Frank Hague served diligently as mayor of Jersey City for a period of thirty years. Hague was a democratic state chairman and had a significant influence on the people than any person. Through Hague, the Democrat was able to win the governorship because of the strong political organization. On the other hand, when they lost, it was because the Republican has truncated Hague's inspiration. Besides, Hague respected the rights of voting for the women and allowed women to vote.

Moreover, Hague employed Congresswoman Mary Norton to enhance his voter-support base. Similarly, Hague also fostered education and health for the people. For instance, Hague built public schools and hospitals such as Margaret Hague Maternity Hospital, a name he took after his beloved mother and the Jersey City Medical Center Complex (Birkner et al., 2012).

Other people reacted negatively to the actions of Hague; for instance, David Dayton said that Hague was in power because through using means such as threatening rivals, making a false arrest to silence his opponents, directing newspapers, and attractive in wiretapping. Hague relates to the present because of allowing women to vote and promoting the welfare of the women. Moreover, the slogan used by Hague of "the unbossed" brought about democracy. Furthermore, the development of schools and hospitals which were affordable enabled people to be educated and develop in good health (Birkner et al., 2012). Hague actions were part of the fight among the democrats. The democrats had taken New Jersey politics to their benefit, and when Hague rose to power, he referred to himself as the law because of the inspiration he had. Despite being having many enemies in the political career, Hague managed to dispense favors and court the voters to remain popular in his constituents.
