Part 2

Hello, it was a pleasure reading your discussion, and thank you for sharing such a meaningful discussion on the incredible usefulness of Wikipedia. Indeed, Wikipedia has often faced massive criticism concerning its credibility, yet at the same time, it has been one of the most consulted sites when it comes to information acquisition. On that matter, I find your discussion perfectly timely concerning the usefulness of Wikipedia. The discussion is well researched and communicated, for it rightly serves its intended purpose of informing the readers on some of the credible uses of Wikipedia.

I agree with you that Wikipedia is a great source. I drew much attention specifically to your point that almost everything in the world is found on Wikipedia. Therefore this ready availability of the sources in Wikipedia makes it possible for the researchers to do background checks on pieces of information they so wish to inquire about. Additionally, as part of my support to your discussion, I find Wikipedia incredibly useful in acquiring information because it is a free and noncommercial source. Wikipedia does not require one to pay for the information either by registration or subscription. One is just required to search for any result he or she needs, and Wikipedia displays the results at the comfort of his or her phone. It is very accurate that every digital information source must have weaknesses, and Wikipedia is not exceptional. However, I agree with your research and discussion that Wikipedia's strengths outweigh its weaknesses, therefore, making it an incredible source of information.

I am so delighted to read a well-researched discussion. From your paper, people can significantly learn not to criticize Wikipedia but develop an open mind in their perception about the source. You have brought it out in a show that despite people's poor perception about

Wikipedia, through its strengths against weaknesses, Wikipedia remains to be the most visited site in information acquisition.
