My Understanding of Social Science

Humanity and the striking social reform with advancement and transition necessitates a consistent discipline that evaluates social contact and the socioeconomic issues that plague civilization. As a result, the advancement of 'social science' surfaced in the framework of unprecedented systemic change. My understanding of social science is that it tries to explain social phenomena within the parenthesis of the available evidence. Social science teaches us something about the universe over and above our everyday experience. It can help us understand how our society functions - from the factors that cause unemployment to promote wealth creation, how and why voters vote, and what motivates people.

Basically, in my daily life, social science applies in many ways. For instance, I sometimes visit a restaurant with my family or friends, watch a movie or a football match, where we get to interact, share stories, and have fun. In this case, what I am engaged in is called social interaction based on the understanding of social science. In this case, social science explains how and why I interact with the people I interact with. Beyond that, social science is significant in helping me have a more robust idea of how society functions. At a personal level, it assists me in understanding how to engage with different people and systems for my benefit and society in general. That explains why the discipline helps us understand how we function as members of a society and interact with each other.

More importantly, using the example given above, while interacting with my friends and family, I want to understand how to scrutinize their behaviors and the conduct and motivation of my close friends and relatives. Social science gives me a rough idea of being more inclusive and effective at communicating with others. I understand why others behave in the manner they do, what offends them, and how systems work to have better and functioning institutions, society, and cultures. That is my understanding of social science.
