Ethical standards are principles that are based on human morals of what is right or wrong. The codes are created by the founders of the company to provide a foundation or structure that can be used as direction during the decision making process. This helps the employees align their behavior and skills according to the company's ethical principles through transparency, trustworthiness, and integrity. Legal standards are principles set by the government and are important because the rules tell people what they should and should not do. These standards are enforced by local authorities who can administer a form of punishment to the wrongdoer. For instance, if a person steals a car, the individual will be arrested because stealing is wrong, and it is not allowed.

The scope of community practice applies to a group of people who care about a passion for something they do or the same real-life issues. The people from these groups regularly interact to learn from each other through their expertise and knowledge (Pyrko et al., 2017). For instance, a community can create a program or an initiative to help reduce drug abuse among youths. Statute of limitation is a judicial act that restricts the time involved parties have to begin legal proceedings from the date the events occurred. The statute of limitations was developed to protect individuals against claims after the witness has disappeared or lost evidence (Hawkins, 2018). For example, for medical malpractice, the statute of limitations is two years. If one waits for two days or more after the limitation, then the case becomes null and void since they cannot sue for medical malpractice.
