Should All Americans Have Access to Healthcare?

Health is a crucial element in individuals' life; therefore, the United States should have healthcare for all because of the significant benefits it will obtain. For example, Paguyo (2020) argue that healthcare for all is essential for enhancing economic productivity. When individuals have access to quality health services, they will live healthy lives and reduce the likelihood of missing work, contributing more to the economy. Access to health services is essential for all Americans because it is the required basis of a just society (Gerisch, 2017). This is because, through individuals having better healthcare, they can have the opportunity to engage in partisan, societal and economic activities in the society. Therefore, it maintains them as entirely participating residents. Another reason for having healthcare for all people is because the government can enforce regulations and taxes to control citizens from making a healthier decision such as prohibited drugs. Also, the government can control the healthcare prices through negotiations and regulation hence reducing cost overly.
