On reflection of the “Amongst white clouds” film directed by Edward Burger, I find a well-collected documentary played to show the rich culture of Buddhists in China through the Hermits. The film reveals that the Buddhists for centuries have resided in the mountains and for a very long time, many people have not been able to understand their culture due to their distinct and unique way of life. Additionally, I find the director keen on displaying these hidden Buddhist cultures by balancing the dialogue with the hermits who talk about their daily insights while living in the mountains. Consequently, through such discussion, we find that the hermits engage in land practices whereby some live alone while others opt to live in groups with strict adherence to the Chinese culture. Notably, it is evident through the conversation that the hermits lead a very difficult life in the mountains, as portrayed by their honesty when they agreed that it is so lonely leaving up there in the mountains. Lastly, I commend the director for a job well done covering the hermits’ experiences in the mountain in consideration of how other Buddhists live around the world.
