently.° O, give me leave.°

136 with idle sight complacently or incomprehendingly. 137 round roundly, plainly. 138 bespeak address. 139 out of thy star above your sphere, position. 140 prescripts orders. 141 his resort his visits. 146 watch state of sleeplessness. 147 lightness lightheadedness; declension decline, deterioration (with a pun on the grammatical sense). 149 all we all of us, or, into everything that we. 154 Take this from this (The actor probably gestures, indicating that he means his head from his shoulders, or his staff of office or chain from his hands or neck, or something similar.) 157 center middle point of the earth (which is also the center of the Ptolemaic universe); try test, judge. 160 loose (as one might release an animal that is being mated.) 161 arras hanging, tapestry. 163 thereon on that account. 165 carters wagon drivers. 166 sadly seriously. 168 board accost; presently at once; give me leave i.e., excuse me, leave me alone. (Said to those he hurries offstage, including the King and Queen.)

Exeunt KING and QUEEN [with attendants].

How does my good Lord Hamlet?

HAMLET: Well, God-a-mercy.°

POLONIUS: Do you know me, my lord?

HAMLET: Excellent well. You are a fishmonger.°

POLONIUS: Not I, my lord.

HAMLET: Then I would you were so honest a man.

POLONIUS: Honest, my lord?

HAMLET: Ay, sir. To be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

POLONIUS: That's very true, my lord.

HAMLET: For if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a good kissing carrion°—Have you a daughter?

POLONIUS: I have, my lord.

HAMLET: Let her not walk i' the sun.° Conception° is a blessing, but as your daughter may conceive, friend, look to 't.

POLONIUS [aside]: How say you by that? Still harping on my daughter. Yet he knew me not at first; 'a° said I was a fishmonger. 'A is far gone. And truly in my youth I suffered much extremity for love, very near this. I'll speak to him again.—What do you read, my lord?

HAMLET: Words, words, words.

POLONIUS: What is the matter,° my lord?

HAMLET: Between who?

POLONIUS: I mean, the matter that you read, my lord.

HAMLET: Slanders, sir; for the satirical rogue says here that old men have gray beards, that their faces are wrinkled, their eyes purging° thick amber° and plum-tree gum, and that they have a plentiful lack of wit,° together with most weak hams. All which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe, yet I hold it not honesty° to have it thus set down, for yourself, sir, shall grow old° as I am, if like a crab you could go backward.

POLONIUS [aside]: Though this be madness, yet there is method in 't.—Will you walk out of the air,° my lord?

HAMLET: Into my grave.

POLONIUS: Indeed, that's out of the air. [Aside.] How pregnant° sometimes his replies are! A happiness° that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously° be delivered of. I will leave him and suddenly° contrive the means of meeting between him and my daughter.—My honorable lord, I will most humbly take my leave of you.

HAMLET: You cannot, sir, take from me anything that I will more willingly part withal°—except my life, except my life, except my life.

170 God-a-mercy God have mercy, i.e., thank you. 172 fishmonger fish merchant. 179 a good kissing carrion i.e., a good piece of flesh for kissing, or for the sun to kiss. 182 i' the sun in public (with additional implication of the sunshine of princely favors); Conception (1) understanding, (2) pregnancy. 185 'a he. 189 matter substance. (But Hamlet plays on the sense of "basis for a dispute.") 193 purging discharging; amber i.e., resin, like the resinous plum-tree gum. 194 wit understanding. 196 honesty decency, decorum. 197 old as old. 199 out of the air (The open air was considered dangerous for sick people.) 201 pregnant quick-witted, full of meaning. 202 happiness felicity of expression. 203 prosperously successfully. 204 suddenly immediately. 207 withal with.

Enter GUILDENSTERN and ROSENCRANTZ.

POLONIUS: Fare you well, my lord.
HAMLET: These tedious old fools!°
POLONIUS: You go to seek the Lord Hamlet. There he is.
ROSENCRANTZ [to POLONIUS]: God save you, sir! [Exit POLONIUS.]
GUILDENSTERN: My honored lord!
ROSENCRANTZ: My most dear lord!
HAMLET: My excellent good friends! How dost thou, Guildenstern? Ah, Rosencrantz! Good lads, how do you both?
ROSENCRANTZ: As the indifferent° children of the earth.
GUILDENSTERN: Happy in that we are not overhappy.
On Fortune's cap we are not the very button.
HAMLET: Nor the soles of her shoe?
ROSENCRANTZ: Neither, my lord.
HAMLET: Then you live about her waist, or in the middle of her favors?°
GUILDENSTERN: Faith, her privates we.°
HAMLET: In the secret parts of Fortune? O, most true, she is a strumpet.° What news?
ROSENCRANTZ: None, my lord, but the world's grown honest.
HAMLET: Then is doomsday near. But your news is not true. Let me question more in particular. What have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of Fortune that she sends you to prison hither?
GUILDENSTERN: Prison, my lord?
HAMLET: Denmark's a prison.
ROSENCRANTZ: Then is the world one.
HAMLET: A goodly one, in which there are many confines,° wards,° and dungeons, Denmark being one o' the worst.
ROSENCRANTZ: We think not so, my lord.
HAMLET: Why then 'tis none to you, for there is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so. To me it is a prison.
ROSENCRANTZ: Why then, your ambition makes it one. 'Tis too narrow for your mind.
HAMLET: O God, I could be bounded in a nutshell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams.
GUILDENSTERN: Which dreams indeed are ambition, for the very substance of the ambitious° is merely the shadow of a dream.
HAMLET: A dream itself is but a shadow.
ROSENCRANTZ: Truly, and I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow's shadow.
HAMLET: Then are our beggars bodies,° and our monarchs and outstretched° heroes the beggars' shadows. Shall we to the court? For, by my fay,° I cannot reason.

209 old fools i.e., old men like Polonius. 216 indifferent ordinary, at neither extreme of fortune or misfortune. 221 favors i.e., sexual favors. 222 her privates we i.e., (1) we are sexually intimate with Fortune, the fickle goddess who bestows her favors indiscriminately, (2) we are her private citizens. 223 strumpet prostitute. (A common epithet for indiscriminate Fortune; see line 449.) 232 confines places of confinement; wards cells. 240–41 the very . . . ambitious that seemingly very substantial thing that the ambitious pursue. 245 bodies i.e., solid substances rather than shadows (since beggars are not ambitious). outstretched (1) far-reaching in their ambition, (2) elongated as shadows. 246 fay faith.

ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN: We'll wait upon° you.

HAMLET: No such matter. I will not sort° you with the rest of my servants, for, to speak to you like an honest man, I am most dreadfully attended.° But, in the beaten way° of friendship, what make° you at Elsinore?

ROSENCRANTZ: To visit you, my lord, no other occasion.

HAMLET: Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks; but I thank you, and sure, dear friends, my thanks are too dear a halfpenny.° Were you not sent for? Is it your own inclining? Is it a free° visitation? Come, come, deal justly with me. Come, come. Nay, speak.

GUILDENSTERN: What should we say, my lord?

HAMLET: Anything but to the purpose.° You were sent for, and there is a kind of confession in your looks which your modesties° have not craft enough to color.° I know the good King and Queen have sent for you.

ROSENCRANTZ: To what end, my lord?

HAMLET: That you must teach me. But let me conjure° you, by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth,° by the obligation of our ever-preserved love, and by what more dear a better° proposer could charge° you withal, be even° and direct with me whether you were sent for or no.

ROSENCRANTZ [aside to GUILDENSTERN]: What say you?

HAMLET [aside]: Nay, then, I have an eye of° you.—If you love me, hold not off.°

GUILDENSTERN: My lord, we were sent for.

HAMLET: I will tell you why; so shall my anticipation prevent your discovery,° and your secrecy to the King and Queen molt no feather,° I have of late—but wherefore I know not—lost all my mirth, forgone all custom of exercises; and indeed it goes so heavily with my disposition that this goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory; this most excellent canopy, the air, look you, this brave° o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted° with golden fire, why, it appeareth nothing to me but a foul and pestilent congregation° of vapors. What a piece of work° is a man! How noble in reason, how infinite in faculties, in form and moving how express° and admirable, in action how like an angel, in apprehension° how like a god! The beauty of the world, the paragon of animals! And yet, to me, what is this quintessence° of dust? Man delights not me—no, nor woman neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so.

ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, there was no such stuff in my thoughts.

HAMLET: Why did you laugh, then, when I said man delights not me?

248 wait upon accompany, attend. (But Hamlet uses the phrase in the sense of providing menial service.) 249 sort class, categorize. 250 dreadfully attended waited upon in slovenly fashion. 251 beaten way familiar path, tried-and-true course; make do. 254 too dear a halfpenny (1) too expensive at even a halfpenny, i.e., of little worth, (2) too expensive by a halfpenny in return for worthless kindness. 255 free voluntary. 258 Anything but to the purpose anything except a straightforward answer. (Said ironically.) 259 modesties sense of shame. 260 color disguise. 262 conjure adjure, entreat. 263 the consonancy of our youth our closeness in our younger days. 264 better more skillful; charge urge. 265 even straight, honest. 267 of on; hold not off don't hold back. 269 so . . . discovery in that way my saying it first will spare you from revealing the truth. 270 molt no feather i.e., not diminish in the least. 274 brave splendid. 275 fretted adorned (with fretwork, as in a vaulted ceiling). 276 congregation mass; piece of work masterpiece. 278 express well-framed, exact, expressive. 278 apprehension power of comprehending. 280 quintessence the fifth essence of ancient philosophy, beyond earth, water, air, and fire, supposed to be the substance of the heavenly bodies and to be latent in all things.

ROSENCRANTZ: To think, my lord, if you delight not in man, what Lenten entertainment° the players shall receive from you. We coted° them on the way, and hither are they coming to offer you service.

HAMLET: He that plays the king shall be welcome; His Majesty shall have tribute° of° me. The adventurous knight shall use his foil and target,° the lover shall not sigh gratis,° the humorous man° shall end his part in peace,° the clown shall make those laugh whose lungs are tickle o' the sear,° and the lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt° for 't. What players are they?

ROSENCRANTZ: Even those you were wont to take such delight in, the tragedians° of the city.

HAMLET: How chances it they travel? Their residence,° both in reputation and profit, was better both ways.

ROSENCRANTZ: I think their inhibition° comes by the means of the late° innovation.°

HAMLET: Do they hold the same estimation they did when I was in the city? Are they so followed?

ROSENCRANTZ: No, indeed are they not.

HAMLET: How comes it? Do they grow rusty?

ROSENCRANTZ: Nay, their endeavor keeps° in the wonted° pace. But there is, sir, an aerie° of children, little eyases,° that cry out on the top of question° and are most tyrannically° clapped for 't. These are now the fashion, and so berattle° the common stages°—so they call them—that many wearing rapiers° are afraid of goose quills° and dare scarce come thither.

HAMLET: What, are they children? Who maintains 'em? How are they escoted?° Will they pursue the quality° no longer than they can sing?° Will they not say afterwards, if they should grow themselves to common° players—as it is most like,° if their means are no better°—their writers do them wrong to make them exclaim against their own succession?°

ROSENCRANTZ: Faith, there has been much to-do° on both sides, and the nation holds it no sin to tar° them to controversy. There was for a while no money bid for argument unless the poet and the player went to cuffs in the question.°

HAMLET: Is 't possible?

284–85 Lenten entertainment meager reception (appropriate to Lent); coted overtook and passed by. 287 tribute (1) applause, (2) homage paid in money. 288 of from; foil and target sword and shield. 289 gratis for nothing; humorous man eccentric character, dominated by one trait or "humor"; in peace i.e., with full license. 290 tickle o' the sear easy on the trigger, ready to laugh easily. (A sear is part of a gunlock.) 291 halt limp. 293 tragedians actors. 295 residence remaining in their usual place, i.e., in the city. 297 inhibition formal prohibition (from acting plays in the city); late recent; innovation i.e., the new fashion in satirical plays performed by boy actors in the "private" theaters; or possibly a political uprising; or the strict limitations set on theaters in London in 1600. 302 keeps continues; wonted usual. 303 aerie nest; eyases young hawks; cry . . . question speak shrilly, dominating the controversy (in decrying the public theaters). 304 tyrannically outrageously. 305 berattle berate, clamor against; common stages public theaters. 305–06 many wearing rapiers i.e., many men of fashion, afraid to patronize the common players for fear of being satirized by the poets writing for the boy actors; goose quills i.e., pens of satirists. 307 escoted maintained. 308 quality (acting) profession; no longer . . . sing i.e., only until their voices change. 309 common regular, adult. 310 like likely; if . . . better if they find no better way to support themselves. 311 succession i.e., future careers. 312 to-do ado. 313 tar set on (as dogs). 313–14 There . . . question i.e., for a while, no money was offered by the acting companies to playwrights for the plot to a play unless the satirical poets who wrote for the boys and the adult actors came to blows in the play itself.

GUILDENSTERN: O, there has been much throwing about of brains.
HAMLET: Do the boys carry it away?°
ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, that they do, my lord—Hercules and his load° too.°
HAMLET: It is not very strange; for my uncle is King of Denmark, and those that would make mouths° at him while my father lived give twenty, forty, fifty, a hundred ducats° apiece for his picture in little.° 'Sblood,° there is something in this more than natural, if philosophy° could find it out.

A flourish [of trumpets within].

GUILDENSTERN: There are the players.
HAMLET: Gentlemen, you are welcome to Elsinore. Your hands, come then. Th' appurtenance° of welcome is fashion and ceremony. Let me comply° with you in this garb,° lest my extent° to the players, which, I tell you, must show fairly outwards,° should more appear like entertainment° than yours. You are welcome. But my uncle-father and aunt-mother are deceived.
GUILDENSTERN: In what, my dear lord?
HAMLET: I am but mad north-north-west.° When the wind is southerly I know a hawk from a handsaw.°

Enter POLONIUS.

POLONIUS: Well be with you, gentlemen!
HAMLET: Hark you, Guildenstern, and you too; at each ear a hearer. That great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling clouts.°
ROSENCRANTZ: Haply° he is the second time come to them, for they say an old man is twice a child.
HAMLET: I will prophesy he comes to tell me of the players. Mark it.—You say right, sir, o' Monday morning, 'twas then indeed.
POLONIUS: My lord, I have news to tell you.
HAMLET: My lord, I have news to tell you. When Roscius° was an actor in Rome—
POLONIUS: The actors are come hither, my lord.
HAMLET: Buzz,° buzz!
POLONIUS: Upon my honor—
HAMLET: Then came each actor on his ass.
POLONIUS: The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable,° or poem unlimited.°

317 carry it away i.e., win the day. 318 Hercules . . . load (thought to be an allusion to the sign of the Globe Theatre, which was Hercules bearing the world on his shoulders.) 301–18 How . . . load too (The passage, omitted from the early quartos, alludes to the so-called War of the Theaters, 1599–1602, the rivalry between the children's companies and the adult actors.) 320 mouths faces. 321 ducats gold coins; in little in miniature; 'Sblood by God's (Christ's) blood. 322 philosophy i.e., scientific inquiry. 325 appurtenance proper accompaniment; comply observe the formalities of courtesy. 326 garb i.e., manner; my extent that which I extend, i.e., my polite behavior. 327 show fairly outwards show every evidence of cordiality; entertainment a (warm) reception. 331 north-north-west just off true north, only partly. 332 hawk, handsaw i.e., two very different things, though also perhaps meaning a mattock (or hack) and carpenter's cutting tools, respectively; also birds, with a play on hernshaw, or heron. 335 swaddling clouts cloths in which to wrap a newborn baby. 336 Haply perhaps. 341 Roscius a famous Roman actor who died in 62 BCE. 343 Buzz (an interjection used to denote stale news.) 348 scene individable a play observing the unity of place; or perhaps one that is unclassifiable, or performed without intermission; poem unlimited a play disregarding the unities of time and place; one that is all-inclusive.

Seneca° cannot be too heavy, nor Plautus° too light. For the law of writ and the liberty,° these° are the only men.

HAMLET: O Jephthah, judge of Israel,° what a treasure hadst thou!

POLONIUS: What a treasure had he, my lord?

HAMLET: Why,

"One fair daughter, and no more,
The which he lovèd passing° well."

POLONIUS [aside]: Still on my daughter.

HAMLET: Am I not i' the right, old Jephthah?

POLONIUS: If you call me Jephthah, my lord, I have a daughter that I love passing well.

HAMLET: Nay, that follows not.

POLONIUS: What follows then, my lord?

HAMLET: Why,

"As by lot,° God wot,"° and then, you know,

"It came to pass, as most like° it was"— the first row° of the pious chanson° will show you more, for look where my abridgement° comes.

Enter the PLAYERS.

