The United States has had its fair share of political drama over the last few months. The issue that took center stage and triggered political intervention was the issue of racism. This was after the killing of George Floyd, a man with a black skin tone. This raised tension in various states in the United States and the whole world in general. The Black Lives Matter movement was then born, and it opened massive campaigns against racism across the globe. The initiative triggered constitutional action, bill of rights acts, the Congress's efforts, and the presidency and the courts.

Constitutional Action and the Bill of Rights

The fight against racism in the United States spiked constitutional actions. The people in the states suddenly started to exercise the constitutional rights of assembly and freedom of speech (Szetela, 2020). The murder of George by the police made various people in the state very angry such that they immediately started demonstrations. They assemble in groups converse, and from such meetings, protests were started. The bill of rights was also exercised as the fight for justice murder of George began, and there was pressure to arrest and prosecute the officer capable of committing the offense.

The Presidency, Action by Congress and The Courts

The three arms of government played a part in the fight against racism. The Black Lives Matter campaigns spiked political tension. The saw the Congress in the United States stated new laws about discrimination. The president of the United States was forced to address the nation regarding the incident and the demonstrations that were happening all over America. The federal courts were not spares, either as there was public pressure to prosecute the murder suspects.
