Response

I agree with the response to ethical study as it changes an individual perspective from individual thinking to collective thinking. However, it deviates from the point by defining people as society becomes a norm. My view is that this is acting ethically hence there is failure to explain why study ethics in your first point. The work is wordy and fails to provide more points to support the topic. Contrarily, you opt to define ethical principles and describe how ethics plays a crucial role in society. My opinion is how you would offer more points compared to defining terminologies and stating the obvious. On the brighter side, I justify your point on the ethical study as your answer provides an opportunity to understand people and their differences better. However, describing how ethics alter values and decision-making represents ethical behavior and, therefore, does not stand out as a reason to study ethics when not acting ethically. Finally, the conclusion is superb, and you sum up the key points together to give a well-formulated closing sentence. In conclusion, you have a fairly good response even though you deviate from the topic in more than one instance, it is logical that you have a deeper understanding of the topic being discussed but lack the words to explain your points better.
