Healthcare as a Fundamental Human Right

Healthcare should be made a fundamental human right as it has a direct impact on the life of an individual. When people are allowed to receive free medical attention, they will be treated on time regardless of their race, economic status, ethnic background or social status. Many are times when people die at medical facilities waiting to be admitted as they wait for the family and friends to raise money needed for admission. Thus, protection of human life should be given a priority by making healthcare a basic human right. The government should always provide affordable healthcare to the citizens by subsidizing or reducing the cost to zero. Most importantly, the government should take the responsibility of the caregiver or health facility to provide emergency treatment to those who require the attention without asking for a deposit.

Notwithstanding, the quality of healthcare services provided to people should not be stratified according to the social or economic status. When one is sick, he should receive the best possible medical attention possible. This will not only reduce the mortality rate but also reduce the life complications associated with late medical attention. However, in certain developing countries, it might be impractical to provide free medical care to its citizen due to the high cost of running the project. In such cases, the government should identify a vulnerable group that will receive the medical attention free of charge while the other pay a subsidized cost. Conclusively, the focus should ensure that emergency response is provided at all times regardless of whether the patients can afford the service or not.
