

Friedman and Ghemawat offered different views on globalization. Friedman argued that Internet made the world "flat," while Ghemawat argued that our global connectivity through Internet and social media is, in fact, limited.

In your post, briefly summarize each position, and reflect their arguments on your own internet and social media usage. How global is your own personal world, and how is internet contributing to it? What factors, do you think, may be preventing your personal connections becoming more global?