You are welcome, masters; welcome, all. I am glad to see thee well. Welcome, good friends. O, old friend! Why, thy face is valanced° since I saw thee last. Com'st thou to beard° me in Denmark? What, my young lady° and mistress! By 'r Lady,° your ladyship is nearer to heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine.° Pray God your voice, like a piece of uncurrent° gold, be not cracked within the ring.° Masters, you are all welcome. We'll e'en to 't° like French falconers, fly at anything we see. We'll have a speech straight.° Come, give us a taste of your quality.° Come, a passionate speech.

FIRST PLAYER: What speech, my good lord?

HAMLET: I heard thee speak me a speech once, but it was never acted, or if it was, not above once, for the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviar to the general.° But it was—as I received it, and others, whose judgments in such matters cried in the top of° mine—an excellent play, well digested° in the scenes, set down with as much modesty° as cunning.° I remember one said there were no sallets° in the lines to make 349 Seneca writer of Latin tragedies; Plautus writer of Latin comedies. 349–50 law . . . liberty dramatic composition both according to the rules and disregarding the rules; these i.e., the actors. 351 Jephthah . . . Israel (Jephthah had to sacrifice his daughter; see Judges 11. Hamlet goes on to quote from a ballad on the theme.) 355 passing surpassingly. 363 lot chance; wot knows. 365 like likely, probable. 366 row stanza; chanson ballad, song. 367 my abridgement something that cuts short my conversation; also, a diversion. 369 valanced fringed (with a beard). 370 beard confront, challenge (with obvious pun). 370–71 young lady i.e., boy playing women's parts; By 'r Lady by Our Lady. 372 chopine thick-soled shoe of Italian fashion. 373 uncurrent not passable as lawful coinage; cracked . . . ring i.e., changed from adolescent to male voice, no longer suitable for women's roles. (Coins featured rings enclosing the sovereign's head; if the coin was cracked within this ring, it was unfit for currency.) 374 e'en to 't go at it. 375 straight at once. 376 quality professional skill. 380 caviar to the general caviar to the multitude, i.e., a choice dish too elegant for coarse tastes. 381 cried in the top of i.e., spoke with greater authority than. 382 digested arranged, ordered; modesty moderation, restraint. 383 cunning skill; sallets i.e., something savory, spicy improprieties.

the matter savory, nor no matter in the phrase that might indict° the author of affectation, but called it an honest method, as wholesome as sweet, and by very much more handsome° than fine.° One speech in 't I chiefly loved: 'twas Aeneas' tale to Dido, and thereabout of it especially when he speaks of Priam's slaughter.° If it live in your memory, begin at this line: let me see, let me see—

"The rugged Pyrrhus,° like th' Hyrcanian beast°"—

'Tis not so. It begins with Pyrrhus:

"The rugged° Pyrrhus, he whose sable° arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble
When he lay couchèd° in the ominous horse,°
Hath now this dread and black complexion smeared
With heraldry more dismal.° Head to foot
Now is he total gules,° horridly tricked°
With blood of fathers, mothers, daughters, sons,
Baked and impasted° with the parching streets,°
That lend a tyrannous° and a damnèd light
To their lord's° murder. Roasted in wrath and fire,
And thus o'ersizèd° with coagulate gore,
With eyes like carbuncles,° the hellish Pyrrhus Old grandsire Priam seeks."

So proceed you.

POLONIUS: 'Fore God, my lord, well spoken, with good accent and good discretion.

FIRST PLAYER: "Anon he finds him
Striking too short at Greeks. His antique° sword,
Rebellious to his arm, lies where it falls,
Repugnant° to command. Unequal matched,
Pyrrhus at Priam drives, in rage strikes wide,
But with the whiff and wind of his fell° sword
Th' unnervèd° father falls. Then senseless Ilium,°
Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top
Stoops to his° base, and with a hideous crash
Takes prisoner Pyrrhus' ear. For, lo! His sword,
Which was declining° on the milky° head

384 indict convict. 386 handsome well-proportioned; fine elaborately ornamented, showy. 388 Priam's slaughter the slaying of the ruler of Troy, when the Greeks finally took the city. 390 Pyrrhus a Greek hero in the Trojan War, also known as Neoptolemus, son of Achilles—another avenging son; Hyrcanian beast i.e., tiger. (On the death of Priam, see Virgil, Aeneid, 2.506 ff.; compare the whole speech with Marlowe's Dido Queen of Carthage, 2.1.214. ff. On the Hyrcanian tiger, see Aeneid, 4.366–67. Hyrcania is on the Caspian Sea.) 392 rugged shaggy, savage; sable black (for reasons of camouflage during the episode of the Trojan horse). 394 couchèd concealed; ominous horse fateful Trojan horse, by which the Greeks gained access to Troy. 396 dismal ill-omened. 397 total gules entirely red. (A heraldic term); tricked spotted and smeared. (Heraldic.) 399 impasted crusted, like a thick paste; with . . . streets by the parching heat of the streets (because of the fires everywhere). 400 tyrannous cruel. 401 their lord's i.e., Priam's. 402 o'ersizèd covered as with size or glue. 403 carbuncles large fiery-red precious stones thought to emit their own light. 408 antique ancient, long-used. 410 Repugnant disobedient, resistant. 412 fell cruel. 413 unnervèd strengthless; senseless Ilium inanimate citadel of Troy. 415 his its. 417 declining descending; milky white-haired.

Of reverend Priam, seemed i' th' air to stick.
So as a painted° tyrant Pyrrhus stood,
And, like a neutral to his will and matter,°
Did nothing.
But as we often see against° some storm
A silence in the heavens, the rack° stand still,
The bold winds speechless, and the orb° below
As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder
Doth rend the region,° so, after Pyrrhus' pause,
A rousèd vengeance sets him new a-work
And never did the Cyclops'° hammers fall
On Mars's armor forged for proof eterne°
With less remorse° than Pyrrhus' bleeding sword
Now falls on Priam.
Out, out, thou strumpet Fortune! All you gods
In general synod° take away her power!
Break all the spokes and fellies° from her wheel,
And bowl the round nave° down the hill of heaven°
As low as to the fiends!"

POLONIUS: This is too long.
HAMLET: It shall to the barber's with your beard.—Prithee, say on. He's for a jig° or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps. Say on; come to Hecuba.°
FIRST PLAYER: "But who, ah woe! had° seen the moblèd° queen"—
HAMLET: "The moblèd queen?"
POLONIUS: That's good. "Moblèd queen" is good.
FIRST PLAYER: "Run barefoot up and down, threat'ning the flames°
With bisson rheum,° a clout° upon that head
Where late° the diadem stood, and, for a robe,
About her lank and all o'erteemd° loins
A blanket, in the alarm of fear caught up—
Who this had seen, with tongue in venom steeped,
'Gainst Fortune's state° would treason have pronounced.°
But if the gods themselves did see her then
When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport
In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs,
The instant burst of clamor that she made,
Unless things mortal move them not at all,
Would have made milch° the burning eyes of heaven,°
And passion° in the gods."

419 painted i.e., painted in a picture. 420 like . . . matter i.e., as though suspended between his intention and its fulfullment. 422 against just before. 423 rack mass of clouds. 424 orb globe, earth. 426 region sky. 428 Cyclops giant armor makers in the smithy of Vulcan. 429 proof eterne eternal resistance to assault. 430 remorse pity. 433 synod assembly. 434 fellies pieces of wood forming the rim of a wheel. 435 nave hub; hill of heaven Mount Olympus. 438 jig comic song and dance often given at the end of a play. 439 Hecuba wife of Priam. 440 who . . . had anyone who had; moblèd muffled. 443 threat'ning the flames i.e., weeping hard enough to dampen the flames. 444 bisson rheum blinding tears; clout cloth. 445 late lately. 446 all o'erteemèd utterly worn out with bearing children. 449 state rule, managing; pronounced proclaimed. 455 milch milky, moist with tears; burning eyes of heaven i.e., heavenly bodies. 456 passion overpowering emotion.

POLONIUS: Look whe'er° he has not turned his color and has tears in 's eyes. Prithee, no more.

HAMLET: 'Tis well; I'll have thee speak out the rest of this soon.—Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?° Do you hear, let them be well used, for they are the abstract° and brief chronicles of the time. After your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live.

POLONIUS: My lord, I will use them according to their desert.

HAMLET: God's bodikin,° man, much better. Use every man after his desert, and who shall scape whipping? Use them after° your own honor and dignity. The less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty. Take them in.

POLONIUS: Come, sirs. [Exit.]

HAMLET: Follow him, friends. We'll hear a play tomorrow. [As they start to leave, HAMLET detains the FIRST PLAYER.] Dost thou hear me, old friend? Can you play The Murder of Gonzago?

FIRST PLAYER: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: We'll ha 't° tomorrow night. You could, for a need, study° a speech of some dozen or sixteen lines which I would set down and insert in 't, could you not?

FIRST PLAYER: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: Very well. Follow that lord, and look you mock him not. [Exeunt PLAYERS.] My good friends, I'll leave you till night. You are welcome to Elsinore.

ROSENCRANTZ: Good my lord! Exeunt [ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN].

HAMLET: Ay, so, goodbye to you.—Now I am alone.
O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I!
Is it not monstrous that this player here,
But° in a fiction, in a dream of passion,
Could force his soul so to his own conceit°
That from her working° all his visage wanned,°
Tears in his eyes, distraction in his aspect,°
A broken voice, and his whole function suiting
With forms to his conceit?° And all for nothing!
For Hecuba!
What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears
And cleave the general ear° with horrid° speech,
Make mad the guilty and appall° the free,°
Confound the ignorant,° and amaze° indeed
The very faculties of eyes and ears. Yet I,
A dull and muddy-mettled° rascal, peak°

457 whe'er whether. 460 bestowed lodged. 461 abstract summary account. 464 God's bodikin by God's (Christ's) little body, bodykin. (Not to be confused with bodkin, "dagger.") 465 after according to. 472 ha 't have it; study memorize. 482 But merely. 483 force . . . conceit bring his innermost being so entirely into accord with his conception (of the role). 484 from her working as a result of, or in response to, his soul's activity; wanned grew pale. 485 aspect look, glance. 486–87 his whole . . . conceit all his bodily powers responding with actions to suit his thought. 493 the general ear everyone's ear; horrid horrible. 494 appall (literally, make pale.); free innocent. 495 Confound the ignorant, i.e., dumbfound those who know nothing of the crime that has been committed; amaze stun. 497 muddy-mettled dull-spirited; peak mope, pine.

Like John-a-dreams,° unpregnant of° my cause,
And can say nothing—no, not for a king
Upon whose property° and most dear life
A damned defeat° was made. Am I a coward?
Who calls me villain? Breaks my pate° across?
Plucks off my beard and blows it in my face?
Tweaks me by the nose? Gives me the lie i' the throat°
As deep as to the lungs? Who does me this?
Ha, 'swounds,° I should take it; for it cannot be
But I am pigeon-livered° and lack gall
To make oppression bitter,° or ere this
I should ha' fatted all the region kites°
With this slave's offal.° Bloody, bawdy villain!
Remorseless,° treacherous, lecherous, kindless° villain!
O, vengeance!
Why, what an ass am I! This is most brave,°
That I, the son of a dear father murdered,
Prompted to my revenge by heaven and hell,
Must like a whore unpack my heart with words
And fall a-cursing, like a very drab,°
A scullion!° Fie upon 't, foh! About,° my brains!
Hum, I have heard
That guilty creatures sitting at a play
Have by the very cunning° of the scene°
Been struck so to the soul that presently°
They have proclaimed their malefactions;
For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
With most miraculous organ. I'll have these players
Play something like the murder of my father
Before mine uncle. I'll observe his looks;
I'll tent° him to the quick.° If 'a do blench,°
I know my course. The spirit that I have seen
May be the devil, and the devil hath power
T' assume a pleasing shape; yea, and perhaps,
Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
As he is very potent with such spirits,°
Abuses° me to damn me. I'll have grounds
More relative° than this. The play's the thing
Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the King. Exit.

498 John-a-dreams a sleepy, dreaming idler; unpregnant of not quickened by. 500 property i.e., the crown; also character, quality. 501 damned defeat damnable act of destruction. 502 pate head. 504 Gives . . . throat calls me an out-and-out liar. 506 'swounds by his (Christ's) wounds. 507 pigeon-livered (The pigeon or dove was popularly supposed to be mild because it secreted no gall.) 508 bitter i.e., bitter to me. 509 region kites kites (birds of prey) of the air. 510 offal entrails. 511 Remorseless pitiless; kindless unnatural. 513 brave fine, admirable. (Said ironically.) 517 drab whore. 518 scullion menial kitchen servant (apt to be foul-mouthed); About about it, to work. 521 cunning art, skill; scene dramatic presentation. 522 presently at once. 528 tent probe; the quick the tender part of a wound, the core; blench quail, flinch. 533 spirits humors (of melancholy). 534 Abuses deludes. 535 relative cogent, pertinent.

[3.1]

Enter KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, lords.

KING: And can you by no drift of conference°
Get from him why he puts on this confusion,
Grating so harshly all his days of quiet
With turbulent and dangerous lunacy?
ROSENCRANTZ: He does confess he feels himself distracted,
But from what cause 'a will by no means speak.
GUILDENSTERN: Nor do we find him forward° to be sounded,°
But with a crafty madness keeps aloof
When we would bring him on to some confession
Of his true state.
QUEEN: Did he receive you well?
ROSENCRANTZ: Most like a gentleman.
GUILDENSTERN: But with much forcing of his disposition.°
ROSENCRANTZ: Niggard° of question,° but of our demands
Most free in his reply.
QUEEN: Did you assay° him
To any pastime?
ROSENCRANTZ: Madam, it so fell out that certain players
We o'erraught° on the way. Of these we told him,
And there did seem in him a kind of joy
To hear of it. They are here about the court,
And, as I think, they have already order
This night to play before him.
POLONIUS: 'Tis most true,
And he beseeched me to entreat Your Majesties
To hear and see the matter.
KING: With all my heart, and it doth much content me
To hear him so inclined.
Good gentlemen, give him a further edge°
And drive his purpose into these delights.
ROSENCRANTZ: We shall, my lord. Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.
KING: Sweet Gertrude, leave us too
For we have closely° sent for Hamlet hither,
That he, as 'twere by accident, may here
Affront° Ophelia.
Her father and myself, lawful espials,°
Will so bestow ourselves that seeing, unseen,
We may of their encounter frankly judge,
And gather by him, as he is behaved,
If't be th' affliction of his love or no
That thus he suffers for.
QUEEN: I shall obey you.
And for your part, Ophelia, I do wish

[3.1] Location: The castle. 1 drift of conference directing of conversation. 7 forward willing; sounded questioned. 12 dispositon inclination. 13 Niggard stingy; question conversation. 14 assay try to win. 17 o'erraught overtook. 26 edge incitement. 29 closely privately. 31 Affront confront, meet. 32 espials spies.

That your good beauties be the happy cause
Of Hamlet's wildness. So shall I hope your virtues
Will bring him to his wonted° way again,
To both your honors.
OPHELIA: Madam, I wish it may. [Exit QUEEN.]
POLONIUS: Ophelia, walk you here.—Gracious,° so please you,
We will bestow° ourselves. [to OPHELIA.] Read on this book,
[giving her a book]
That show of such an exercise° may color°
Your loneliness.° We are oft to blame in this—
'Tis too much proved°—that with devotion's visage
And pious action we do sugar o'er
The devil himself.
KING [aside]: O 'tis too true!
How smart a lash that speech doth give my conscience!
The harlot's cheek, beautied with plastering art,
Is not more ugly to° the thing° that helps it
Than is my deed to my most painted word.
O heavy burden!
POLONIUS: I hear him coming. Let's withdraw, my lord.
[The KING and POLONIUS withdraw.°]
Enter HAMLET. [OPHELIA pretends to read a book.]
HAMLET: To be, or not to be, that is the question:
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The slings° and arrows of outrageous fortune,
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles
And by opposing end them. To die, to sleep—
No more—and by a sleep to say we end
The heartache and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to. 'Tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To die, to sleep;
To sleep, perchance to dream. Ay, there's the rub,°
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled° off this mortal coil,°
Must give us pause. There's the respect°
That makes calamity of so long life.°
For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
Th' oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,°
The pangs of disprized° love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office,° and the spurns°

41 wonted accustomed. 43 Gracious your Grace (i.e., the King). 44 bestow conceal. 45 exercise religious exercise. (The book she reads is one of devotion.); color give a plausible appearance to. 46 loneliness being alone. 47 too much proved too often shown to be true, too often practiced. 53 to compared to; the thing i.e., the cosmetic. 56 s.d. withdraw (The King and Polonius may retire behind an arras. The stage directions specify that they "enter" again near the end of the scene.) 59 slings missiles. 66 rub (literally, an obstacle in the game of bowls.) 68 shuffled sloughed, cast; coil turmoil. 69 respect consideration. 70 of . . . life so long-lived, something we willingly endure for so long (also suggesting that long life is itself a calamity). 72 contumely insolent abuse. 73 disprized unvalued. 74 office officialdom; spurns insults.

