Conclusion

The above discussion concerning mutual aid in society brings out the fact that people must depend on each other in one way or the other to enable them to achieve their basic needs in society. The mutual aid support systems are aimed at helping the needy in society. Through these systems, they can find various basic life wants that they can hardly achieve due to their low-income capabilities. On the other hand, one of the main key takeaway points is that people in society are not equal in terms of economic income. Therefore there is every need for people to interdepend on each other for survival. Another evident basic of the discussion is that to elevate others from poverty, the privileged members of the society need to form and join mutual aid programs, donate to these programs towards helping the needy cushion themselves from the harsh economic times they face. Moreover, one of the major parts is that mutual aid programs have a way of uniting members of society since people from different ethnic backgrounds and societal classes unite at different levels through these programs.

The big picture is that in society, people are not of the same economic capability. Therefore, every privileged member of society needs to come to the rescue of poor people during harsh economic times. During harsh economic times like Covid-19 pandemic duration, poor members of the society find it difficult to manage basic needs; being aware of this; privileged members should consider a given need and donate towards helping the poor achieve that specific need. For instance, lack of money for buying diapers among the poor members of the New York state. The interviewed individuals are unable to purchase this vital commodity for their children. The interview revealed how willing and happy they were to be parts of the Diapers Assistance program that help the poor in the New York state find the basic need. The whole project showed that people should come to the rescue of each other during difficult times to reduce the poverty gap in society.

Consequently, the data provided answered the research question. From the result, most of the interviewed members of the diaper assistance program replied that the main reason why they joined the program was that they wanted to help those in need, in this case, diapers. This answer resonates well with the research question asking the interviewed individuals to show why they joined the program of diapers assistance. Additionally, the research results relate well with the literature review of this project because the diapers assistance program aimed at providing diapers to families that lacked the commodity shows how people mutually benefit from each other through mutual aid in the society for survival. The literature review shows various publications pointing to mutual aid to assist the less privileged in society, and that exactly what this paper's result finds through the diaper assistance program.

For future research, information gathered is critical in providing future researchers with a clear insight into how mutual aid programs can help the needy in society. Future researchers will have basic information that they can use to further their research. In addition, if I were to re-do this research, I would change my methodology by moving my research to a rural state or a third-world country to understand how mutual aid programs assist the poor in society. Nevertheless, my research is important because it clarifies social segregation by the difference in economic incomes. Such results may make sway those privileged in society to help the poor and make the government form social policies to cushion their citizens from hard economic times. Through coming up with programs to provide them with such needs.
