Discussion #5 Federal Government

The discussion focuses on the typology that is associated with the different groups in the United States concerning religious and social issues. It explains Republican and Democratic political strategies on social issues (especially on religion) since the 1960s. In some cases, there have arisen different cases of the social and religious profiling, and some of the decision tends to conflict each other as the ideology behind the past and the present decision are so divided in reasoning. The cases of the 1960s when ² the Supreme Court banned prayer and Bible readings in the public schools and, in 1973, ruled that abortion was legal during the first trimester of pregnancy, which was dismay to most of the religious persons.

In the religious affiliation, there has been a division in the opinions from the democrats, and the republican as the sense of the ¹ belief in the existence of God varies with some of the people believing that God exists. In contrast, others ¹ believe that God doesn't exist. The attachment of morality and belief in God does not apply to the persons ¹ who don't believe in the existence of God. The countries first conservatives made up of the strong republican group stick to the belief of linking morality and good values to God. The Democrats also share the more significant percentage of their members' opinion that with the belief in religion and God, the country promotes morality though having the smaller percentage in the belief of the religion promoting good morals. The solid liberals in both democrats and republicans believe that there is a very big rift between the countries' morals and religion, and they should not be used in an argument to support each other (Mason & Wronski, 2018).

The large percentages of the core conservatives and the countries first conservative have an opinion that abortion should be illegal. The republicans are so divided on the point of reason on legalizing and illegalizing the abortion (Chen et al., 2017). The decision on abortion is pinned to the opinion that it is giving humanity the rights and freedom to make decisions that solemnly favor their life objectives. The view of abortion is meant to give women political and social freedom. The democrats have a more significant percentage of their follows, very willing to see the legalizing of the abortion. The solid democratic liberals seem to be in full support of the legalizing of the abortion.