That patient merit of th' unworthy takes,° 75
When he himself might his quietus° make
With a bare bodkin?° Who would fardels° bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death,
The undiscovered country from whose bourn° 80
No traveler returns, puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear those ills we have
Than fly to others that we know not of?
Thus conscience does make cowards of us all;
And thus the native hue° of resolution 85
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast° of thought,
And enterprises of great pitch° and moment°
With this regard° their currents° turn awry
And lose the name of action.—Soft you° now,
The fair Ophelia. Nymph, in thy orisons° 90
Be all my sins remembered.

OPHELIA: Good my lord,
How does your honor for this many a day?

HAMLET: I humbly thank you; well, well, well.

OPHELIA: My lord, I have remembrances of yours,
That I have longèd long to redeliver. 95
I pray you, now receive them. [She offers tokens.]

HAMLET: No, not I, I never gave you aught.

OPHELIA: My honored lord, you know right well you did,
And with them words of so sweet breath composed
As made the things more rich. Their perfume lost, 100
Take these again, for to the noble mind
Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind.
There, my lord. [She gives tokens.]

HAMLET: Ha, ha! Are you honest?°

OPHELIA: My lord? 105

HAMLET: Are you fair?°

OPHELIA: What means your lordship?

HAMLET: That if you be honest and fair, your honesty° should admit no discourse to° your beauty.

OPHELIA: Could beauty, my lord, have better commerce° than with honesty? 110

HAMLET: Ay, truly, for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his° likeness. This was sometime° a paradox,° but now the time° gives it proof. I did love you once.

75 of . . . takes receives from unworthy persons. 76 quietus acquitance; here, death. 77 a bare bodkin a mere dagger, unsheathed; fardels burdens. 80 bourn frontier, boundary. 85 native hue natural color, complexion. 86 cast tinge, shade of color. 87 pitch height (as of a falcon's flight.); moment importance. 88 regard respect, consideration; currents courses. 89 Soft you i.e., wait a minute, gently. 90 orisons prayers. 104 honest (1) truthful, (2) chaste. 106 fair (1) beautiful, (2) just, honorable. 108 your honesty your chastity. 108–09 discourse to familiar dealings with. 110 commerce dealings, intercourse. 113 his its; sometime formerly; a paradox a view opposite to commonly held opinion; the time the present age.

OPHELIA: Indeed, my lord, you made me believe so.

HAMLET: You should not have believed me, for virtue cannot so inoculate° our old stock but we shall relish of it.° I loved you not.

OPHELIA: I was the more deceived.

HAMLET: Get thee to a nunnery.° Why wouldst thou be a breeder of sinners? I am myself indifferent honest,° but yet I could accuse me of such things that it were better my mother had not borne me: I am very proud, revengeful, ambitious, with more offenses at my beck° than I have thoughts to put them in, imagination to give them shape, or time to act them in. What should such fellows as I do crawling between earth and heaven? We are arrant knaves all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery. Where's your father?

OPHELIA: At home, my lord.

HAMLET: Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool nowhere but in's own house. Farewell.

OPHELIA: O, help him, you sweet heavens!

HAMLET: If thou dost marry, I'll give thee this plague for thy dowry: be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny. Get thee to a nunnery, farewell. Or, if thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool, for wise men know well enough what monsters° you° make of them. To a nunnery, go, and quickly too. Farewell.

OPHELIA: Heavenly powers, restore him!

HAMLET: I have heard of your paintings too, well enough. God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another. You jig,° you amble,° and you lisp, you nickname God's creatures,° and make your wantonness your ignorance.° Go to, I'll no more on 't;° it hath made me mad. I say we will have no more marriage. Those that are married already—all but one—shall live. The rest shall keep as they are. To a nunnery, go.

Exit.

OPHELIA: O, what a noble mind is here o'erthrown!
The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword,
Th' expectancy° and rose° of the fair state,
The glass of fashion and the mold of form,°
Th' observed of all observers,° quite, quite down!
And I, of ladies most deject and wretched,
That sucked the honey of his music° vows,
Now see that noble and most sovereign reason
Like sweet bells jangled out of tune and harsh,
That unmatched form and feature of blown° youth
Blasted° with ecstasy.° O, woe is me,
T' have seen what I have seen, see what I see!

116 inoculate graft, be engrafted to. 117 but . . . it that we do not still have about us a taste of the old stock, i.e., retain our sinfulness. 119 nunnery convent (with possibly an awareness that the word was also used derisively to denote a brothel). 120 indifferent honest reasonably virtuous. 122 beck command. 133 monsters (an illusion to the horns of a cuckold.); you i.e., you women. 137 jig dance; amble move coyly. 138 you nickname . . . creatures i.e., you give trendy names to things in place of their god-given names. 139 make . . . ignorance i.e., excuse your affectation on the grounds of pretended ignorance; on 't of it. 144 expectancy hope; rose ornament. 145 The glass . . . form the mirror of true fashioning and the pattern of courtly behavior. 146 Th' observed . . . observers i.e., the center of attention and honor in the court. 148 music musical, sweetly uttered. 151 blown blooming. 152 Blasted withered; ecstasy madness.

Enter KING and POLONIUS.

KING: Love? His affections° do not that way tend;
Nor what he spake, though it lacked form a little,
Was not like madness. There's something in his soul
O'er which his melancholy sits on brood,°
And I do doubt° the hatch and the disclose°
Will be some danger; which for to prevent,
I have in quick determination
Thus set it down:° he shall with speed to England
For the demand of° our neglected tribute.
Haply the seas and countries different
With variable objects° shall expel
This something-settled matter in his heart,° Whereon his brains still° beating puts him thus
From fashion of himself.° What think you on 't?
POLONIUS: It shall do well. But yet do I believe
The origin and commencement of his grief
Sprung from neglected love.—How now, Ophelia?
You need not tell us what Lord Hamlet said;
We heard it all.—My lord, do as you please,
But, if you hold it fit, after the play
Let his queen-mother° all alone entreat him
To show his grief. Let her be round° with him;
And I'll be placed, so please you, in the ear
Of all their conference. If she find him not,°
To England send him, or confine him where Your wisdom best shall think.
KING: It shall be so.
Madness in great ones must not unwatched go. Exeunt.

[3.2]

Enter HAMLET and three of the PLAYERS.

HAMLET: Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue. But if you mouth it, as many of our players° do, I had as lief° the town crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand, thus, but use all gently; for in the very torrent, tempest, and, as I may say, whirlwind of your passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness. O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious° periwig-pated° fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings,° who for the most part 154 affections emotions, feelings. 157 sits on brood sits like a bird on a nest, about to hatch mischief (line 169). 158 doubt fear; disclose disclosure, hatching. 161 set it down resolved. 162 For . . . of to demand. 164 variable objects various sights and surroundings to divert him. 165 This something . . . heart the strange matter settled in his heart. 166 still continually. 167 From . . . himself out of his natural manner. 174 queen-mother queen and mother. 175 round blunt. 177 find him not fails to discover what is troubling him. [3.2] Location: The castle. 2 our players players nowadays. 2–3 I had as lief I would just as soon. 7 robustious violent, boisterous; periwig-pated wearing a wig. 8 groundlings spectators who paid least and stood in the yard of the theater.

are capable of° nothing but inexplicable dumb shows° and noise. I would have such a fellow whipped for o'erdoing Termagant.° It out-Herods Herod.° Pray you, avoid it.

FIRST PLAYER: I warrant your honor.

HAMLET: Be not too tame neither, but let your own discretion be your tutor. Suit the action to the word, the word to the action, with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty° of nature. For anything so o'erdone is from° the purpose of playing, whose end, both at the first and now, was and is to hold as 't were the mirror up to nature, to show virtue her feature, scorn° her own image, and the very age and body of the time° his° form and pressure.° Now this overdone or come tardy off,° though it makes the unskillful° laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve, the censure of the which one° must in your allowance° o'erweigh a whole theater of others. O, there be players that I have seen play, and heard others praise, and that highly, not to speak it profanely,° that, neither having th' accent of Christians° nor the gait of Christian, pagan, nor man,° have so strutted and bellowed that I have thought some of nature's journeymen° had made men and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.°

FIRST PLAYER: I hope we have reformed that indifferently° with us, sir.

HAMLET: O, reform it altogether. And let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them; for there be of them° that will themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren° spectators to laugh too, though in the meantime some necessary question of the play be then to be considered. That's villainous, and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it. Go make you ready. [Exeunt PLAYERS.]

Enter POLONIUS, GUILENSTERN and ROSENCRANTZ.

How now, my lord, will the King hear this piece of work?

POLONIUS: And the Queen too, and that presently.°

HAMLET: Bid the players make haste. [Exit POLONIUS.]

Will you two help to hasten them?

ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, my lord. Exeunt they two.

HAMLET: What ho, Horatio!

Enter HORATIO.

HORATIO: Here, sweet lord, at your service.

9 capable of able to understand; dumb shows mimed performances, often used before Shakespeare's time to precede a play or each act. 10 Termagant a supposed deity of the Mohammedans, not found in any English medieval play but elsewhere portrayed as violent and blustering. 11 Herod Herod of Jewry. (A character in The Slaughter of the Innocents and other cycle plays. The part was played with great noise and fury.) 15 modesty restraint, moderation. 16 from contrary to. 18 scorn i.e., something foolish and deserving of scorn. 18–19 the very . . . time i.e., the present state of affairs; his its; pressure stamp, impressed character; come tardy off inadequately done. 20 the unskillful those lacking in judgment. 21 the censure . . . one the judgment of even one of whom; your allowance your scale of values. 23 not . . . profanely (Hamlet anticipates his idea in lines 25–27 that some men were not made by God at all.) 24 Christians i.e., ordinary decent folk. 24–25 nor man i.e., nor any human being at all. 26 journeymen laborers who are not yet masters in their trade. 27 abominably (Shakespeare's usual spelling, abhominably, suggests a literal though etymologically incorrect meaning, "removed from human nature.") 28 indifferently tolerably. 30 of them some among them. 31 barren i.e., of wit. 36 presently at once.

HAMLET: Horatio, thou art e'en as just a man
As e'er my conversation coped withal.°
HORATIO: O, my dear lord—
HAMLET: Nay, do not think I flatter,
For what advancement may I hope from thee
That no revenue hast but thy good spirits
To feed and clothe thee? Why should the poor be flattered?
No, let the candied° tongue lick absurd pomp,
And crook the pregnant° hinges of the knee
Where thrift° may follow fawning. Dost thou hear?
Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice
And could of men distinguish her election,°
Sh' hath sealed thee° for herself, for thou hast been
As one, in suffering all, that suffers nothing,
A man that Fortune's buffets and rewards
Hast ta'en with equal thanks; and blest are those Whose blood° and judgment are so well commeddled°
That they are not a pipe for Fortune's finger
To sound what stop° she please. Give me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,
As I do thee.—Something too much of this.—
There is a play tonight before the King.
One scene of it comes near the circumstance
Which I have told thee of my father's death.
I prithee, when thou seest that act afoot,
Even with the very comment of thy soul°
Observe my uncle. If his occulted° guilt
Do not itself unkennel° in one speech,
It is a damnéd° ghost that we have seen,
And my imaginations are as foul
As Vulcan's stithy.° Give him heedful note,
For I mine eyes will rivet to his face,
And after we will both our judgments join
In censure of his seeming.°
HORATIO: Well, my lord.
If 'a steal aught° the whilst this play is playing
And scape detecting, I will pay the theft.

[Flourish.] Enter trumpets and kettledrums, KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, [ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and other lords, with guards carrying torches].

HAMLET: They are coming to the play. I must be idle.°
Get you a place. [The KING, QUEEN, and courtiers sit.]

42 my . . . withal my dealings encountered. 47 candied sugared, flattering. 48 pregnant compliant. 49 thrift profit. 51 could . . . election could make distinguishing choices among persons. 52 sealed thee (literally, as one would seal a legal document to mark possession.) 56 blood passion; commeddled commingled. 58 stop hole in a wind instrument for controlling the sound. 66 very . . . soul your most penetrating observation and consideration. 67 occulted hidden. 68 unkennel (as one would say of a fox driven from its lair.) 69 damnéd in league with Satan. 71 stithy smithy, place of stiths (anvils). 74 censure of his seeming judgment of his appearance or behavior. 75 If 'a steal aught if he gets away with anything. 77 idle (1) unoccupied, (2) mad.

KING: How fares our cousin° Hamlet?
HAMLET: Excellent, i' faith, of the chameleon's dish:° I eat the air, promise-crammed. You cannot feed capons° so.
KING: I have nothing with° this answer, Hamlet. These words are not mine.°
HAMLET: No, nor mine now.° [To POLONIUS.] My lord, you played once i' th' university, you say?
POLONIUS: That did I, my lord, and was accounted a good actor.
HAMLET: What did you enact?
POLONIUS: I did enact Julius Caesar. I was killed i' the Capitol; Brutus killed me.
HAMLET: It was a brute° part° of him to kill so capital a calf° there.—Be the players ready?
ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, my lord. They stay upon° your patience.
QUEEN: Come hither, my dear Hamlet, sit by me.
HAMLET: No, good Mother, here's metal° more attractive.
POLONIUS [to the KING]: O, ho, do you mark that?
HAMLET: Lady, shall I lie in your lap? [Lying down at OPHELIA*'s feet.*]
OPHELIA: No, my lord.
HAMLET: I mean, my head upon your lap?
OPHELIA: Ay, my lord.
HAMLET: Do you think I meant country matters?°
OPHELIA: I think nothing, my lord.
HAMLET: That's a fair thought to lie between maids' legs.
OPHELIA: What is, my lord?
HAMLET: Nothing.°
OPHELIA: You are merry, my lord.
HAMLET: Who, I?
OPHELIA: Ay, my lord.
HAMLET: O God, your only jig maker.° What should a man do but be merry? For look you how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within 's° two hours.
OPHELIA: Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.
HAMLET: So long? Nay then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables.° O heavens! Die two months ago, and not forgotten yet? Then there's 79 cousin i.e., close relative. 80 chameleon's dish (Chameleons were supposed to feed on air. Hamlet deliberately misinterprets the King's fares as "feeds." By his phrase eat the air he also plays on the idea of feeding himself with the promise of succession, of being the heir.) 81 capons roosters castrated and crammed with feed to make them succulent. 82 have . . . with make nothing of, or gain nothing from; are not mine do not respond to what I asked. 83 nor mine now (once spoken, words are proverbially no longer the speaker's own—and hence should be uttered warily.) 88 brute (the Latin meaning of brutus, "stupid," was often used punningly with the name Brutus.); part (1) deed, (2) role; calf fool. 90 stay upon await. 92 metal substance that is attractive, i.e., magnetic, but with suggestion also of mettle, "disposition." 98 country matters sexual intercourse (making a bawdy pun on the first syllable of country). 102 Nothing the figure zero or naught, suggesting the female sexual anatomy. (Thing not infrequently has a bawdy connotation of male or female anatomy, and the reference here could be male.) 106 only jig maker very best composer of jigs, i.e., pointless merriment. (Hamlet replies sardonically to Ophelia's observation that he is merry by saying, "If you're looking for someone who is really merry, you've come to the right person.") 107 within 's within this (i.e., these). 110 suit of sables garments trimmed with the fur of the sable and hence suited for a wealthy person, not a mourner (but with a pun on sable, "black," ironically suggesting mourning once again).

hope a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year. But, by 'r Lady, 'a must build churches, then, or else shall 'a suffer not thinking on,° with the hobbyhorse, whose epitaph is

"For O, for O, the hobbyhorse is forgot."° 115

The trumpets sound. Dumb show follows.

Enter a King and a Queen [very lovingly]; the Queen embracing him, and he her. [She kneels, and makes show of protestation unto him.] He takes her up, and declines his head upon her neck. He lies him down upon a bank of flowers. She, seeing him asleep, leaves him. Anon comes in another man, takes off his crown, kisses it, pours poison in the sleeper's ears, and leaves him. The Queen returns, finds the King dead, makes passionate action. The Poisoner with some three or four come in again, seem to condole with her. The dead body is carried away. The Poisoner woos the Queen with gifts; she seems harsh awhile, but in the end accepts love.

[Exeunt PLAYERS.]

OPHELIA: What means this, my lord?

HAMLET: Marry, this' miching mallico;° it means mischief.

OPHELIA: Belike° this show imports the argument° of the play.

Enter PROLOGUE.

