Heart of Darkness

Imperialism refers to the colonization times that occurred in Asian and African countries. In this paper we are also going to look at how the European countries looked down upon the Africans during the colonization periods. Marlow also was able to be an eye witness on how the blacks were being treated as slaves. In Heart of Darkness, Conrad expressly chose two criteria-productivity and the "thought" of the humanizing mission to judge colonialism. Even though he did not embrace these qualities (which social Darwinists used to legitimize European development), he picked them since they were mainstream and appropriate to ensure the impossible to miss misuse of the Congo by King Leopold II.

Dissimilar to capital-rich colonialism, which could look for long haul advancement, Leopold's capital-poor government brought about rushed misuse of surface assets through constrained work. Conrad's story intensely delineated the extraordinary wastefulness and pitilessness of such abuse. As in his other pioneer books, Conrad went ahead to suggest a further judgment against a wide range of government, even England's, a result of their cooperation, antagonism, and rude interruption of indigenous societies.

Marlow starts his story with an abstract of the historical backdrop of the European government, the procedure by which Western human progress has spread the world over since its commencement. "I was considering ancient times, when the Romans first came here to Britain nineteen hundred years back—" toward the start of the Christian period, altogether enough. Depicting the hardships of the Roman troops battling against the antagonistic wild, he thinks about how it would be if a Roman would in some inland post feel the brutality, the utter viciousness, had shut around him. All that baffling existence of the wild that blends in the woods, in the wildernesses, in the hearts of wild men. There's no start either into such puzzles. He needs to live amidst the limitless, which is additionally abominable. What's more, it has an interest that goes to work with him—you know, envision the developing second thoughts, the aching to get away, the frail nauseate, the surrender, the scorn (Hemalatha,p. 835).

² All through Conrad's vocation Heart of Darkness stayed one of his most well-known and exceedingly important works. The novella points of interest the narrative of the sailor Marlow who, straight from Europe, is sent on a pontoon venture up the Congo River to alleviate Kurtz, the best merchant in ivory working for the Belgian government. Before their experience, Marlow knows and appreciates Kurtz through his notoriety and his actions on the humanizing of the African mainland and sets out on the excursion energized at the possibility of meeting him. In any case, Marlow's involvement in Africa rouses aversion at the dehumanizing impacts of ¹ expansionism. This objection comes full circle when he finds that Kurtz has declined. From an edified civilized into a horrible, eager for power subjugator of the African locals. Marlow's adventure constrains him to go up against Kurtz's debasement as well as those components inside himself that are liable to the same enticements that influenced Kurtz.

From the narration of the story by Marlow, he had hoped on imperialism. But the reasons that he gave to support his wish or statement have much less to do or associate the impact of colonialism towards colonized nations and individuals. In his statement, he says that it might result in degradation of the superiority of the Europeans by separating them from European Context society. This is later expected to trigger violent behaviours from individuals because of the hostile environment. Marlow then also said that the civilization and enlightenment process of the residents was deceived. He was also in disbelief when he saw how the natives were being mishandled and mistreated. He concluded that there was lineage between the white and the black. However, this lineage was not reliable.

According to Abu-Snoubar (p 5), he also saw how people were being mistreated because they had inferior war weapons as compared to them. He did not directly disagree with this kind of mistreatment, but he chose to walk away and just accept that this kind of power abuse was happening. This was a clear indication that he was against these forms of conviction. The Whites also exploited the Black people, and this led to racial discrimination. This is noticed as the European were allowed to possess the land from any region. Marlow named or called the residents as savages. He also tells Kurtz that the European people were planning to civilize the blacks.

Conclusively, Marlow believed that colonization and imperialism would have impacted positively on Africans love. Europe was quite developed, so they thought they could transform the black people too. However, things did not turn out to be as expected as there was much abuse of power. These made Marlow unsettled because of what was happening.
