Game Of Thrones Review

Introduction

The “games of thrones” is an amazing book that covers the entire character of the humankind and the handle about running their daily life. It shows the whole character of the human race and how egocentric human beings are as long as they satisfy the self-help goals irrespective of the many people they harm along their way to achieving that goal. The article precisely shows the high thirst human beings have for power and how the same thirst can lead to the destruction of the human race. It also counts on decision making as a single small error in a decision can bring about the failure of many considering the person as a leader. The best way is only good decisions and good leaders for the best interest in the growth of the entire human race.

The human race has, for a long time, been in a game of gaining power for personal gain, as illustrated in the game of thrones. The seven kingdoms are answerable to King Robert Baratheon, who is majorly focused on the little progress of the kingdom but fun just like hunting and womanizing rather than being a good leader. As (Muller et al.2017), bad leadership with little management will only end to little and even no success. Cersei Lannister, the queen to king Robert sire’s kids with his brother, who are to be the ones in the line to the throne, the most prestigious and powerful seat in the kingdom. The thirst for power and the fear of losing the seat because the kids were not King Robert's caused death to the Lord John Arryn, the king's right-hand advisor, well known as "Hand of the King." Lord Arryn is poisoned by Cersei Lannister, showing how human prioritizes power over human life to ensure he doesn't tell the secret to King Robert. The king is so busy having fun that he can't just even know that behind his back, bad doings against his Kingdom were happening, portraying how poor leaders have power in the society stalling growth.

Conclusion

The love for our gain is the beginning of most of human failure. The thirst for power or dominance is highly prioritized that people forget that it is service to humanity rather than service to personal stomachs. It shows how poor decision-makers humankind is, and there will be no room for a hundred percent efficiency as we will always remain selfish.