HAMLET: We shall know by this fellow. The players cannot keep counsel;° they'll tell all. 120

OPHELIA: Will 'a tell us what this show meant?

HAMLET: Ay, or any show that you will show him. Be not you° ashamed to show, he'll not shame to tell you what it means.

OPHELIA: You are naught,° you are naught. I'll mark the play.

PROLOGUE: For us, and for our tragedy, 125
Here stooping° to your clemency,
We beg your hearing patiently. [Exit.]

HAMLET: Is this a prologue, or the posy of a ring?°

OPHELIA: 'Tis brief, my lord.

HAMLET: As woman's love. 130

Enter [two PLAYERS as] King and Queen.

PLAYER KING: Full thirty times hath Phoebus' cart° gone round
Neptune's salt wash° and Tellus'° orbèd ground,
And thirty dozen moons with borrowed° sheen
About the world have times twelve thirties been,
Since love our hearts and Hymen° did our hands 135
Unite commutual° in most sacred bands.°

113–14 suffer . . . on undergo oblivion. 115 For . . . forgot (verse of a song occurring also in Love's Labour's Lost, 3.1.27–28. The hobbyhorse was a character made up to resemble a horse and rider, appearing in the morris dance and such May-game sports. This song laments the disappearance of such customs under pressure from the Puritans.) 117 this' miching mallico this is sneaking mischief. 118 Belike probably; argument plot. 119 counsel secret. 122 Be not you provided you are not. 124 naught indecent. (Ophelia is reacting to Hamlet's pointed remarks about not being ashamed to show all.) 126 stooping bowing. 128 posy . . . ring brief motto in verse inscribed in a ring. 131 Phoebus' cart the sun-god's chariot, making its yearly cycle. 132 salt wash the sea; Tellus goddess of the earth, of the orbèd ground. 133 borrowed i.e., reflected. 135 Hymen god of matrimony. 136 commutual mutually; bands bonds.

PLAYER QUEEN: So many journeys may the sun and moon
Make us again count o'er ere love be done!
But, woe is me, you are so sick of late,
So far from cheer and from your former state,
That I distrust° you. Yet, though I distrust, Discomfort° you, my lord, it nothing° must.
For women's fear and love hold quantity;°
In neither aught, or in extremity.°
Now, what my love is, proof° hath made you know,
And as my love is sized,° my fear is so.
Where love is great, the littlest doubts are fear;
Where little fears grow great, great love grows there.
PLAYER KING: Faith, I must leave thee, love, and shortly too;
My operant powers° their functions leave to do.°
And thou shalt live in this fair world behind,°
Honored, beloved; and haply one as kind
For husband shalt thou—
PLAYER QUEEN: O, confound the rest!
Such love must needs be treason in my breast.
In second husband let me be accurst!
None° wed the second but who° killed the first.
HAMLET: Wormwood,° wormwood.
PLAYER QUEEN: The instances° that second marriage move°
Are base respects of thrift,° but none of love.
A second time I kill my husband dead
When second husband kisses me in bed.
PLAYER KING: I do believe you think what now you speak,
But what we do determine oft we break.
Purpose is but the slave to memory,°
Of violent birth, but poor validity,°
Which° now, like fruit unripe, sticks on the tree,
But fall unshaken when they mellow be.
Most necessary 'tis that we forget
To pay ourselves what to ourselves is debt.°
What to ourselves in passion we propose,
The passion ending, doth the purpose lose.
The violence of either grief or joy
Their own enactures° with themselves destroy.
Where joy most revels, grief doth most lament;
Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident.°

141 distrust am anxious about. 142 Discomfort distress; nothing not at all. 143 hold quantity keep proportion with one another. 144 In . . . extremity i.e., women fear and love either too little or too much, but the two, fear and love, are equal in either case. 145 proof experience. 146 sized in size. 150 operant powers vital functions; leave to do cease to perform. 151 behind after I have gone. 156 None i.e., let no woman; but who except the one who. 157 Wormwood i.e., how bitter. (Literally, a bitter-tasting plant.) 158 instances motives; move motivate. 159 base . . . thrift ignoble considerations of material prosperity. 164 Purpose . . . memory our good intentions are subject to forgetfulness. 165 validity strength, durability. 166 Which i.e., purpose. 168–69 Most . . . debt it's inevitable that in time we forget the obligations we have imposed on ourselves. 173 enactures fulfillments. 174–75 Where . . . accident the capacity for extreme joy and grief go together, and often one extreme is instantly changed into its opposite on the slightest provocation.

This world is not for aye,° nor 'tis not strange
That even our loves should with our fortunes change;
For 'tis a question left us yet to prove,
Whether love lead fortune, or else fortune love
The great man down,° you mark his favorite flies;
The poor advanced makes friends of enemies.°
And hitherto° doth love on fortune tend;°
For who not needs° shall never lack a friend,
And who in want° a hollow friend doth try°
Directly seasons him° his enemy.
But, orderly to end where I begun,
Our wills and fates do so contrary run°
That our devices still° are overthrown;
Our thoughts are ours, their ends° none of our own.
So think thou wilt no second husband wed,
But die thy thoughts when thy first lord is dead.

PLAYER QUEEN: Nor° earth to me give food, nor heaven light,
Sport and repose lock from me day and night,°
To desperation turn my trust and hope,
An anchor's cheer° in prison be my scope!°
Each opposite that blanks° the face of joy
Meet what I would have well and it destroy!°
Both here and hence° pursue me lasting strife
If, once a widow, ever I be wife!

HAMLET: If she should break it now!

PLAYER KING: 'Tis deeply sworn. Sweet, leave me here awhile;
My spirits° grow dull, and fain I would beguile
The tedious day with sleep.

PLAYER QUEEN: Sleep rock thy brain,
And never come mischance between us twain!

[He sleeps.] Exit [PLAYER QUEEN].

HAMLET: Madam, how like you this play?

QUEEN: The lady doth protest too much,° methinks.

HAMLET: O, but she'll keep her word.

KING: Have you heard the argument?° Is there no offense in 't?

HAMLET: No, no, they do but jest,° poison in jest. No offense° i' the world.

KING: What do you call the play?

176 aye ever. 180 down fallen in fortune. 181 The poor . . . enemies when one of humble station is promoted, you see his enemies suddenly becoming his friends. 182 hitherto up to this point in the argument, or, to this extent; tend attend. 183 who not needs he who is not in need (of wealth). 184 who in want he who, being in need; try test (his generosity). 185 seasons him ripens him into. 187 Our . . . run what we want and what we get go so contrarily. 188 devices still intentions continually. 189 ends results. 192 Nor let neither. 193 Sport . . . night may day deny me its pastimes and night its repose. 195 anchor's cheer Anchorite's or hermit's fare; my scope the extent of my happiness. 196 blanks causes to blanch or grow pale. 196–97 Each . . . destroy may every adverse thing that causes the face of joy to turn pale meet and destroy everything that I desire to see prosper. 198 hence in the life hereafter. 202 spirits vital spirits. 206 doth . . . much makes too many promises and protestations. 208 argument plot. 209 jest make believe. 208–09 offense . . . offense cause for objection . . . actual injury, crime.

HAMLET: The Mousetrap. Marry, how? Tropically.° This play is the image of a murder done in Vienna. Gonzago is the Duke's° name, his wife, Baptista. You shall see anon. 'Tis a knavish piece of work, but what of that? Your Majesty, and we that have free° souls, it touches us not. Let the galled jade° wince, our withers° are unwrung.°

Enter LUCIANUS.

This is one Lucianus, nephew to the King.

OPHELIA: You are as good as a chorus,° my lord.

HAMLET: I could interpret° between you and your love, if I could see the puppets dallying.°

OPHELIA: You are keen,° my lord, you are keen.

HAMLET: It would cost you a groaning to take off mine edge.

OPHELIA: Still better, and worse.°

HAMLET: So° you mis-take° your husbands. Begin, murder; leave thy damnable faces and begin. Come, the croaking raven doth bellow for revenge.

LUCIANUS: Thoughts black, hands apt, drugs fit, and time agreeing,
Confederate season,° else° no creature seeing,° Thou mixture rank, of midnight weeds collected,
With Hecate's ban° thrice blasted, thrice infected,
Thy natural magic and dire property°
On wholesome life usurp immediately.
[He pours the poison into the sleeper's ear.]

HAMLET: 'A poisons him i' the garden for his estate.° His° name's Gonzago. The story is extant, and written in very choice Italian. You shall see anon how the murderer gets the love of Gonzago's wife.

[CLAUDIUS rises.]

OPHELIA: The King rises.

HAMLET: What, frighted with false fire?°

QUEEN: How fares my lord?

POLONIUS: Give o'er the play.

KING: Give me some light. Away!

POLONIUS: Lights, lights, lights!

Exeunt all but HAMLET and HORATIO.

211 Tropically figuratively. (The First Quarto reading, trapically, suggests a pun on trap in Mousetrap.) 212 Duke's i.e., king's (A slip that may be due to Shakespeare's possible source, the alleged murder of the Duke of Urbino by Luigi Gonzaga in 1538.) 214 free guiltless. 214–15 galled jade horse whose hide is rubbed by saddle or harness. 215 withers the part between the horse's shoulder blades; unwrung not rubbed sore. 217 chorus (In many Elizabethan plays, the forthcoming action was explained by an actor known as the "chorus"; at a puppet show, the actor who spoke the dialogue was known as an "interpreter," as indicated by the lines following.) 218 interpret (1) ventriloquize the dialogue, as in a puppet show, (2) act as pander. 218–19 puppets dallying (with suggestion of sexual play, continued in keen, "sexually aroused," groaning, "moaning in pregnancy," and edge, "sexual desire" or "impetuosity.") 220 keen sharp, bitter. 222 Still . . . worse more keen, always bettering what other people say with witty wordplay, but at the same time more offensive. 223 So even thus (in marriage); mis-take take falseheartedly and cheat on. (The marriage vows say "for better, for worse.") 226 Confederate season the time and occasion conspiring (to assist the murderer); else otherwise; seeing seeing me. 228 Hecate's ban the curse of Hecate, the goddess of witchcraft. 229 dire property baleful quality. 231 estate i.e., the kingship; His i.e., the king's. 235 false fire the blank discharge of a gun loaded with powder but no shot.

HAMLET:

"Why,° let the strucken deer go weep,
The hart ungallèd° play.
For some must watch,° while some must sleep;
Thus runs the world away."°

Would not this,° sir, and a forest of feathers°—if the rest of my fortunes turn Turk with° me—with two Provincial roses° on my razed° shoes, get me a fellowship in a cry° of players?°

HORATIO: Half a share.

HAMLET: A whole one, I.

"For thou dost know, O Damon° dear,
This realm dismantled° was
Of Jove himself, and now reigns here
A very, very—pajock."°

HORATIO: You might have rhymed.

HAMLET: O good Horatio, I'll take the ghost's word for a thousand pound. Didst perceive?

HORATIO: Very well, my lord.

HAMLET: Upon the talk of the poisoning?

HORATIO: I did very well note him.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

HAMLET: Aha! Come, some music! Come, the recorders.°

"For if the King like not the comedy,
Why then, belike, he likes it not, perdy."°

Come, some music.

GUILDENSTERN: Good my lord, vouchsafe me a word with you.

HAMLET: Sir, a whole history.

GUILDENSTERN: The King, sir—

HAMLET: Ay, sir, what of him?

GUILDENSTERN: Is in his retirement° marvelous distempered.°

240–43 Why . . . away (probably from an old ballad, with allusion to the popular belief that a wounded deer retires to weep and die; compare with As You Like It, 2.1.33–66.) 241 ungallèd unafflicted. 242 watch remain awake. 243 Thus . . . away thus the world goes. 244 this i.e., the play; feathers (allusion to the plumes that Elizabethan actors were fond of wearing.) 245 turn Turk with turn renegade against, go back on; Provincial roses rosettes of ribbon, named for roses grown in a part of France; razed with ornamental slashing. 246 cry pack (of hounds); fellowship . . . players partnership in a theatrical company. 249 Damon the friend of Pythias, as Horatio is friend of Hamlet; or, a traditional pastoral name. 250 dismantled stripped, divested. 250–52 This realm . . . pajock i.e., Jove, representing divine authority and justice, has abandoned this realm to its own devices, leaving in his stead only a peacock or vain pretender to virtue (though the rhyme-word expected in place of pajock or "peacock" suggests that the realm is now ruled over by an "ass"). 259 recorders wind instruments of the flute kind. 261 perdy (a corruption of the French par dieu, "by god.") 267 retirement withdrawal to his chambers; distempered out of humor. (But Hamlet deliberately plays on the wider application to any illness of mind or body, as in line 298, especially to drunkenness.)

HAMLET: With drink, sir?
GUILDENSTERN: No, my lord, with choler.°
HAMLET: Your wisdom should show itself more richer to signify this to the doctor, for for me to put him to his purgation° would perhaps plunge him into more choler.
GUILDENSTERN: Good my lord, put your discourse into some frame° and start° not so wildly from my affair.
HAMLET: I am tame, sir. Pronounce.
GUILDENSTERN: The Queen, your mother, in most great affliction of spirit, hath sent me to you.
HAMLET: You are welcome.
GUILDENSTERN: Nay, good my lord, this courtesy is not of the right breed.° If it shall please you to make me a wholesome answer, I will do your mother's commandment; if not, your pardon° and my return shall be the end of my business.
HAMLET: Sir, I cannot.
ROSENCRANTZ: What, my lord?
HAMLET: Make you a wholesome answer; my wit's diseased. But, sir, such answer as I can make, you shall command, or rather, as you say, my mother. Therefore no more, but to the matter. My mother, you say—
ROSENCRANTZ: Then thus she says: your behavior hath struck her into amazement and admiration.°
HAMLET: O wonderful son, that can so stonish a mother! But is there no sequel at the heels of this mother's admiration? Impart.
ROSENCRANTZ: She desires to speak with you in her closet° ere you go to bed.
HAMLET: We shall obey, were she ten times our mother. Have you any further trade with us?
ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, you once did love me.
HAMLET: And do still, by these pickers and stealers.°
ROSENCRANTZ: Good my lord, what is your cause of distemper? You do surely bar the door upon your own liberty° if you deny° your griefs to your friend.
HAMLET: Sir, I lack advancement.
ROSENCRANTZ: How can that be, when you have the voice of the King himself for your succession in Denmark?
HAMLET: Ay, sir, but "While the grass grows"°—the proverb is something° musty.

Enter the PLAYERS° with recorders.

O, the recorders. Let me see one. [He takes a recorder.]
To withdraw° with you: why do you go about to recover the wind° of me, as if you would drive me into a toil?°

269 choler anger. (But Hamlet takes the word in its more basic humoral sense of "bilious disorder.") 271 purgation (Hamlet hints at something going beyond medical treatment to bloodletting and the extraction of confession.) 273 frame order; start shy or jump away (like a horse; the opposite of tame in line 275). 279 breed (1) kind, (2) breeding, manners. 281 pardon permission to depart. 289 admiration bewilderment. 292 closet private chamber. 296 pickers and stealers i.e., hands. (so called from the catechism, "to keep my hands from picking and stealing.") 298 liberty i.e., being freed from distemper, line 297, but perhaps with a veiled threat as well; deny refuse to share. 302 While . . . grows (the rest of the proverb is "the silly horse starves"; Hamlet may not live long enough to succeed to the kingdom.); something somewhat; s.d. Players actors. 304 withdraw speak privately; recover the wind get to the windward side (thus driving the game into the toil, or "net"). 305 toil snare.

GUILDENSTERN: O, my lord, if my duty be too bold, my love is too unmannerly.°
HAMLET: I do not well understand that.° Will you play upon this pipe?
GUILDENSTERN: My lord, I cannot.
HAMLET: I pray you.
GUILDENSTERN: Believe me, I cannot.
HAMLET: I do beseech you.
GUILDENSTERN: I know no touch of it, my lord.
HAMLET: It is as easy as lying. Govern these ventages° with your fingers and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops.
GUILDENSTERN: But these cannot I command to any utterance of harmony. I have not the skill.
HAMLET: Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you make of me! You would play upon me, you would seem to know my stops, you would pluck out the heart of my mystery, you would sound° me from my lowest note to the top of my compass,° and there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ,° yet cannot you make it speak. 'Sblood, do you think I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret° me, you cannot play upon me.

Enter POLONIUS.

God bless you, sir!
POLONIUS: My lord, the Queen would speak with you, and presently.°
HAMLET: Do you see yonder cloud that's almost in shape of a camel?
POLONIUS: By the Mass and 'tis, like a camel indeed.
HAMLET: Methinks it is like a weasel.
POLONIUS: It is backed like a weasel.
HAMLET: Or like a whale.
POLONIUS: Very like a whale.
HAMLET: Then I will come to my mother by and by.° [Aside.] They fool me° to the top of my bent.°—I will come by and by.
POLONIUS: I will say so. [Exit.]
HAMLET: "By and by" is easily said. Leave me, friends.

[Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

'Tis now the very witching time° of night,
When churchyards yawn and hell itself breathes out
Contagion to this world. Now could I drink hot blood
And do such bitter business as the day
Would quake to look on. Soft, now to my mother.
O heart, lose not thy nature!° Let not ever
The soul of Nero° enter this firm bosom.
Let me be cruel, not unnatural;
I will speak daggers to her, but use none.

306 if . . . unmannerly if I am using an unmannerly boldness, it is my love that occasions it. 307 I . . . that i.e., I don't understand how genuine love can be unmannerly. 313 ventages finger-holes or stops (line 319) of the recorder. 320 sound (1) fathom, (2) produce sound in. 321 compass range (of voice). 322 organ musical instrument. 324 fret irritate (with a quibble on fret, meaning the piece of wood, gut, or metal that regulates the fingering on an instrument). 326 presently at once. 333 by and by quite soon. fool me trifle with me, humor my fooling. 334 top of my bent limit of my ability or endurance. (Literally, the extent to which a bow may be bent.) 337 witching time time when spells are cast and evil is abroad. 342 nature natural feeling. 343 Nero murderer of his mother, Agrippina.

My tongue and soul in this be hypocrites:
How in my words soever° she be shent,°
To give them seals° never my soul consent! Exit.

[3.3]

Enter KING, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: I like him° not, nor stands it safe with us
To let his madness range. Therefore prepare you.
I your commission will forthwith dispatch,°
And he to England shall along with you.
The terms of our estate° may not endure
Hazard so near 's as doth hourly grow
Out of his brows.°
GUILDENSTERN: We will ourselves provide.
Most holy and religious fear° it is
To keep those many many bodies safe
That live and feed upon Your Majesty.
ROSENCRANTZ: The single and peculiar° life is bound
With all the strength and armor of the mind
To keep itself from noyance,° but much more
That spirit upon whose weal depends and rests
The lives of many. The cess° of majesty
Dies not alone, but like a gulf° doth draw
What's near it with it; or it is a massy° wheel
Fixed on the summit of the highest mount,
To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
Are mortised° and adjoined, which, when it falls,°
Each small annexment, petty consequence,°
Attends° the boisterous ruin. Never alone
Did the King sigh, but with a general groan.
KING: Arm° you, I pray you, to this speedy voyage,
For we will fetters put about this fear,
Which now goes too free-footed.
ROSENCRANTZ: We will haste us.
Exeunt gentlemen [ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN].

Enter POLONIUS.

POLONIUS: My lord, he's going to his mother's closet.
Behind the arras° I'll convey myself

347 How . . . soever however much by my words; shent rebuked. 348 give them seals i.e., confirm them with deeds. [3.3] Location: The castle. 1 him i.e., his behavior. 3 dispatch prepare, cause to be drawn up. 5 terms of our estate circumstances of my royal position. 7 Out of his brows i.e., from his brain, in the form of plots and threats. 8 religious fear sacred concern. 11 single and peculiar individual and private. 13 noyance harm. 15 cess decease, cessation. 16 gulf whirlpool. 17 massy massive. 20 mortised fastened (as with a fitted joint); when it falls i.e., when it descends, like the wheel of Fortune, bringing a king down with it. 21 Each . . . consequence i.e., every hanger-on and unimportant person or thing connected with the king. 22 Attends participates in. 24 Arm prepare. 28 arras screen of tapestry placed around the walls of household apartments. (On the Elizabethan stage, the arras was presumably over a door or discovery space in the tiring-house facade.)

To hear the process.° I'll warrant she'll tax him home,°
And, as you said—and wisely was it said—
'Tis meet° that some more audience than a mother,
Since nature makes them partial, should o'erhear
The speech, of vantage.° Fare you well, my liege.
I'll call upon you ere you go to bed
And tell you what I know.

KING: Thanks, dear my lord. Exit [POLONIUS].

O, my offense is rank! It smells to heaven.
It hath the primal eldest curse° upon't,
A brother's murder. Pray can I not,
Though inclination be as sharp as will;°
My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent,
And like a man to double business bound°
I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
And both neglect. What if this cursèd hand
Were thicker than itself with brother's blood,
Is there not rain enough in the sweet heavens
To wash it white as snow? Whereto serves mercy
But to confront the visage of offense?°
And what's in prayer but this twofold force,
To be forestallèd° ere we come to fall,
Or pardoned being down? Then I'll look up.
My fault is past. But O, what form of prayer
Can serve my turn? "Forgive me my foul murder"?
That cannot be, since I am still possessed
Of those effects for which I did the murder:
My crown, mine own ambition, and my Queen.
May one be pardoned and retain th' offense?°
In the corrupted currents° of this world
Offense's gilded hand° may shove by° justice,
And oft 'tis seen the wicked prize° itself
Buys out the law. But 'tis not so above.
There° is no shuffling,° there the action lies°
In his° true nature, and we ourselves compelled,
Even to the teeth and forehead° of our faults,
To give in° evidence. What then? What rests?°
Try what repentance can. What can it not?
Yet what can it, when one cannot repent?
O wretched state, O bosom black as death,

29 process proceedings; tax him home reprove him severely. 31 meet fitting. 33 of vantage from an advantageous place, or, in addition. 37 the primal eldest curse the curse of Cain, the first murderer; he killed his brother Abel. 39 Though . . . will though my desire is as strong as my determination. 41 bound (1) destined, (2) obliged. (The King wants to repent and still enjoy what he has gained.) 46–47 Whereto . . . offense What function does mercy serve other than to meet sin face to face? 49 forestallèd prevented (from sinning). 56 th' offense the thing for which one offended. 57 currents courses. 58 gilded hand hand offering gold as a bribe; shove by thrust aside. 59 wicked prize prize won by wickedness. 61 There i.e., in heaven; shuffling escape by trickery; the action lies the accusation is made manifest. (A legal metaphor.) 62 his its. 63 to the teeth and forehead face to face, concealing nothing. 64 give in provide; rests remains.

limèd° soul that, struggling to be free,
Art more engaged!° Help, angels! Make assay.°
Bow, stubborn knees, and heart with strings of steel,
Be soft as sinews of the newborn babe!
All may be well. [He kneels.]

Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: Now might I do it pat,° now 'a is a-praying;
And now I'll do 't. [He draws his sword.] And so 'a goes to heaven,
And so am I revenged. That would be scanned:°
A villain kills my father, and for that,
I, his sole son, do this same villain send
To heaven.
Why, this is hire and salary, not revenge.
'A took my father grossly, full of bread,°
With all his crimes broad blown,° as flush° as May;
And how his audit° stands who knows save° heaven?
But in our circumstance and course of thought°
'Tis heavy with him. And am I then revenged,
To take him in the purging of his soul
When he is fit and seasoned° for his passage?
No!
Up, sword, and know thou a more horrid hent.°
[He puts up his sword.]
When he is drunk asleep, or in his rage,°
Or in th' incestuous pleasure of his bed,
At game,° a-swearing, or about some act
That has no relish° of salvation in 't—
Then trip him, that his heels may kick at heaven,
And that his soul may be as damned and black
As hell, whereto it goes. My mother stays.°
This physic° but prolongs thy sickly days. Exit.

KING: My words fly up, my thoughts remain below.
Words without thoughts never to heaven go. Exit.

[3.4]

Enter [QUEEN] GERTRUDE and POLONIUS.

POLONIUS: 'A will come straight. Look you lay home° to him.
Tell him his pranks have been too broad° to bear with,

68 limèd caught as with birdlime, a sticky substance used to ensnare birds. 69 engaged entangled; assay trial. (Said to himself.) 73 pat opportunely. 75 would be scanned needs to be looked into, or, would be interpreted as follows. 80 grossly, full of bread i.e., enjoying his worldly pleasures rather than fasting. (See ezekiel 16:49.) 81 crimes broad blown sins in full bloom; flush vigorous. 82 audit account; save except for. 83 in . . . thought As we see it from our mortal perspective. 86 seasoned matured, readied. 88 know . . . hent await to be grasped by me on a more horrid occasion; hent act of seizing. 89 drunk . . . rage dead drunk, or in a fit of sexual passions. 91 game gambling. 92 relish trace, savor. 95 stays awaits (me). 96 physic purging (by prayer), or, Hamlet's postponement of the killing. [3.4] Location: The Queen's private chamber. 1 lay home thrust to the heart, reprove him soundly. 2 broad unrestrained.

And that Your Grace hath screened and stood between Much heat° and him. I'll shroud° me even here.
Pray you, be round° with him.
HAMLET [within]: Mother, Mother, Mother!
QUEEN: I'll warrant you, fear me not.
Withdraw, I hear him coming. [POLONIUS hides behind the arras.]

Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: Now, Mother, what's the matter?
QUEEN: Hamlet, thou hast thy father° much offended.
HAMLET: Mother, you have my father much offended.
QUEEN: Come, come, you answer with an idle° tongue.
HAMLET: Go, go, you question with a wicked tongue.
QUEEN: Why, how now, Hamlet?
HAMLET: What's the matter now?
QUEEN: Have you forgot me?°
HAMLET: No, by the rood,° not so:
You are the Queen your husband's brother's wife,
And—would it were not so!—you are my mother.
QUEEN: Nay, then, I'll set those to you that can speak.°
HAMLET: Come, come, and sit you down; you shall not budge.
You go not till I set you up a glass
Where you may see the inmost part of you.
QUEEN: What wilt thou do? Thou wilt not murder me?
Help, ho!
POLONIUS [behind the arras]: What ho! Help!
HAMLET [drawing]: How now? A rat? Dead for a ducat,° dead!
[He thrusts his rapier through the arras.]
POLONIUS [behind the arras]: O, I am slain! [He falls and dies.]
QUEEN: O me, what hast thou done?
HAMLET: Nay, I know not. Is it the King?
QUEEN: O, what a rash and bloody deed is this!
HAMLET: A bloody deed—almost as bad, good Mother,
As kill a King, and marry with his brother.
QUEEN: As kill a King!
HAMLET: Ay, lady, it was my word.

[He parts the arras and discovers POLONIUS.]

Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell!
I took thee for thy better. Take thy fortune.
Thou find'st to be too busy° is some danger.—
Leave wringing of your hands. Peace, sit you down,
And let me wring your heart, for so I shall,
If it be made of penetrable stuff,
If damnèd custom° have not brazed° it so
That it be proof° and bulwark against sense.°

4 Much heat i.e., the King's anger; shroud conceal. (With ironic fitness to Polonius' imminent death. The word is only in the First Quarto: the second Quarto and the Folio read "silence.") 5 round blunt. 10 thy father i.e., your stepfather, Claudius. 12 idle foolish. 15 forgot me i.e., forgotten that I am your mother; rood cross of Christ. 18 speak i.e., to someone so rude. 25 Dead for a ducat i.e., I bet a ducat he's dead; or, a ducat is his life's fee. 34 busy nosy. 38 damnèd custom habitual wickedness; brazed brazened, hardened. 39 proof armor; sense feeling.

QUEEN: What have I done, that thou dar'st wag thy tongue
In noise so rude against me?
HAMLET: Such an act
That blurs the grace and blush of modesty,
Calls virtue hypocrite, takes off the rose
From the fair forehead of an innocent love
And sets a blister° there, makes marriage vows
As false as dicers' oaths. O, such a deed
As from the body of contraction° plucks
The very soul, and sweet religion makes°
A rhapsody° of words. Heaven's face does glow
O'er this solidity and compound mass
With tristful visage, as against the doom,
Is thought-sick at the act.°
QUEEN: Ay me, what act,
That roars so loud and thunders in the index?°
HAMLET [showing her two likenesses]: Look here upon this picture, and on this,
The counterfeit presentment° of two brothers.
See what a grace was seated on this brow:
Hyperion's° curls, the front° of Jove himself,
An eye like Mars° to threaten and command,
A station° like the herald Mercury°
New-lighted° on a heaven-kissing hill—
A combination and a form indeed
Where every god did seem to set his seal°
To give the world assurance of a man.
This was your husband. Look you now what follows:
Here is your husband, like a mildewed ear,°
Blasting° his wholesome brother. Have you eyes?
Could you on this fair mountain leave° to feed
And batten° on this moor?° Ha, have you eyes?
You cannot call it love, for at your age
The heyday° in the blood° is tame, it's humble,
And waits upon the judgment, and what judgment
Would step from this to this? Sense,° sure, you have,
Else could you not have motion, but sure that sense
Is apoplexed,° for madness would not err,°
Nor sense to ecstasy was ne'er so thralled,

45 sets a blister i.e., brands as a harlot. 47 contraction the marriage contract. 48 sweet religion makes i.e., makes marriage vows. 49 rhapsody senseless string. 49–52 Heaven's . . . act Heaven's face blushes at this solid world compounded of the various elements, with sorrowful face as though the day of doom were near, and is sick with horror at the deed (i.e., Gertrude's marriage). 54 index table of contents, prelude or preface. 55 counterfeit presentment portrayed representation. 57 Hyperion's the sungod's; front brow. 58 Mars god of war. 59 station manner of standing; Mercury winged messenger of the gods. 60 New-lighted newly alighted. 62 set his seal i.e., affix his approval. 65 ear i.e., of grain. 66 Blasting blighting. 67 leave cease. 68 batten gorge; moor barren or marshy ground (suggesting also "dark-skinned"). 70 heyday state of excitement; blood passion. 72 Sense perception through the five senses (the functions of the middle sensible soul). 74 apoplexed paralyzed (Hamlet goes on to explain that, without such a paralysis of will, mere madness would not so err, nor would the five senses so enthrall themselves to ecstasy or lunacy; even such deranged states of mind would be able to make the obvious choice between Hamlet Senior and Claudius.); err so err.

But° it reserved some quantity of choice
To serve in such a difference.° What devil was 't
That thus hath cozened° you at hoodman-blind?°
Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight,
Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans° all
Or but a sickly part of one true sense
Could not so mope.° O shame, where is thy blush?
Rebellious hell,
If thou canst mutine° in a matron's bones,
To flaming youth let virtue be as wax
And melt in her own fire.° Proclaim no shame
When the compulsive ardor gives the charge,
Since frost itself as actively doth burn,
And reason panders will.°

QUEEN: O Hamlet, speak no more!
Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul,
And there I see such black and grainèd° spots
As will not leave their tinct.°

HAMLET: Nay, but to live
In the rank sweat of an enseamèd° bed,
Stewed° in corruption, honeying and making love
Over the nasty sty!

QUEEN: O, speak to me no more!
These words like daggers enter in my ears.
No more, sweet Hamlet!

HAMLET: A murderer and a villain,
A slave that is not twentieth part the tithe°
Of your precedent lord,° a vice° of kings,
A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole
And put it in his pocket!

QUEEN: No more!

Enter GHOST [in his nightgown].

HAMLET: A king of shreds and patches°—
Save me, and hover o'er me with your wings,
You heavenly guards! What would your gracious figure?

QUEEN: Alas, he's mad!

76 But but that. 77 To . . . difference to help in making a choice between two such men. 78 cozened cheated; hoodman-blind blindman's buff. (In this game, says Hamlet, the devil must have pushed Claudius toward Gertrude while she was blindfolded.) 80 sans without. 82 mope be dazed, act aimlessly. 84 mutine incite mutiny. 85–86 be as wax . . . fire melt like a candle or stick of sealing wax held over the candle flame. 86–89 Proclaim . . . will call it no shameful business when the compelling ardor of youth delivers the attack, i.e., commits lechery, since the frost of advanced age burns with as active a fire of lust and reason perverts itself by fomenting lust rather than restraining it. 92 grainèd dyed in grain, indelible. 93 leave their tinct surrender their color. 94 enseamèd saturated in the grease and filth of passionate lovemaking. 95 Stewed soaked, bathed (with a suggestion of "stew," brothel). 100 tithe tenth part. 101 precedent lord former husband; vice buffoon. (A reference to the Vice of the morality plays.) 106 shreds and patches i.e., motley, the traditional costume of the clown or fool.

