Survey

The most notable thing about the survey is that it is well structured, easy to read through, and takes a limited amount of time to complete the survey questions. It took me less than a minute to complete the survey. It adheres to the principle that simplicity is king. Surveys are structured differently, but this particular one is simple, and as I read through, I can focus on each question and give my best response. Regrettably, the survey has restricted my ability to offer additional information because it has multiple choices. In this case, the answer I can give is limited in terms of scope and explanation. The surveyor intends to get certain specific answers from me based on the choices offered.

I also noticed that the survey questions, to a large extent, are double-barreled, as suggested in the document about things to know in surveys. I found some of the questions problematic. For instance, depending on how one views them, some of the questions have multiple correct answers. For instance, there is a question talking about what the respondents love when using G-mail. The multiple answers to this question are all correct. Another question without a single answer talks about how often we listen to music. In addition to that, though the questions are straightforward, but biased to a certain extent. For instance, the surveyor asks what their favorite thing about G-mail is when the respondents use G-mail. Based on this question, the surveyor has already concluded that the respondents use G-mail and not any other platform, which is biased in my opinion.

Some of the questions pinpointed should be appropriately framed because, as they are structured, they are subjective and offer the respondents little room for choice. In addition to that, some of the questions, like the one on G-mail, have correct answers. It is confusing to the respondent, especially when one is required to select a single choice.
