During the day's life different and proved not to be conducive to one gender. For the 1950s young mothers were not expected to seek any job. The women faced a captive life in society. They were few women and ladies who were in professional careers. They were frustrated in a society that was characterized by a patriarchal society. Society indicated that only the achievement of a woman will be evident when they undertook housewife and child care. The female gender was considered inferior during the years that subjected them to problems. Restrictions were bound to some genders that made it hard for some of the cohabitants in the society (Litt, 2019).

Family setups have changed drastically from the formations in the where the children in households where family structures had changed due to low fertility levels due to aging populations. Through this, the family's growing share has changed drastically. The population around were predominant with a population of two to one children. Where there was more population included more than three children. There are falling partnership patterns with falling marriage rates and increasing divorce that included single parents. In some counties, the marriage rates were very high that corresponded to divorce. In some places, there were reported cases in some countries where the marriage rates were minimal in some countries such as Switzerland. The decline in marriage rates led to the emergence of co-parenting among the people. Which has resulted in living apart together and civil partnership. The partnership generation has radically changed the younger generation which has re-structured the family view.

Female market labor participation has increased as compared to the earlier days where the female gender has moved more in getting higher education that has resulted to them having job opportunities some of the countries with this change include new Zealand. There has been a stable record of female employment statistics when it's compared in the early days. The rate of women involved in paid work has also increased drastically from the 1980s. But there is also a margin between the paid and unpaid based on the gender difference, where women have secured temporary employment as compared to males who have permanent jobs.

During the old days, time grandparents spent more time with the families as compared to the current situation. The important issues that were addressed during the days include the teaching of valuable skills that are upheld in society. They also provided comfort and support to the children by exhibiting unconditional love. They were the basis of the children learning more about their parents, by knowing the character that they had in the young days. A time with the grandchildren was important because the children have time to interact with them. Technology has led to family efficiencies by making it easy to plan for a snap by eradicating costs that could be incurred traveling to meet to make the plans. There is also erasing of geographical boundaries where video calls have been used bring relatives close to each other despite the distance factor. There is created a shared experience where family groups have been set up to allow interaction despite their difference in geographical positions, family members can now capture new memories among the family members. The parents have engaging apps that have helped in making follow-up of their children in the school setting which has maintained a good relationship with teachers. There is the establishment of home security systems that have promoted correspondence in danger alarms that have become efficient for the safety of family members (Lee, et al 2021).

From the family perspective back in the 1950s, there was decreased social stigma where the divorce cases were minimal as compared to the current trends in the families. The perception of raising girls in the 50s and now are similar where the female gender is considered to grow and have good conduct. But there is a change in perception on how the early days where females were not given a chance to attend school but were merely expected to participate in house chores which contradicts my perception where ladies should get equal education with the male gender to be competitive in the job markets. There is also a similarity in the upbringing of male children in the 1950s and now where they are considered to be responsible and strong and developed more authority of their selves. The early parents seemed to be restrictive as compared to parents today who are more permissive that have developed independently in the young generation. Family cohesiveness was more as compared to today where you find families now have separated in search for greener pastures but in the early society, they were living in suburbs and maintained with the local jobs. From the analysis of the family, there have been rampant changes in their setting and gender roles.

One of the positive changes is increased freedom where children are allowed to choose the paths of their careers and their spouses as compared to the earlier days when the parents made most of the decisions. There are equal opportunities in education and job opportunities this has increased feminism where the girl child has been given equal chances like the boy child in all fields. There are also renitent gender roles that have varied from the early days where now males and females can partake in any duties regardless of the gender in pursuit of economic excellence. Women empowerment have been intensified by the feminist movements that have promoted the position of girl child in society. Negative experiences include higher divorce levels that have been resulted from economic problems and domestic violence. There is an increased number of single parents due to irresponsible parenting from the parents who lack cooperation and move to break up. Due to digitalization there is increased loss of family values as culture has evolved due to new knowledge introduced.