HAMLET: Do you not come your tardy son to chide,
That, lapsed° in time and passion, lets go by
Th' important° acting of your dread command?
O, say!
GHOST: Do not forget. This visitation
Is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose.
But look, amazement° on thy mother sits.
O, step between her and her fighting soul!
Conceit° in weakest bodies strongest works.
Speak to her, Hamlet.
HAMLET: How is it with you, lady?
QUEEN: Alas, how is 't with you,
That you do bend your eye on vacancy,
And with th' incorporal° air do hold discourse?
Forth at your eyes your spirits wildly peep,
And, as the sleeping soldiers in th' alarm,°
Your bedded° hair, like life in excrements,°
Start up and stand on end. O gentle son,
Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper°
Sprinkle cool patience. Whereon do you look?
HAMLET: On him, on him! Look you how pale he glares!
His form and cause conjoined,° preaching to stones,
Would make them capable.°—Do not look upon me,
Lest with this piteous action you convert
My stern effects.° Then what I have to do
Will want true color—tears perchance for blood.°
QUEEN: To whom do you speak this?
HAMLET: Do you see nothing there?
QUEEN: Nothing at all, yet all that is I see.
HAMLET: Nor did you nothing hear?
QUEEN: No, nothing but ourselves.
HAMLET: Why, look you there, look how it steals away!
My father, in his habit° as° he lived!
Look where he goes even now out at the portal! Exit GHOST.
QUEEN: This is the very° coinage of your brain.
This bodiless creation ecstasy
Is very cunning in.°
HAMLET: Ecstasy?
My pulse as yours doth temperately keep time,
And makes as healthful music. It is not madness

111 lapsed delaying. 112 important importunate, urgent. 116 amazement distraction. 118 Conceit imagination. 122 incorporal immaterial. 124 as . . . alarm like soldiers called out of sleep by an alarum. 125 bedded laid flat; like life in excrements i.e., as though hair, an outgrowth of the body, had a life of its own. (Hair was thought to be lifeless because it lacks sensation, and so its standing on end would be unnatural and ominous.) 127 distemper disorder. 130 His . . . conjoined his appearance joined to his cause for speaking. 131 capable receptive. 132–33 convert . . . effects divert me from my stern duty. 134 want . . . blood lack plausibility so that (with a play on the normal sense of color) I shall shed colorless tears instead of blood. 141 habit clothes; as as when 143 very mere. 144–45 This . . . in madness is skillful in creating this kind of hallucination.

That I have uttered. Bring me to the test,
And I the matter will reword,° which madness
Would gambol° from. Mother, for love of grace,
Lay not that flattering unction° to your soul
That not your trespass but my madness speaks.
It will but skin° and film the ulcerous place,
Whiles rank corruption, mining° all within,
Infects unseen. Confess yourself to heaven,
Repent what's past, avoid what is to come,
And do not spread the compost° on the weeds
To make them ranker. Forgive me this my virtue;°
For in the fatness° of these pursy° times
Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg,
Yea, curb° and woo for leave° to do him good.

QUEEN: O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain.

HAMLET: O, throw away the worser part of it,
And live the purer with the other half.
Good night. But go not to my uncle's bed;
Assume a virtue, if you have it not.
That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat,°
Of habits devil,° is angel yet in this,
That to the use of actions fair and good
He likewise gives a frock or livery°
That aptly° is put on. Refrain tonight,
And that shall lend a kind of easiness
To the next abstinence; the next more easy;
For use° almost can change the stamp of nature,°
And either° . . . the devil, or throw him out
With wondrous potency. Once more, good night;
And when you are desirous to be blest,
I'll blessing beg of you.° For this same lord, [pointing to POLONIUS.]
I do repent; but heaven hath pleased it so
To punish me with this, and this with me,
That I must be their scourge and minister.°
I will bestow° him, and will answer° well
The death I gave him. So, again, good night.
I must be cruel only to be kind.

150 reword repeat word for word. 151 gambol skip away. 152 unction ointment. 154 skin grow a skin for. 155 mining working under the surface. 158 compost manure. 159 this my virtue my virtuous talk in reproving you. 160 fatness grossness; pursy flabby, out of shape. 162 curb bow, bend the knee; leave permission. 168 who . . . eat which consumes all proper or natural feeling, all sensibility. 169 Of habits devil devil-like in prompting evil habits. 171 livery an outer appearance, a customary garb (and hence a predisposition easily assumed in time of stress). 172 aptly readily. 175 use habit; the stamp of nature our inborn traits. 176 And either (a defective line, usually emended by inserting the word master after either, following the Fourth Quarto and early editors.) 178–79 when . . . you i.e., when you are ready to be penitent and seek God's blessing, I will ask your blessing as a dutiful son should. 182 their scourge and minister i.e., agent of heavenly retribution. (By scourge, Hamlet also suggests that he himself will eventually suffer punishment in the process of fulfilling heaven's will.) 183 bestow stow, dispose of; answer account or pay for.

This° bad begins, and worse remains behind.°
One word more, good lady.
QUEEN: What shall I do?
HAMLET: Not this by no means that I bid you do:
Let the bloat° King tempt you again to bed,
Pinch wanton° on your cheek, call you his mouse,
And let him, for a pair of reechy° kisses,
Or paddling° in your neck with his damned fingers,
Make you to ravel all this matter out°
That I essentially am not in madness,
But mad in craft.° 'Twere good° you let him know,
For who that's but a Queen, fair, sober, wise,
Would from a paddock,° from a bat, a gib,°
Such dear concernings° hide? Who would do so?
No, in despite of sense and secrecy,°
Unpeg the basket° on the house's top,
Let the birds fly, and like the famous ape,°
To try conclusions,° in the basket creep
And break your own neck down.°
QUEEN: Be thou assured, if words be made of breath,
And breath of life, I have no life to breathe
What thou hast said to me.
HAMLET: I must to England. You know that?
QUEEN: Alack,
I had forgot. 'Tis so concluded on.
HAMLET: There's letters sealed, and my two schoolfellows,
Whom I will trust as I will adders fanged,
They bear the mandate; they must sweep my way
And marshal me to knavery.° Let it work.°
For 'tis the sport to have the enginer°
Hoist with° his own petard,° and 't shall go hard
But I will° delve one yard below their mines°
And blow them at the moon. O, 'tis most sweet
When in one line° two crafts° directly meet.

186 This i.e., the killing of Polonius; behind to come. 189 bloat bloated. 190 Pinch wanton i.e., leave his love pinches on your cheeks, branding you as wanton. 191 reechy dirty, filthy. 192 paddling fingering amorously. 193 ravel . . . out unravel, disclose. 195 in craft by cunning; good (said sarcastically; also the following eight lines.) 197 paddock toad; gib tomcat. 198 dear concernings important affairs. 199 sense and secrecy secrecy that common sense requires. 200 Unpeg the basket open the cage, i.e., let out the secret. 201 famous ape (in a story now lost.) 202 try conclusions test the outcome (in which the ape apparently enters a cage from which birds have been released and then tries to fly out of the cage as they have done, falling to its death). 203 down in the fall; utterly. 211–12 sweep . . . knavery sweep a path before me and conduct me to some knavery or treachery prepared for me; work proceed. 213 enginer maker of military contrivances. 214 Hoist with blown up by; petard an explosive used to blow in a door or make a breach. 214–15 't shall . . . will unless luck is against me, I will; mines tunnels used in warfare to undermine the enemy's emplacements; Hamlet will countermine by going under their mines. 217 in one line i.e., mines and countermines on a collision course, or the countermines directly below the mines; crafts acts of guile, plots.

This man shall set me packing.°
I'll lug the guts into the neighbor room.
Mother, good night indeed. This counselor
Is now most still, most secret, and most grave,
Who was in life a foolish prating knave.—
Come, sir, to draw toward an end° with you.—
Good night, Mother.

Exeunt [separately, HAMLET dragging in POLONIUS].

[4.1]

Enter KING and QUEEN,° with ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: There's matter° in these sighs, these profound heaves.°
You must translate; 'tis fit we understand them.
Where is your son?
QUEEN: Bestow this place on us a little while.
[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]
Ah, mine own lord, what have I seen tonight!
KING: What, Gertrude? How does Hamlet?
QUEEN: Mad as the sea and wind when both contend
Which is the mightier. In his lawless fit,
Behind the arras hearing something stir,
Whips out his rapier, cries, "A rat, a rat!"
And in this brainish apprehension° kills
The unseen good old man.
KING: O heavy° deed!
It had been so with us,° had we been there.
His liberty is full of threats to all—
To you yourself, to us, to everyone.
Alas, how shall this bloody deed be answered?°
It will be laid to us, whose providence°
Should have kept short,° restrained, and out of haunt°
This mad young man. But so much was our love,
We would not understand what was most fit,
But, like the owner of a foul disease,
To keep it from divulging,° let it feed
Even on the pith of life. Where is he gone?
QUEEN: To draw apart the body he hath killed,
O'er whom his very madness, like some ore°
Among a mineral° of metals base,
Shows itself pure: 'a weeps for what is done.

218 set me packing set me to making schemes, and set me to lugging (him), and, also, send me off in a hurry. 223 draw . . . end finish up (with a pun on draw, "pull").
[4.1] Location: The castle. s.d. Enter . . . Queen (Some editors argue that Gertrude never exits in 3.4 and that the scene is continuous here, as suggested in the Folio, but the second Quarto marks an entrance for her and at line 35 Claudius speaks of Gertrude's closet as though it were elsewhere. A short time has elapsed, during which the King has become aware of her highly wrought emotional state.) 1 matter significance; heaves heavy sighs. 11 brainish apprehension headstrong conception. 12 heavy grievous. 13 us i.e., me. (The royal "we"; also in line 15.) 16 answered explained. 17 providence foresight. 18 short i.e., on a short tether; out of haunt secluded. 22 divulging becoming evident. 25 ore vein of gold. 26 mineral mine.

KING: O Gertrude, come away!
The sun no sooner shall the mountains touch
But we will ship him hence, and this vile deed
We must with all our majesty and skill
Both countenance° and excuse.—Ho, Guildenstern!

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

Friends both, go join you with some further aid.
Hamlet in madness hath Polonius slain,
And from his mother's closet hath he dragged him.
Go seek him out, speak fair, and bring the body
Into the chapel. I pray you, haste in this.
[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]
Come, Gertrude, we'll call up our wisest friends
And let them know both what we mean to do
And what's untimely done°. . . . . .
Whose whisper o'er the world's diameter,°
As level° as the cannon to his blank,°
Transports his poisoned shot, may miss our name
And hit the woundless° air. O, come away!
My soul is full of discord and dismay. Exeunt.

[4.2]

Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: Safely stowed.
ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN [within]: Hamlet! Lord Hamlet!
HAMLET: But soft, what noise? Who calls on Hamlet? O, here they come.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

ROSENCRANTZ: What have you done, my lord, with the dead body?
HAMLET: Compounded it with dust, whereto 'tis kin.
ROSENCRANTZ: Tell us where 'tis, that we may take it thence
And bear it to the chapel.
HAMLET: Do not believe it.
ROSENCRANTZ: Believe what?
HAMLET: That I can keep your counsel and not mine own.° Besides, to be demanded of° a sponge, what replication° should be made by the son of a king?
ROSENCRANTZ: Take you me for a sponge, my lord?
HAMLET: Ay, sir, that soaks up the King's countenance,° his rewards, his authorities.° But such officers do the King best service in the end. He keeps them, like an ape, an apple, in the corner of his jaw, first mouthed to be last swallowed. When he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you, and, sponge, you shall be dry again.

32 countenance put the best face on. 40 And . . . done (a defective line; conjectures as to the missing words include So, haply, slander [Capell and other early editors]; For, haply, slander [Theobald and others]; and So envious slander [Jenkins].) 41 diameter extent from side to side. 42 As level with as direct aim; his blank its target at point-blank range. 44 woundless invulnerable. [4.2] Location: The castle. 10 That . . . own i.e., that I can follow your advice (by telling where the body is) and still keep my own secret. 10–11 demanded of questioned by; replication reply. 13 countenance favor. 13–14 authorities delegated power, influence.

ROSENCRANTZ: I understand you not, my lord.
HAMLET: I am glad of it. A knavish speech sleeps in° a foolish ear.
ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, you must tell us where the body is and go with us to the King.
HAMLET: The body is with the King, but the King is not with the body.°
The King is a thing—
GUILDENSTERN: A thing, my lord?
HAMLET: Of nothing.° Bring me to him. Hide fox, and all after!°

Exeunt [running].

[4.3]

Enter KING, and two or three.

KING: I have sent to seek him, and to find the body.
How dangerous is it that this man goes loose!
Yet must not we put the strong law on him.
He's loved of° the distracted° multitude,
Who like not in their judgment, but their eyes,°
And where 'tis so, th' offender's scourge° is weighed,°
But never the offense. To bear all smooth and even,°
This sudden sending him away must seem Deliberate pause.° Diseases desperate grown
By desperate appliance° are relieved,
Or not at all.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and all the rest.

How now, what hath befall'n?

ROSENCRANTZ: Where the dead body is bestowed, my lord,
We cannot get from him.
KING: But where is he?
ROSENCRANTZ: Without, my lord; guarded, to know your pleasure.
KING: Bring him before us.
ROSENCRANTZ: Ho! Bring in the lord.

They enter [with HAMLET].

KING: Now, Hamlet, where's Polonius?
HAMLET: At supper.
KING: At supper? Where?

19 sleeps in has no meaning to. 22 The . . . body (Perhaps alludes to the legal commonplace of "the king's two bodies," which drew a distinction between the sacred office of kingship and the particular mortal who possessed it at any given time. Hence, although Claudius' body is necessarily a part of him, true kingship is not contained in it. Similarly, Claudius will have Polonius' body when it is found, but there is no kingship in this business either.) 25 Of nothing (1) of no account, (2) lacking the essence of kingship, as in lines 24–25 and note; Hide . . . after (an old signal cry in the game of hide-and-seek, suggesting that Hamlet now runs away from them.) [4.3] Location: The castle. 4 of by; distracted fickle, unstable. 5 Who . . . eyes who choose not by judgment but by appearance. 6 scourge punishment. (Literally, blow with a whip.); weighed sympathetically considered. 7 To . . . even to manage the business in an unprovocative way. 9 Deliberate pause carefully considered action. 10 appliance remedies.

HAMLET: Not where he eats, but where 'a is eaten. A certain convocation of politic worms° are e'en° at him. Your worm° is your only emperor for diet.° We fat all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots. Your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service°—two dishes, but to one table. That's the end.

KING: Alas, alas!

HAMLET: A man may fish with the worm that hath eat° of a king, and eat of the fish that hath fed of that worm.

KING: What dost thou mean by this?

HAMLET: Nothing but to show you how a king may go a progress° through the guts of a beggar.

KING: Where is Polonius?

HAMLET: In heaven. Send thither to see. If your messenger find him not there, seek him i' th' other place yourself. But if indeed you find him not within this month, you shall nose him as you go up the stairs into the lobby.

KING [to some attendants]: Go seek him there.

HAMLET: 'A will stay till you come. [Exeunt attendants.]

KING: Hamlet, this deed, for thine especial safety—
Which we do tender,° as we dearly° grieve
For that which thou hast done—must send thee hence
With fiery quickness. Therefore prepare thyself.
The bark° is ready, and the wind at help,
Th' associates tend,° and everything is bent°
For England.

HAMLET: For England!

KING: Ay, Hamlet.

HAMLET: Good.

KING: So is it, if thou knew'st our purposes.

HAMLET: I see a cherub° that sees them. But come, for England!
Farewell, dear mother.

KING: Thy loving father, Hamlet.

HAMLET: My mother. Father and mother is man and wife, man and wife is one flesh, and so, my mother. Come, for England! Exit.

KING: Follow him at foot;° tempt him with speed aboard.
Delay it not. I'll have him hence tonight.
Away! For everything is sealed and done
That else leans on° th' affair. Pray you, make haste.
[Exeunt all but the KING.]
And, England,° if my love thou hold'st at aught°—

19–20 politic worms crafty worms (suited to a master spy like Polonius); e'en even now; Your worm your average worm. (Compare your fat king and your lean beggar in lines 21–22.); diet food, eating (with a punning reference to the Diet of Worms, a famous convocation held in 1521). 22 variable service different courses of a single meal. 25 eat eaten. (Pronounced et.) 28 progress royal journey of state. 38 tender regard, hold dear; dearly intensely. 41 bark sailing vessel. 42 tend wait; bent in readiness. 48 cherub (Cherubim are angels of knowledge. Hamlet hints that both he and heaven are onto Claudius' tricks.) 53 at foot close behind, at heel. 56 leans on bears upon, is related to. 57 England i.e., King of England; at aught at any value.

As my great power thereof may give thee sense,°
Since yet thy cicatrice° looks raw and red
After the Danish sword, and thy free awe° 60
Pays homage to us—thou mayst not coldly set°
Our sovereign process,° which imports at full,°
By letters congruing° to that effect,
The present° death of Hamlet. Do it, England,
For like the hectic° in my blood he rages, 65
And thou must cure me. Till I know 'tis done,
Howe'er my haps,° my joys were ne'er begun. Exit.

[4.4]

Enter FORTINBRAS with his army over the stage.

