The first example of when I'm going to persuade someone on a topic relevant to my job is when patients are going to need drugs, and I will use pharmacology to prescribe the best drugs for them. Secondly, when doing a surgical operation on the patient, I will use both anatomy and physiology to persuade my fellow nurses and patients on how body systems and structures operate and interact. Thirdly, when dealing with breast-feeding mothers, I will use the human development topic to persuade them to provide the right care and nutrition to their babies. The understanding audience is going to help me to build a common ground for me and my audience to give the best care to them. When the authors write a persuasive essay, they aim to convince and persuade their audience that their claim, assertion, or opinion they are writing about is correct or valid, (Smith,p.23). Gaining the aforementioned skills is going to help me in understanding how to argue my point out.
