Prison Gangs and the Free World

Almost every prison in the United States has gangs; these gangs results in innocent, incarcerated individuals to be harmed. Similarly, prison gangs are also the major players in the illegal market and have a significant role in causing fierceness, viciousness, and other criminal doings. However, according to Skarbek (2011), prison governance plays a critical role in leading to the development of criminal gangs. The deportation of prison gangs might be a changing game on how correctional institutions are administered because it will reduce prison population. Moreover, deportation will also help reduce prisoners from engaging in gangs hence reducing violence and other criminal activities supported by gangs.

Free world society and prisons have conflicting norms and values because the free world always supports peace and living in harmony. However, prison gangs have different values and principles that guide them; hence they believe that they will be incarcerated in the future (Skarbek, 2011). Also, prison gangs always promote a race-based fight in the free world society (Tapia et al., 2014). Furthermore, the same source reports that most individuals involved in prison gangs are young because of variations in the opportunity for rewarding street events such as admittance to weapons, readiness for drug market networks as well as inundating the market by associations. Similarly, prisons are affected by prison gangs' values and norms because they engage in ferocious activities that may injure other inmates. Although prison governance is required to ensure inmates maintain social order, the free world gang members have a significant role in prison gangs because the latter is in the illegal market and thus have to corporate with the former. Fleisher (2006) argues that there is social exchange among the prison gangs and free world gangs because most gangs developed in prisons are associated with free world gangs;

hence inmates affiliated with them will be protected while they work towards accomplishing the values of the gang.