FORTINBRAS: Go, Captain, from me greet the Danish king.
Tell him that by his license° Fortinbras
Craves the conveyance of° a promised march
Over his kingdom. You know the rendezvous.
If that His Majesty would aught with us, 5
We shall express our duty° in his eye;°
And let him know so.
CAPTAIN: I will do 't, my lord.
FORTINBRAS: Go softly° on. [Exeunt all but the CAPTAIN.]

Enter HAMLET, ROSENCRANTZ, [GUILDENSTERN,] etc.

HAMLET: Good sir, whose powers° are these? 10
CAPTAIN: They are of Norway, sir.
HAMLET: How purposed, sir, I pray you?
CAPTAIN: Against some part of Poland.
HAMLET: Who commands them, sir?
CAPTAIN: The nephew to old Norway, Fortinbras. 15
HAMLET: Goes it against the main° of Poland, sir,
Or for some frontier?
CAPTAIN: Truly to speak, and with no addition,°
We go to gain a little patch of ground
That hath in it no profit but the name. 20
To pay° five ducats, five, I would not farm it;°
Nor will it yield to Norway or the Pole
A ranker° rate, should it be sold in fee.°
HAMLET: Why, then the Polack never will defend it.
CAPTAIN: Yes, it is already garrisoned. 25

58 As . . . sense for so my great power may give you a just appreciation of the importance of valuing my love. 59 cicatrice scar. 60 free awe voluntary show of respect. 61 coldly set regard with indifference. 62 process command; imports at full conveys specific directions for. 63 congruing agreeing. 64 present immediate. 65 hectic persistent fever. 67 haps fortunes. [4.4] Location: The coast of Denmark. 2 license permission. 3 the conveyance of escort during. 6 duty respect; eye presence. 9 softly slowly, circumspectly. 10 powers forces. 16 main main part. 18 addition exaggeration. 21 To pay i.e., for a yearly rental of; farm it take a lease on it. 23 ranker higher; in fee fee simple, outright.

HAMLET: Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats
Will not debate the question of this straw.°
This is th' impostume° of much wealth and peace,
That inward breaks, and shows no cause without
Why the man dies. I humbly thank you, sir.
CAPTAIN: God b' wi' you, sir. [Exit.]
ROSENCRANTZ: Will 't please you go, my lord?
HAMLET: I'll be with you straight. Go a little before.

[Exeunt all except HAMLET.]

How all occasions do inform against° me
And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
If his chief good and market of° his time
Be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more.
Sure he that made us with such large discourse,°
Looking before and after,° gave us not
That capability and godlike reason
To fust° in us unused. Now, whether it be Bestial oblivion,° or some craven° scruple
Of thinking too precisely° on th' event°—
A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom
And ever three parts coward—I do not know
Why yet I live to say "This thing's to do,"
Sith° I have cause, and will, and strength, and means
To do 't. Examples gross° as earth exhort me:
Witness this army of such mass and charge,°
Led by a delicate and tender° prince,
Whose spirit with divine ambition puffed
Makes mouths° at the invisible event,°
Exposing what is mortal and unsure
To all that fortune, death, and danger dare,°
Even for an eggshell. Rightly to be great
Is not to stir without great argument,
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
When honor's at the stake.° How stand I, then,
That have a father killed, a mother stained,
Excitements of° my reason and my blood,
And let all sleep, while to my shame I see
The imminent death of twenty thousand men
That for a fantasy° and trick° of fame
Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot°

27 debate . . . straw settle this trifling matter. 28 impostume abscess. 34 inform against denounce, betray; take shape against. 36 market of profit of, compensation for. 38 discourse power of reasoning. 39 Looking before and after able to review past events and anticipate the future. 41 fust grow moldy. 42 oblivion forgetfulness; craven cowardly. 43 precisely scrupulously; event outcome. 47 Sith since. 48 gross obvious. 49 charge expense. 50 delicate and tender of fine and youthful qualities. 52 Makes mouths makes scornful faces; invisible event unforeseeable outcome. 54 dare could do (to him). 55–58 Rightly . . . stake true greatness does not normally consist of rushing into action over some trivial provocation; however, when one's honor is involved, even a trifling insult requires that one respond greatly (?); at the stake (A metaphor from gambling or bear-baiting.) 60 Excitements of promptings by. 63 fantasy fanciful caprice, illusion; trick trifle, deceit. 64 plot plot of ground.

Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,° 65
Which is not tomb enough and continent°
To hide the slain? O, from this time forth
My thoughts be bloody or be nothing worth! Exit.

[4.5]

Enter HORATIO, [QUEEN] GERTRUDE, and a GENTLEMAN.

QUEEN: I will not speak with her.
GENTLEMAN: She is importunate,
Indeed distract.° Her mood will needs be pitied.
QUEEN: What would she have?
GENTLEMAN: She speaks much of her father, says she hears
There's tricks° i' the world, and hems,° and beats her heart,° 5
Spurns enviously at straws,° speaks things in doubt°
That carry but half sense. Her speech is nothing,
Yet the unshapèd use° of it doth move
The hearers to collection;° they yawn° at it,
And botch° the words up fit to their own thoughts, 10
Which,° as her winks and nods and gestures yield° them,
Indeed would make one think there might be thought,°
Though nothing sure, yet much unhappily.°
HORATIO: 'Twere good she were spoken with, for she may strew
Dangerous conjectures in ill-breeding° minds. 15
QUEEN: Let her come in. [Exit GENTLEMAN.]
[Aside.] To my sick soul, as sin's true nature is,
Each toy° seems prologue to some great amiss.°
So full of artless jealousy is guilt,
It spills itself in fearing to be spilt.° 20

Enter OPHELIA° [distracted].

OPHELIA: Where is the beauteous majesty of Denmark?
QUEEN: How now, Ophelia?
OPHELIA [she sings]:

"How should I your true love know
From another one?
By his cockle hat° and staff, 25
And his sandal shoon."°

QUEEN: Alas, sweet lady, what imports this song?

65 Whereon . . . cause on which there is insufficient room for the soldiers needed to engage in a military contest. 66 continent receptacle; container. [4.5] Location: The castle. 2 distract distracted. 5 tricks deceptions; hems makes "hmm" sounds; heart i.e., breast. 6 Spurns . . . straws kicks spitefully, takes offense at trifles; in doubt obscurely. 8 unshapèd use incoherent manner. 9 collection inference, a guess at some sort of meaning; yawn gape, wonder; grasp. (The Folio reading, aim, is possible.) 10 botch patch. 11 Which which words; yield deliver, represent. 12 thought intended. 13 unhappily unpleasantly near the truth, shrewdly. 15 ill-breeding prone to suspect the worst and to make mischief. 18 toy trifle; amiss calamity. 19–20 So . . . split guilt is so full of suspicion that it unskilfully betrays itself in fearing betrayal. s.d. Enter Ophelia (In the First Quarto, Ophelia enters, "playing on a lute, and her hair down, singing.") 25 cockle hat hat with cockle-shell stuck in it as a sign that the wearer had been a pilgrim to the shrine of saint James of Compostela in spain. 26 shoon shoes.

OPHELIA: Say you? Nay, pray you, mark.

"He is dead and gone, lady, [Song.]
He is dead and gone;
At his head a grass-green turf,
At his heels a stone."
O, ho!

QUEEN: Nay, but Ophelia—
OPHELIA: Pray you, mark. [Sings.]

"White his shroud as the mountain snow"—
Enter KING.

QUEEN: Alas, look here, my lord.
OPHELIA:

"Larded° with sweet flowers; [Song.]
Which bewept to the ground did not go
With true-love showers."°

KING: How do you, pretty lady?
OPHELIA: Well, God 'ild° you! They say the owl° was a baker's daughter. Lord, we know what we are, but know not what we may be. God be at your table!
KING: Conceit° upon her father.
OPHELIA: Pray let's have no words of this; but when they ask you what it means, say you this:

"Tomorrow is Saint Valentine's day, [Song.]
All in the morning betime,°
And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine.
Then up he rose, and donned his clothes,
And dupped° the chamber door,
Let in the maid, that out a maid
Never departed more."

KING: Pretty Ophelia—
OPHELIA: Indeed, la, without an oath, I'll make an end on 't: [Sings.]

"By Gis° and by Saint Charity,
Alack, and fie for shame!
Young men will do 't, if they come to 't;
By Cock,° they are to blame.
Quoth she, 'Before you tumbled me,
You promised me to wed.'"

He answers:

" 'So would I ha' done, by yonder sun,
An° thou hadst not come to my bed.'"

38 Larded decorated. 40 showers i.e., tears. 42 God 'ild god yield or reward; owl (refers to a legend about a baker's daughter who was turned into an owl for being ungenerous when Jesus begged a loaf of bread.) 45 Conceit brooding. 49 betime early. 53 dupped did up, opened. 58 Gis Jesus. 61 Cock (a perversion of "god" in oaths; here also with a quibble on the slang word for penis.) 66 An if.

KING: How long hath she been thus?

OPHELIA: I hope all will be well. We must be patient, but I cannot choose but weep to think they would lay him i' the cold ground. My brother shall know of it. And so I thank you for your good counsel. Come, my coach! Good night, ladies, good night, sweet ladies, good night, good night. [Exit.]

KING [to HORATIO]: Follow her close. Give her good watch, I pray you. [Exit HORATIO.]

O, this is the poison of deep grief; it springs
All from her father's death—and now behold!
O Gertrude, Gertrude,
When sorrows come, they come not single spies,°
But in battalions. First, her father slain;
Next, your son gone, and he most violent author
Of his own just remove;° the people muddied,°
Thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers
For good Polonius' death—and we have done but greenly,°
In hugger-mugger° to inter him; poor Ophelia
Divided from herself and her fair judgment,
Without the which we are pictures or mere beasts;
Last, and as much containing° as all these,
Her brother is in secret come from France,
Feeds on this wonder, keeps himself in clouds,°
And wants° not buzzers° to infect his ear
With pestilent speeches of his father's death,
Wherein necessity,° of matter beggared,°
Will nothing stick our person to arraign
In ear and ear.° O my dear Gertrude, this,
Like to a murdering piece,° in many places
Gives me superfluous death.° A noise within.

QUEEN: Alack, what noise is this?

KING: Attend!° Where is my Switzers?° Let them guard the door.

Enter a MESSENGER.

What is the matter?

MESSENGER: Save yourself, my lord!
The ocean, overpeering of his list,°
Eats not the flats° with more impetuous° haste
Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,°
O'erbears your officers. The rabble call him lord,

77 spies scouts sent in advance of the main force. 80 remove removal; muddied stirred up, confused. 82 greenly in an inexperienced way, foolishly. 83 hugger-mugger secret haste. 86 as much containing as full of serious matter. 88 Feeds . . . clouds feeds his resentment or shocked grievance, holds himself inscrutable and aloof amid all this rumor. 89 wants lacks; buzzers gossipers, informers. 91 necessity i.e., the need to invent some plausible explanation; of matter beggared unprovided with facts. 92–93 Will . . . ear will not hesitate to accuse my (royal) person in everybody's ears. 94 murdering piece cannon loaded so as to scatter its shot. 95 Gives . . . death kills me over and over. 97 Attend i.e., guard me. 98 Switzers Swiss guards, mercenaries. 100 overpeering of his list overflowing its shore, boundary. 101 flats i.e., flatlands near shore; impetuous violent. (Perhaps also with the meaning of impiteous [impitious, Q2], "pitiless.") 102 head insurrection.

And, as° the world were now but to begin,
Antiquity forgot, custom not known,
The ratifiers and props of every word,°
They cry, "Choose we! Laertes shall be king!"
Caps,° hands, and tongues applaud it to the clouds,
"Laertes shall be king, Laertes king!"
QUEEN: How cheerfully on the false trail they cry! A noise within.
O, this is counter,° you false Danish dogs!

Enter LAERTES with others.

KING: The doors are broke.
LAERTES: Where is this King?—Sirs, stand you all without.
ALL: No, let's come in.
LAERTES: I pray you, give me leave.
ALL: We will, we will.
LAERTES: I thank you. Keep the door. [Exeunt followers.] O thou vile king,
Give me my father!
QUEEN [restraining him]: Calmly, good Laertes.
LAERTES: That drop of blood that's calm proclaims me bastard,
Cries cuckold to my father, brands the harlot
Even here, between° the chaste unsmirchèd brow
Of my true mother.
KING: What is the cause, Laertes,
That thy rebellion looks so giantlike?
Let him go, Gertrude. Do not fear our° person.
There's such divinity doth hedge° a king
That treason can but peep to what it would,° Acts little of his will.° Tell me, Laertes,
Why thou art thus incensed. Let him go, Gertrude.
Speak, man.
LAERTES: Where is my father?
KING: Dead.
QUEEN: But not by him.
KING: Let him demand his fill.
LAERTES: How came he dead? I'll not be juggled with.°
To hell, allegiance! Vows, to the blackest devil!
Conscience and grace, to the profoundest pit!
I dare damnation. To this point I stand,°
That both the worlds I give to negligence,°
Let come what comes, only I'll be revenged
Most throughly° for my father.
KING: Who shall stay you?

104 as as if. 106 The ratifiers . . . word i.e., antiquity (or tradition) and custom ought to confirm (ratify) and underprop our every word or promise. 108 Caps (The caps are thrown in the air.) 111 counter (a hunting term, meaning to follow the trail in a direction opposite to that which the game has taken.) 122 between in the middle of. 125 fear our fear for my. 126 hedge protect, as with a surrounding barrier. 127 can . . . would can only peep furtively, as through a barrier, at what it would intend. 128 Acts . . . will (but) performs little of what it intends. 132 juggled with cheated, deceived. 135 To . . . stand I am resolved in this. 136 both . . . negligence i.e., both this world and the next are of no consequence to me. 138 throughly thoroughly.

LAERTES: My will, not all the world's.°
And for° my means, I'll husband them so well
They shall go far with little.
KING: Good Laertes,
If you desire to know the certainty
Of your dear father, is 't writ in your revenge
That, swoopstake,° you will draw both friend and foe,
Winner and loser?
LAERTES: None but his enemies.
KING: Will you know them, then?
LAERTES: To his good friends thus wide I'll ope my arms,
And like the kind life-rendering pelican°
Repast° them with my blood.
KING: Why, now you speak
Like a good child and a true gentleman.
That I am guiltless of your father's death,
And am most sensibly° in grief for it,
It shall as level° to your judgment 'pear
As day does to your eye. A noise within.
LAERTES: How now, what noise is that?
Enter OPHELIA.

KING: Let her come in.
LAERTES: O heat, dry up my brains! Tears seven times salt
Burn out the sense and virtue° of mine eye!
By heaven, thy madness shall be paid with weight°
Till our scale turn the beam.° O rose of May!
Dear maid, kind sister, sweet Ophelia!
O heavens, is 't possible a young maid's wits
Should be as mortal as an old man's life?
Nature is fine in° love, and where 'tis fine
It sends some precious instance° of itself
After the thing it loves.°
OPHELIA: [Song.]

"They bore him barefaced on the bier,
Hey non nonny, nonny, hey nonny,
And in his grave rained many a tear—"

Fare you well, my dove!
LAERTES: Hadst thou thy wits and didst persuade° revenge,
It could not move thus.

140 My will . . . world's I'll stop (stay) when my will is accomplished, not for anyone else's. 141 for as for. 145 swoopstake i.e., indiscriminately. (Literally, taking all stakes on the gambling table at once. Draw is also a gambling term, meaning "taken from.") 150 pelican (refers to the belief that the female pelican fed its young with its own blood.) 151 Repast feed. 154 sensibly feelingly. 155 level plain. 159 virtue faculty, power. 160 paid with weight repaid, avenged equally or more. 161 beam crossbar of a balance. 165 fine in refined by. 166 instance token. 167 After . . . loves i.e., into the grave, along with Polonius. 172 persuade argue cogently for.

OPHELIA: You must sing "A-down a-down," and you "call him a-down-a."° O, how the wheel° becomes it! It is the false steward° that stole his master's daughter.

LAERTES: This nothing's more than matter.°

OPHELIA: There's rosemary,° that's for remembrance; pray you, love, remember. And there is pansies;° that's for thoughts.

LAERTES: A document° in madness, thoughts and remembrance fitted.

OPHELIA: There's fennel° for you, and columbines.° There's rue° for you, and here's some for me; we may call it herb of grace o' Sundays. You must wear your rue with a difference.° There's a daisy.° I would give you some violets,° but they withered all when my father died. They say 'a made a good end—

[Sings.] "For bonny sweet Robin is all my joy."

LAERTES: Thought° and affliction, passion,° hell itself,
She turns to favor° and to prettiness.

OPHELIA: [Song.]

"And will 'a not come again?
And will 'a not come again?
No, no, he is dead.
Go to thy deathbed,
He never will come again.

