Re: Steps using COP/POP Philosophy to solve the problem in the Scenario

Purpose: The purpose of this memorandum is to explain steps using the COP/POP philosophy to solve the subject's problem causing security challenges to the community.

Analyze: Problem-oriented policing (POP) is the diagnosis and solving of challenges that are intensifying the crime dangers, especially in regions experiencing relatively high levels of crimes. Therefore, considering that the subject under scrutiny is causing significant risk to the community around them, nevertheless, the disability nature results in the police not focusing on their arrest as well as the fire department. Similarly, despite the increase in dangers he causes for instance shouting profanity at anyone in the society, unsettling traffic and trespassing into other people's property, a lot of people are not pressing charges due to his condition. Again, the police do not do anything to arrest the subject. Likewise, the main reason for the police to ignore minor arrest warrants is because of the medical expenses they encountered with the subject.

Response: Problem-oriented policing will be able to deal with the problem because it is more effective than in solving different forms of problems. Problem-oriented policing is essential as it is in a position to enhance the relationship between law enforcement officials and the community as the problem solving is done in collaboration of the two parties. Also, POP is effective for decreasing crime in areas of increased risks such as where the subject trespasses other people's property. Furthermore, the capability of the police gathering more information from the community about the subject will allow them to solve other more serious crime problems.

To solve the problem the police need to collect as much information as possible from the community members about the subject threat to security. Additionally, understanding the disorders the subject has is also a critical aspect in solving the crime. The police will then have meetings with the community frequently and develop solutions together. The causes that make the subject to perform such actions will then be assessed to understand how they will solve the problem on an individual basis. Therefore, to solve the problem the subject need counsel to ensure they know what is right for them and realize that they are members of the community just like other people. Similarly, mental health support is also essential for the subject. Furthermore, another critical solution is changing the subject's environment to make it more hospitable as they need to feel loved and taken care of. For example, the subject currently lives with a caregiver who is busy managing the grocery and this provides limited time to take care of them. This results in the subject to go and take alcohol despite the health conditions.