"His beard was as white as snow,
All flaxen was his poll.°
He is gone, he is gone,
And we cast away moan.
God ha' mercy on his soul!"

And of all Christian souls, I pray God. God b' wi' you.

[Exit, followed by GERTRUDE.]

LAERTES: Do you see this, O God?

KING: Laertes, I must commune with your grief,
Or you deny me right. Go but apart,
Make choice of whom° your wisest friends you will,
And they shall hear and judge twixt you and me.
If by direct or by collateral hand°
They find us touched,° we will our kingdom give,

174 You . . . a-down-a (Ophelia assigns the singing of refrains, like her own "Hey non nonny," to others present.) 175 wheel spinning wheel as accompaniment to the song, or refrain; false steward (The story is unknown.) 177 This . . . matter This seeming nonsense is more eloquent than sane utterance. 178 rosemary (used as a symbol of remembrance both at weddings and at funerals.) 179 pansies (emblems of love and courtship; perhaps from French pensées, "thoughts.") 180 document instruction, lesson. 181 fennel (emblem of flattery.); columbines (emblems of unchastity or ingratitude.); rue (emblem of repentance—a signification that is evident in its popular name, herb of grace.) 183 with a difference (a device used in heraldry to distinguish one family from another on the coat of arms, here suggesting that Ophelia and the others have different causes of sorrow and repentance; perhaps with a play on rue in the sense of "ruth," "pity."); daisy (emblem of dissembling, faithlessness.) 184 violets (emblems of faithfulness.) 187 Thought melancholy; passion suffering. 188 favor grace, beauty. 195 poll head. 203 whom whichever of. 205 collateral hand indirect agency. 206 us touched me implicated.

Our crown, our life, and all that we call ours
To you in satisfaction; but if not,
Be you content to lend your patience to us,
And we shall jointly labor with your soul
To give it due content.

LAERTES: Let this be so.
His means of death, his obscure funeral—
No trophy,° sword, nor hatchment° o'er his bones,
No noble rite, nor formal ostentation°—
Cry to be heard, as 'twere from heaven to earth,
That° I must call 't in question.°

KING: So you shall,
And where th' offense is, let the great ax fall.
I pray you, go with me.

Exeunt.

[4.6]

Enter HORATIO and others.

HORATIO: What are they that would speak with me?
GENTLEMAN: Seafaring men, sir. They say they have letters for you.
HORATIO: Let them come in.

[Exit GENTLEMAN.]

I do not know from what part of the world
I should be greeted, if not from Lord Hamlet.

Enter Sailors.

FIRST SAILOR: God bless you, sir.
HORATIO: Let him bless thee too.
FIRST SAILOR: 'A shall, sir, an 't° please him. There's a letter for you, sir—it came from th' ambassador° that was bound for England—if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know it is. [He gives a letter.]
HORATIO [reads]: "Horatio, when thou shalt have overlooked° this, give these fellows some means° to the King; they have letters for him. Ere we were two days old at sea, a pirate of very warlike appointment° gave us chase. Finding ourselves too slow of sail, we put on a compelled valor, and in the grapple I boarded them. On the instant they got clear of our ship, so I alone became their prisoner. They have dealt with me like thieves of mercy,° but they knew what they did: I am to do a good turn for them. Let the King have the letters I have sent, and repair° thou to me with as much speed as thou wouldest fly death. I have words to speak in thine ear will make thee dumb, yet are they much too light for the bore° of the matter. These good fellows will bring thee where I am. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern hold their course for England. Of them I have much to tell thee. Farewell.

213 trophy memorial; hatchment tablet displaying the armorial bearings of a deceased person. 214 ostentation ceremony. 216 That so that; call 't in question demand an explanation. [4.6] Location: The castle. 8 an 't if it. 9 th' ambassador (evidently Hamlet. The sailor is being circumspect.) 11 overlooked looked over. 12 means means of access. 13 appointment equipage. 16–17 thieves of mercy merciful thieves. 18 repair come. 20 bore caliber, i.e., importance.

He that thou knowest thine, Hamlet."
Come, I will give you way° for these your letters,
And do 't the speedier that you may direct me
To him from whom you brought them. Exeunt.

[4.7]

Enter KING and LAERTES.

KING: Now must your conscience my acquittance seal,°
And you must put me in your heart for friend,
Sith° you have heard, and with a knowing ear,
That he which hath your noble father slain
Pursued my life.
LAERTES: It well appears. But tell me
Why you proceeded not against these feats°
So crimeful and so capital° in nature,
As by your safety, greatness, wisdom, all things else,
You mainly° were stirred up.
KING: O, for two special reasons,
Which may to you perhaps seem much unsinewed,°
But yet to me they're strong. The Queen his mother
Lives almost by his looks, and for myself—
My virtue or my plague, be it either which—
She is so conjunctive° to my life and soul
That, as the star moves not but in his° sphere,°
I could not but by her. The other motive
Why to a public count° I might not go
Is the great love the general gender° bear him,
Who, dipping all his faults in their affection,
Work° like the spring° that turneth wood to stone,
Convert his gyves° to graces, so that my arrows,
Too slightly timbered° for so loud° a wind,
Would have reverted° to my bow again
But not where I had aimed them.
LAERTES: And so have I a noble father lost,
A sister driven into desperate terms,°
Whose worth, if praises may go back° again,
Stood challenger on mount° of all the age
For her perfections. But my revenge will come.
KING: Break not your sleeps for that. You must not think
That we are made of stuff so flat and dull

25 way means of access. [4.7] Location: The castle. 1 my acquittance seal confirm or acknowledge my innocence. 3 Sith since. 6 feats acts. 7 capital punishable by death. 9 mainly greatly. 11 unsinewed weak. 15 conjunctive closely united. (An astronomical metaphor.) 16 his its; sphere one of the hollow spheres in which, according to Ptolematic astronomy, the planets were supposed to move. 18 count account, reckoning, indictment. 19 general gender common people. 21 Work operate, act; spring i.e., a spring with such a concentration of lime that it coats a piece of wood with limestone, in effect gilding and petrifying it. 22 gyves fetters (which, gilded by the people's praise, would look like badges of honor). 23 slightly timbered light; loud (suggesting public outcry on Hamlet's behalf). 24 reverted returned. 27 terms state, condition. 28 go back i.e., recall what she was. 29 on mount set up on high.

That we can let our beard be shook with danger
And think it pastime. You shortly shall hear more.
I loved your father, and we love ourself;
And that, I hope, will teach you to imagine—

Enter a MESSENGER with letters.

How now? What news?
MESSENGER: Letters, my lord, from Hamlet:
This to Your Majesty, this to the queen. [He gives letters.]
KING: From Hamlet? Who brought them?
MESSENGER: Sailors, my lord, they say. I saw them not.
They were given me by Claudio. He received them
Of him that brought them.
KING: Laertes, you shall hear them.—
Leave us. [Exit MESSENGER.]
[He reads.] "High and mighty, you shall know I am set naked° on your kingdom. Tomorrow shall I beg leave to see your kingly eyes, when I shall, first asking your pardon,° thereunto recount the occasion of my sudden and more strange return. Hamlet."
What should this mean? Are all the rest come back?
Or is it some abuse,° and no such thing?°
LAERTES: Know you the hand?
KING: 'Tis Hamlet's character.° "Naked!"
And in a postscript here he says "alone."
Can you devise° me?
LAERTES: I am lost in it, my lord. But let him come.
It warms the very sickness in my heart
That I shall live and tell him to his teeth,
"Thus didst thou."°
KING: If it be so, Laertes—
As how should it be so? How otherwise?°—
Will you be ruled by me?
LAERTES: Ay, my lord,
So° you will not o'errule me to a peace.
KING: To thine own peace. If he be now returned,
As checking at° his voyage, and that° he means
No more to undertake it, I will work him
To an exploit, now ripe in my device,°
Under the which he shall not choose but fall;
And for his death no wind of blame shall breathe,
But even his mother shall uncharge the practice°
And call it accident.

45 naked destitute, unarmed, without following. 47 pardon permission. 50 abuse deceit; no such thing not what it appears. 51 character handwriting. 53 devise explain to. 57 Thus didst thou i.e., here's for what you did to my father. 58 As . . . otherwise How can this (Hamlet's return) be true? Yet how otherwise than true (since we have the evidence of his letter)? 60 So provided that. 62 checking at i.e., turning aside from (like a falcon leaving the quarry to fly at a chance bird); that if. 64 device devising, invention. 67 uncharge the practice acquit the stratagem of being a plot.

LAERTES: My lord, I will be ruled,
The rather if you could devise it so
That I might be the organ.°
KING: It falls right.
You have been talked of since your travel much,
And that in Hamlet's hearing, for a quality
Wherein they say you shine. Your sum of parts°
Did not together pluck such envy from him
As did that one, and that, in my regard,
Of the unworthiest siege.°
LAERTES: What part is that, my lord?
KING: A very ribbon in the cap of youth,
Yet needful too, for youth no less becomes°
The light and careless livery that it wears
Than settled age his sables° and his weeds°
Importing health and graveness.° Two months since
Here was a gentleman of Normandy.
I have seen myself, and served against, the French,
And they can well° on horseback, but this gallant
Had witchcraft in 't; he grew unto his seat,
And to such wondrous doing brought his horse
As had he been incorpsed and demi-natured°
With the brave beast. So far he topped° my thought
That I in forgery° of shapes and tricks
Come short of what he did.
LAERTES: A Norman was 't?
KING: A Norman.
LAERTES: Upon my life, Lamord.
KING: The very same.
LAERTES: I know him well. He is the brooch° indeed
And gem of all the nation.
KING: He made confession° of you,
And gave you such a masterly report
For art and exercise in your defense,°
And for your rapier most especial,
That he cried out 'twould be a sight indeed
If one could match you. Th' escrimers° of their nation,
He swore, had neither motion, guard, nor eye
If you opposed them. Sir, this report of his Did Hamlet so envenom with his envy
That he could nothing do but wish and beg
Your sudden° coming o'er, to play° with you.
Now, out of this—

70 organ agent, instrument. 73 Your . . . parts i.e., all your other virtues. 76 unworthiest siege least important rank. 79 no less becomes is no less suited by. 81 his sables its rich robes furred with sable; weeds garments. 82 Importing . . . graveness signifying a concern for health and dignified prosperity; also, giving an impression of comfortable prosperity. 85 can well are skilled. 88 As . . . demi-natured as if he had been of one body and nearly of one nature (like the centaur). 89 topped surpassed. 90 forgery imagining. 94 brooch ornament. 96 confession testimonial, admission of superiority. 98 For . . . defense with respect to your skill and practice with your weapon. 101 escrimers fencers. 106 sudden immediate; play fence.

LAERTES: What out of this, my lord?
KING: Laertes, was your father dear to you?
Or are you like the painting of a sorrow,
A face without a heart?
LAERTES: Why ask you this?
KING: Not that I think you did not love your father,
But that I know love is begun by time,°
And that I see, in passages of proof,°
Time qualifies° the spark and fire of it.
There lives within the very flame of love
A kind of wick or snuff° that will abate it,
And nothing is at a like goodness still,°
For goodness, growing to a pleurisy,°
Dies in his own too much.° That° we would do,
We should do when we would; for this "would" changes
And hath abatements° and delays as many
As there are tongues, are hands, are accidents,°
And then this "should" is like a spendthrift sigh,°
That hurts by easing.° But, to the quick o' th' ulcer:°
Hamlet comes back. What would you undertake
To show yourself in deed your father's son
More than in words?
LAERTES: To cut his throat i' the church.
KING: No place, indeed, should murder sanctuarize;°
Revenge should have no bounds. But good Laertes,
Will you do this,° keep close within your chamber.
Hamlet returned shall know you are come home.
We'll put on those shall° praise your excellence
And set a double varnish on the fame
The Frenchman gave you, bring you in fine° together,
And wager on your heads. He, being remiss,°
Most generous,° and free from all contriving,
Will not peruse the foils, so that with ease,
Or with a little shuffling, you may choose
A sword unbated,° and in a pass of practice°
Requite him for your father.

112 begun by time i.e., created by the right circumstance and hence subject to change. 113 passages of proof actual instances that prove it. 114 qualifies weakens, moderates. 116 snuff the charred part of a candlewick. 117 nothing . . . still nothing remains at a constant level of perfection. 118 pleurisy excess, plethora. (Literally, a chest inflammation.) 119 in . . . much of its own excess; That that which. 121 abatements diminutions. 122 As . . . accidents as there are tongues to dissuade, hands to prevent, and chance events to intervene. 123 spendthrift sigh (an allusion to the belief that sighs draw blood from the heart.) 124 hurts by easing i.e., costs the heart blood and wastes precious opportunity even while it affords emotional relief; quick o' th' ulcer i.e., heart of the matter. 128 sanctuarize protect from punishment. (Alludes to the right of sanctuary with which certain religious places were invested.) 130 Will you do this if you wish to do this. 132 put on those shall arrange for some to. 134 in fine finally. 135 remiss negligently unsuspicious. 136 generous noble-minded. 139 unbated not blunted, having no button; pass of practice treacherous thrust.

LAERTES: I will do 't,
And for that purpose I'll anoint my sword.
I bought an unction° of a mountebank°
So mortal that, but dip a knife in it,
Where it draws blood no cataplasm° so rare,
Collected from all simples° that have virtue°
Under the moon,° can save the thing from death
That is but scratched withal. I'll touch my point
With this contagion, that if I gall° him slightly,
It may be death.
KING: Let's further think of this,
Weigh what convenience both of time and means
May fit us to our shape.° If this should fail,
And that our drift look through our bad performance,°
'Twere better not assayed. Therefore this project
Should have a back or second, that might hold
If this did blast in proof.° Soft, let me see.
We'll make a solemn wager on your cunnings°—
I ha 't!
When in your motion you are hot and dry—
As° make your bouts more violent to that end—
And that he calls for drink, I'll have prepared him
A chalice for the nonce,° whereon but sipping,
If he by chance escape your venomed stuck,°
Our purpose may hold there. [A cry within.] But stay, what noise?

Enter QUEEN.

QUEEN: One woe doth tread upon another's heel,
So fast they follow. Your sister's drowned, Laertes.
LAERTES: Drowned! O, where?
QUEEN: There is a willow grows askant° the brook,
That shows his hoar leaves° in the glassy stream;
Therewith fantastic garlands did she make
Of crowflowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples,°
That liberal° shepherds give a grosser name,°
But our cold° maids do dead men's fingers call them.
There on the pendent° boughs her crownet° weeds
Clamb'ring to hang, an envious sliver° broke,
When down her weedy° trophies and herself

142 unction ointment; mountebank quack doctor. 144 cataplasm plaster or poultice. 145 simples herbs; virtue potency. 146 Under the moon i.e., anywhere (with reference perhaps to the belief that herbs gathered at night had a special power). 148 gall graze, wound. 152 shape part we propose to act. 153 drift . . . performance intention should be made visible by our bungling. 156 blast in proof burst in the test (like a cannon). 157 cunnings respective skills. 160 As i.e., and you should. 162 nonce occasion. 163 stuck thrust. (From stoccado, a fencing term.) 168 askant aslant. 169 hoar leaves white or gray undersides of the leaves. 171 long purples early purple orchids. 172 liberal free-spoken; a grosser name (the testicle-resembling tubers of the orchid, which also in some cases resemble dead men's fingers, have earned various slang names like "dogstones" and "cullions.") 173 cold chaste. 174 pendent over-hanging; crownet made into a chaplet or coronet. 175 envious sliver malicious branch. 176 weedy i.e., of plants.

Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide,
And mermaidlike awhile they bore her up,
Which time she chanted snatches of old lauds,°
As one incapable of° her own distress,
Or like a creature native and endued°
Unto that element. But long it could not be Till that her garments, heavy with their drink,
Pulled the poor wretch from her melodious lay
To muddy death.

LAERTES: Alas, then she is drowned?

QUEEN: Drowned, drowned.

LAERTES: Too much of water hast thou, poor Ophelia,
And therefore I forbid my tears. But yet
It is our trick;° nature her custom holds,
Let shame say what it will. [He weeps.] When these are gone,
The woman will be out.° Adieu, my lord.
I have a speech of fire that fain would blaze,
But that this folly douts° it. Exit.

KING: Let's follow, Gertrude.
How much I had to do to calm his rage!
Now fear I this will give it start again;
Therefore let's follow. Exeunt.

[5.1]

Enter two CLOWNS° [with spades and mattocks].

FIRST CLOWN: Is she to be buried in Christian burial, when she willfully seeks her own salvation?°

SECOND CLOWN: I tell thee she is; therefore make her grave straight.° The crowner° hath sat on her,° and finds it° Christian burial.

FIRST CLOWN: How can that be, unless she drowned herself in her own defense?

SECOND CLOWN: Why, 'tis found so.°

